Ceremonies at the testimonial dinner in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past twenty years, will be broadcast on WROK and the Blue network tonight at 10:30. The dinner and program will be a tribute to the inestimable aid and encouragement which Dr. Koussevitsky has extended to American composers and musicians. Aaron Copland will preside as master of ceremonies and Dr. Howard Hanson will speak on behalf of the composers represented at the dinner.

United Press news is scheduled on WROK tonight at 6 and 10 o'clock and tomorrow morning at 6:05, 6:30 and 7:55. The Blue network inserts late evening bulletins at 10:55 and 11:55. WROK's regular operating hours will be extended in the event of important news.

The Green Hornet, Blue network mystery thriller, will be heard on WROK tonight at 6:30. Boris Karloff has the starring role in another spine-chiller, Creeps By Night, at 9:30.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

MAY 24 1944

YMPHONY MANAGERS MEET

BOSTON (U.P.)—Managers of symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada arrived in Boston today for a two-day conference during which they will be the guests of George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony. J. W. Elton of Toronto represents the only non-United States organization at the conference. Two women represent major symphony orchestras. They are Mrs. Leland A. Irish of Los Angeles and Mrs. Ruth O. Seufert of Kansas City, Mo.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

MAY 24 1944

Musicians Applaud Audience.

Boston, May 24 (U.P.)—So attentive were children during a performance of Bethoven's Eroica Symphony that Boston Symphony Orchestra members concluded by applauding the youthful audience.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 21 1944

COMPOSERS' TRIBUTE

Dinner for Koussevitzky Was a Gesture Of Gratitude From American Musicians

By OLIN DOWNES

THE testimonial dinner tendered Dr. Koussevitzky by American composers last Tuesday night was far more than a conventional gesture of recognition for the completion of his twenty years in the country of his adoption as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was, in fact, the expression of the profound gratitude, especially of the younger men, for his singularly comprehending and effective labors in their behalf, and of the faith in themselves and the renewed enthusiasm of their creative effort which he has kindled.

And indeed no musician, least of all one of Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathies and insight, could have been indifferent to the tributes that the evening called forth. These did not have the form of some resounding title, bestowed with the flourish of trumpets customary on official occasions. Nor was there any shining medal or similar guerdon of service. The testimonials were simple and much more significant. They were the lists of American compositions and of the works of living composers on both sides of the Atlantic which Koussevitzky, with the insight and zeal which always have characterized him, had made known to the public.

Compositions Listed

They were extraordinary lists. The dinner card offered no menu (which, in view of the character of the food, was tactful), but presented instead the titles of more than one hundred and fifty compositions by Americans (so classified as being either of native birth or citizenship since September of 1939) and sixty-three first performances. Supplementing this was a historical bound volume, a gift of the evening presented by Mrs. Margaret Grant, with the signatures and sentiments and notations from their scores of all the composers of whatever nationality now living in America whose works Dr. Koussevitzky has interpreted. To these tokens whole groups of composers, seniors and juniors, from England and from Russia, added their messages.

Thus was outlined the special position Dr. Koussevitzky has taken as an exponent of contemporary music. It need not be claimed—in fact, he himself was the first to advance a disclaimer—that he alone has advanced the cause of the native composer. That is by no means the case. One of the distinguished guests of the evening was Dr. Walter Damrosch. It was he who gave first performances of compositions by Aaron Copland and Howard Hanson, the two principal speakers of the evening; who had commissioned the composition of George Gershwin's first important essay in an avowedly classic and symphonic form—the Concerto in F; and who through his whole career had offered programs which with true catholicity advanced music new and old, native and of foreign origin, and passed by no important manifestation in the tonal art of his period.

Damrosch Cited

More: as Dr. Koussevitzky pointed out, Dr. Damrosch had introduced Bach and Wagner when they were still novelties in many places in America. And other conductors, had it been the occasion, who now lead American orchestras, would be in the list of highly honorable mention. But their notable services would not invalidate the unique and in fact historical relation in which Koussevitzky stands today to the evolution of American music.

Before him, and in spite of a rapid increase of opportunities, the native composer faced an impasse in his development. He had little opportunity to hear his own music and hence to gain the practical experience necessary to become a skilled workman. Too often he was composing unnoticed and experimentally in a vacuum. Therefore he was unable to produce even technically representative scores. The nation must wait, it seemed, until in some way this composer found his feet and wrote some good music! It was a paradoxical dilemma, but a very real one—one which, for example, still confronts our conductors.

Dr. Koussevitzky did not wait for times to change. He changed them. He acted. He met the composer more than halfway. The young men found in him an intuitive response to their thought and their needs; and a wise counselor and fearless champion. That out of the 150-odd American compositions Koussevitzky has performed there may not be more than a dozen of over a day's significance, does not alter his achievement, or affect its fruitfulness.

Remarkable Folk Singer

There will be later occasion, without doubt, in the course of some review, to speak of the remarkable and delightful art of Señora Olga Cuelho, the most finished and eloquent interpreter of folk music, revealed to that audience, that this reviewer has yet encountered. Her performance alone of songs of Guarnieri, de Falla, in the folk vein, and other folk melodies, would have made the evening memorable. Dorothy Maynor sang among other songs the birthday greeting, text and music by the 82-year-old Russian Gretchaninoff, who accompanied the singer in his greeting, especially created for the occasion, "Glory to Serge Alexandrovitch," and the two compatriots of many years rushed to each other's arms with a Russian kiss. There was the playing of the Prokofieff Third sonata by the brilliant William (Katchatourian) Kapell, as he was introduced by Mr. Copland. Then the side-splitting take-off of Koussevitzky for one, and Copland for another, "Sacha Pizzekaski," by the incomparable virtuoso humorist Adolph Green, with Leonard Bernstein at the piano. And then there were the Koussevitzky stories of rehearsal told and mimed by friend "Chou-Chou"—otherwise the brilliant musician, pianist, raconteur, Jesús María Sanromá. All worth telling. Here are two.

The story of the rehearsal, unsatisfactory to the conductor, of the third movement of a Berezowsky symphony, which is in elegiac vein. "Yes, gentlemen. I know it is funereal music. But—you are not the corpses."

Too Loud—Too Soft

The occasion when a wind instrument player could not get his solo to the conductor's satisfaction. A sort of a duel ensued, the player with eyes averted, and painfully attentive to Koussevitzky's repeated criticisms. "No! It is too loud. . . . No! It is too soft. No! Not the right phrasing. . . . No! You are playing without imagination." At which the artist, now certain that in any event he would be fired, summoned up courage enough to glare defiantly at the conductor, who looked back at him from his pulpit with resignation, and then said, sadly: "Very well! Kill me, if you will. It will give me more pleasure than to listen to you!" And finally, Mr. Copland's narrative of Koussevitzky's lukewarm and evasive comment upon Copland's attempt to conduct one of his own works. Later on, after a certain concert, the conductor asked what Copland thought of a Koussevitzky composition—a Passacaglia, which had figured in the program. "I will tell you that," said Copland, "when you give me your full and frank opinion of my conducting." Koussevitzky considered a moment, then shook his head. "No! So bad it is not!"

No one was more amused with these tales than their subject. He had reason to feel gratified with all that the occasion betokened. For he can say, regarding the question of the validity of the contemporary musical art, as also that of the potentialities of the American composers, that, with the passing of twenty years, he has won the argument.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAY 17 1944

Koussevitzky Feted in New York

Honored by 400 At Testimonial—SanRoma Resigns

Special to THE EAGLE

NEW YORK—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given a testimonial dinner at the Hotel Plaza last night with 400 in attendance. Aaron Copeland, composer, presided. Included were many others of the faculty of the Berkshire Music School at Tanglewood and many who have attended the famous Festival now being curtailed because of war conditions.

Among those from the Berkshires to attend were Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Owen Johnson and Miss Patricia Johnson of Stockbridge, Lester Roberts of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Laurence R. Connor and Mrs. George W. Edman of Pittsfield and Miss Annabelle Terrell of Chatham. Congratulatory wires were received from Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and Dr. and Mrs. Artur Rodzinski.

The resignation of Jesus Maria SanRoma as orchestra pianist of the Boston Symphony was read. He is to do concert work. His successor is Lucas Foss.

The program included Allelulìah written in 1940 by Randall Thompson to open the Berkshire Music School and solos by Dorothy Maynor, soprano, piano selections by Leonard Bernstein and Lucas Foss.

An address was given by Howard Hanson, recent Pulitzer Prize winner. Dr. Koussevitzky thanked all for their interest in his work. Conductors attending included Walter Damrosch and Bruno Walter. Cables were received from the leading Soviet composers, Shostakovitch and Prokofieff, and the celebrated Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAY 23 1944

A Deserved Salute

The homage accorded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the testimonial dinner held in his honor in New York last week naturally was of especial interest to his many admirers and summer neighors here in the Berkshires. A considerable share of his activities at Tanglewood, both in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he directed and of the school which he founded and launched with such prodigious success, had to do with the encouragement and support of native talent.

He very humbly refused to agree that he alone was deserving of praise on that score, but everyone familiar with the American musical scene will concede that he has not been excelled, at least, in the zeal with which he has searched and championed young composers and new music.

There are Chauvinists who pretend that the Boston Orchestra and Koussevitzky can make the musical scribblings of any tyro sound well. Certain it is that the composers who were chosen to receive initial performances through those channels were indeed fortunate but the respect which Dr. Koussevitzky has won from practically the entire musical fraternity is due to his tireless efforts to discover talent and then to nourish it with all the care, experience, affection and understanding at his command.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 16 1944

IC CRITICS PRIZE N BY BERNSTEIN

ah' Symphony Chosen son's Best Orchestral rk by an American rd Bernstein's "Jeremiah" ny No. 1 was voted the outorchestral work by an n composer introduced in k concert halls during the ust ended, by the Music Circle of New York, at a yesterday afternoon. The y by the young composer- r won a majority vote on ballot. Runners-up were Schuman's Symphony for and Norman Dello Joio's cat."

hree works, which were d from a list of more than new compositions introuring the season, were t a broadcast-concert of Symphony under the di- Dr. Frank Black last evening. It was from ert, which was attended membership of the Circle Oscar Thompson, music The New York Sun, that award was voted yesternoon.

eremiah" symphony was d by the New York Phil- -Symphony under the baton earlier this sea- Schuman work was first the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Kousse- Carnegie ~~Hall and~~ the "Magnificat" by the Na- chestral Association un- rection of Leon Barzin. he 1941-42 season, the e Circle's existence, Wil- man's Third Symphony ward and last year's win- aul Creston's Symphony e awards are presented in the form of certifid award will be made by or the season's most dis- new chamber work by an composer. The Circle on May 21 a concert of , part of which will be e National Broadcasting beginning at 12 noon, works, from which the in the chamber music ill be made, are string Randall Thompson and bertson, which will be the Roth Quartet; a tet by Sgt. Andrew Im- will be played by the Quartet, and Aaron Sonata, which will be by Mischa Mischakoff, er of the NBC Sym- Lukas Foss, young The chamber music e voted at the Circle's g of the season next

---

LE, WASH.
TIMES

7 1944

zky Asks p for Music

May 17.—(AP)—An dience of the coun- tant musical and night heard Serge upon A[illegible] a to a new world.

y spoke at a din- bration of the com- t 20 years as con- Boston Symphony inner began as a nized by a group mposers in recog- great conductor's American music. rew its frame, and m overflowed with en and women.

Dr. Kousse- t will include llegiate Cho- ert Shaw, and the piano of written for eonard Bern- will be mas- n the group rris, William ylor, Samuel ezowsky, Ed- Hill, Walter Dukelsky.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

2 1944

2 Young Musicians Win Honors In New York Concert Field

Koussevitzky Dinner A Huge Success; Ballet Theater Ends Popular Season

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, May 22—Youth ver definitely had its innings in Ne York this past week. Leonard Bernstein, the young ex-assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, who has scarce arrived at his mid-twenties, won th award of the Music Critics Circle o New York for the outstanding ne orchestral work premiere in the cit this season. Lukas Foss, who i about the same age, was showere with critical approval after premiere of his dramatic cantata The Prairie, by Robert Shaw and th Collegiate Chorale. Both are Serg Koussevitzky's "bright young men," Mr. Bernstein having had his training under the distinguished conductor, while Mr. Foss, is slated to become pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

The Bernste[illegible] which won the critics' award was the symphony Jeremiah, first heard in New York in March with the composer conductin. Nan Merriman, the Nation Federation of Music Clubs' Young Artist Winner of 1943, sang the solo part of the symphony for the re-hearing of the three top contenders in the famous Studio 8-H at NBC, and won almost as many encomiums as the gifted young composer—which will b good news to all her Portland admirers.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDED AT DINNER

Boston Symphony Conductor Is Honored for His Service to American Music

A dinner honoring Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the twenty years he has been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for his distinguished service to music in America, was held at the Plaza Hotel last night. The dinner, attended by several hundred friends and admirers of Dr. Koussevitzky, was tendered by a composers' committee which included Samuel Barber, Howard Hanson, Nicolai Berezowsky, Leonard Bernste Roy Harris, Edward Burlinghai Hill, Aaron Copland, Walter P ton, William Schuman, Vladim Dukelsky and Deems Taylor.

The program, which was broac cast over station WQXR from 1 P. M. to 10:30 and rebroadcast b transcription over the Blue Network at 11:30, was headed by Mr Copland who, as master of ceremonies, paid tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his espousal of the causes of American music.

"Dr. Koussevitzky has a profound understanding not only of music," he said, "but of what it means to be a composer. He loves music; but he never forgets the men who make it."

Dr. Koussevitzky pleaded the case of young American composers and their place in the sun. "We owe a debt to our composers," he said, warning of the way that they had been neglected in other eras "The coming generation of musicians should not have to blush for the failure of this generation in its treatment of composers. We should watch the example of Russia, who offers every means of protectio to her young creative artists. Th cause of justice to the composer in line with the American tradition."

The musical portion of the program, provided by the Collegiate Chorale, directed by Robert Shaw, included performances of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia" and William Schuman's "Holiday Song," and as an encore, four short songs of Hindemith.

Messages congratulating Dr. Koussevitzky came from all parts of the world and included telegrams from the Moscow Conservatory and the Moscow Philharmonic signed by Shostakovich, Prokoffief, Khatchaturian and Shebalin, and others from Vaughn Williams in London, Igor Stravinsky, Darius Milhaud, Roger Sessions, William Walton, Eugene Goosens, Carlos Chavez, Dr. and Mrs. Artur Rodzinski.

The guests at the dinner included hundreds of distinguished figures from all phases of America's musical life.

ROCKFORD, ILL.
REGISTER-REPUBLIC

MAY 1 8 1944

Koussevitsky Is Honored

Ceremonies Broadcast By WROK Tonight

WROK HIGHLIGHTS
Tonight

6:00—News.
6:30—Green Hornet (B).
7:20—U. S. E. S.
7:30—Let Yourself Go (B).
8:30—Spotlight Bands (B).
9:30—Creeps By Night (B).
10:00—News.
10:30—Koussevitsky Dinner (B).

Wednesday

6:00 a. m.—Musical Clock.
8:00 a. m.—Breakfast Club (B).
9:15 a. m.—My True Story (B).
10:00 a. m.—Breakfast at Sardi's (B).
10:45 a. m.—Victory Food Club
12:15 p. m.—Column Left.

Ceremonies at the testimonia dinner in honor of Dr. Serge Kousevitsky, distinguished conductor o the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past twenty years, will be broadcast on WROK and the Blue network tonight at 10:30. The dinner and program will be a tribute to the inestimable aid and encouragement which Dr. Koussevitsky has extended to American composers and musicians. Aaron Copland will preside as master o ceremonies and Dr. Howard Hanson will speak on behalf of the composers represented at the dinner.

United Press news is scheduled on WROK tonight at 6 and 10 o'clock and tomorrow morning at 6:05, 6:30 and 7:55. The Blue network inserts late evening bulletins at 10:55 and 11:55. WROK's regular operating hours will be extended in the event of important news.

The Green Hornet, Blue network mystery thriller, will be heard on WROK tonight at 6:30. Boris Karloff has the starring role in another spine-chiller, Creeps By Night, at 9:30.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

MAY 24 1944

YMPHONY MANAGERS MEET

BOSTON (U.P.)—Managers of symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada arrived in Boston today for a two-day conference during which they will be the guests of George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony. J. W. Elton of Toronto ~~represents~~ the only non-United States organization at the conference. Two women represent major symphony orchestras. They are Mrs. Leland A. Irish of Los Angeles and Mrs. Ruth O. Seufert of Kansas City, Mo.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

MAY 24 1944

Musicians Applaud Audience.

Boston, May 24 (U.P.)—So attentive were children during a performance of Bethoven's Eroica Symphony that Boston Symphony Orchestra members concluded by applauding the youthful audience.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 21 1944

COMPOSERS' TRIBUTE

Dinner for Koussevitzky Was a Gesture Of Gratitude From American Musicians

By OLIN DOWNES

THE testimonial dinner tendered Dr. Koussevitzky by American composers last Tuesday night was far more than a conventional gesture of recognition for the completion of his twenty years in the country of his adoption as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was, in fact, the expression of the profound gratitude, especially of the younger men, for his singularly comprehending and effective labors in their behalf, and of the faith in themselves and the renewed enthusiasm of their creative effort which he has kindled.

And indeed no musician, least of all one of Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathies and insight, could have been indifferent to the tributes that the evening called forth. These did not have the form of some resounding title, bestowed with the flourish of trumpets customary on official occasions. Nor was there any shining medal or similar guerdon of service. The testimonials were simple and much more significant. They were the lists of American compositions and of the works of living composers on both sides of the Atlantic which Koussevitzky, with the insight and zeal which always have characterized him, had made known to the public.

Compositions Listed

They were extraordinary lists. The dinner card offered no menu (which, in view of the character of the food, was tactful), but presented instead the titles of more than one hundred and fifty compositions by Americans (so classified as being either of native birth or citizenship since September of 1939) and sixty-three first performances. Supplementing this was a historical bound volume, a gift of the evening presented by Mrs. Margaret Grant, with the signatures and sentiments and notations from their scores of all the composers of whatever nationality now living in America whose works Dr. Koussevitzky has interpreted. To these tokens whole groups of composers, seniors and juniors, from England and from Russia, added their messages.

Thus was outlined the special position Dr. Koussevitzky has taken as an exponent of contemporary music. It need not be claimed—in fact, he himself was the first to advance a disclaimer—that he alone has advanced the cause of the native composer. That is by no means the case. One of the distinguished guests of the evening was Dr. Walter Damrosch. It was he who gave first performances of compositions by Aaron Copland and Howard Hanson, the two principal speakers of the evening; who had commissioned the composition of George Gershwin's first important essay in an avowedly classic and symphonic form—the Concerto in F; and who through his whole career had offered programs which with true catholicity advanced music new and old, native and of foreign origin, and passed by no important manifestation in the tonal art of his period.

Damrosch Cited

More: as Dr. Koussevitzky pointed out, Dr. Damrosch had introduced Bach and Wagner when they were still novelties in many places in America. And other conductors, had it been the occasion, who now lead American orchestras, would be in the list of highly honorable mention. But their notable services would not invalidate the unique and in fact historical relation in which Koussevitzky stands today to the evolution of American music.

Before him, and in spite of a rapid increase of opportunities, the native composer faced an impasse in his development. He had little opportunity to hear his own music and hence to gain the practical experience necessary to become a skilled workman. Too often he was composing unnoticed and experimentally in a vacuum. Therefore he was unable to produce even technically representative scores. The nation must wait, it seemed, until in some way this composer found his feet and wrote some good music! It was a paradoxical dilemma, but a very real one—one which, for example, still confronts our conductors.

Dr. Koussevitzky did not wait for times to change. He changed them. He acted. He met the composer more than halfway. The young men found in him an intuitive response to their thought and their needs; and a wise counselor and fearless champion. That out of the 150-odd American compositions Koussevitzky has performed there may not be more than a dozen of over a day's significance, does not alter his achievement, or affect its fruitfulness.

Remarkable Folk Singer

There will be later occasion, without doubt, in the course of some review, to speak of the remarkable and delightful art of Señora Olga Cuelho, the most finished and eloquent interpreter of folk music, revealed to that audience, that this reviewer has yet encountered. Her performance alone of songs of Guarnieri, de Falla, in the folk vein, and other folk melodies, would have made the evening memorable. Dorothy Maynor sang among other songs the birthday greeting, text and music by the 82-year-old Russian Gretchaninoff, who accompanied the singer in his greeting, especially created for the occasion, "Glory to Serge Alexandrovitch," and the two compatriots of many years rushed to each other's arms with a Russian kiss. There was the playing of the Prokofieff Third sonata by the brilliant William (Katchatourian) Kapell, as he was introduced by Mr. Copland. Then the side-splitting take-off of Koussevitzky for one, and Copland for another, "Sacha Pizzekaski," by the incomparable virtuoso humorist Adolph Green, with Leonard Bernstein at the piano. And then there were the Koussevitzky stories of rehearsal told and mimed by friend "Chou-Chou"—otherwise the brilliant musician, pianist, raconteur, Jesús María Sanromá. All worth telling. Here are two.

The story of the rehearsal, unsatisfactory to the conductor, of the third movement of a Berezowsky symphony, which is in elegiac vein. "Yes, gentlemen. I know it is funereal music. But—you are not the corpses."

Too Loud—Too Soft

The occasion when a wind instrument player could not get his solo to the conductor's satisfaction. A sort of a duel ensued, the player with eyes averted, and painfully attentive to Koussevitzky's repeated criticisms. "No! It is too loud. . . . No! It is too soft. No! Not the right phrasing. . . . No! You are playing without imagination." At which the artist, now certain that in any event he would be fired, summoned up courage enough to glare defiantly at the conductor, who looked back at him from his pulpit with resignation, and then said, sadly: "Very well! Kill me, if you will. It will give me more pleasure than to listen to you!" And finally, Mr. Copland's narrative of Koussevitzky's lukewarm and evasive comment upon Copland's attempt to conduct one of his own works. Later on, after a certain concert, the conductor asked what Copland thought of a Koussevitzky composition—a Passacaglia, which had figured in the program. "I will tell you that," said Copland, "when you give me your full and frank opinion of my conducting." Koussevitzky considered a moment, then shook his head. "No! So bad it is not!"

No one was more amused with these tales than their subject. He had reason to feel gratified with all that the occasion betokened. For he can say, regarding the question of the validity of the contemporary musical art, as also that of the potentialities of the American composers, that, with the passing of twenty years, he has won the argument.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAY 17 1944

Koussevitzky Feted in New York

Honored by 400 At Testimonial— SanRoma Resigns

Special to THE EAGLE

NEW YORK—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given a testimonial dinner at the Hotel Plaza last night with 400 in attendance. Aaron Copeland, composer, presided. Included were many others of the faculty of the Berkshire Music School at Tanglewood and many who have attended the famous Festival now being curtailed because of war conditions.

Among those from the Berkshires to attend were Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Owen Johnson and Miss Patricia Johnson of Stockbridge, Lester Roberts of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Laurence R. Connor and Mrs. George W. Edman of Pittsfield and Miss Annabelle Terrell of Chatham. Congratulatory wires were received from Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and Dr. and Mrs. Artur Rodzinski.

The resignation of Jesus Maria SanRoma as orchestra pianist of the Boston Symphony was read. He is to do concert work. His successor is Lucas Foss.

The program included Alleluliah written in 1940 by Randall Thompson to open the Berkshire Music School and solos by Dorothy Maynor, soprano, piano selections by Leonard Bernstein and Lucas Foss.

An address was given by Howard Hanson, recent Pulitzer Prize winner. Dr. Koussevitzky thanked all for their interest in his work. Conductors attending included Walter Damrosch and Bruno Walter. Cables were received from the leading Soviet composers, Shostakovitch and Prokofieff, and the celebrated Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAY 23 1944

A Deserved Salute

The homage accorded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the testi~~monial dinner held~~ in his honor in New York last week naturally was of especial interest to his many admirers and summer neighors here in the Berkshires. A considerable share of his activities at Tanglewood, both in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he directed and of the school which he founded and launched with such prodigious success, had to do with the encouragement and support of native talent.

He very humbly refused to agree that he alone was deserving of praise on that score, but everyone familiar with the American musical scene will concede that he has not been excelled, at least, in the zeal with which he has searched and championed young composers and new music.

There are Chauvinists who pretend that the Boston Orchestra and Koussevitzky can make the musical scribblings of any tyro sound well. Certain it is that the composers who were chosen to receive initial performances through those channels were indeed fortunate but the respect which Dr. Koussevitzky has won from practically the entire musical fraternity is due to his tireless efforts to discover talent and then to nourish it with all the care, experience, affection and understanding at his command.

This Clipping From MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

MAY 27 1944

Pull Up A Chair

By NEAL O'HARA

A human being improves in his ability to see objects up to his 17th year, and then a gradual decline sets in, according to research by Yale's Prof. Walter Miles. But so gradual is the decline that an average person of 52 years can see as well as a 14-year-old boy.

The Nazis have probably changed this by now, but up to their benevolent occupation of Denmark, one of Copenhagen's leading hotels had running beer as well as running water piped into all its guest rooms.

Summer stuff—to paste in your Panama hat: It isn't the heat of the sun that causes sunburn, but the actinic rays of the sun. In fact, there have been cases of sunburn contracted inside the Arctic Circle.

When Brown University at a special ceremony conferred an honorary degree on the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, he responded not with a speech, but by performing a short concert on his double bass.

Today's favorite gag: "Daddy," inquired the talkative six-year-old son of his father, "am I made of dust?" "I'm afraid not," said papa. "If you were, you'd dry up now and then."

We're just asking: What ever became of all that money certain labor unions collected from every worker who helped construct every Army post and camp in the United States and reached scandalous proportions? Nothing, so far as we're aware. But where did the millions of swag go?. Or doesn't the Government care?

The cinema veteran, Adolph Menjou, is boiling at adverse criticism by American newspaper men at actors and actresses who make USO appearances abroad for the entertainment of servicemen. His contention is that civilians have no right to criticize those performing for soldiers, and that any writer who is present, "by courtesy," at an Army show should shut up unless he has something good to say. Look, Adolph, what the heck do you think our servicemen are fighting for—the form of press censorship you advocate?

The demand for coffee in the United States has snapped back, after a slump when it was taken off the ration list, and the import quota for 1944-45 has been hoisted 15 per cent.

A utility egg package, containing the dehydrated equivalent of two dozen eggs in the space required for half a dozen fresh ones, will be a postwar application of a wartime development.

WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR

25 1944

Contemporary Music

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has long made a specialty of presenting contemporary music, called upon American composers to help music build a new world when he spoke at a dinner given in celebration of his twenty first anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We are in full accord with Doctor Koussevitsky's thought that the world may rediscover its soul through music, but we do not believe that contemporary composers, by and large, whether American or foreign, can promote the process as long as they devote their talent to the production of completely patternless composition.

It is not necessary to have the genius of Mozart or Beethoven or Brahams or Tchaikovski to write good orchestral music. But it certainly is not necessary, after centuries of musical evolution, to go back to the jungles for style. Deems Taylor, to cite one exception to the contemporary form has woven beautiful music for orchestras. By the classic standard, his music is not great, but it is always graceful, pleasing to the ear, and as all music should be restful when it is not stirring.

Amongst the contemporary symphonies Doctor Koussevitzky has presented, and we have heard most of them, we have uniformly failed to find rest and have been stirred only to revolt.

THE PHILA. FORUM
MAGAZINE
PHILA., PA
JUNE, 1944

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE FORUM will again present the Annual Philadelphia Concert. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

MAY 27 1944

Short Symphony Works Featured by Victor

By MILTON WIDDER

VICTOR'S classical list for the month consists entirely of single-platter releases featuring contemporary compositions, a fev songs and some encore numbers from th symphony literature.

Corp. Samuel Farber's overture to "Schoo for Scandal," played by the Janssen Symphony of Los Angeles, directed by Werner Janssen, is a light, frothy and thoroughly delightful piece which catches the comedy of Sheridan.

Corp. Barber's Second Symphony was performed last month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and received praise from the eastern critics.

Another symphonic recording is by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, including the spirited "The Banjo," by Louis Gottschalk (transcribed by Quinto Magini), and two pieces in ragtime, "Jazz Legato" and "Jazz Pizzicato," by Leroy Anderson. The Anderson works are tuneful and light.

Miliza Korjus, the coloratura who also has looks, is presented in two songs by Victor, one the "Laughing Song" from "The Bat," sung in Spanish, and "The Nightingale," a waltz from the film, "Caballeria del Imperio." The latter gives the singer some opportunity for extraordinary vocal gymnastics.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

MAY 31 1944

Koussevitsky Award WNEW Answer to Beef On U.S. Talent Brusho

Cueing its action to recent Li mag article by Serge Koussevitsk conductor of the Boston Symphor Orchestra, in which the famed ma stro deplored failure to foster ar encourage American musical taler WNEW, N. Y., which generally hev to the pop music groove, has set u a Koussevitsky Award. Winner, be selected from series of finalists b the Boston symph leader and othe judges, will receive a $1,000 fiddle.

Station takes the position tha while there are plenty opportunitie for scholarships to the longhaire academies, the kids with the talen are often stymied by inability to la out coin for a good instrumen Koussevitsky has told the station h likes the idea.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 17 1944

Koussevitzky Is Honore For His Service to Mus

Dinner Here Marks 20 Year With the Boston Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was th guest of honor at a dinner give last night by a committee of com posers at the Hotel Plaza, Fifty ninth Street and Fifth Avenue, t celebrate his twentieth year a conductor of the Boston Symphon Orchestra. Dr. Howard Hanso director of the Eastman School Music, praised Mr. Koussevitzky work and said that he ha "strengthened our faith in th eternal spirit of beauty."

Mr. Koussevitzky called upon th American people to support com posers and creative artists, sayin that if these are not dying heartbreak and hunger today, the are having a constant struggle make a living. "We who ser art," he declared, "have faith the people of America. We firm believe that the day will com when not only groups, but also th world public will participate in th effort to organize life so that a will be supported by the people a controlled by the artists."

TIMES

JUN 1 - 1944

COMMISSIONS GIVEN FOR RADIO MUSIC

Works Ordered From Composers by the Blue Network

Musical compositions of five to seven minutes in length, designed especially for radio broadcasting, have been ordered by the Blue network from composers in the serious and popular music fields, Mark Woods, president of the Blue, announced yesterday.

Among those commissioned to write the streamlined works, or "symphonettes," are Roy Harris, Igor Stravinsky, Aaron Copland, Leonard Bernstein, David Rose, Richard Rodgers, Morton Gould, Peter De Rose, Erich Korngold, Victor Young and Ferde Grofe. Presentation of their works will begin in July over the Blue chain and will continue for thirteen consecutive weeks on varying days during each week under the general supervision of Paul Whiteman, musical director for the network.

The commissions are to be paid, Mr. Woods said, out of a newly established "Creative Music Fund," with the network retaining first broadcast rights and exclusive performance rights for one year. Accrued royalties will be assigned to the Blue until the sum originally advanced is returned to the fund, after which all royalties will go to the composer. The size of the fund and the individual commission was not disclosed.

Mr. Woods last year commissioned the writing of Mr. Harris' Sixth Symphony, which was given its première by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUN 25 1944

THOSE POPULAR BOSTON 'POPS'

By HARRY RAUCH

"HELLO, fighting men in the Pacific! Are you lonely tonight? This is Radio Tokyo bringing you your Sunday evening concert hour. Tonight we feature the magnificent playing of the Boston Pops Orchestra." Thus spoke Tokyo Rose, in her oft-described Bostonian accent, one recent night, for the benefit of our boys in that battle area.

What is this Boston Pops Orchestra? What is its magic that even the Japs use it as musical ammunition to pop at our fighting forces? The answer probably lies in the fact that for sixty seasons now this unique organization, only one of its kind on the whole American continent, has been neither fish nor fowl, musically.

It vacillates faithfully with the average American's musical trend, definitely handing the symphonic heavies the cold shoulder during the warm months. It embraces a "Mairzy Doats" with the same reverence as the "Eroica" of Beethoven.

Musical Harbinger

To Bostonians spring comes, not with the first flowers but with the announcement of the first Pops concert at the beginning of May, when ninety members of the regular symphonic orchestra, freed from the bondage of standard symphonic masterworks, start swinging the hit tunes of our time and the lighter classics of all time.

To be sure, the eminent conductor of the winter season concerts, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has nothing to do with this loosening of the spirit of spring in Boston. The Pops conductor is Arthur Fiedler, a maestro who is not averse to playing the tinniest of Tin-Pan Alley tunes if the public calls loudly enough for them as the evening's pièce-de-résistance, or encore.

When the first Pops concert was presented in old Music Hall on July 11, 1885, the public was invited to "Come and see the new electric lamps," as well as to hear the music. It should be noted that Music Hall, erected in 1852, was one of the first gathering places to be wired for light. Although the reviewer of The Boston Transcript thought pretty well of the light, and the program, he was moved to report that "the mounds of ice cream are too low and the price of beer too high."

"C'est la Guerre"

In these times, if the same holds true of the ice cream and beer, the patron affably mumbles "c'est la guerre." Sandwiches are from 15 cents up and the wine list is modest enough, considering.

Today the Pops concerts claim a world-wide audience, through the Saturday night broadcasts over the Blue Network, and the millions of Pops recordings. OWI transcriptions bring the Pops music to the ears of service men and women on every battlefront.

And what these various outlets overlook in the way of presenting the delightful concerts of the Boston Pops Orchestra, Tokyo Rose generously fills in of a Sunday evening. And what could be more accommodating than that, save a mass hara-kiri movement on the part of the little Nips?

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
JEWISH EXAMINER

JUN 2 - 1944

Koussevitzky's Brother Killed

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symhony Orchestra, has been informed of his brother Nicholas' death in Leningrad in 1941 at the hands of the Nazis.

SALISBURY, MD
ADVERTISER
6/29/44

LOVE OF MUSIC IS EASILY GOTTEN

You don't have to have a technical knowledge of music in order to appreciate good music, according to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor.

Don't let your lack of technical musical knowledge scare you away from the enjoyment of good music, because if you really want to appreciate good music, all you have to do is listen to it a few times, he suggests.

Dr. Koussevitzky lists 15 classical compositions which will lead the beginner easily into an appreciation of music in an article by George Marek in the July issue of Good Housekeeping magazine. He lists:

"Mozart: Symphony in C. Major, No. 43; Haydn: Symphony in B-flat Major, No. 9 in London series; Beethoven: Symphony in A Major, No. 7; Mendelssohn: 'Italian' Symphony; Schumann: 'Sprin an' Symphony; Schumann: 'Spring' Symphony; Tchaikovsky: Symphony in F Minor, No. 4; Berioz: 'Fantastic' Symphony; Brahms: Symphony in E Minor, No. 4; Richard Strauss: 'Thus Spake Zarathustra' Tone Poem; Debussy: 'The Sea' Symphonic Sketches; Ravel: 'Daphnis and Chole,' ballet suite; Stravinsk 'The Rite of Spring', ballet; Pr kofieff: 'Lieutenant Kije' suite Sibelius: Symphony in B-flat Major, No. 5; and Roy Harris: Symphony No. 3."

HEMET, CAL
NEWS
6/9/44

Hint to Composers

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, veteran conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, feels a little sorry for composers. Too bad, he says, that most of them can't make a living from their work.

Evidently he has in mind music in its more exalted forms and those creators who attempt to maintain the classical tradition. He wouldn't we suppose, know much about the earning capacity of a "Pistol Packin' Mama" or any of that juke box brood that is said to amass quite a revenue by retailing at a nickel a performance. Or maybe his ear just doesn't recognize any connection between this kind of folk rhythm and the music of his experience. At any rate there is no juke box outlet for symphonies, sonatas, concertos et cetera.

Perhaps the composers of our best music might take a tip from the experience of the author of Main Street. He started out by writing a revenue producing potboiler or two for lunch money to tide him over the period when he set himself seriously to the task of producing the great American novel. The method seemed to work pretty well. A hit song or two might become the foundation for composition of the great American symphony.

This Clipping From MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

MAY 27 1944

Pull Up A Chair

By NEAL O'HARA

A human being improves in his ability to see objects up to his 17th year, and then a gradual decline sets in, according to research by Yale's Prof. Walter Miles. But so gradual is the decline that an average person of 52 years can see as well as a 14-year-old boy.

The Nazis have probably changed this by now, but up to their benevolent occupation of Denmark, one of Copenhagen's leading hotels had running beer as well as running water piped into all its guest rooms.

Summer stuff—to paste in your Panama hat: It isn't the heat of the sun that causes sunburn, but the actinic rays of the sun. In fact, there have been cases of sunburn contracted inside the Arctic Circle.

When Brown University at a special ceremony conferred an honorary degree on the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, he responded not with a speech, but by performing a short concert on his double bass.

Today's favorite gag: "Daddy," inquired the talkative six-year-old son of his father, "am I made of dust?" "I'm afraid not," said papa. "If you were, you'd dry up now and then."

We're just asking: What ever became of all that money certain labor unions collected from every worker who helped construct every Army post and camp in the United States and reached scandalous proportions? Nothing, so far as we're aware. But where did the millions of swag go? Or doesn't the Government care?

The cinema veteran, Adolph Menjou, is boiling at adverse criticism by American newspaper men at actors and actresses who make USO appearances abroad for the entertainment of servicemen. His contention is that civilians have no right to criticize those performing for soldiers, and that any writer who is present, "by courtesy," at an Army show should shut up unless he has something good to say. Look, Adolph, what the heck do you think our servicemen are fighting for—the form of press censorship you advocate?

The demand for coffee in the United States has snapped back, after a slump when it was taken off the ration list, and the import quota for 1944-45 has been hoisted 15 per cent.

A utility egg package, containing the dehydrated equivalent of two dozen eggs in the space required for half a dozen fresh ones, will be a postwar application of a wartime development.

WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR

MAY 25 1944

Contemporary Music

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has long made a specialty of presenting contemporary music, called upon American composers to help music build a new world when he spoke at a dinner given in celebration of his twenty-first anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We are in full accord with Doctor Koussevitsky's thought that the world may rediscover its soul through music, but we do not believe that contemporary composers, by and large, whether American or foreign, can promote the process as long as they devote their talent to the production of completely patternless composition.

It is not necessary to have the genius of Mozart or Beethoven or Brahams or Tchaikovski to write good orchestral music. But it certainly is not necessary, after centuries of musical evolution, to go back to the jungles for style. Deems Taylor, to cite one exception to the contemporary form has woven beautiful music for orchestras. By the classic standard, his music is not great, but it is always graceful, pleaing to the ear, and as all music should be restful when it is not stirring.

Amongt the contemporary symphonies Doctor Koussevitzky has presented, and we have heard most of them, we have uniformly failed to find rest and have been stirred only to revolt

---

THE PHILA. FORUM
MAGAZINE
PHILA., PA
JUNE. 1944

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE FORUM will again present the Annual Philadelphia Concert Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

MAY 27 1944

Short Symphony Works Featured by Victor

By MILTON WIDDER

VICTOR'S classical list for the month consists entirely of single-platter releases featuring contemporary compositions, a few songs and some encore numbers from the symphony literature.

Corp. Samuel Farber's overture to "School for Scandal," played by the Janssen Symphony of Los Angeles, directed by Werner Janssen, is a light, frothy and thoroughly delightful piece which catches the comedy of Sheridan.

Corp. Barber's Second Symphony was performed last month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and received praise from the eastern critics.

Another symphonic recording is by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, including the spirited "The Banjo," by Louis Gottschalk (transcribed by Quinto Magini), and two pieces in ragtime, "Jazz Legato" and "Jazz Pizzicato," by Leroy Anderson. The Anderson works are tuneful and light.

Miliza Korjus, the coloratura who also has looks, is presented in two songs by Victor, one the "Laughing Song" from "The Bat," sung in Spanish, and "The Nightingale," a waltz from the film, "Caballeria del Imperio." The latter gives the singer some opportunity for extraordinary vocal gymnastics.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

MAY 31 1944

Koussevitsky Award WNEW Answer to Beef On U.S. Talent Brushof

Cueing its action to recent Li mag article by Serge Koussevitsk conductor of the Boston Symphon Orchestra, in which the famed ma stro deplored failure to foster an encourage American musical talen WNEW, N. Y., which generally hew to the pop music groove, has set u a Koussevitsky Award. Winner, t be selected from series of finalists b the Boston symph leader and othe judges, will receive a $1,000 fiddle.

Station takes the position tha while there are plenty opportunitie for scholarships to the longhaire academies, the kids with the talen are often stymied by inability to la out coin for a good instrument Koussevitsky has told the station h likes the idea.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 17 1944

Koussevitzky Is Honore For His Service to Musi

Dinner Here Marks 20 Year With the Boston Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was th guest of honor at a dinner give last night by a committee of com posers at the Hotel Plaza, Fifty ninth Street and Fifth Avenue, t celebrate his twentieth year a conductor of the Boston Symphon Orchestra. Dr. Howard Hanso director of the Eastman School c Music, praised Mr. Koussevitzky work and said that he ha "strengthened our faith in th eternal spirit of beauty."

Mr. Koussevitzky called upon th American people to support com posers and creative artists, sayin that if these are not dying heartbreak and hunger today, the are having a constant struggle make a living. "We who ser art," he declared, "have faith the people of America. We firm believe that the day will com when not only groups, but also th world public will participate in th effort to organize life so that a will be supported by the people a controlled by the artists."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JUN 1 - 1944

COMMISSIONS GIVEN FOR RADIO MUSIC

Works Ordered From Composers by the Blue Network

Musical compositions of five to seven minutes in length, designed especially for radio broadcasting, have been ordered by the Blue network from composers in the serious and popular music fields, Mark Woods, president of the Blue, announced yesterday.

Among those commissioned to write the streamlined works, or "symphonettes," are Roy Harris, Igor Stravinsky, Aaron Copland, Leonard Bernstein, David Rose, Richard Rodgers, Morton Gould, Peter De Rose, Erich Korngold, Victor Young and Ferde Grofe. Presentation of their works will begin in July over the Blue chain and will continue for thirteen consecutive weeks on varying days during each week under the general supervision of Paul Whiteman, musical director for the network.

The commissions are to be paid, Mr. Woods said, out of a newly established "Creative Music Fund," with the network retaining first broadcast rights and exclusive performance rights for one year. Accrued royalties will be assigned to the Blue until the sum originally advanced is returned to the fund, after which all royalties will go to the composer. The size of the fund and the individual commission was not disclosed.

Mr. Woods last year commissioned the writing of Mr. Harris' Sixth Symphony, which was given its première by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUN 25 1944

THOSE POPULAR BOSTON 'POPS'

By HARRY RAUCH

"HELLO, fighting men in the Pacific! Are you lonely tonight? This is Radio Tokyo bringing you your Sunday evening concert hour. Tonight we feature the magnificent playing of the Boston Pops Orchestra." Thus spoke Tokyo Rose, in her oft-described Bostonian accent, one recent night, for the benefit of our boys in that battle area.

What is this Boston Pops Orchestra? What is its magic that even the Japs use it as musical ammunition to pop at our fighting forces? The answer probably lies in the fact that for sixty seasons now this unique organization, only one of its kind on the whole American continent, has been neither fish nor fowl, musically.

It vacillates faithfully with the average American's musical trend, definitely handing the symphonic heavies the cold shoulder during the warm months. It embraces a "Mairzy Doats" with the same reverence as the "Eroica" of Beethoven.

Musical Harbinger

To Bostonians spring comes, not with the first flowers but with the announcement of the first Pops concert at the beginning of May, when ninety members of the regular symphonic orchestra, freed from the bondage of standard symphonic masterworks, start swinging the hit tunes of our time and the lighter classics of all time.

To be sure, the eminent conductor of the winter season concerts, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has nothing to do with this loosening of the spirit of spring in Boston. The Pops conductor is Arthur Fiedler, a maestro who is not averse to playing the tinniest of Tin-Pan Alley tunes if the public calls loudly enough for them as the evening's pièce-de-résistance, or encore.

When the first Pops concert was presented in old Music Hall on July 11, 1885, the public was invited to "Come and see the new electric lamps," as well as to hear the music. It should be noted that Music Hall, erected in 1852, was one of the first gathering places to be wired for light. Although the reviewer of The Boston Transcript thought pretty well of the light, and the program, he was moved to report that "the mounds of ice cream are too low and the price of beer too high."

"C'est la Guerre"

In these times, if the same holds true of the ice cream and beer, the patron affably mumbles "c'est la guerre." Sandwiches are from 15 cents up and the wine list is modest enough, considering.

Today the Pops concerts claim a world-wide audience, through the Saturday night broadcasts over the Blue Network, and the millions of Pops recordings. OWI transcriptions bring the Pops music to the ears of service men and women on every battlefront.

And what these various outlets overlook in the way of presenting the delightful concerts of the Boston Pops Orchestra, Tokyo Rose generously fills in of a Sunday evening. And what could be more accommodating than that, save a mass hara-kiri movement on the part of the little Nips?

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
JEWISH EXAMINER

JUN 2 1944

Koussevitzky's Brother Killed

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symhony Orchestra, has been informed of his brother Nicholas' death in Leningrad in 1941 at the hands of the Nazis.

SALISBURY, MD
ADVERTISER
6/29/44

— Buy Bonds & Stamps —

LOVE OF MUSIC IS EASILY GOTTEN

You don't have to have a technical knowledge of music in order to appreciate good music, according to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor.

Don't let your lack of technical musical knowledge scare you away from the enjoyment of good music, because if you really want to appreciate good music, all you have to do is listen to it a few times, he suggests.

Dr. Koussevitzky lists 15 classical compositions which will lead the beginner easily into an appreciation of music in an article by George Marek in the July issue of Good Housekeeping magazine. He lists:

"Mozart: Symphony in C. Major, No. 43; Haydn: Symphony in B-flat Major, No. 9 in London series; Beethoven: Symphony in A Major, No. 7; Mendelssohn: 'Italian' Symphony; Schumann: 'Sprin an' Symphony; Schumann: Spring' Symphony; Tchaikovsky: Symphony in F Minor, No. 4; Berlioz: 'Fantastic' Symphony; Brahms: Symphony in E Minor, No. 4; Richard Strauss: 'Thus Spake Zarathustra' Tone Poem; Debussy: 'The Sea' Symphonic Sketches; Ravel: 'Daphnis and Chole,' ballet suite; Stravinsk 'The Rite of Spring', ballet; Pr kofieff: 'Lieutenant Kije' suit Sibelius: Symphony in B-flat Major, No. 5; and Roy Harris: Symphony No. 3."

HEMET, CAL
NEWS
6/9/44

Hint to Composers

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, veteran conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, feels a little sorry for composers. Too bad, he says, that most of them can't make a living from their work.

Evidently he has in mind music in its more exalted forms and those creators who attempt to maintain the classical tradition. He wouldn't we suppose, know much about the earning capacity of a "Pistol Packin' Mama" or any of that juke box brood that is said to amass quite a revenue by retailing at a nickel a performance. Or maybe his ear just doesn't recognize any connection between this kind of folk rhythm and the music of his experience. At any rate there is no juke box outlet for symphonies, sonatas, concertos et cetera.

Perhaps the composers of our best music might take a tip from the experience of the author of Main Street. He started out by writing a revenue producing potboiler or two for lunch money to tide him over the period when he set himself seriously to the task of producing the great American novel. The method seemed to work pretty well. A hit song or two might become the foundation for composition of the great American symphony.

TTEN tech-order ccord-vitzky, chnical away od muvant to ll you a few

5 clasill lead appreicle by ssue of ne. He

C. Mahony in on ser-in A
: 'Ital-
'Sprin umann:
ovsky:
4; Berhony;
Minor,
: 'Thus Poem; phonic is and vinsk t; Pi suit at Ma
: Sym-

'POPS'

y the Pops concerts claim a vide audience, through the ay night broadcasts over the etwork, and the millions of ecordings. OWI transcrip-ring the Pops music to the service men and women on attlefront.
what these various outlets k in the way of presenting ghtful concerts of the Bosps Orchestra, Tokyo Rose sly fills in of a Sunday eve-
And what could be more nodating than that, save a ara-kiri movement on the the little Nips?

nductor of , feels a d, he says, ving from n its more s who at-tradition.

nuch about ol Packin' brood that y retailing ybe his ear on between music of is no juke
, concertos best music nce of the ted out by tboiler or n over the usly to the rican novel.

tty well. A he foundat American

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

CLEARING HOUSE FOR COMPOSERS

By OLIN DOWNES

IN a recent conversation with Dr. Artur Rodzinski the talk turned upon the results of the reading rehearsals of new American scores which he instituted last winter as part of the program of his first season as director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. His summary of the results of that experiment led to a suggestion which could be of pronounced value to American composers.

Dr. Rodzinski was asked whether the three reading rehearsals had discovered music which he considered of sufficient value to perform at his concerts. He replied immediately in the affirmative. At least two of the scores tested at these rehearsals would be given first performances under his direction next season.

So far, so good. Now: How many scores had been submitted, following the newspaper announcements of the plan, for a hearing?

"I'd need exact figures, not at hand, to tell you," he said. "I would say, for an unofficial estimate, over two hundred.'

All Scores Not Heard

Were all these scores examined in detail or given a hearing?

"By no means," he replied. "Some 50 per cent were quickly discarded as being technically or otherwise unworthy of attention. Of the remainder, about half were read and about half of those were played at the rehearsals."

And the others?

"Some thirty scores remain," he said, "for examination with a view to a possible hearing next season."

Would, then, the reading rehearsals of new music be continued in that season?

"Certainly," he replied, "they have proved their value."

In that case, with more new scores pouring in, wouldn't there be an embarrassing congestion of material?

"Very possibly," he replied. "I may say here that no one who has not sat in the seat of the conductor of a leading American symphony orchestra would imagine the numbers of scores that come to him without solicitation, with appeals at least for a reading, if not a performance.

"If a conductor tells you the truth of this matter, he will tell you of the scores that pile up on him, arriving by mail and express, and to which he simply cannot find the time, in the enormously taxing routine of his season, to give adequate attention. Let no one pretend that it is otherwise, because it isn't. No one human being is capable of the time and energy needed for the complete discharge of such a task.

Conductor Needs Help

"For the selection from the scores submitted for the special reading rehearsals of last winter I was able to summon capable assistance, but all we could do did not finish the job or exhaust its interest. In the months before the opening of next season I shall catch up on this, but we will have to create a better procedure for the perusal of the additional manuscripts which will be awaiting attention by the time the new season opens."

Was the whole of the United States represented musically on our orchestral programs? Dr. Rodzinski did not believe so. This held especially true of the Middle West. Ergo: he thought the representation of our native music at present to be fragmentary and disproportionate, and this notwithstanding the brilliant and highly productive championship of American music by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the annual festival of American manuscript compositions conducted by Howard Hanson at the Eastman School with the Rochester Symphony, and other sincere measures by various American conductors, intended to acquaint their following with what is being done in the native art.

"No one conductor and orchestra," he said, "or indeed any half dozen, can properly cover this field. Some agency, at once broader in its scope, and more centralized in its operation than these media, is needed to meet the situation." And he proceeded to specify.

"What kind of agency? I can best describe what I think of as the imperative need, at this time, of a clearing house for the works of our young American composers.

"This is not only a desirable measure, it is entirely practicable. And only this kind of an institution can perform the desired service.

For a Control Agency

"If anything had been needed to clarify this issue for me it would have been the experience of the Philharmonic-Symphony reading rehearsals. What have they shown as being fundamental to the problem? First of all, the plain, clear, inescapable fact that no conductor and orchestra can possibly find time in their crowded schedule to adequately survey the field.

"That is a primary consideration. We need a control agency to accomplish, on a national scale, what conductors and orchestras now do locally and partially under handicap. We want to make interesting new music accessible, as easily and quickly as possible, to all its potential interpreters, and thus bring the composer into the widest contact possible with the markets that there are for his wares. And we want to do this in the way which will be most effective in promoting his practical as well as artistic interests.

"I repeat: This can only be accomplished by means of a properly instituted clearing house.

"Such a 'clearing house' needs in the first place to be soundly organized and financed. It is a project which would best be undertaken by the cooperative action of music publishers.

Publishers Should Act

"They—the publishers—proportionately backing the project should appoint a small group of first-class score-readers and musicians of the highest rank, and properly remunerate them for the periodical delivery of a preliminary report upon the value of the manuscripts submitted for prospective performance and publication.

"The works selected as worthy of advancement should then be given reading rehearsals by an orchestra, or orchestras, competent to give them effective presentation. Such orchestral 'services' could be donated, as the three reading rehearsals of the Philharmonic-Symphony were donated last season, from the orchestra's rehearsal schedule, or in addition to it, if the directors so designated. Or the necessary 'services' could be contributed by members of the musicians' union, if Mr. Petrillo, who has made plain his desire to foster orchestral performances, and hence orchestral music, could see his way clear to such valuable cooperation. I am certain that conductors and orchestra boards, in one way or another, would make possible this essential feature of the plan's operation.

"From the orchestra readings records would be made of the selected compositions. Then the record films, small, light, and cheaply transportable, would be sent with the full score of the work submitted to conductors or other potentially interested parties.

Suggests a Periodical

"To further facilitate such distribution a periodical would be circulated, listing the new works available for performance, and including whatever information about them that would be useful to the prospective interpreter, as for example the instrumentation, the time needed for performance, the number of movements and any other relevant information.

"Once a composition reaches public performance, its further fate would rest upon the arrangements of royalty or purchase deemed mutually satisfactory by composer and publisher. I can conceive of problems arising here as to which of the publishers who had cooperated should have the new work in his catalogue.

"I am no publisher, so I gladly leave these important issues to those most competent by knowledge and experience to handle them. There are a hundred other questions that would have to be answered before a broad plan of this sort took final form. Here I am mentioning the barest essentials.

Careful Appointments

"As with every conception, the success of this one would depend upon the efficiency and the effective interplay of all its practical elements. The committee of score-readers and appraisers of the manuscripts, for example, could not be appointed too carefully, or be too objective and sensitive in its judgments. It might be best to change the membership of such a committee at stated periods. If a composer did not trust the decisions of such a body, he would be perfectly free to approach in the manner he felt best any conductor he had in mind.

"But the composers' clearing house, properly functioning, should be a boon equally to the creative talent seeking a hearing and the conductor in search of new music. It should be an asset and a stimulus to progressive publishers, and a challenge to the curiosity and the varied interests of modern audiences. The measure of its success would be the intelligence of its administration and the degree in which it genuinely aided and fostered the art of music."

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

JUL 26 194

Urges Music at Peace Parley

Koussevitzky Says Plan Would Insure Success of Parley

LENOX, Mass., July 26—(A. P.)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

Inpire Work

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston Symphony orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor. "I feel sure that if this great music festival were to be held at the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

The Russian-born director is resting at his summer home and preparing for the revival at Tanglewood this week-end and next of an abbreviated version of the Berkshire festival which he raised to top rank in the musical world. At that time the orchestra will give four concerts devoted entirely to the works of Mozart.

Koussevitzky is in excellent health and spirits, just as full of enthusiasm as he was when he took over the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra 20 years ago.

Other prizes were won by G. A. Waterman, Mrs. William L. Childs, Nellie E. Carr, Elton R. Matthews and Kate Duseau.

Mr. and Mrs. Guy Brill have received word that their son, Pvt. Guy Brill, has arrived safely on foreign soil.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUN 29 1944

ELECTED TO PHI BETA

CAMBRIDGE, June 29 (UP)—Six men have elected to honorary memberships in the Harvard Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa, it was announced today. They are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor; I. A. Richards, co-developer of basic English; Pres. Wilbur K. Jordan of Radcliffe College, Judge John F. Perkins of the Boston Juvenile Court; Rudolph Altrocchi, associated Harvard clubs president; and Delmar Leighton, dean of Harvard freshmen.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.

JUN 3 - 1944

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITZKY—when there is an occasion for him to talk about music—has a way of hurling big words and ideas around, with much destruction of intellectual crockery. One such occasion was his recent Life article on American composers. Explaining what he meant by American music he observed that "musical art is an expression of life and nature . . . its manifestation in each country is in accordance not only with that country's spiritual riches but also with its natural riches—its mountains, its rivers, its fertile land"—in our case the Mississippi, for example. It was not surprising therefore to learn that while "there is probably not a single living musician who understands Einstein's fourth dimension, yet the discovery that a fourth dimension could exist has powerfully stimulated musical artists' imaginations, broadened their artistic horizons, and deepened their inspiration"—indeed that it has made a difference in Koussevitzky's own performances. And "the composer of today reveals in us different emotions than the composer of yesterday. . . . We don't always understand exactly what are our own emotions. . . . Beethoven had difficulties with some people who did not understand that he was expressing their emotions." That is something Beethoven himself did not understand, I suspect.

I suspect also that the facts of some of the incidents Koussevitzky described in his account of his patronage of American composers would not recognize themselves in the stories as he now recalls and tells them. He has, he says, had to battle for the American composer with the public and the critics; and when he has considered a work worth playing and they have not, he of course has been right and has continued to play it until they were convinced. His example is Copland's "Music for the Theater," which he says was a complete failure at its first New York performance, and which he therefore repeated a month later, with the result that each critic now liked a different part, and which "today . . . is in the standard repertoire of every major orchestra in the United States." But I heard that first performance (at a concert of the League of Composers or some other such group); and my recollection is that the audience responded to the piece as warmly as it deserved, as did the Carnegie Hall audience a month later. On the other hand I heard people in the audience express their dislike of the "Ode" which Copland wrote for the Boston Symphony several years later; and they were right, and would not, I am sure, have changed their opinion if Koussevitzky had repeated the work—just as the people who have disliked the works of Harris and Schuman have been right and have, I am sure, continued to dislike them in the face of Koussevitzky's persistence.

In 1924, he says, when he began his work with the Boston Symphony, "American creative music was barely alive"; and he revived it by playing the works of American composers and in this way getting them to write. American music [illegible] was barely alive when another conductor played a new work of Hadley or Hanson; it began to revive when Koussevitzky played a new work of Edward Burlingame Hill. The truth is that other conductors have offered American composers the same kind of encouragement, and that if Koussevitzky hadn't played the music of Copland, Harris, and Schuman it would not have gone unperformed and uncomposed. And it is amusing to watch him, in some of his stories, by-pass what others did.

Thus he tells that during his first months in America he met Gershwin. "He had already composed the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' I went to the première given by Paul Whiteman. . . . Although then he lacked great technical knowledge, Gershwin . . . brought a new idea in the expression of music. He showed the whole gaiety and gusto of American life. I confess that I did not then think the 'Rhapsody in Blue' suitable for concert performance by a great symphony orchestra. I was wrong. Later I became aware of this and asked Gershwin to compose a piece for the Boston Symphony. He wrote the 'Second Rhapsody.' . . . The rhapsodies . . . were proof that there would be a real American music." One would suppose from this that after "Rhapsody in Blue" Gershwin's next step as an American composer, taken at the instigation of Koussevitzky, was "Second Rhapsody"; one would never suspect that there were intervening steps instigated by someone else.

As a matter of fact Koussevitzky, who took over the Boston Symphony in the fall of 1924, could not have heard the première of "Rhapsody in Blue," which occurred in February of that year. The conductor who did attend that first Whiteman concert in Aeolian Hall was Damrosch, who after each number managed to get his "bravo!" out ahead of the applause, and who for the same reason jumped into the driver's seat of the Gershwin-for-American-Composer bandwagon by commissioning Gershwin to write the Piano Concerto in F. This was performed in the season of 1925-26; and Damrosch also conducted the first performance of "An American in Paris" in the season of 1928-29. And it was not until a couple of years later that Koussevitzky performed "Second Rhapsody," which—if I remember correctly—had begun as part of a Gershwin score for a film, when it had had the title "Rhapsody in Rivets," because of its imitations of riveting with which it "expressed" American life.

Koussevitzky evidently shares this idea that was behind Gershwin's career as a serious American composer—that since American life includes jazz and riveting the music which "expresses" this life also had to include them, and that a man who writes superb Broadway show music is therefore the man to write the American symphony and opera. The idea is completely fallacious; and that is what Gershwin's works as a serious American composer proved.

B. H. HAGGIN

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD-SUN

JUL 2 - 1944

TRIBUTE TO CONDUCTOR

Everyone knows about Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 30 years. Boston recently paid tribute to him at the last concert of the year by presenting him an inscribed silver cup. They said: "No conductor has done more to give encouragement to contemporary composers, on whom depends the continuity of the creative music impulse."

The Koussevitsky Music Foundation, although comparatively new, has already shown the effective aid it will give to maintain high standards of art and encourage creative work both among composers of repute and those of youthful promise.

Dr. Koussevitsky recently received a letter from his sister who lives with her daughter and two grandchildren somewhere in the Urals, to which they were evacuated by the Soviet Government. She is Mrs. Anna Bach. Her letter bore the tragic news of the death of their brother, Nicholas, in 1941, "at the hands of the Fascist butchers," the letter stated. They had formerly lived in Leningrad, and the letter was forwarded to Dr. Koussevitsky through the Government Museum of Tchaikovsky at Klin.

—LUCILLE K. BOYDEN.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

JUL 16 1944

Koussevitzky Reveals How to Shorten Name

It appears that Koussevitzky at some time or other, since he has been conductor of the Boston symphony, decided that some of the barriers customary between conductor and personnel should be done away with. At a rehearsal he said to the men: "I call you by your first names, you forget 'Dr. Koussevitzy' and call me by my first name. It will be shorter and more convenient and easier to say!" One of the players ventured to ask just how the conductor wished to be addressed. "Call me Sergyei Alexandrovitch, of course!" he replied.

OTTEN

a tech-n order accord-evitzky.

echnical ou away ood mu-want to all you t a few

15 clas-will lead n apprerticle by issue of azine. He

n C. Ma-phony in ndon ser-ony in A hn: 'Ital-nn: 'Sprin chumann:
aikovsky:
o. 4; Berphony;
E Minor, ss: 'Thus ne Poem; Symphonic ohnis and travinsk allet; Pi ije' suite
B-flat Ma rris: Sym-

N 'POPS'

Today the Pops concerts claim a orld-wide audience, through the turday night broadcasts over the ue Network, and the millions of ps recordings. OWI transcrip-ons bring the Pops music to the rs of service men and women on ery battlefront.

And what these various outlets erlook in the way of presenting e delightful concerts of the Bos-n Pops Orchestra, Tokyo Rose enerously fills in of a Sunday eve-ing. And what could be more ccommodating than that, save a ass hara-kiri movement on the art of the little Nips?

an conductor of hestra, feels a oo bad, he says,
e a living from music in its more reators who atssical tradition.

ow much about "Pistol Packin' box brood that enue by retailing
Or maybe his ear nnection between nd the music of there is no juke onatas, concertos of our best music experience of the

He started out by cing potboiler or ide him over the f seriously to the t American novel. ork pretty well. A ecome the founda-he great American

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

CLEARING HOUSE FOR COMPOSERS

By OLIN DOWNES

IN a recent conversation with Dr. Artur Rodzinski the talk turned upon the results of the reading rehearsals of new American scores which he instituted last winter as part of the program of his first season as director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. His summary of the results of that experiment led to a suggestion which could be of pronounced value to American composers.

Dr. Rodzinski was asked whether the three reading rehearsals had discovered music which he considered of sufficient value to perform at his concerts. He replied immediately in the affirmative. At least two of the scores tested at these rehearsals would be given first performances under his direction next season.

So far, so good. Now: How many scores had been submitted, following the newspaper announcements of the plan, for a hearing?

"I'd need exact figures, not at hand, to tell you," he said. "I would say, for an unofficial estimate, over two hundred.'

All Scores Not Heard

Were all these scores examined n detail or given a hearing?

"By no means," he replied. "Some 50 per cent were quickly iscarded as being technically or therwise unworthy of attention. f the remainder, about half were ead and about half of those were layed at the rehearsals."

And the others?

"Some thirty scores remain," he aid, "for examination with a view a possible hearing next season."

Would, then, the reading re- earsals of new music be con- inued in that season?

"Certainly," he replied, "they ave proved their value."

In that case, with more new cores pouring in, wouldn't there e an embarrassing congestion of aterial?

"Very possibly," he replied. "I may say here that no one who has ot sat in the seat of the conductor f a leading American symphony rchestra would imagine the num- ers of scores that come to him ithout solicitation, with appeals t least for a reading, if not a per- ormance.

"If a conductor tells you the truth this matter, he will tell you of e scores that pile up on him, ar- ving by mail and express, and to hich he simply cannot find the me, in the enormously taxing utine of his season, to give ade- ate attention. Let no one pretend at it is otherwise, because it isn't one human being is capable of time and energy needed for complete discharge of such a k.

nductor Needs Help

"For the selection from the res submitted for the special ding rehearsals of last winter as able to summon capable as- ance, but all we could do did finish the job or exhaust its rest. In the months before the ning of next season I shall h up on this, but we will have create a better procedure for perusal of the additional man- ipts which will be awaiting at- ion by the time the new season ns."

as the whole of the United es represented musically on orchestral programs? Dr. Rod- ki did not believe so. This held cially true of the Middle West. : he thought the representa- of our native music at present e fragmentary and dispropor- te, and this notwithstanding brilliant and highly productive pionship of American music Koussevitzky with the Boston phony Orchestra, the annual val of American manuscript ositions conducted by Howard on at the Eastman School the Rochester Symphony, and sincere measures by various ican conductors, intended to int their following with what ng done in the native art. one conductor and orches- he said, "or indeed any half can properly cover this field. agency, at once broader in pe, and more centralized in eration than these media, is to meet the situation." And ceeded to specify.

"What kind of agency? I can best describe what I think of as the imperative need, at this time, of a clearing house for the works of our young American composers.

"This is not only a desirable measure, it is entirely practicable. And only this kind of an institution can perform the desired service.

For a Control Agency

"If anything had been needed to clarify this issue for me it would have been the experience of the Philharmonic-Symphony reading rehearsals. What have they shown as being fundamental to the problem? First of all, the plain, clear, inescapable fact that no conductor and orchestra can possibly find time in their crowded schedule to adequately survey the field.

"That is a primary consideration. We need a control agency to accomplish, on a national scale, what conductors and orchestras now do locally and partially under handicap. We want to make interesting new music accessible, as easily and quickly as possible, to all its potential interpreters, and thus bring the composer into the widest contact possible with the markets that there are for his wares. And we want to do this in the way which will be most effective in promoting his practical as well as artistic interests.

"I repeat: This can only be accomplished by means of a properly instituted clearing house.

"Such a 'clearing house' needs in the first place to be soundly organized and financed. It is a project which would best be undertaken by the cooperative action of music publishers.

Publishers Should Act

"They—the publishers—proportionately backing the project should appoint a small group of first-class score-readers and musicians of the highest rank, and properly remunerate them for the periodical delivery of a preliminary report upon the value of the manuscripts submitted for prospective performance and publication.

"The works selected as worthy of advancement should then be given reading rehearsals by an orchestra, or orchestras, competent to give them effective presentation. Such orchestral 'services' could be donated, as the three reading rehearsals of the Philharmonic-Symphony were donated last season, from the orchestra's rehearsal schedule, or in addition to it, if the directors so designated. Or the necessary 'services' could be contributed by members of the musicians' union, if Mr. Petrillo, who has made plain his desire to foster orchestral performances, and hence orchestral music, could see his way clear to such valuable cooperation. I am certain that conductors and orchestra boards, in one way or another, would make possible this essential feature of the plan's operation.

"From the orchestra readings records would be made of the selected compositions. Then the record films, small, light, and cheaply transportable, would be sent with the full score of the work submitted to conductors or other potentially interested parties.

Suggests a Periodical

"To further facilitate such distribution a periodical would be circulated, listing the new works available for performance, and including whatever information about them that would be useful to the prospective interpreter, as for example the instrumentation, the time needed for performance, the number of movements and any other relevant information.

"Once a composition reached public performance, its further fate would rest upon the arrangements of royalty or purchase deemed mutually satisfactory by composer and publisher. I can conceive of problems arising here as to which of the publishers who had cooperated should have the new work in his catalogue.

"I am no publisher, so I gladly leave these important issues to those most competent by knowledge and experience to handle them. There are a hundred other questions that would have to be answered before a broad plan of this sort took final form. Here I am mentioning the barest essentials.

Careful Appointments

"As with every conception, the success of this one would depend upon the efficiency and the effective interplay of all its practical elements. The committee of score-readers and appraisers of the manuscripts, for example, could not be appointed too carefully, or be too objective and sensitive in its judgments. It might be best to change the membership of such a committee at stated periods. If a composer did not trust the decisions of such a body, he would be perfectly free to approach in the manner he felt best any conductor he had in mind.

"But the composers' clearing house, properly functioning, should be a boon equally to the creative talent seeking a hearing and the conductor in search of new music. It should be an asset and a stimulus to progressive publishers, and a challenge to the curiosity and the varied interests of modern audiences. The measure of its success would be the intelligence of its administration and the degree in which it genuinely aided and fostered the art of music."

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

JUL 26 194

Urges Music at Peace Parley

Koussevitzky Says Plan Would Insure Success of Parley

LENOX, Mass., July 26—(A. P.)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

Inpire Work

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston Symphony orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor.

"I feel sure that if this great music festival were to be held at the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

The Russian-born director is resting at his summer home and preparing for the revival at Tanglewood this week-end and next of an abbreviated version of the Berkshire festival which he raised to top rank in the musical world. At that time the orchestra will give four concerts devoted entirely to the works of Mozart.

Koussevitzky is in excellent health and spirits, just as full of enthusiasm as he was when he took over the leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra 20 years ago.

Other prizes were won by G. A. Waterman, Mrs. William L. Childs, Nellie E. Carr, Elton R. Matthews and Kate Duseau.

Mr. and Mrs. Guy Brill have received word that their son, Pvt. Guy Brill, has arrived safely on foreign soil.

RCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUN 29 1944

[illegible]ECTED TO PHI BETA

C[illegible]MBRIDGE, June 29 (UP) S[illegible] men have elected to hon-[illegible] memberships in the Har-[illegible] Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa, [illegible]s announced today. They [illegible]e Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Bos-[illegible] Symphony Orchestra con-[illegible]tor; I. A. Richards, co-de-[illegible]oper of basic English; Pres. [illegible]bur K. Jordan of Radcliffe College. Judge John F. Perkins [illegible] the Boston Juvenile Court; [illegible]udolph Altrocchi, associated [illegible]ard clubs president; and [illegible]elmar Leighton, dean of Har-[illegible]freshmen.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.

JUN 3 - 1944

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITZKY—when there is an occasion for him to talk about music—has a way of hurling big words and ideas around, with much destruction of intellectual crockery. One such occasion was his recent Life article on American composers. Explaining what he meant by American music he observed that "musical art is an expression of life and nature . . . its manifestation in each country is in accordance not only with that country's spiritual riches but also with its natural riches—its mountains, its rivers, its fertile land"—in our case the Mississippi, for example. It was not surprising therefore to learn that while "there is probably not a single living musician who understands Einstein's fourth dimension, yet the discovery that a fourth dimension could exist has powerfully stimulated musical artists' imaginations, broadened their artistic horizons, and deepened their inspiration"—indeed that it has made a difference in Koussevitzky's own performances. And "the composer of today reveals in us different emotions than the composer of yesterday. . . . We don't always understand exactly what are our own emotions. . . . Beethoven had difficulties with some people who did not understand that he was expressing their emotions." That is something Beethoven himself did not understand, I suspect.

I suspect also that the facts of some of the incidents Koussevitzky described in his account of his patronage of American composers would not recognize themselves in the stories as he now recalls and tells them. He has, he says, had to battle for the American composer with the public and the critics; and when he has considered a work worth playing and they have not, he of course has been right and has continued to play it until they were convinced. His example is Copland's "Music for the Theater," which he says was a complete failure at its first New York performance, and which he therefore repeated a month later, with the result that each critic now liked a different part, and which "today . . . is in the standard repertoire of every major orchestra in the United States." But I heard that first performance (at a concert of the League of Composers or some other such group); and my recollection is that the audience responded to the piece as warmly as it deserved, as did the Carnegie Hall audience a month later. On the other hand I heard people in the audience express their dislike of the "Ode" which Copland wrote for the Boston Symphony several years later; and they were right, and would not, I am sure, have changed their opinion if Koussevitzky had repeated the work—just as the people who have disliked the works of Harris and Schuman have been right and have, I am sure, continued to dislike them in the face of Koussevitzky's persistence.

In 1924, he says, when he began his work with the Boston Symphony, "American creative music was barely alive"; and he revived it by playing the works of American composers and in this way getting them to write. American music [illegible] was barely alive when another conductor played a new work of Hadley or Hanson; it began to revive when Koussevitzky played a new work of Edward Burlingame Hill. The truth is that other conductors have offered American composers the same kind of encouragement, and that if Koussevitzky hadn't played the music of Copland, Harris, and Schuman it would not have gone unperformed and uncomposed. And it is amusing to watch him, in some of his stories, by-pass what others did.

Thus he tells that during his first months in America he met Gershwin. "He had already composed the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' I went to the première given by Paul Whiteman. . . . Although then he lacked great technical knowledge, Gershwin . . . brought a new idea in the expression of music. He showed the whole gaiety and gusto of American life. I confess that I did not then think the 'Rhapsody in Blue' suitable for concert performance by a great symphony orchestra. I was wrong. Later I became aware of this and asked Gershwin to compose a piece for the Boston Symphony. He wrote the 'Second Rhapsody.' . . . The rhapsodies . . . were proof that there would be a real American music." One would suppose from this that after "Rhapsody in Blue" Gershwin's next step as an American composer, taken at the instigation of Koussevitzky, was "Second Rhapsody"; one would never suspect that there were intervening steps instigated by someone else.

As a matter of fact Koussevitzky, who took over the Boston Symphony in the fall of 1924, could not have heard the première of "Rhapsody in Blue," which occurred in February of that year. The conductor who did attend that first Whiteman concert in Aeolian Hall was Damrosch, who after each number managed to get his "bravo!" out ahead of the applause, and who for the same reason jumped into the driver's seat of the Gershwin-for-American-Composer bandwagon by commissioning Gershwin to write the Piano Concerto in F. This was performed in the season of 1925-26; and Damrosch also conducted the first performance of "An American in Paris" in the season of 1928-29. And it was not until a couple of years later that Koussevitzky performed "Second Rhapsody," which—if I remember correctly—had begun as part of a Gershwin score for a film, when it had had the title "Rhapsody in Rivets," because of its imitations of riveting with which it "expressed" American life.

Koussevitzky evidently shares this idea that was behind Gershwin's career as a serious American composer—that since American life includes jazz and riveting the music which "expresses" this life also had to include them, and that a man who writes superb Broadway show music is therefore the man to write the American symphony and opera. The idea is completely fallacious; and that is what Gershwin's works as a serious American composer proved.

B. H. HAGGIN

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD-SUN

JUL 2 - 1944

TRIBUTE TO CONDUCTOR

Everyone knows about Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 30 years. Boston recently paid tribute to him at the last concert of the year by presenting him an inscribed silver cup. They said: "No conductor has done more to give encouragement to contemporary composers, on whom depends the continuity of the creative music impulse."

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation, although comparatively new, has already shown the effective aid it will give to maintain high standards of art and encourage creative work both among composers of repute and those of youthful promise.

Dr. Koussevitzky recently received a letter from his sister who lives with her daughter and two grandchildren somewhere in the Urals, to which they were evacuated by the Soviet Government. She is Mrs. Anna Bach. Her letter bore the tragic news of the death of their brother, Nicholas, in 1941, "at the hands of the Fascist butchers," the letter stated. They had formerly lived in Leningrad, and the letter was forwarded to Dr. Koussevitzky through the Government Museum of Tchaikovsky at Klin.

—LUCILLE K. BOYDEN.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

JUL 16 1944

Koussevitzky Reveals How to Shorten Name

It appears that Koussevitzky at some time or other, since he has been conductor of the Boston symphony, decided that some of the barriers customary between conductor and personnel should be done away with. At a rehearsal he said to the men: "I call you by your first names, you forget 'Dr. Koussevitzy' and call me by my first name. It will be shorter and more convenient and easier to say!" One of the players ventured to ask just how the conductor wished to be addressed. "Call me Sergyei Alexandrovitch, of course!" he replied.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SALES MANAGEMENT
JUN 15 1944

Promotion Angles Allis-Chalmers Found in Symphony Sponsorship

Without sacrificing the dignity demanded by commercialization of one of the world's greatest musical organizations—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Allis-Chalmers found effective ways to stimulate audience interest and to merchandise the program to the trade.

BY GEORGE CALLOS

Manager of Advertising and Public Relations
Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co.
Milwaukee

WHEN Serge Koussevitzky last Christmas night raised his baton before the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the event made news in both the musical world and merchandising circles. It marked the first appearance of this world-famed orchestra under commercial sponsorship on a national broadcast and it inaugurated the first institutional advertising of the 97-year-old Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co.

STRAND NOW
NOW SHOWING — A FEATURE PROGRAM
MARCH of TIME'S
Upbeat In Music
featuring BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
On Our Screen
MARCH 28-29
KXEL
ALLIS-CHALMERS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
20 YEAR
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Allis-Chalmers developed listener interest with tie-ins with RCA Victor, producer of Boston Symphony recordings, and March of Time's film, "Up Beat in Music." Window displays (below) were distributed to over 2,200 leading music stores. Theater lobby displays (left), distributed through Blue Network, featured the symphony as it was seen in the film and as it could be heard over the radio Saturday nights.

Up to this time, our company had been a consistent advertiser with product copy on heavy machinery and farm equipment running year after year in national magazines, business publications, industrial and farm magazines. We had been in radio only to the extent of a little weekly radio series over one Milwaukee station.

Does this seem like a strange combination—a symphony orchestra and a manufacturer of capital equipment? Perhaps. But there was a sound reason behind it.

When the war broke out, Allis-Chalmers was operating nine factories and maintaining an extensive dealer organization for some 1,600 machinery and farm equipment products. By 1943 we were converted 100% to war work.

We had an institutional story to tell, typical of many large corporations, yet possessing one rather unique factor. Our volume of business and diversified activities placed us in the same league with a number of the country's leading corporations whose identities were household words due to long-term advertising of their consumer products. Other than in the farm field, we had concentrated on producing and servicing other factors in industry. We had a consumer story which had been veiled from the public due to the avenues of distribution.

The story we wanted to tell was simple, yet one of wide appeal—"Production for Victory and for Better Living in the Post-War World." This broad concept did not require high pressure methods of daytime soap operas or catchy jingles announcing another comedy or variety show. Our thoughts were rather turned towards a new field in radio entertainment which had just begun to catch the sponsors' attention — symphonic music. From this point on the decision was easy and Allis-Chalmers inaugurated a weekly series over the Blue Network of one full-hour concerts by the Boston Symphony from Symphony Hall in Boston.

The Commercial Build-up

We realized from the start that just presenting these weekly broadcasts alone would not accomplish our objective. In spite of growing consciousness of good music, we were well aware that the existing audience was still comparatively small in terms of Hooper and Crosley ratings. Furthermore, sponsor identification — always a problem to a new sponsor — would be particularly tough in this type of program, which requires dignity and restraint in the presentation of commercial messages.

Therefore, at the outset, promotion and merchandising were considered essential elements in the formation of our plans. Two major avenues were considered: (1) promotion to build up more listeners for the weekly broadcasts; (2) promotion which would tell of Allis-Chalmers sponsorship within industry who, in the final analysis, were our prime customers.

The development of listener interest followed a varied pattern. Any radio program possesses certain news value—some created and others spontaneous. The first playing of a new symphony, guest artists, and human interest yarns often find their way in the crowded columns of the radio pages of daily newspapers. The decision of a guest conductor such as Igor Stravinsky to play his own arrangement of the National Anthem typifies what I might call "unrehearsed publicity." However, radio pages cover a lot of radio programs and our job went far beyond the favorable mentions of sympathetic radio editors.

Tie-in with RCA Victor

One of the most obvious tie-ins was with RCA Victor, producer of the Boston Symphony Recordings. After all, purchasers of Boston Symphony Records were all potential listeners to Boston Symphony broadcasts. This idea meant a sympathetic response and resulted in a number of special Boston Symphony promotions, including a "Boston Symphony Window" designed for and distributed to over 2,200 leading music stores. RCA produced a color portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky, which we supplemented with window streamers, display cards, and booklets —all with tie-ups between recordings and the broadcasts.

The reception of this promotion is indicated by two statements from RCA distributors. One in New England writes: "We have just completed distribution of the special sales promotional material which you sent us in connection with the twentieth anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor for the Boston Symphony. This is being very well received and we are receiving requests from dealers for additional quantities of the booklet on the symphony orchestra." A Middle West distributor comments: "We certainly think you ought to be congratulated on the beautiful Boston Symphony display, streamer, and booklet. It looks like a double-plus merchandise and makes an attractive window piece. We suggest that we have more like it!"

Another promotional tie-in stemmed from a lucky break. Around the first of the year March of Time released the film "Up Beat in Music"—reporting on the role of music in wartime. The Boston Symphony was the only symphonic orchestra featured. This seemed to be a natural. As a result special theater lobby displays were prepared, featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it was seen in the March of Time film, and as it could be heard over the radio on Saturday evenings. These displays were distributed through Blue Network stations with a request that they contact their local March of Time theaters, offering them pre-announcements of the March of Time showings in return for displaying the poster in the theater lobbies. This two-way promotion was highly successful as evidenced by such reports as KXEL "The Voice of Agriculture," Waterloo, Iowa: "We feel that this is an unusual opportunity to increase the list of audience for the Boston Symphony Orchestra." WAGE, Syracuse, N. Y.: "In return for a schedule of courtesy spot announcements promoting 'Up Beat in Music', your broadsides were displayed prominently in the RKO Theaters in Syracuse." Nearly 50 Blue Network stations reported similar experiences.

Other promotions were tied in directly with the Blue Network stations. For example, we offered them an "Invitation to Listen" card which could be mailed out to a local list, calling attention to the Saturday night broadcasts—the cards imprinted with local call letters, local frequency and "to stay tuned to this station for the best in radio entertainment." More than 100 Blue Network stations cooperated in this promotion.

The public was likewise reached directly in our promotion program through the offer of an 8-page booklet on the Boston Symphony during the regular broadcasts, and to date ten thousand requests have been received and they are still coming in.

With the coming of spring, Symphony Hall in Boston was transformed from its dignified setting for the Boston Symphony and took on the informal atmosphere long identified with the Boston Pops Concerts. This setting provides for tables, refreshments and gaiety with popular music by the Boston Pops Orchestra—composed of 90 Boston Symphony musicians—under the direction of its able conductor, Arthur Fiedler. The spirit of the Pops was captured by the well known artist, Alajalov—famous for his cover drawings for The New Yorker—in the form of a Boston Pops poster, which has been widely distributed through radio stations, music stores, and within our own organization.

Up to now, I've been dealing with promotion designed primarily to build up up more listeners for these weekly broadcasts, and at the same time to identify Allis-Chalmers sponsorship. The program is now being supplemented by a regular 56-line newspaper campaign on the radio pages of one daily in each of the Blue Network station cities.

Promotion Within Industry

Promotion within industry has been developed in the form of a monthly folder entitled "Good Living" which is sent to business executives throughout the country. The tone of "Good Living" can be grasped from several paragraphs of the May issue:

"If you don't happen to have a book and crave sociability, dial a hundred-man orchestra into your living room, that's really something! Good music and gloom don't mix.

"When all is said and done, good living is no more than a happy state of mind. Anyone who is slipping, isn't happy. There's no fun in quitting or being afraid. Happiness is for those who are going ahead, not going without.

"Good living is a progress on a one-way street—from here to eternity. The scenery is all in front."

Then later on in this issue can be found these paragraphs:

"Somewhere up front in this piece, we slipped in a casual reference to the soul satisfaction in listening to beautiful music, as rendered by an orchestra of 100 great musicians. That was sort of leading up to the Boston Symphony, generally considered by music lovers to be the finest orchestra in the world.

"As you know, the Saturday night Boston Symphony and Boston Pops are air-sent to you by Allis-Chalmers.

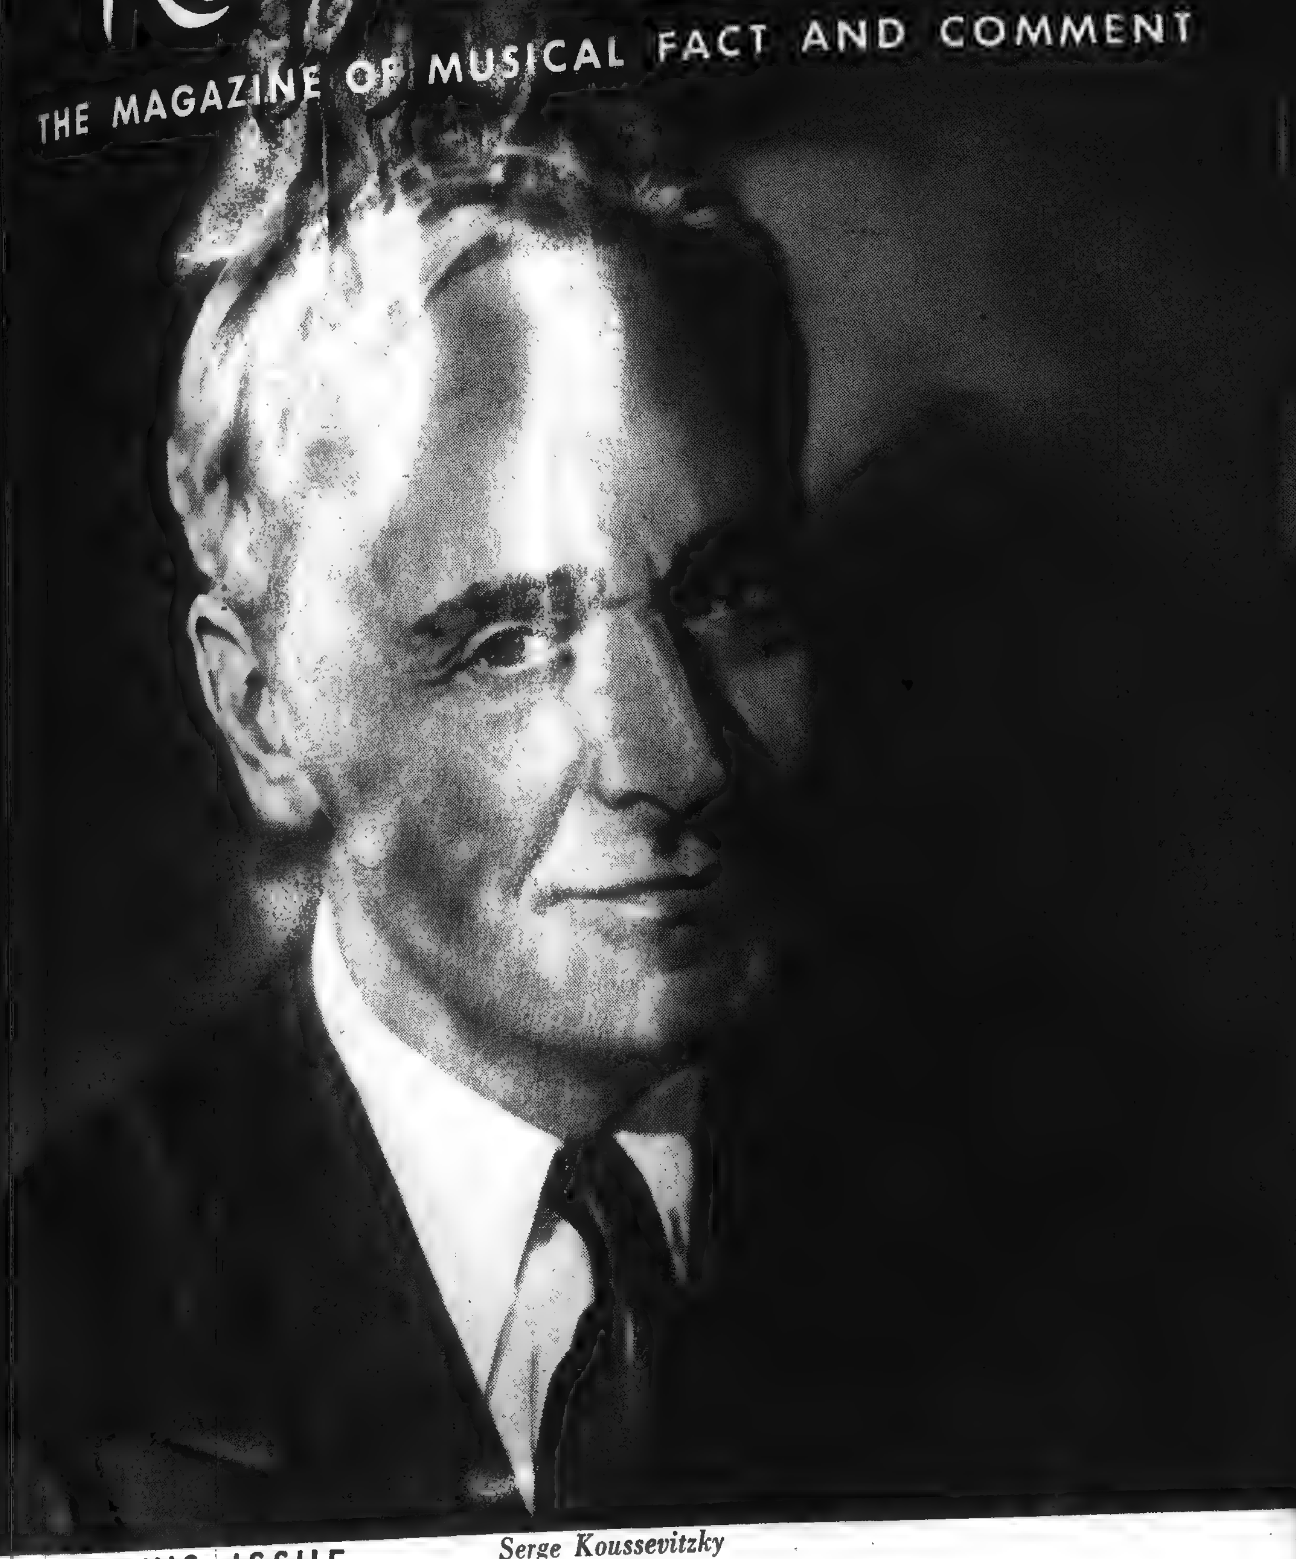
"So some Saturday night, when the family has gone to the movies, or somewhere, and you are quietly alone, tune in on this world's finest music. See if it doesn't express in some subtle way, the breadth and depth and goodness of American living."

The modern world is a curious one —which teams up a large industrial concern with a large symphonic orchestra. The results of the past season already indicate that this has been a highly successful venture, and we are now making plans for more extensive promotion activities with the start of fall symphony season in October.

ULY
944

VICTOR
Record Review

THE MAGAZINE OF MUSICAL FACT AND COMMENT



Serge Koussevitzky

IN THIS ISSUE

Seven Pianists Play Seven Masterpieces • Serge Koussevitzky Observes an Anniversary and a Birthday • E. Power Biggs Discusses Organ Literature • Collegiate "Pops" Concerts • Ellingtonia • Kreisler Makes Radio Debut • Dorsey "Starmaker" Album • • •

Koussevitzky polishes up some intricate passage work at a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestr

---

AN ANNIVERSARY AND A BIRTHDAY

Serge Koussevitzky, Champion of American Music, Observes Twenty Years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and His Seventieth Birthday in July

BY JOHN N. BURK

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has been much feted on the completion of his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and rightly so. He has in that stretch of years kept his musical energies and ambitions unabated; he has grown in artistic stature, and his orchestra has grown with him.

He has traversed prodigious territory, musically speaking, in his score of American years, and found fresh conceptual depths and beauties in the music of the past.

On July 26 Serge Koussevitzky will reach another milestone, his seventieth birthday. And this calls for another accounting. At seventy, Dr. Koussevitzky looks as fit and dapper as he did at fifty, when he first landed on the American terra firma of a New York pier. Gray hairs are unessential; so are the relics of a picturesque Russian accent and the courteous Old World manners which linger in Serge Koussevitzky, the American citizen.

Decidedly a birthday toast should be added to the many toasts proposed on May 16 by a group of grateful American composers and 400 guests at a testimonial dinner in New York. These composers had plentiful cause for gratitude. Twenty years ago. Koussevitzky had found in America a handful of composers of an older generation, with distinguished abilities, but on the whole European in their musical speech. There proved to be some younger men; but they were neither played nor heeded. How different the situation in May of 1944! At the head table sat a round dozen of American composers truly to be reckoned with.

Of more than one of them it could be said that he has had from Koussevitzky not only his true introduction to the public by orchestral performance, but consistent performances of ensuing works which have brought him inner development and outward renown. These include Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris, Nicolai Berezowsky, Howard Hanson, Roger Sessions, Vladimir Dukelsky, and William Schuman.

An interviewer who made his way into Dr. Koussevitzky's study in the course of the twentieth season extracted interesting comments from the conductor on just this situation. He is Cyrus W. Durgin of the Boston Globe.

"So much has happened in twenty years," said Dr. Koussevitzky to Mr. Durgin. "When I first came here, there was little new music, little American music played. Both the orchestra and I are proud of the enormous influence the Boston Symphony has had in the entire musical life of the country.

"American music can be said to be in its third generation. The first included such men as Edward MacDowell, George Chadwick and Arthur Foote. Between them and the next generation, Edward Burlingame Hill is a connecting link. The outstanding men of America's second musical generation are Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roger Sessions and Roy Harris. Now we have a third, young generation led by William Schuman, David Diamond and Nicolai Berezowsky.

"Styles in American composition have changed enormously since I first came to Boston in 1924," continued Koussevitzky. "The technique has developed so that now men like Copland and Piston possess the highest, most universal technique of writing.

"I can find little emotion in modern music. The best of it sounds very well as music, is beautifully written. But try as I have, I can find little emotion in it. Perhaps other conductors can."

And he made this frank statement with the smiling simplicity and the honesty of a great artist with a vast knowledge and understanding of musical evolution.

When his birthday comes to pass, he will not

(continued on page 10)

An Anniversary and a Birthday

(continued from page 4)

be content with settling back and receiving felicitations. He will interrupt his summer's rest at his beautiful and idyllic country place in Lenox in the Berkshire Hills to open Tanglewood, necessarily dormant for the duration as far as concerts on a large scale are concerned, to give a festival in chamber proportions of the music of Mozart.

Koussevitzky's Recordings

Ample evidence of the versatility of Koussevitzky's art as a conductor may be gained from a casual perusal of the Victor catalogue, The Music America Loves Best.

Koussevitzky-conducted masterpieces that deserve a special place in every record library include Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet (DM-347, List Price $3.50); Debussy's La Mer (DM-643, List Price $3.50); Gabriel Fauré's Incidental Music to Pelléas and Mélisande (DM-941, List Price $2.50); Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf (DM-566, List Price $3.50); Copland's El Salón México (DM-546, List Price $2.50).

Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E Minor (DM-730, List Price $5.00); Roy Harris' Symphony No. 3 (DM-651, List Price $2.50); and Schubert's Symphony No. 8 in B Minor, the Unfinished (DM-319, List Price $3.50).

MOUNT MORRIS, N.Y
UNION
7/7/44

LOVE OF MUSIC EASILY GOTTEN.

• • • • •

You don't have to have a technical knowledge of music in order to appreciate good music, according to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor.

Don't let your lack of technical musical knowledge scare you away from the enjoyment of good music, because if you really want to appreciate good music, all you have to do is listen to it a few times, he suggests.

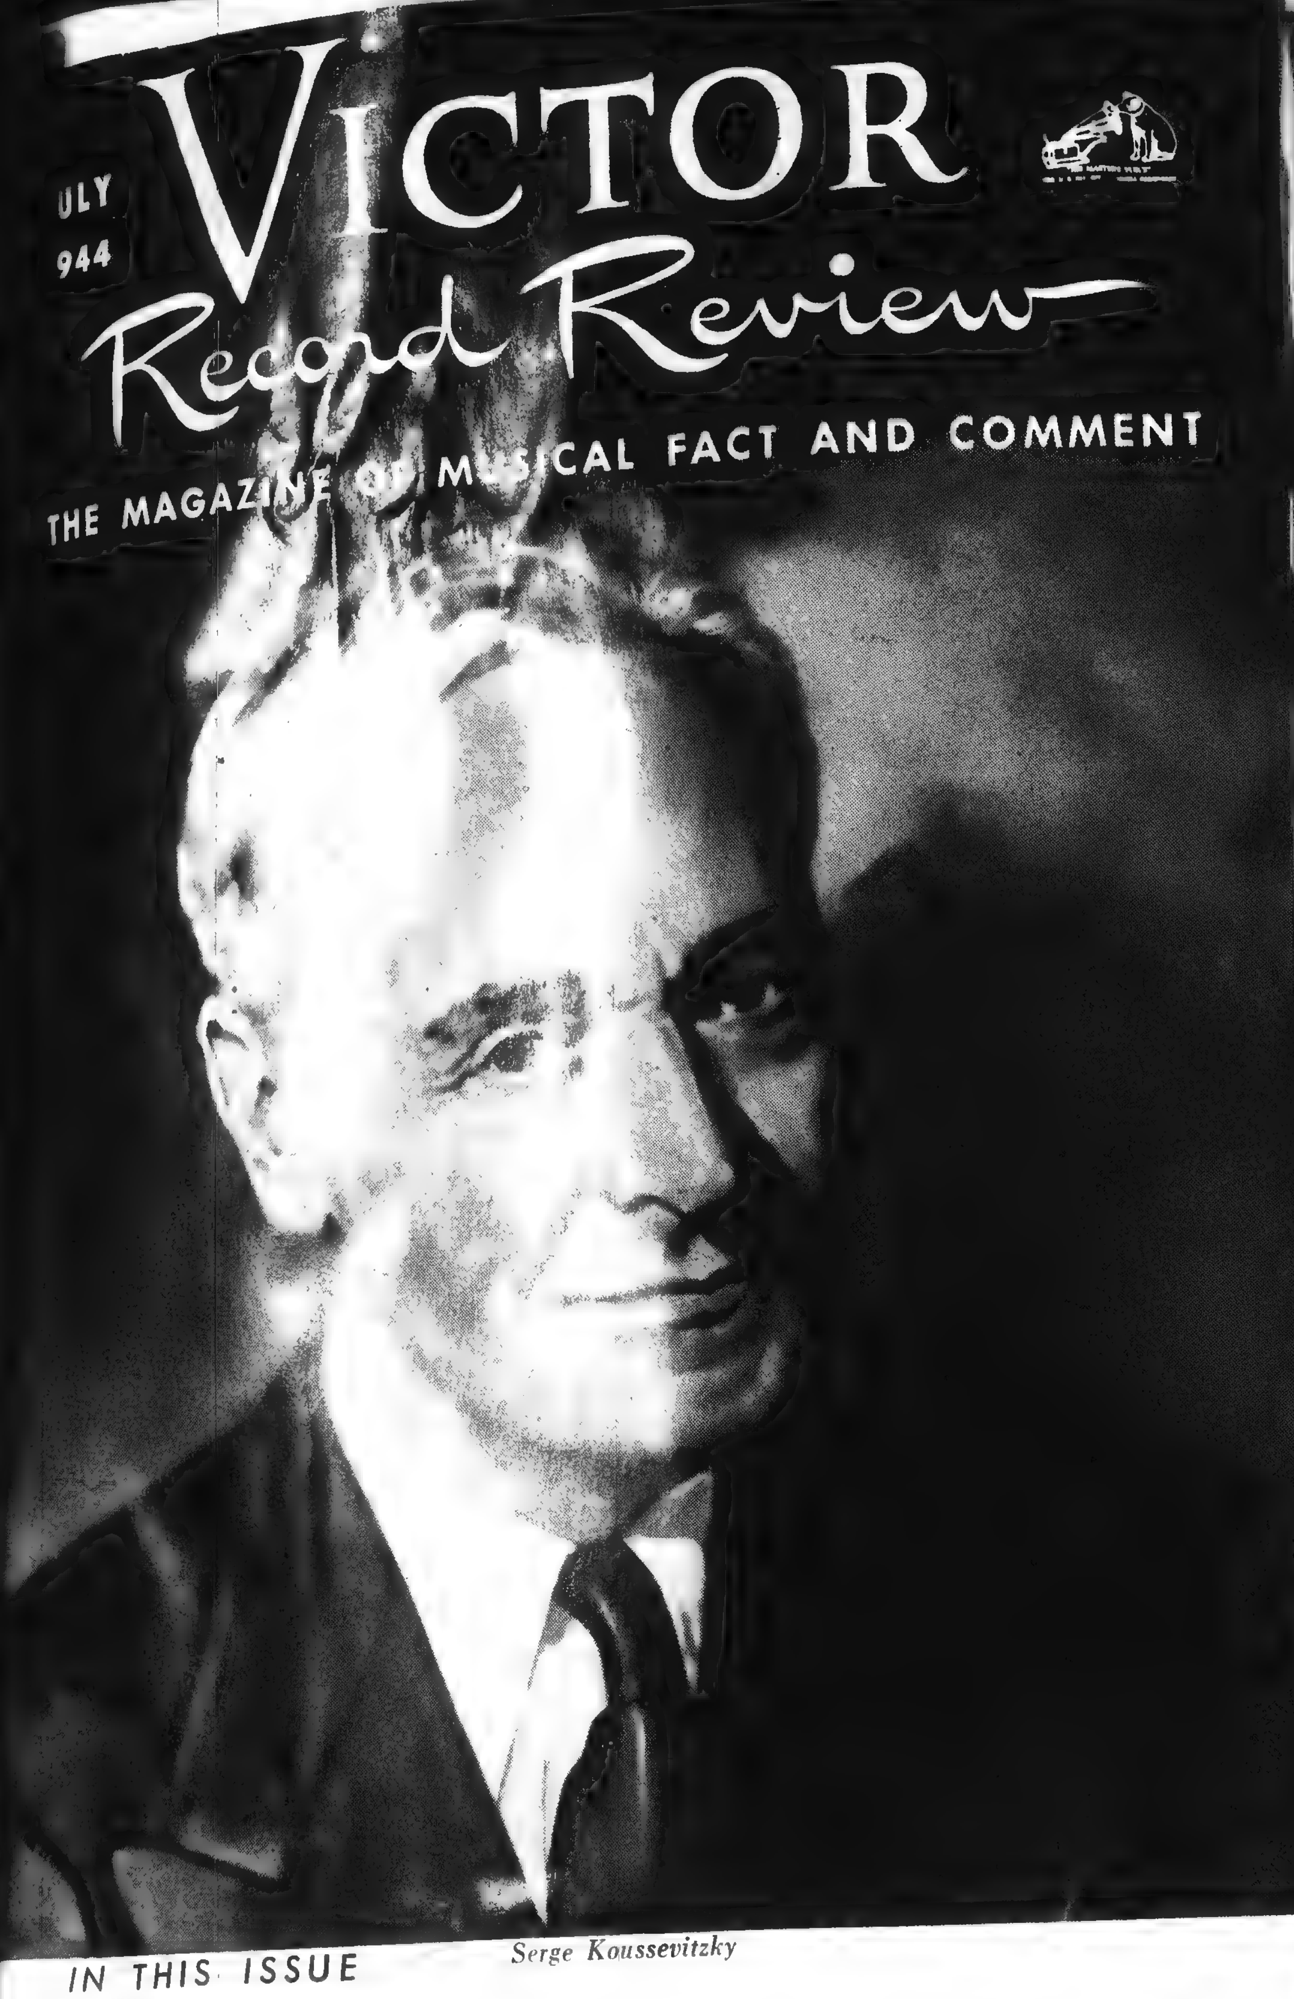
Dr. Koussevitzky lists fifteen classical compositions which will lead the beginner easily into an appreciation of music in an article by George Marek in the July issue of Good Housekeeping magazine. He lists:

"Mozart: Symphony in C Major, No. 43; Haydn: Symphony in B-flat Major, No. 9 in London series; Beethoven: Symphony in A Major, No. 7; Mendelssohn: "Italian' Symphony; Schumann: 'Spring' Symphony; Tchaikovsky: Symphony in F Minor, No. 4; Berlioz: 'Fantastic' Symphony; Brahm: Symphony in E Minor, No. 4; Richard Strauss: 'Thus Spake Zarathustra' Tone Poem; Debussy: 'The Sea' Symphonic Sketches; Ravel: 'Daphnis and Chole,' ballet suite; Stravinsky: 'The Rite of Spring,' ballet; Prokofieff: 'Lieutenant Kije' suite; Sibelius: Symphony in flat Major, No. 5; and Roy Harris: Symphony No. 3."

JULY
1944

VICTOR
Record Review

THE MAGAZINE OF MUSICAL FACT AND COMMENT



Serge Koussevitzky

IN THIS ISSUE

Seven Pianists Play Seven Masterpieces • Serge Koussevitzky Observes an Anniversary and a Birthday • E. Power Biggs Discusses Organ Literature • Collegiate "Pops" Concerts • Ellingtonia • Kreisler Makes Radio Debut • Dorsey "Starmaker" Album • • •

AN ANNIVERSARY AND A BIRTHDAY

Serge Koussevitzky, Champion of American Music, Observes Twenty Years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and His Seventieth Birthday in July

BY JOHN N. BURK

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has been much feted on the completion of his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and rightly so. He has in that stretch of years kept his musical energies and ambitions unabated; he has grown in artistic stature, and his orchestra has grown with him.

He has traversed prodigious territory, musically speaking, in his score of American years, and found fresh conceptual depths and beauties in the music of the past.

On July 26 Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] each another milestone, his seven[illegible] [illegible]day. And this calls for another [illegible]. At seventy, Dr. Koussevitzky lo[illegible] [illegible]nd dapper as he did at fifty, when he first landed on the American terra firma of a New York pier. Gray hairs are unessential; so [illegible] the relics of a picturesque Russian accent [illegible] the courteous Old World manners w[illegible] [illegible]in er[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky, the Ameri[illegible] [illegible]itizen.

Decidedly a birthday toast sh[illegible] be added to the many toasts proposed [illegible] y 16 by a group of grateful American [illegible]osers [illegible] 100 guests at a testimonial d[illegible]r in York. These composers had [illegible] for gratitude. Twenty years [illegible]go Koussevitzky had found in Ameri[illegible] [illegible]andful [illegible] composers of an older genera[illegible]n with d[illegible]tinguished abilities, but on the whole European in their musical speech. There prov[illegible] to be some younger men; but they were neither played nor heeded. How different the situation in May of 1944! At the head table sat a round dozen of Ame[illegible]a composers truly to be reckoned with.

Of more than one of them it could be said that he has had from Koussevitzky not only his true introduction to the public by orchestral performance, but consistent performances of ensuing works which have [illegible]ught him inner development and outward [illegible]en[illegible]n. These include Aaron Copland, Walter [illegible]iston, Roy Harris, Nicolai Berezowsky, Howard Hanson, Roger Sessions, Vladimir Dukelsky, and William Schuman.

An interviewer who made his way into Dr. Koussevitzky's study in the course of the twentieth season extracted interesting comments from the conductor on just this situation. He is Cyrus W. Durgin of the Boston Globe.

"So much has happened in twenty years," said Dr. Koussevitzky to Mr. Durgin. "When I first came here, there was little new music, little American music played. Both the orchestra and I are proud of the enormous influence the Boston Symphony has had in the entire musical life of the country.

"American music can be said to be in its third generation. The first included such men as Edward MacDowell, George Chadwick and Arthur Foote. Between them and the next generation, Edward Burlingame Hill is a connecting link. The outstanding men of America's second musical generation are Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roger Sessions and Roy Harris. Now we have a third, young generation led by William Schuman, David Diamond and Nicolai Berezowsky.

"Styles in American composition have changed enormously since I first came to Boston in 1924," continued Koussevitzky. "The technique has developed so that now men like Copland and Piston possess the highest, most universal technique of writing.

"I can find little emotion in modern music. The best of it sounds very well as music, is beautifully written. But try as I have, I can find little emotion in it. Perhaps other conductors can."

And he made this frank statement with the smiling simplicity and the honesty of a great artist with a vast knowledge and understanding of musical evolution.

When his birthday comes to pass, he will not

(continued on page 10)

Koussevitzky polishes up some intricate passage work at a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestr

An Anniversary and a Birthday

(continued from page 4)

be content with settling back and receiving felicitations. He will interrupt his summer's rest at his beautiful and idyllic country place in Lenox in the Berkshire Hills to open Tanglewood, necessarily dormant for the duration as far as concerts on a large scale are concerned, to give a festival in chamber proportions of the music of Mozart.

Koussevitzky's Recordings

Ample evidence of the versatility of Koussevitzky's art as a conductor may be gained from a casual perusal of the Victor catalogue, The Music America Loves Best.

Koussevitzky-conducted masterpieces that deserve a special place in every record library include Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet (DM-347, List Price $3.50); Debussy's La Mer (DM-643, List Price $3.50); Gabriel Fauré's Incidental Music to Pelléas and Mélisande (DM-941, List Price $2.50); Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf (DM-566, List Price $3.50); Copland's El Salón México (DM-546, List Price $2.50).

Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E Minor (DM-730, List Price $5.00); Roy Harris' Symphony No. 3 (DM-651, List Price $2.50); and Schubert's Symphony No. 8 in B Minor, the Unfinished (DM-319, List Price $3.50).

MOUNT MORRIS, N.Y
UNION
7/7/44

LOVE OF MUSIC EASILY GOTTEN.

• • • • •

You don't have to have a technical knowledge of music in order to appreciate good music, according to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor.

Don't let your lack of technical musical knowledge scare you away from the enjoyment of good music, because if you really want to appreciate good music, all you have to do is listen to it a few times, he suggests.

Dr. Koussevitzky lists fifteen classical compositions which will lead the beginner easily into an appreciation of music in an article by George Marek in the July issue of Good Housekeeping magazine. He lists:

"Mozart: Symphony in C Major, No. 43; Haydn: Symphony in B-flat Major, No. 9 in London series; Beethoven: Symphony in A Major, No. 7; Mendelssohn: "Italian' Symphony; Schumann: 'Spring' Symphony; Tchaikovsky: Symphony in F Minor, No. 4; Berlioz: 'Fantastic' Symphony; Brahm: Symphony in E Minor, No. 4; Richard Strauss: 'Thus Spake Zarathustra' Tone Poem; Debussy: 'The Sea' Symphonic Sketches; Ravel: 'Daphnis and Chole,' ballet suite; Stravinsky: 'The Rite of Spring,' ballet; Prokofieff: 'Lieutenant Kije' suite; Sibelius: Symphony in flat Major, No. 5; and Roy Harris: Symphony No. 3."

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES
JUL 15 1944

Koussevitzky Waved The Baton In Boston

Symphony Leader Dared To Break Tradition

BY HARRY RAUCH,

A Special Correspondent of the Star-Times.

NEW YORK, July 15.—The date was July 26. The year, 1874. A child was born. Many children were born that day, and that year, in the vast, cold land that is Russia. The village, just another tiny speck over which Hitler's legions were to tramp, and flee through, leaving nothing but rubble.

And this child was to all appearances no different from the other children in the home of a poor violin teacher, Koussevitzky. Serge, they named ~~the child.~~ He was a restless, wiry little lad, but within him burned a fire which was to grow to consuming proportions.

Instead of spending his days at play with the youngsters of the village, he would brood in the dark, musty room that was parlor and bedroom for the Koussevitzkys. He would pick up a piece of wood from the fireplace and beat the air with it.

From his throat would come weird sounds. Had anyone come upon him then, he would have fled, shouting: "The boy is possessed." The boy was possessed—with a genius which no man living can equal today.

His eyes closed, he would envision a great orchestra before him, playing music as it had never been played before. This was his dream, his obsession. To become a symphony conductor. Without funds, without technical training, all he had was a prayer.

* * *

HE was 14 when, with three rubles in his pocket, he took a long walk, but he made it. The Philharmonic Conservatory was his goal.

When he arrived, he was heartbroken to learn that there were no classes in conducting. Impressed by the boy's ambition, the headmaster told him he would be accepted in a class for double bass, that huge, ungainly instrument shaped like an overgrown violin.

And so Serge Koussevitzky took up the study of the double bass. When he was graduated in 1894, he already was a virtuoso, and within a year, he had become the world's greatest.

It was the practice in those lush days of the czars, that the great artists of the day should be patronized by royalty and rich. Not that the guests would listen to the performance of the artists. It was the fashionable thing to have them play, not to listen to them.

During one of the soirees, young Koussevitzky noticed a lovely girl listening to him play. She was the daughter of a wealthy landowner, far above She was the daughter of a his station. They met again, fell in love, married.

* * *

WITH the aid of her father, Koussevitzky was enabled to fulfill the second of his great ambitions—to have his own symphony orchestra, and to bring its music to the people. He chartered a ship, and made a historic trip along the Volga, bringing the glorious works of the old masters to thousands of peasants who never before had heard such eloquent music.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, dynamic maestro of the Boston Symphony, who began his career in a little Russian village.

His fame spread to America, and when the famous ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra began to falter in 1924, he was called to take over the baton. His arrival in Boston was quiet enough, but his flair for the dynamic, his sparkling, searing intensity upset the staid Boston Brahmins no end.

And then, when he insisted upon weeding out the musicians who could not match fire for fire with him, the roof of old Symphony Hall all but fell on his head.

But to the credit of Boston, his genius was recognized and appreciated.

It was then that Koussevitzky began to experiment with the modern composers' works — an unheard-of-thing in those days of Beethoven and Wagner. He sought out the younger, unknown composers — Stravinsky, Copland, Harris, and gave their music to the world.

Serge Koussevitzky likes nothing better than to make a soapbox of his podium for the nonentities, providing they have something to say. It was so during the days of the Russian revolution, when he joined the uprising Reds in upsetting the Romanoffs. It still is so today, when his weekly winter season programs broadcast over the coast-to-coast Blue Network—and KXOK, the Star-Times station (630 kilocycles) — sparkle with the works of new composers that shatter tradition, but establish artistic precedence.

* * *

THE fire-eating maestro still loves to overthrow hidebound tradition. To him, music is a dominant need of our time, and nothing must stand in the way of its expression.

"Music," he says, "is a great stimulus for our fighting forces, and a great hope for our future. Every atom of artistic effort must be thrown into action to defeat the unholy hoards which have attacked, invaded and imperiled our life. As never before do we realize that art and culture are a stronghold against the aggressor and his devastating, demoralizing forces.

"Let us write hymns of freedom and victory; compose marches to vanquish the foe; let us proclaim hatred for despotism and destruction; let us sing the song of love for mankind and faith in the ageless ideals of independence and democracy."

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
JUL 22 1944

Boston Symphony Opens Esplanade Concert

The first in the annual series of the well-known Esplanade C certs on the Charles River Embankment in Boston will be bro when Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 on WFMJ.

Fiedler has chosen to open the program with "Sambre et Meuse Regiment March" by Planquette-Turlet. Following this Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" will be heard. The orchestra will then play Dvorak's Fifteenth Slavonic Dance in C major, after which the "Bostonia Suite" will be heard. The latter work is a musical picturization by Keith Brown of several well-known Boston landmarks. The program will then conclude with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The Esplanade Concert, (open air), will replace the Symphony Hall pops concerts.

A new series of dramas entitled "They Call Me Joe" will begin at 7 p. m. on WTAM to replace the "American Story." "They Call Me Joe" will tell the story of the contributions to America made by the various national and racial groups represented among our servicemen. Through the co-operation of the War Department, the dramas will also be heard by servicemen and women overseas.

and Mona Paulee, popular singer, are the guests scheduled for "The Music America Loves Best."

8:00 — WKBN — Kenny Baker, radio's number one tenor, entertains the Les Paul Trio when Kenny's show honors Cole Porter.

8:30—WTAM—A story about a camera that produces pictures about tomorrow's news before it appears in print, is told on "Author's Playhouse."

9:45—WKBN — Soprano Jessica Dragonette sings "Love at Last," a version of the popular Offenbach "Barcarolle" as one of her selections for the "Saturday Night Serenade."

10:30—WFMJ—A thrilling story about a group of army engineers, advancing through the jungle to repair an air strip, is presented by the "Army Service Forces" in a drama entitled "The Longest Night."

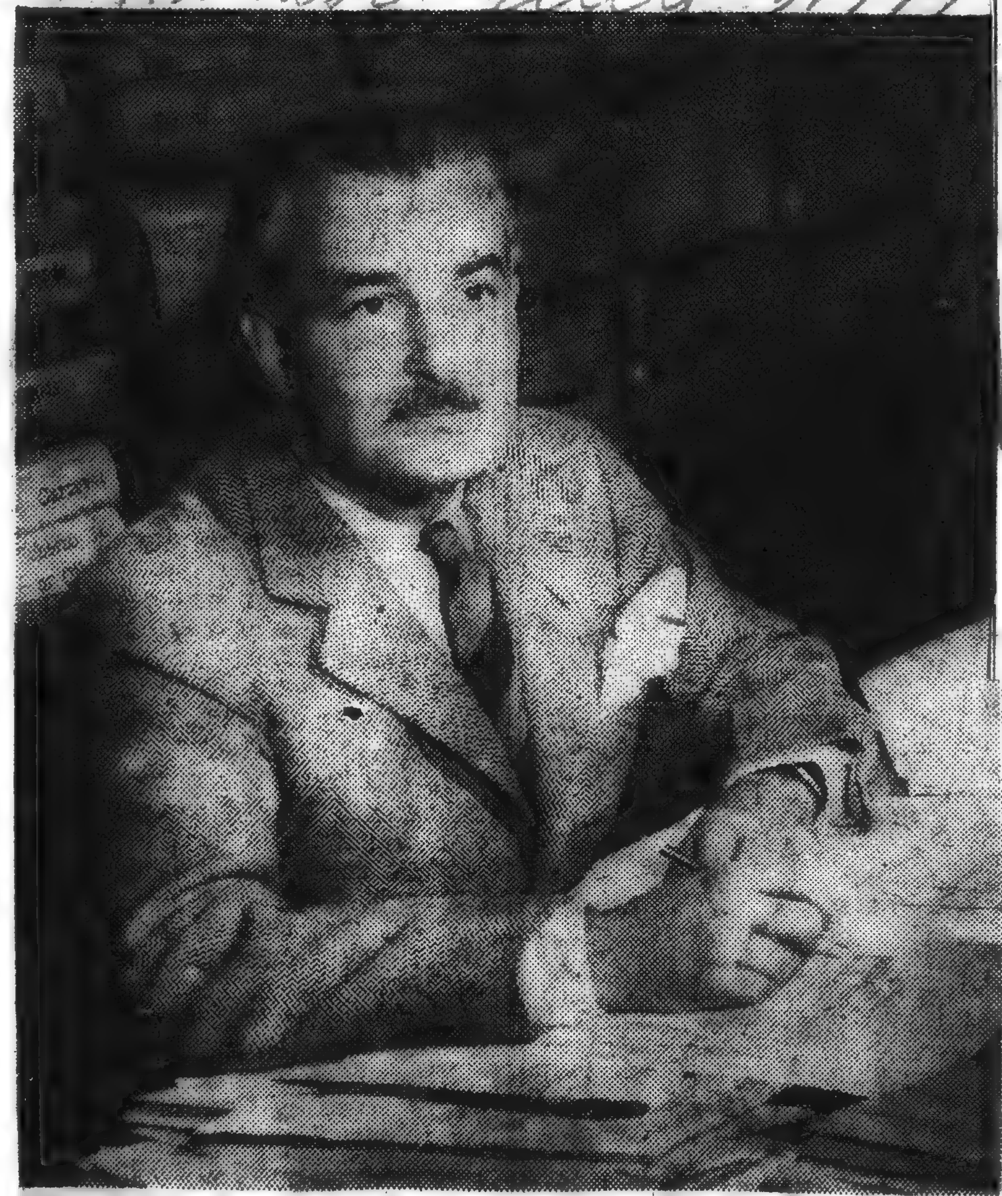
11:15—WFMJ—The Down Homers, an instrumental and vocal quartet, make their first appearance on the Blue's "Hoosier Hop."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 9 - 1944

Boston Symphony Rests, Along With Sponsor

The Bostons—the symphony, not the Red Sox—sponsored by Milwaukee's largest manufacturer, will take a summer radio rest after this Saturday's concert by the "Pops" ensemble (7:30 to 8:30 p. m., WENR, WEMP). Sponsorship will resume with the return to the air of the full symphony under Serge Koussevitzky Oct. 7. Meantime the Blue network may broadcast two or three of the group's summer concerts on a sustaining basis.

Monitor July 21 1944



David Nilsson

Arthur Fiedler

Opening his sixteenth season of Esplanade Concerts next Thursday evening in the Hatch Memorial Shell.

Post July 21

20,000 AT FIRST FIEDLER CONCERT

16th Esplanade Series Is Opened With Classical Programme at the Hatch Shell

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

What the Symphony men call Fiedler's luck kept the rain away from the Charles River Esplanade last evening, though the all-day threat of showers prevented what might easily have been a record-breaking attendance at the opening concert of the 16th Esplanade season.

20,000 AT FIRST FIEDLER CONCERT

Continued From First Page

As it was, upwards of 20,000 people occupied and virtually filled the great oval in front of the Edward Hatch Memorial Shell in which Arthur Fiedler's 70 Symphony musicians have played since 1939.

Before the concert actually took place there were the usual formalities. Introduced by Commissioner Eugene Hultman, Lieutenant-Governor Horace Cahill briefly addressed the assembled multitude. A year ago, he said, we had hoped that this summer the world would be at peace. But if that happy state of affairs has not yet arrived, we are at least free from the fears and apprehensions which last summer necessitated the dimout.

It will be recalled that the concerts then began at 7:30 in order to take advantage of the daylight. This season the old starting time of 8:30 is once more in effect.

For the rest, the Lieutenant-Governor's remarks had to do with the universal craving for music and the heightened need for that art in war time. Due notice was also taken of the excellent qualities of conductor and orchestra.

Classical Programme

When the Esplanade concerts began there was much sugar coating of the musical pill. Mr. Fiedler now gives them the classics straight from the shoulder, and they they like it. Berlioz, Prokofieff, Bach and Weber were represented last evening, along with Verdi, Saint-Saens, Grainger and the "Salute to Our Fighting Forces," in Bodge's arrangement, that appeared on nearly every programme in the recently concluded season of Pops.

The presence on this list of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony reminded us that the musical bad boy, the fearsome modernist of today, is always likely to turn out to be the popular composer of tomorrow. As the Pops, there were encores last evening, but not so many of them. Taken as a whole, the Esplanade concerts may be set down as slightly more serious. And that, when you come to think it over, means quite a lot.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES

JUL 15 1944

Koussevitzky Waved The Baton In Boston

Symphony Leader Dared To Break Tradition

BY HARRY RAUCH,

A Special Correspondent of the Star-Times.

NEW YORK, July 15.—The date was July 26. The year, 1874. A child was born. Many children were born that day, and that year, in the vast, cold land that is Russia. The village, just another tiny speck over which Hitler's legions were to tramp, and flee through, leaving nothing but rubble.

And this child was to all appearances no different from the other children in the home of a poor violin teacher, Koussevitzky. Serge, they named ~~the child.~~ He was a restless, wiry little lad, but within him burned a fire which was to grow to consuming proportions.

Instead of spending his days at play with the youngsters of the village, he would brood in the dark, musty room that was parlor and bedroom for the Koussevitzkys. He would pick up a piece of wood from the fireplace and beat the air with it.

From his throat would come weird sounds. Had anyone come upon him then, he would have fled, shouting: "The boy is possessed." The boy was possessed—with a genius which no man living can equal today.

His eyes closed, he would envision a great orchestra before him, playing music as it had never been played before. This was his dream, his obsession. To become a symphony conductor. Without funds, without technical training, all he had was a prayer.

* * *

HE was 14 when, with three rubles in his pocket, he took a long walk, but he made it. The Philharmonic Conservatory was his goal.

When he arrived, he was heartbroken to learn that there were no classes in conducting. Impressed by the boy's ambition, the headmaster told him he would be accepted in a class for double bass, that huge, ungainly instrument shaped like an overgrown violin.

And so Serge Koussevitzky took up the study of the double bass. When he was graduated in 1894, he already was a virtuoso, and within a year, he had become the world's greatest.

It was the practice in those lush days of the czars, that the great artists of the day should be patronized by royalty and rich. Not that the guests would listen to the performance of the artists. It was the fashionable thing to have them play, not to listen to them.

During one of the soirees, young Koussevitzky noticed a lovely girl listening to him play. She was the daughter of a wealthy landowner, far above She was the daughter of a his station. They met again, fell in love, married.

* * *

WITH the aid of her father, Koussevitzky was enabled to fulfill the second of his great ambitions—to have his own symphony orchestra, and to bring its music to the people. He chartered a ship, and made a historic trip along the Volga, bringing the glorious works of the old masters to thousands of peasants who never before had heard such eloquent music.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, dynamic maestro of the Boston Symphony, who began his career in a little Russian village.

His fame spread to America, and when the famous ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra began to falter in 1924, he was called to take over the baton. His arrival in Boston was quiet enough, but his flair for the dynamic, his sparkling, searing intensity upset the staid Boston Brahmins no end.

And then, when he insisted upon weeding out the musicians who could not match fire for fire with him, the roof of old Symphony Hall all but fell on his head.

But to the credit of Boston, his genius was recognized and appreciated.

It was then that Koussevitzky began to experiment with the modern composers' works — an unheard-of-thing in those days of Beethoven and Wagner. He sought out the younger, unknown composers — Stravinsky, Copland, Harris, and gave their music to the world.

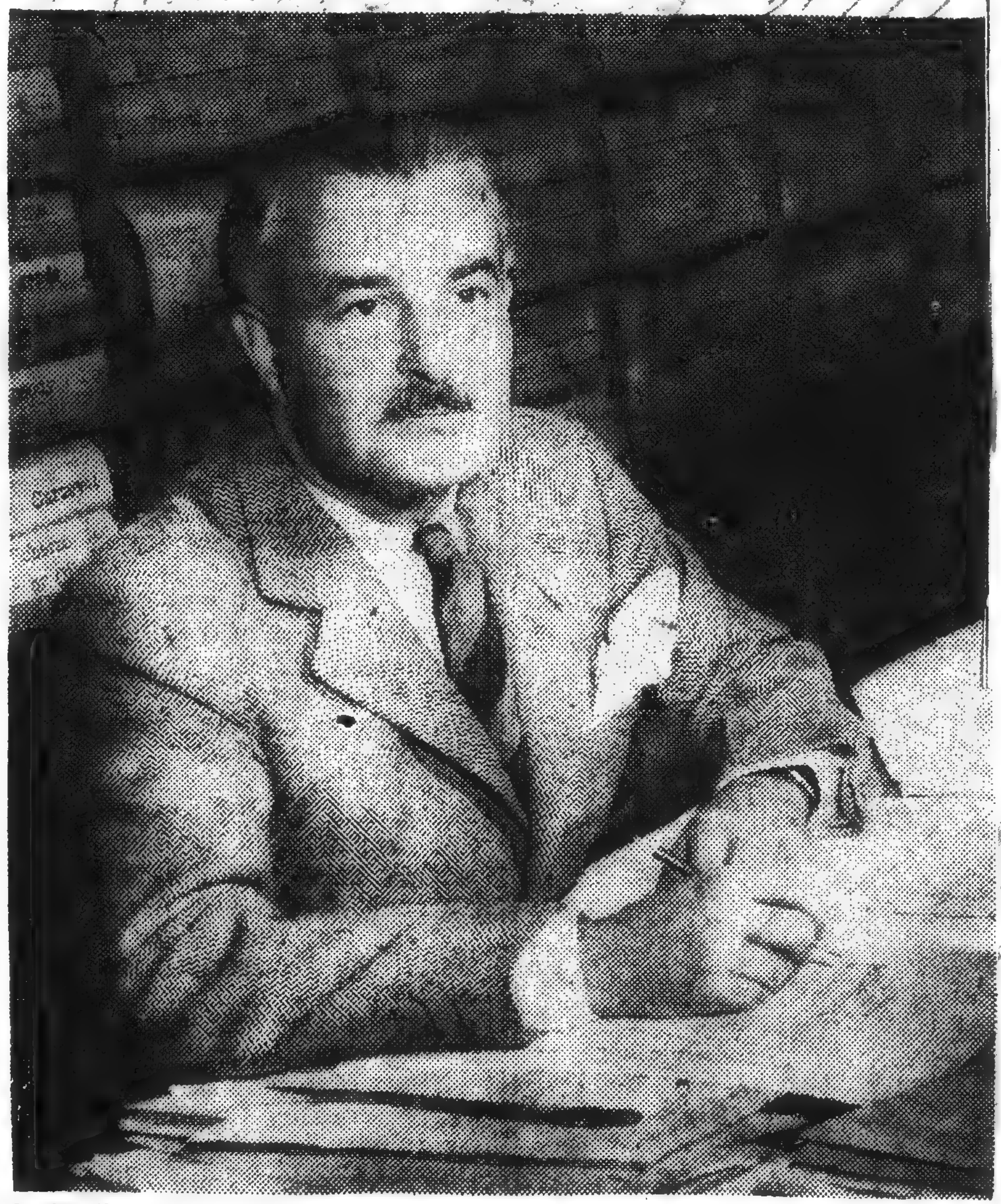
Serge Koussevitzky likes nothing better than to make a soapbox of his podium for the nonentities, providing they have something to say. It was so during the days of the Russian revolution, when he joined the uprising Reds in upsetting the Romanoffs. It still is so today, when his weekly winter season programs broadcast over the coast-to-coast Blue Network—and KXOK, the Star-Times station (630 kilocycles) — sparkle with the works of new composers that shatter tradition, but establish artistic precedence.

* * *

THE fire-eating maestro still loves to overthrow hidebound tradition. To him, music is a dominant need of our time, and nothing must stand in the way of its expression.

"Music," he says, "is a great stimulus for our fighting forces, and a great hope for our future. Every atom of artistic effort must be thrown into action to defeat the unholy hoards which have attacked, invaded and imperiled our life. As never before do we realize that art and culture are a stronghold against the aggressor and his devastating, demoralizing forces.

"Let us write hymns of freedom and victory; compose marches to vanquish the foe; let us proclaim hatred for despotism and destruction; let us sing the song of love for mankind and faith in the ageless ideals of independence and democracy."



David Nilsson

Arthur Fiedler

Opening his sixteenth season of Esplanade Concerts next Thursday evening in the Hatch Memorial Shell.

20,000 AT FIRST FIEDLER CONCERT

16th Esplanade Series Is Opened With Classical Programme at the Hatch Shell

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

What the Symphony men call Fiedler's luck kept the rain away from the Charles River Esplanade last evening, though the all-day threat of showers prevented what might easily have been a record-breaking attendance at the opening concert of the 16th Esplanade season.

20,000 AT FIRST FIEDLER CONCERT

Continued From First Page

As it was, upwards of 20,000 people occupied and virtually filled the great oval in front of the Edward Hatch Memorial Shell in which Arthur Fiedler's 70 Symphony musicians have played since 1939.

Before the concert actually took place there were the usual formalities. Introduced by Commissioner Eugene Hultman, Lieutenant-Governor Horace Cahill briefly addressed the assembled multitude. A year ago, he said, we had hoped that this summer the world would be at peace. But if that happy state of affairs has not yet arrived, we are at least free from the fears and apprehensions which last summer necessitated the dimout.

It will be recalled that the concerts then began at 7:30 in order to take advantage of the daylight. This season the old starting time of 8:30 is once more in effect.

For the rest, the Lieutenant-Governor's remarks had to do with the universal craving for music and the heightened need for that art in war time. Due notice was also taken of the excellent qualities of conductor and orchestra.

Classical Programme

When the Esplanade concerts began there was much sugar coating of the musical pill. Mr. Fiedler now gives them the classics straight from the shoulder, and they they like it. Berlioz, Prokofieff, Bach and Weber were represented last evening, along with Verdi, Saint-Saens, Grainger and the "Salute to Our Fighting Forces," in Bodge's arrangement, that appeared on nearly every programme in the recently concluded season of Pops.

The presence on this list of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony reminded us that the musical bad boy, the fearsome modernist of today, is always likely to turn out to be the popular composer of tomorrow. As the Pops, there were encores last evening, but not so many of them. Taken as a whole, the Esplanade concerts may be set down as slightly more serious. And that, when you come to think it over, means quite a lot.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

JUL 22 1944

Boston Symphony Opens Esplanade Concerts

The first in the annual series of the well-known Esplanade concerts on the Charles River Embankment in Boston will be broad- when Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 on WFMJ.

Fiedler has chosen to open the program with "Sambre et Meuse Regiment March" by Pianquette-Turlet. Following this Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" will be heard. The orchestra will then play Dvorak's Fifteenth Slavonic Dance in C major, after which the "Bostonia Suite" will be heard. The latter work is a musical picturization by Keith Brown of several well-known Boston landmarks. The program will then conclude with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The Esplanade Concert, (ope- will replace the Symphony Hall pops concerts.

A new series of dramas entitled "They Call Me Joe" will begin at 7 p. m. on WTAM to replace the "American Story." "They Call Me Joe" will tell the story of the contributions to America made by the various national and racial groups represented among our servicemen. Through the co-operation of the War Department, the dramas will also be heard by servicemen and wo~~men over~~seas.

and Mona Paulee, popular singer, are the ~~guests~~ scheduled for "The Music America Loves Best."

8:00 — WKBN — Kenny Baker, radio's number one tenor, entertains the Les Paul Trio when Kenny's show honors Cole Porter.

8:30—WTAM—A story about a camera that produces pictures about tomorrow's news before it appears in print, is told on "Author's Playhouse."

9:45—WKBN — Soprano Jessica Dragonette sings "Love at Last," a version of the popular Offenbach "Barcarolle" as one of her selections for the "Saturday Night Serenade."

10:30—WFMJ—A thrilling story about a group of army engineers, advancing through the jungle to repair an air strip, is presented by the "Army Service Forces" in a drama entitled "The Longest Night."

11:15—WFMJ—The Down Homers, an instrumental and vocal quartet, make their first appearance on the Blue's "Hoosier Hop."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

JUL 9 1944

Boston Symphony Rests, Along With Sponsor

The Bostons — the symphony, not the Red Sox—sponsored by Milwaukee's largest manufacturer, will take a summer radio rest after this Saturday's concert by the "Pops" ensemble (7:30 to 8:30 p. m., WENR, WEMP). Sponsorship will resume with the return to the air of the full symphony under Serge Koussevitzky Oct 7. Meantime the Blue network may broadcast two or three of the group's summer concerts on a sustaining basis.

OGRAMME

sical Variety Accou

it comes to answering ... department usually re- ... to those which are direct- ...ed to it. However, be- ...ts timeliness and because ...etic issues involved, an ex- ... being made here in the case of ... communication which recently appeared in the What Post Readers Say column. The writer, who revealed himself as a former Bostonian now living in Syracuse, N. Y., was greatly distressed at hearing the Pops Orchestra perform "that monstrous ditty, 'Pistol Packin' Mamma.'"

The general trend of this letter was that Boston had slipped musically to an alarming degree if the Pops Orchestra could bend backward sufficiently "to cater to the moronic tastes of some whose presence in Symphony Hall detracts rather than adds to the prestige of this notable auditorium."

Well, how about it? The offend-ing num... arrangem... Shooting... was an e... it has ye... night of... cessful 5... a close ... viewer r... out of ... must ne...

What... there is ... amazing... grammes ... for their... Casella, ... tried ea... lofty pla... nocent ... fantasias ... you or ... Fiedler ... it is wh... Pops, w... ards in... concerts ... Boston ... frankly ... fact, th... of the ... pays fo... series o...

Pops ...

The ... progra... of a so... that wi... and Ge... or Rus... descend... The ve... case of ... encores ... offer a ... not co... someth... a certa... in ques... rule a... elicito...

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

JUL 17 1944

CRITICAL and AM

—Blom— Arnold

HEARD AND OV

Don't Get the Wrong Idea

The column last Thursday about NBC censorship policies was badly and unfortunately phrased in a couple of instances, as I realized—too late—when I saw it in print.

The column mentioned three scripts, two written by Jerry Devine, an independent writer-director, and the third by Richard P. McDonagh, of NBC's own script division.

The first two enacted Nazi brutalities vividly; the third recited, but did not enact, Nazi crimes far more horrible.

NBC objected to Devine's scripts on the ground that its code forbids radio portrayal of brutal crimes; there was no objection to McDonagh's script.

My editorial comments were: "Just why NBC is so insistent on being polite to the Nazis is a riddle I leave to its executive vice president and chief censor, Clarence L. Menser, to explain."

"The Nazis couldn't be that bad, could they?"

"Where were you, Mr. Menser, when holier-than-thou NBC treated the Nazis so disrespectfully?"

I can understand NBC's aversion to putting brutality on the air, as a general rule; but I cannot under-stand ... forget ... are co...

The ... heavy-... might ... NBC ... ishness ... contra... tent o...

Any... is here ... if NBC ... it, my ...

Point ...

I w... now ... by Se... up by ... radio, ... the su... tics, ... chance... tism, ... Germa... his br... dous ... other ... the ... enough ... so ... thing... ing ...

Koussevitzky At 7
Peace Table Musi

LENOX, MASS., July (AP) ... of the next world peace conference ... birthday interview, ...ibe...

ROGRAMMES POSSESS POPULAR APPEAL

Musical Variety Accounts Largely for Enduring Success of Pops Concerts

When it comes to answering tters, this department usually re- ricts itself to those which are directaddressed to it. However, beuse of its timeliness and because the esthetic issues involved, an exption is being made here in the se of a communication which rently appeared in the What Post Readers Say column. The writer, who revealed himself as a former ostonian now living in Syracuse, Y., was greatly distressed at hearg the Pops Orchestra perform "that onstrous ditty, 'Pistol Packin' amma.'"

The general trend of this letter as that Boston had slipped musily to an alarming degree if the Pops Orchestra could bend backward ufficiently "to cater to the moronic astes of some whose presence in ymphony Hall detracts rather than dds to the prestige of this notable uditorium."

Well, how about it? The offending number, a hilarious orchestral arrangement bearing the title, "The Shooting of Pistol Packin' Mamma," was an extra—the only way in which it has yet appeared—on the opening night of the unprecedentedly successful 59th season, which came to a close last evening. Since this reviewer recalls getting a distinct kick out of it, the adjective "moronic" must necessarily apply to him.

Whatever the merits of the case, there is no denying the fact that the amazing range of the Pops programmes are an outstanding reason for their present popularity. Alfredo Casella, conductor from 1927-29, tried earnestly to keep them on a lofty plane, eschewing even such innocent entertainment as operatic fantasias. And it was no go. Whether you or I happen to approve, Arthur Fiedler has the right idea. Plainly it is what the public wants; and the Pops, while adhering to certain standards inseparable from a series of concerts by the major portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are frankly a commercial venture. In fact, they help defray the expenses of the winter season, which no more pays for itself than does any other series of symphony concerts.

Pops Concerts Unique

The general plan of Mr. Fiedler's programmes is something like that of a song recital by a popular artist that will begin with the elder classics and German Lieder, or the French or Russian equivalent, and gradually descend to the final songs in English. The very lightest pieces, as in the case of the Pops concerts, will be the encores. Even here the Pops seldom offer a popular number which does not come from a musical show, something which automatically gives it a certain prestige. The number now in question was one exception to this rule and another was the equally felicitous arrangement of "Deep was greatly relished two seasons ago. At the other extreme come the so-called popular classics, the standard overtures, suites and concertos and certain of the standard symphonies or movements therefrom. No other series of concerts by an orchestra of comparable size and caliber offers programmes of like range. This, in combination with the refreshments and the indoor setting, makes the Pops a unique institution. For some peculiar reason, attempted imitations in other cities have signally failed to go over.

To get back to "Pistol Packin' Mamma," it could be argued that this is one of the most likable popular songs of recent years. It has almost the character of folk music and might conceivably survive the changes in its own field. If the words are extravagant and a bit on the silly side, so are those of many folksongs. They are at least amusing and refreshingly free from tasteless or mawkish sentiment. This particular song, unlike some of its fellows, happily does not suggest the jungle, the nursery or the psychopathic ward.

The Pops concluded, other activities of the Symphony men are about to begin. Under Arthur Fiedler's direction, as usual, the free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will commence next Thursday evening and continue for four weeks. There will be an "intimate" Mozart Festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshires, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Eminent soloists, the principals and other members of the Symphony will provide the music. These concerts will take place on Saturday evenings, July 29 and Aug. 5 and Sunday afternoons July 30 and Aug. 6. The final summer activity will be four pairs of concerts by these same principals and others in New England Mutual Hall on Sunday and Monday evenings beginning Aug 13 and 14 and concluding Sept 3 and 4. Bernard Zighera, G. Wallace Woodworth and Richard Burgin will be the conductors. The third programme will be in the hands of the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments and the Boston Flute Players Club, respectively directed by Alfred Zighera and Georges Laurent.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

SYMPHONY HALL — COM. 1492

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

announces

16th Season

ESPLANADE concerts July 20 to August 16

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

MOZART Festival at Tanglewood

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

JULY 29, 30—AUGUST 5 and 6

Tickets at Symphony Hall

CHAMBER Orchestra Four Programmes

On SUNDAY Evenings, Aug. 13-20-27, Sept. 3

On MONDAY Evenings, Aug. 14-21-28, Sept. 4

to be given in New England Mutual Hall

Season Tickets $6.00, Tax Included. Now on Sale

New England Mutual and Symphony Hall

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

July 26 '44

URGES MUSIC WITH PEACE CONFERENCE

Koussevitzky Would Have Great Artists Lead World Harmony

LENOX, Mass. (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston Symphony Orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor. "I feel sure that if this great music festival were to be held at the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

CRITICAL and AMUSEMENTS

—Blom—

HEARD AND OVERHEARD

Don't Get the Wrong Idea

The column last Thursday about NBC censorship policies was badly and unfortunately phrased in a couple of instances, as I realized—too late—when I saw it in print.

The column mentioned three scripts, two written by Jerry Devine, an independent writer-director, and the third by Richard P. McDonagh, of NBC's own script division.

The first two enacted Nazi brutalities vividly; the third recited, but did not enact, Nazi crimes far more horrible.

NBC objected to Devine's scripts on the ground that its code forbids radio portrayal of brutal crimes; there was no objection to McDonagh's script.

My editorial comments were:

"Just why NBC is so insistent on being polite to the Nazis is a riddle I leave to its executive vice president and chief censor, Clarence L. Menser, to explain."

"The Nazis couldn't be that bad, could they?"

"Where were you, Mr. Menser, when holier-than-thou NBC treated the Nazis so disrespectfully?"

I can understand NBC's aversion to putting brutality on the air, as a general rule; but I cannot understand why the network hesitates to forget the rule as far as the Nazis are concerned.

The sole aim of the column, heavy-handed though the sarcasm might have been, was to criticize NBC and Menser for this squeamishness. Any other interpretation is contrary to the facts and to the intent of the column.

Anyone who did misinterpret it is hereby advised of his error. And if NBC and Menser misinterpreted it, my apologies.

Point Counterpoint

I went over to talk to Mark Warnow about one thing—a statement by Serge Koussevitzky. We ended up by talking about music and radio, Charles Fort, premonitions, the supernatural, Hildegarde, politics, the soldier vote, Dewey's chances, Helen Hayes, anti-Semitism, Words at War, the Bible, German refugees, Mark's family, his brother, Raymond Scott, Aldous Huxley, fantasy, and a few other subjects that escape me at the moment. There's not room enough to cover all that Mark said, so let's take the most interesting things, and assume it's Mark talking:

Koussevitzky said it was an outrage that a gifted composer like David Diamond had to earn a living by playing in the All-Time Hit Parade band. Why is that an outrage? At least he's earning a living, which is more than he could do if he had to depend on conductors like Koussevitzky or orchestras like the Boston Symphony. What's more, we rehearse his music, so he can hear what it's like as he goes along, and didn't Koussevitzky say "only a composer knows what a composer suffers when he hasn't the chance to hear his music?"

A symphony conductor will beat his brains out to get a composer's first performance rights, paying him perhaps $100, and after that the composition is seldom heard again, and the composer can begin starving all over. For one day's work a week Diamond gets enough to keep him happy, well fed, well housed, well clothed, and a bit over. Isn't that better than letting him live on a couple of handouts a year from conductors who usually drop him cold after a first performance? . . .

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

JUL 26 1944

Koussevitzky At 70 Advocates Peace Table Music Festival

LENOX, MASS., July 26 (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

High Spiritual Value

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitsky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston symphony orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor.

"I feel sure that if this great music festival were to be held at the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

The Russian-born director is resting at his summer home and preparing for the revival at Tanglewood this week-end and next to an abbreviated version of the Berkshire festival which he raised to top rank in the musical world. At that time the orchestra will give four concerts devoted entirely to the works of Mozart.

Koussevitsky is in excellent health and spirits, just as full of enthusiasm as he was when he took over the leadership of the Boston symphony orchestra 20 years ago.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 22 1944

RADIO
Today

First Esplanade Concert To Be Broadcast Tonight

Arthur Fiedler Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Opening Program in Annual Series — 'Boot Camp Parade' Will Originate From Sampson, N. Y.

The first in the annual series of Esplanade concerts on the Charles river embankment in Boston will be broadcast tonight (WSPR, 8.30 p. m.) when Arthur Fiedler will conduct members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr Fiedler has chosen to open with "Sambre et Meuse," regimental march by Planquette-Turlet, followed by Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." The orchestra will then play Dvorak's 15th Slavonic dance," after which the "Bostonia Suite" will be heard. The latter work is a musical picturization by Keith Brown of several well-known Boston landmarks. The program is to conclude with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The "Chicago Theater of the Air" will present "A Woman of Arles," an original musical-dramatic production based on the Daudet story as set to music by Georges Bizet (WHYN, WHAI, WOR, 9 p. m.). Bruce Foote, baritone; Ruth Slater, contralto, and Virginia Haskins, soprano, will be soloists, with Henry Weber conducting the symphony orchestra and chorus.

Listeners in this area will have an opportunity to hear a program originating from Sampson naval training station in New York, where so many local boys have been stationed, when the new servicemen's musical radio show, "Boot Camp Parade" bows in this afternoon over CBS networks (WMAS, 4 p. m.). The show will present 25 minutes of popular music by an orchestra made up of "boots" in training at Sampson, who were formerly playing in top-flight bands of the country. Oliver Daniels of CBS's musical division will direct.

The story of contributions to America made by the various national and racial groups represented among the servicemen will be presented in "They call me Joe," a series of 12 dramatizations which replaces "American story" tonight (WBZA, WTIC, WGY, 7 p. m.). This program will be recorded and flown to nearly 400 outlets of the armed forces radio services, to be heard by servicemen and women overseas.

"Your America" will pay tribute this afternoon to the coal mining industry, when Eugene McAuliffe of Omaha, president of the Union Pacific Coal company, will be guest speaker (WBZA, WTIC, WGY, 5 p. m.). Elden Westley will tell of Sergt Harry Tully, marine hero of the Solomons, in a story written by Marge Fischer, and Ray Clark, reporter, will interview a general car foreman in the Union Pacific railroad's shops in Omaha.

MARINETTE, WIS.
EAGLE-STAR

JUL 26 1944

Says Music Festival To Save World Peace

Lenox, Mass—(AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference — and if other nations would do likewise — we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

hony Opens nade Concer of the well-known Esplanade nkment in Boston will be broa

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Rests, sor

phony, not the ilwaukee's large a summer raay's concert by 0 to 8:30 p. m., orship will re-he air of the full oussevitzky Oct.
ork may broad-group's summer basis.

T CONCERT

First Page

of 20,000 people filled the great Edward Hatch which Arthur musicians have tually took place formalities. Inssioner Eugene overnor Horace the assembled o, he said, we mmer the world ut if that happy not yet arrived, from the fears.

ch last summer
t. hat the concerts rder to take adht. This season of 8:30 is once he Lieutenant-d to do with the music and the hat art in war also taken of of conductor gramme concerts began coating of the edler now gives raight from the like it. Berlioz, Veber were rep-long with Verdi, and the "Salute es," in Bodge's peared on nearly he recently cons list of Prokophony reminded ad boy, the fearoday, is always the popular com-the Pops, there ning, but not so as a whole, the ay be set down

ous. And that,
k it over, means

PROGRAMMES POSSESS POPULAR APPEAL

Musical Variety Accounts Largely for Enduring Success of Pops Concerts

When it comes to answering [illegible] Symphony Hall detracts rather than [illegible] the prestige of this notable [illegible] The offending number, a hilarious orchestral arrangement bearing the title, "The Shooting of Pistol Packin' Mamma," was an extra—the only way in which it has yet appeared—on the opening night of the unprecedentedly successful 59th season, which came to a close last evening. Since this reviewer recalls getting a distinct kick out of it, the adjective "moronic" must necessarily apply to him.

Whatever the merits of the case, there is no denying the fact that the amazing range of the Pops programmes are an outstanding reason for their present popularity. Alfredo Casella, conductor from 1927-29, tried earnestly to keep them on a lofty plane, eschewing even such innocent entertainment as operatic fantasias. And it was no go. Whether you or I happen to approve, Arthur Fiedler has the right idea. Plainly it is what the public wants; and the Pops, while adhering to certain standards inseparable from a series of concerts by the major portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are frankly a commercial venture. In fact, they help defray the expenses of the winter season, which no more pays for itself than does any other series of symphony concerts.

Pops Concerts Unique

The general plan of Mr. Fiedler's programmes is something like that of a song recital by a popular artist that will begin with the elder classics and German Lieder, or the French or Russian equivalent, and gradually descend to the final songs in English. The very lightest pieces, as in the case of the Pops concerts, will be the encores. Even here the Pops seldom offer a popular number which does not come from a musical show, something which automatically gives it a certain prestige. The number now in question was one exception to this rule and another was the equally felicitous arrangement of "Deep [illegible]" was greatly relished two seasons ago. At the other extreme come the so-called popular classics, the standard overtures, suites and concertos and certain of the standard symphonies or movements therefrom. No other series of concerts by an orchestra of comparable size and caliber offers programmes of like range. This, in combination with the refreshments and the indoor setting, makes the Pops a unique institution. For some peculiar reason, attempted imitations in other cities have signally failed to go over.

To get back to "Pistol Packin' Mamma," it could be argued that this is one of the most likable popular songs of recent years. It has almost the character of folk music and might conceivably survive the changes in its own field. If the words are extravagant and a bit on the silly side, so are those of many folk-songs. They are at least amusing and refreshingly free from tasteless or mawkish sentiment. This particular song, unlike some of its fellows, happily does not suggest the jungle, the nursery or the psychopathic ward.

The Pops concluded, other activities of the Symphony men are about to begin. Under Arthur Fiedler's direction, as usual, the free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will commence next Thursday evening and continue for four weeks. There will be an "intimate" Mozart Festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshires, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Eminent soloists, the principals and other members of the Symphony will provide the music. These concerts will take place on Saturday evenings, July 29 and Aug. 5 and Sunday afternoons July 30 and Aug. 6. The final summer activity will be four pairs of concerts by these same principals and others in New England Mutual Hall on Sunday and Monday evenings beginning Aug. 13 and 14 and concluding Sept. 3 and 4. Bernard Zighera, G. Wallace Woodworth and Richard Burgin will be the conductors. The third programme will be in the hands of the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments and the Boston Flute Players Club, respectively directed by Alfred Zighera and Georges Laurent.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

SYMPHONY HALL — COM. 1492
The Boston Symphony Orchestra
announces
16th Season
ESPLANADE concerts July 20 to August 16
ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor
MOZART Festival at Tanglewood
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor
JULY 29, 30—AUGUST 5 and 6
Tickets at Symphony Hall
CHAMBER Orchestra Four Programmes
On SUNDAY Evenings, Aug. 13-20-27, Sept. 3
On MONDAY Evenings, Aug. 14-21-28, Sept. 4
to be given in New England Mutual Hall
Season Tickets $6.00, Tax Included. Now on Sale
New England Mutual and Symphony Hall

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

URGES MUSIC WITH PEACE CONFERENCE

Koussevitzky Would Have Great Artists Lead World Harmony

LENOX, Mass. (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston Symphony Orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor. "I feel sure that if this great music festival were to be held at the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

CRITICAL and AMUSEMENTS

Blom

HEARD AND OVERHEARD

Don't Get the Wrong Idea

Our column last Thursday [illegible] NBC censorship policies was badly and unfortunately phrased in a couple of instances, as I realized too late when I saw it in print.

The column mentioned three scripts, two written by Jerry Devine, an independent writer-director, and the third by Richard P. McDonagh, of NBC's own script division.

The first two enacted Nazi brutalities vividly; the third recited, but did not enact, Nazi crimes far more horrible.

NBC objected to Devine's scripts on the ground that its code forbids radio portrayal of brutal crimes; there was no objection to McDonagh's script.

My editorial comments were:

"Just why NBC is so insistent on being polite to the Nazis is a riddle I leave to its executive vice president and chief censor, Clarence L. Menser, to explain."

"The Nazis couldn't be that bad, could they?"

"Where were you, Mr. Menser, when holier-than-thou NBC treated the Nazis so disrespectfully?"

I can understand NBC's aversion to putting brutality on the air, as a general rule; but I cannot understand why the network hesitates to forget the rule as far as the Nazis are concerned.

The sole aim of the column, heavy-handed though the sarcasm might have been, was to criticize NBC and Menser for this squeamishness. Any other interpretation is contrary to the facts and to the intent of the column.

Anyone who did misinterpret it is hereby advised of his error. And if NBC and Menser misinterpreted it, my apologies.

Point Counterpoint

I went over to talk to Mark Warnow about one thing—a statement by Serge Koussevitzky. We ended up by talking about music and radio, Charles Fort, premonitions, the supernatural, Hildegarde, politics, the soldier vote, Dewey's chances, Helen Hayes, anti-Semitism, Words at War, the Bible, German refugees, Mark's family, his brother, Raymond Scott, Aldous Huxley, fantasy, and a few other subjects that escape me at the moment. There's not room enough to cover all that Mark said, so let's take the most interesting things, and assume it's Mark talking:

Koussevitzky said it was an outrage that a gifted composer like David Diamond had to earn a living by playing in the All-Time Hit Parade band. Why is that an outrage? At least he's earning a living, which is more than he could do if he had to depend on conductors like Koussevitzky or orchestras like the Boston Symphony. What's more, we rehearse his music, so he can hear what it's like as he goes along, and didn't Koussevitzky say "only a composer knows what a composer suffers when he hasn't the chance to hear his music?"

A symphony conductor will beat his brains out to get a composer's first performance rights, paying him perhaps $100, and after that the composition is seldom heard again, and the composer can begin starving all over. For one day's work a week Diamond gets enough to keep him happy, well fed, well housed, well clothed, and a bit over. Isn't that better than letting him live on a couple of handouts a year from conductors who usually drop him cold after a first performance? . . .

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

JUL 26 1944

Koussevitzky At 70 Advocates Peace Table Music Festival

LENOX, MASS., July 26 (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

High Spiritual Value

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitsky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston symphony orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor.

"I feel sure that if this great music festival were to be held at the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

The Russian-born director is resting at his summer home and preparing for the revival at Tanglewood this week-end and next to an abbreviated version of the Berkshire festival which he raised to top rank in the musical world. At that time the orchestra will give four concerts devoted entirely to the works of Mozart.

Koussevitsky is in excellent health and spirits, just as full of enthusiasm as he was when he took over the leadership of the Boston symphony orchestra 20 years ago.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 22 1944

RADIO
Today

First Esplanade Concert To Be Broadcast Tonight

Arthur Fiedler Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Opening Program in Annual Series — 'Boot Camp Parade' Will Originate From Sampson, N. Y.

The first in the annual series of Esplanade concerts on the Charles river embankment in Boston will be broadcast tonight (WSPR, 8.30 p. m.) when Arthur Fiedler will conduct members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr Fiedler has chosen to open with "Sambre et Meuse," regimental march by Planquette-Turlet, followed by Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." The orchestra will then play Dvorak's 15th Slavonic dance," after which the "Bostonia Suite" will be heard. The latter work is a musical picturization by Keith Brown of several well-known Boston landmarks. The program is to conclude with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The "Chicago Theater of the Air" will present "A Woman of Arles," an original musical-dramatic production based on the Daudet story as set to music by Georges Bizet (WHYN, WHAI, WOR, 9 p. m.). Bruce Foote, baritone; Ruth Slater, contralto, and Virginia Haskins, soprano, will be soloists, with Henry Weber conducting the symphony orchestra and chorus.

Listeners in this area will have an opportunity to hear a program originating from Sampson naval training station in New York, where so many local boys have been stationed, when the new servicemen's musical radio show, "Boot Camp Parade" bows in this afternoon over CBS networks (WMAS, 4 p. m.). The show will present 25 minutes of popular music by an orchestra made up of "boots" in training at Sampson, who were formerly playing in top-flight bands of the country. Oliver Daniels of CBS's musical division will direct.

The story of contributions to America made by the various national and racial groups represented among the servicemen will be presented in "They call me Joe," a series of 12 dramatizations which replaces "American story" tonight (WBZA, WTIC, WGY, 7 p. m.). This program will be recorded and flown to nearly 400 outlets of the armed forces radio services, to be heard by servicemen and women overseas.

"Your America" will pay tribute this afternoon to the coal mining industry, when Eugene McAuliffe of Omaha, president of the Union Pacific Coal company, will be guest speaker (WBZA, WTIC, WGY, 5 p. m.). Elden Westley will tell of Sergt Harry Tully, marine hero of the Solomons, in a story written by Marge Fischer, and Ray Clark, reporter, will interview a general car foreman in the Union Pacific railroad's shops in Omaha.

EAGLE-STAR

JUL 26 1944

Says Music Festival To Save World Peace

Lenox, Mass—(AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, ~~described~~ an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference — and if other nations would do likewise — we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

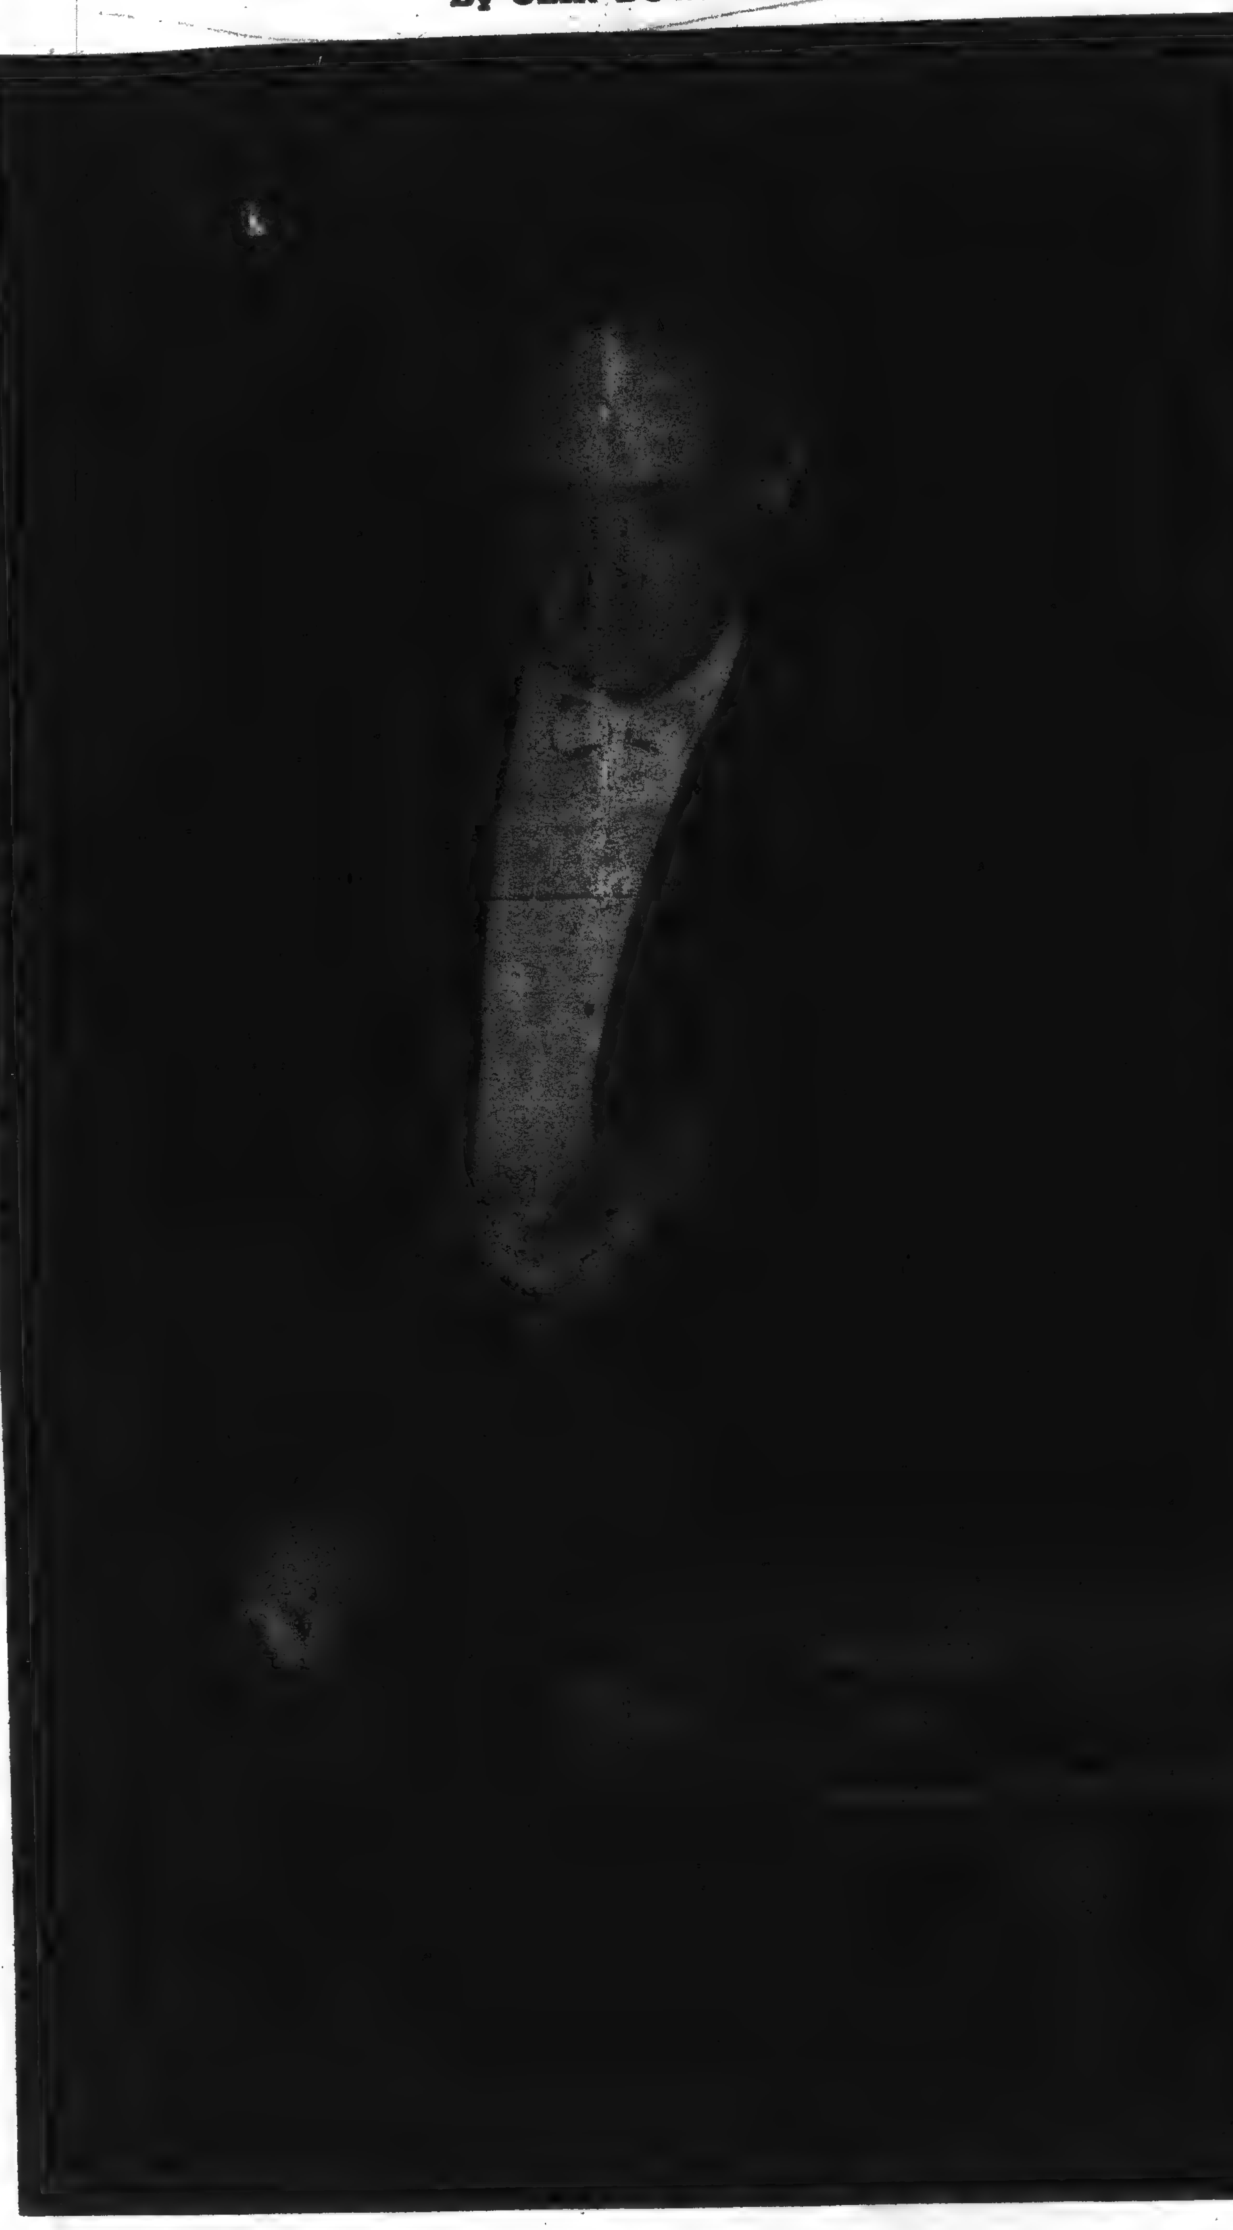
[92]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JUL 23 1944

Koussevitzky: Mentor of Young Composers

The conductor, at 70, foresees a new era of creative effort in American music.

By OLIN DOWNES



"Koussevitzky knows what he wants and exactly how to get it from the players."

TWO anniversaries are celebrated this year by Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, born a Russian, now a citizen of America and one of the pre-eminent orchestra conductors of our time. The first is the celebration of his twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — an organization which he has developed into the most highly perfected and sensitized symphonic ensemble in the world. This would be in itself occasion for wide note—and, in fact, it has been noted in many places already.

But there is another celebration of a broader perspective and summation, which bears more significantly upon the present and future of music in Russia and the United States. Next Wednesday Koussevitzky will be 70; his birthday finds him at the height of the powers and activities of a singularly adventurous yet consistent and unified career.

Today, in any contact with him, there occurs to the observer the word of which Koussevitzky himself is fond—"élan." Koussevitzky lives, always has lived, with "élan." He has an insatiable appetite for ideas and experience.

"I've known complete poverty and great wealth; much discomfort and all conveniences, and I tell you they make little difference," he says. More important matters have concerned him — the abiding passion for music in all its forms and phases and the conception of this art as indispensable to and inseparable from the life of man. That, plus his inborn gifts, is the gist of his story.

To the ordinary observer Koussevitzky's career might seem, especially at its outset, not only meteoric but erratic. He remembers the day when, against the wishes of his father, himself a disappointed musician, he fled to Moscow from his home town of Tver with three rubles and his kit. Koussevitzky had burned his bridges and was in a tight place. Safonoff flatly refused him at the Moscow Conservatoire. He went to the Philharmonic. All vacancies, he was told there, were filled.

He was never one to accept an obstacle. The director was alone in his study. It was late afternoon. He was playing the piano, his long hair down to his shoulders, à la Liszt, when Koussevitzky somehow got into the room. The pianist looked up without stopping.

"What are you doing here? I am busy. Go away."

"You must let me study here."

"There are no vacancies. Go away."

"They had treated me badly at the door," said Koussevitzky, recalling this. "I found myself stamping and yelling at him, 'I will study here!' I was a young boy, near to tears. The director stopped playing, came over to me and said, 'All right, my boy. All right. Don't get excited. Come tomorrow morning and we will see what we can do.' "

THE boy was found to have more than the capacities required for a scholarship and was told what he must do. He must study the double bass—"bull fiddle"—needed in the orchestra. He accepted gratefully. In five months he covered a course of study normally taking five years. He became leading double bass at the Imperial Opera in Moscow, later Professor of Double Bass at the very conservatory where he had studied, and within less than a decade was one of the three greatest double-bass players — Dragonetti and Bottessini being the other two—that the world has known.

He suddenly began to conduct. Beginning to work with the orchestra of the Berlin Hoch Schule, which Joachim placed at his disposal, Koussevitzky developed as a disciple rather than a pupil of the great Nikisch, attending at the same time the rehearsals of noted conductors, such as Mottl, Weingartner, Schuch, Muck, Richard Strauss, under whose baton he once played.

With equal suddenness he elected to become a music publisher, running a double-barreled publishing project on a principle of quixotic generosity to the composers involved—and this with great success. He organized fantastic trips with full orchestra and world-famous soloists on chartered steamers down the 2,300-mile stretch of the Volga, for the benefit of audiences which in many cases had neither heard nor seen a symphony orchestra.

In his rise from poverty to a state of Maecenas-like security and subsidizing of artists and art, Koussevitzky received the honors of Director of State Symphony Orchestras and Director of the Grand Opera at Moscow, under the last Russian Czar. He defied successively the edicts of that Czar before the 1917 revolution and the commands of the revolutionary government afterward. In 1921 he went to France to institute the "Concerts Koussevitzky," attended by "tout Paris" and everybody who was anybody of the international musical world.

THREE years later he came to this country to write a new chapter in the annals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to work for the development of American music. This part of his life has been, in some ways, the most concentrated of all, a time of hardest labor and service, from the point of view of one who believes that this is a period in which the musician can be of special use to his fellow men, and a time when, in Koussevitzky's firm belief, America and Russia, in the cause of art and humanity, will lead the world.

During Koussevitzky's career, conducting—orchestral interpretation—changed much. He says that musical interpretation changes with each epoch. He is not sure that even the genius of Nikisch would find the same welcome now that it once did. Our feeling is less "romantic." Technically as well as esthetically, we approach nearer a classic ideal, though every conductor has his own technique, the outgrowth of the physique and his temperament, and no two conductors' techniques are the same. As for himself, Koussevitzky feels that he has gone far since the days when he instinctively followed the romantic method.

Koussevitzky says, "Conducting requires a maximum of thinking, concentration and control emanating principally from the eyes and from the inner self and a minimum of movement, which bring the greatest results from the orchestra.

"If you are not the master of the situation, you will move a great deal and the orchestra will do less. If you are in control, you will oblige the players to be so much more attentive, to watch you with greater concentration, by economical gestures and an economical beat which they will have to follow carefully, and you will also have the force in reserve for the extraordinary climax when it is needed."

ONE could call this plain conductor's common sense. But it is not so common and it is unknown to tyros. The secrets of Koussevitzky's orchestral results would have to be analyzed further than that. There is perhaps no other such artist for sheer tonal beauty or a colorist who unites subtlety with such richness and variety of shading and suppleness of phrase.

The present supremacy of the Boston Symphony in its field and the public's generous patronage of its concerts are not consequent upon the flash of a "personality" or the prestidigitations of a famous virtuoso leader who has fascinated the crowd. It is the result of sheer knowledge and hard, unremitting labor with the men—the effectiveness of a conductor who really knows what he wants and exactly how to get it from the players. The basis is the wonderful string tone, but throughout the orchestra there is the same sensitivity. Also it is in a measure the result of the development of orchestral players and ensembles in America.

"It is no longer necessary to go to Europe for the best players," Koussevitzky says. "The best players are here, and in abundance. They are young, astonishingly well equipped, (Continued on Page 45)

(Continued from Page 14)

responsive as they can be only in the earlier years. There is new life in them. They have abundant technique. They are living as well as playing on their own soil. They are America, which has developed so incredibly in music in the last quarter-century. From this material, only produced here, can you make the best orchestras in the world.

"AS for feared union limitations of hours of rehearsal, the conductor who knows can very well accomplish all he desires in the time of the allotted union 'services.' Everything can be accomplished, and better, in a few hours of concentrated work that goes straight to the heart of a problem than in many devoted principally to fatiguing repetition. To rehearse effectively, with good musicians under him, is the conductor's business. The orchestra has a right to expect that of him. If he cannot do this it is his fault, no one else's."

This achievement is now behind Koussevitzky. Today his supreme interests are the training of young musicians, especially conductors, at Koussevitzky's Music Center in the Berkshires, and the man who is at the source of all music—the composer. The latter has long been of great concern to him, so much so that in 1909, with his wife, the late Natalia Konstaninovna Koussevitzky, he founded the Russian Music Publishing Company, whose profits went to composers.

Through this company he rescued the young Scriabin from difficulties amounting nearly to privation; published and played for the first time in Russia the new scores of Prokofieff and Stravinsky; enabled Tanieff to compose his last big score, "Upon the Reading of a Psalm," and assisted a whole generation of Russian and European composers. When the critical board of his publishing company rejected composers in whom Koussevitzky had great faith, he proceeded to purchase the Gutheil music house to publish music his first establishment would not accept.

"WHAT a composer needs," says Koussevitzky, "are revealing interpretations upon which his music itself depends. He needs this active, comprehending introduction to the public." This is Koussevitzky's service to American music—the battle he has fought for the native composer. Before he came there was a group of distinguished American composers, most of them educated in Europe. Few of the younger ones had the knowledge and working mastery of orchestration to give form to their ideas in the symphonic field.

And thus there was the superficially logical statement that since our composers had few opportunities to hear their music they could not learn to compose, and since they could not learn to compose, the orchestras could not play their music.

As he had before in Russia, voice, build with it, recognize the significance of the present and prepare effectively for the future. Today there is an enormous creative ferment in America and hundreds of new scores are written every year. Last season I played eight new works by native composers of marked vitality and unmistakable talent.

THE progress of American music is entirely different from that of any other country. In America technique has preceded expression, and performance (which has reached very brilliant levels) creation. This is because as a nation America has had no youth and little development of an indigenous folk spirit. America was born a developed nation. Its founders were men of maturity, especially concerned with political and moral beliefs, which, with the battle of conquering the land itself, had to constitute for a long time their principal concern.

"America is also a synthesis in thought as well as population. An American composer cannot pretend that a Wagner, a Debussy, a Mussorgsky, a Stravinsky, a Hindemith, a Schoenberg, any more than a Bach, Beethoven or Brahms, did not exist. All this past and the international thought and technique has to be assimilated. Consequent upon the synthesis the American artist must discover his own idiom and his own soul.

"What I perceive everywhere is an immense curiosity, enthusiasm and assimilativeness. The young men are working in many different directions and under certain handicaps. One of these is money. The young American composer today is too much preoccupied commercially. He is thinking how to advance and how to sell his product, how to make himself financially secure. I do not blame him for this. I blame his period and the current tendency of all modern Western civilization. But it hurts him as a creator of music.

"THE composers know that they cannot live," he continued, "and get their music before the public without being practical about it. They cannot write the greatest music with this in the

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JUL 23 1944

Koussevitzky: Mentor of Young Composers

The conductor, at 70, foresees a new era of creative effort in American music.

By OLIN DOWNES

TWO anniversaries are celebrated this year by Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, born a Russian, now a citizen of America and one of the pre-eminent orchestra conductors of our time. The first is the celebration of his twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — an organization which he has developed into the most highly perfected and sensitized symphonic ensemble in the world. This would be in itself occasion for wide note—and, in fact, it has been noted in many places already.

But there is another celebration of a broader perspective and summation, which bears more significantly upon the present and future of music in Russia and the United States. Next Wednesday Koussevitzky will be 70; his birthday finds him at the height of the powers and activities of a singularly adventurous yet consistent and unified career.

Today, in any contact with him, there occurs to the observer the word of which Koussevitzky himself is fond—"élan." Koussevitzky lives, always has lived, with "élan." He has an insatiable appetite for ideas and experience.

"I've known complete poverty and great wealth; much discomfort and all conveniences, and I tell you they make little difference," he says. More important matters have concerned him — the abiding passion for music in all its forms and phases and the conception of this art as indispensable to and inseparable from the life of man. That, plus his inborn gifts, is the gist of his story.

To the ordinary observer Koussevitzky's career might seem, especially at its outset, not only meteoric but erratic. He remembers the day when, against the wishes of his father, himself a disappointed musician, he fled to Moscow from his home town of Tver with three rubles and his kit. Koussevitzky had burned his bridges and was in a tight place. Safonoff flatly refused him at the Moscow Conservatoire. He went to the Philharmonic. All vacancies, he was told there, were filled.

He was never one to accept an obstacle. The director was alone in his study. It was late afternoon. He was playing the piano, his long hair down to his shoulders, à la Liszt, when Koussevitzky somehow got into the room. The pianist looked up without stopping.

"What are you doing here? I am busy. Go away."

"You must let me study here."

"There are no vacancies. Go away."

"They had treated me badly at the door," said Koussevitzky, recalling this. "I found myself stamping and yelling at him, 'I will study here!' I was a young boy, near to tears. The director stopped playing, came over to me and said, 'All right, my boy. All right. Don't get excited. Come tomorrow morning and we will see what we can do.'"

THE boy was found to have more than the capacities required for a scholarship and was told what he must do. He must study the double bass—"bull fiddle"—needed in the orchestra. He accepted gratefully. In five months he covered a course of study normally taking five years. He became leading double bass at the Imperial Opera in Moscow, later Professor of Double Bass at the very conservatory where he had studied, and within less than a decade was one of the three greatest double-bass players — Dragonetti and Bottessini being the other two—that the world has known.

"Koussevitzky knows what he wants and exactly how to get it from the players."

He suddenly began to conduct. Beginning to work with the orchestra of the Berlin Hoch Schule, which Joachim placed at his disposal, Koussevitzky developed as a disciple rather than a pupil of the great Nikisch, attending at the same time the rehearsals of noted conductors, such as Mottl, Weingartner, Schuch, Muck, Richard Strauss, under whose baton he once played.

With equal suddenness he elected to become a music publisher, running a double-barreled publishing project on a principle of quixotic generosity to the composers involved—and this with great success. He organized fantastic trips with full orchestra and world-famous soloists on chartered steamers down the 2,300-mile stretch of the Volga, for the benefit of audiences which in many cases had neither heard nor seen a symphony orchestra.

In his rise from poverty to a state of Maecenas-like security and subsidizing of artists and art, Koussevitzky received the honors of Director of State Symphony Orchestras and Director of the Grand Opera at Moscow, under the last Russian Czar. He defied successively the edicts of that Czar before the 1917 revolution and the commands of the revolutionary government afterward. In 1921 he went to France to institute the "Concerts Koussevitzky," attended by "tout Paris" and everybody who was anybody of the international musical world.

THREE years later he came to this country to write a new chapter in the annals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to work for the development of American music. This part of his life has been, in some ways, the most concentrated of all, a time of hardest labor and service, from the point of view of one who believes that this is a period in which the musician can be of special use to his fellow men, and a time when, in Koussevitzky's firm belief, America and Russia, in the cause of art and humanity, will lead the world.

During Koussevitzky's career, conducting—orchestral interpretation—changed much. He says that musical interpretation changes with each epoch. He is not sure that even the genius of Nikisch would find the same welcome now that it once did. Our feeling is less "romantic." Technically as well as esthetically, we approach nearer a classic ideal, though every conductor has his own technique, the outgrowth of the physique and his temperament, and no two conductors' techniques are the same. As for himself, Koussevitzky feels that he has gone far since the days when he instinctively followed the romantic method.

Koussevitzky says, "Conducting requires a maximum of thinking, concentration and control emanating principally from the eyes and from the inner self and a minimum of movement, which bring the greatest results from the orchestra.

"If you are not the master of the situation, you will move a great deal and the orchestra will do less. If you are in control, you will oblige the players to be so much more attentive, to watch you with greater concentration, by economical gestures and an economical beat which they will have to follow carefully, and you will also have the force in reserve for the extraordinary climax when it is needed."

ONE could call this plain conductor's common sense. But it is not so common and it is unknown to tyros. The secrets of Koussevitzky's orchestral results would have to be analyzed further than that. There is perhaps no other such artist for sheer tonal beauty or a colorist who unites subtlety with such richness and variety of shading and suppleness of phrase.

The present supremacy of the Boston Symphony in its field and the public's generous patronage of its concerts are not consequent upon the flash of a "personality" or the prestidigitations of a famous virtuoso leader who has fascinated the crowd. It is the result of sheer knowledge and hard, unremitting labor with the men—the effectiveness of a conductor who really knows what he wants and exactly how to get it from the players. The basis is the wonderful string tone, but throughout the orchestra there is the same sensitivity. Also it is in a measure the result of the development of orchestral players and ensembles in America.

"It is no longer necessary to go to Europe for the best players," Koussevitzky says. "The best players are here, and in abundance. They are young, astonishingly well equipped.

(Continued on Page 45)

(Continued from Page 14)

responsive as they can be only in the earlier years. There is new life in them. They have abundant technique. They are living as well as playing on their own soil. They are America, which has developed so incredibly in music in the last quarter-century. From this material, only produced here, can you make the best orchestras in the world.

"AS for feared union limitations of hours of rehearsal, the conductor who knows can very well accomplish all he desires in the time of the allotted union 'services.' Everything can be accomplished, and better, in a few hours of concentrated work that goes straight to the heart of a problem than in many devoted principally to fatiguing repetition. To rehearse effectively, with good musicians under him, is the conductor's business. The orchestra has a right to expect that of him. If he cannot do this it is his fault, no one else's."

This achievement is now behind Koussevitzky. Today his supreme interests are the training of young musicians, especially conductors, at Koussevitzky's Music Center in the Berkshires, and the man who is at the source of all music—the composer. The latter has long been of great concern to him, so much so that in 1909, with his wife, the late Natalia Konstaninovna Koussevitzky, he founded the Russian Music Publishing Company, whose profits went to composers.

Through this company he rescued the young Scriabin from difficulties amounting nearly to privation; published and played for the first time in Russia the new scores of Prokofieff and Stravinsky; enabled Tanieff to compose his last big score, "Upon the Reading of a Psalm," and assisted a whole generation of Russian and European composers. When the critical board of his publishing company rejected composers in whom Koussevitzky had great faith, he proceeded to purchase the Gutheil music house to publish music his first establishment would not accept.

"WHAT a composer needs," says Koussevitzky, "are revealing interpretations upon which his music itself depends. He needs this active, comprehending introduction to the public." This is Koussevitzky's service to American music—the battle he has fought for the native composer. Before he came there was a group of distinguished American composers, most of them educated in Europe. Few of the younger ones had the knowledge and working mastery of orchestration to give form to their ideas in the symphonic field.

And thus there was the superficially logical statement that since our composers had few opportunities to hear their music they could not learn to compose, and since they could not learn to compose, the orchestras could not play their music.

As he had before in Russia, voice, build with it, recognize the significance of the present and prepare effectively for the future. Today there is an enormous creative ferment in America and hundreds of new scores are written every year. Last season I played eight new works by native composers of marked vitality and unmistakable talent.

THE progress of American music is entirely different from that of any other country. In America technique has preceded expression, and performance (which has reached very brilliant levels) creation. This is because as a nation America has had no youth and little development of an indigenous folk spirit. America was born a developed nation. Its founders were men of maturity, especially concerned with political and moral beliefs, which, with the battle of conquering the land itself, had to constitute for a long time their principal concern.

"America is also a synthesis in thought as well as population. An American composer cannot pretend that a Wagner, a Debussy, a Mussorgsky, a Stravinsky, a Hindemith, a Schoenberg, any more than a Bach, Beethoven or Brahms, did not exist. All this past and the international thought and technique has to be assimilated. Consequent upon the synthesis the American artist must discover his own idiom and his own soul.

"What I perceive everywhere is an immense curiosity, enthusiasm and assimilativeness. The young men are working in many different directions and under certain handicaps. One of these is money. The young American composer today is too much preoccupied commercially. He is thinking how to advance and how to sell his product, how to make himself financially secure. I do not blame him for this. I blame his period and the current tendency of all modern Western civilization. But it hurts him as a creator of music.

"THE composers know that they cannot live," he continued, "and get their music before the public without being practical about it. They cannot write the greatest music with this in the sers nder the last Russian uccessively the edicts the 1917 revolution of the revolutionary rd. In 1921 he went the "Concerts Kousby "tout Paris" and anybody of the interrld.

ter he came to this ew chapter in the an-Symphony Orchestra development of Amer-t of his life has been, most concentrated of st labor and service,
w of one who believes in which the musician to his fellow men, and oussevitzky's firm beussia, in the cause of vill lead the world.
zky's career, conduct-erpretation — changed t musical interpreta-each epoch. He is the genius of Nikisch e welcome now that eling is less "romans well as esthetically, a classic ideal, though s his own technique, he physique and his no two conductors'
ame. As for himself, that he has gone far h he instinctively fol-method.
"Conducting requires ing, concentration and principally from the nner self and a mini-which bring the great-orchestra.
e master of the situa-a great deal and the
s. If you are in con-the players to be so e, to watch you with n, by economical gesnical beat which they carefully, and you will e in reserve for the k when it is needed."

this plain conductor's it is not so common o tyros. The secrets chestral results would d further than that.
other such artist for or a colorist who h such richness and and suppleness of emacy of the Boston ield and the public's of its concerts are the flash of a "perrestidigitations of a er who has fascinated result of sheer knowl-mitting labor with the ss of a conductor who ne wants and exactly he players. The basis ng tone, but through-ere is the same sensi-

a measure the result of orchestral players
nerica.
necessary to go to layers," Koussevitzky yers are here, and in young, astonishingly ntinued on Page 45)

rnational has to be upon the n artist diom and erywhere y, enthuness. The in many nd under of these American much pre-

. He is e and how to make
ure. I do
. I blame rent tendtern civil-him as a now that continued, before the practical write the his in the background of their minds. The music must come from the inner consciousness of the artist.

"Do you realize how apropos all this is to the creative problem of Russia? There is, of course, a profound exception to the American eclecticism, in Russia's magnificent background of an immemorial past and an immense wealth of naive folk-music. But the problem of the grand synthesis remains. A good illustration is the position of the leading composer of the rising Russian generation, Shostakovich. You as a critic point out the derivative influences you believe you find in Shostakovich. You mention Mahler especially, and others; you call this a European and Koussevitzky invited young Americans to compose and helped them with practical advice and criticism. Wherever he saw as much as a fragment of an idea he was on the composer's trail. It need not be claimed that he detected every major creative talent in his vicinity, but few composers indeed have come his way with a talent that he did not perceive.

"If I find a new score with twenty measures of an idea in it," he says, "I watch the man carefully. If he produces a work playable and reasonably effective with the instruments I try to give it a hearing." He mentioned a certain composer. "When I played his second symphony you didn't like it and you said so with much finality of tone. Certainly that symphony was formative. But if I had not played it there never would have been a third symphony, and you will admit that the third symphony has gone pretty well."

ANOTHER young composer produced an impracticable score. Koussevitzky couldn't make its author see it.

"Very well," he said, "I'll give you ten days to study your score and then I'll give you an hour at one of our rehearsals to conduct it." The promise was kept. At the rehearsal the orchestra couldn't play the score and the composer couldn't show them how to do it. The lesson was gratefully learned and appreciated. That composer was Aaron Copland, who properly observed at the dinner given in honor of Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony anniversary that just as any American boy could dream of becoming one day President, so do young American composers dream of being played by Sergei Koussevitzky.

Aside from the actual works he has brought into being and the creative activity he has stimulated, the outstanding result, more important than the lasting significance or longevity of any work he has so far revealed, is that Koussevitzky has given the young men confidence in themselves, incited them to work, to learn, to develop direction and press forward. A whole group, almost a school of composers, has risen, as one might say, in his footsteps, and the period in American musical composition he has inaugurated will be one of his lasting monuments.

"THE stream of music runs sometimes swift and deep, sometimes thinner," Koussevitzky says. "There are very productive epochs, and other epochs less productive. I think we are in a period of transition, of new ideas and significant experiments. We are at the end of seven great centuries of European music. But this does not mean the end of music or absence of achievement and new promise today. What we must do is give music a

---

Koussevitzky zum 70. Geburtstag

Jul 23

Über die Bedeutung des Bostoner Dirigenten für die US

Von HENRY MARX

Einem Manne wie Serge Koussevitzky anläßlich seines 70. Geburtstags am kommenden Mittwoch öffentlich Dank abzustatten, ist eine der schönsten Aufgaben, deren sich ein um den Fortschritt der Musik bemühter Beobachter unseres Musiklebens entledigen kann. Denn Koussevitzky hat in den 20 Jahren seiner Bostoner Tätigkeit — und in den 15 Jahren zuvor — mehr als irgendein anderer lebender Dirigent für die zeitgenössischen Komponisten getan. Koussevitzky hat moderne Werke nicht mit dem Eifer des Propagandisten gespielt, sondern aus seiner Verpflichtung heraus, die Öffentlichkeit über Neuerscheinungen auf dem Laufenden zu halten. Für Koussevitzky ist die Musik — wie jegliche Kunst — eine lebende, sich fortentwickelnde Angelegenheit, kein Museum. Von diesem Gesichtspunkt ausgehend, hat er sich nie gescheut, mit seinen Programmen musikalische Reaktionäre vor den Kopf zu stoßen: er war sich Zeit seines Lebens seiner Sache zu sicher, um sich Knüppel zwischen die Beine werfen zu lassen.

Koussevitzkys Karriere ist von seinen Anfängen an immer ein Kampf um die Popularisierung der Musik gewesen. Als Ideal schwebte ihm vor, gute Musik für die Massen zu machen und die Orchester auf eigene Füße zu stellen, unabhängig von den Geldern reicher Mäzene. In Rußland begann er 1909 mit diesen Bestrebungen, als er Konzerte zu volkstümlichen Preisen veranstaltete, ein absolutes Novum in dem Zarenreich. Wir sehen, wie sich durch Koussevitzkys ganzes Leben diese beiden Grundzüge seiner musikalischen Gesinnung ziehen: der Einsatz für die Musik seiner Zeitgenossen und die Bemühungen um wahre Volksmusik. In beiden Zielen hat er noch nicht die Mitarbeit seiner Kollegen in dem Maße gefunden, wie er es sich gewünscht hätte; mit 70 Jahren ist Koussevitzky noch immer der Pionier, dem etwas vom Prediger in der Wüste anhaftet, und der bei allen äußeren Ehrungen, die ihm in den letzten Jahren zuteil geworden sind, niemals den Kampf um diese beiden Ziele vergessen konnte.

Man kann ohne weiteres sagen, daß Koussevitzky das Boston Symphony Orchestra zum besten und in seiner musikalischen Gesinnung vorbildlichsten Orchester Amerikas gemacht hat. Das Philadelphia Orchestra mag einen volleren Ton produzieren, unsere New Yorker Philharmoniker mögen, Musiker für Musiker betrachtet, besser sein: aber das Boston Orchestra ist ein so wundervoll einheitliches Instrument, das so ganz die musikalischen und persönlichen Absichten Koussevitzkys widerspiegelt, daß es an Geschlossenheit heute unübertroffen ist. Darüber hinaus hat es nicht seinesgleichen, wenn es darum geht, die moderne französische oder russische Musik darzustellen: Koussevitzkys Autorität drückt da dem Orchester den Stempel auf.

Koussevitzky ist bei all dem kein "Spezialist" in des Wortes üblicher Bedeutung. Seine Vorliebe gilt wohl bestimmter Musik, aber er vernachlässigt dafür nicht andere und bringt sie mit einer Vollendung zur Wiedergabe, als ob es sich auch hierbei stets um seine Lieblingswerke handeln würde. Er selbst hat einmal in einem Vortrag vor der American Academy of Arts and Sciences einiges über die Wiedergabe von Kompositionen durch Orchester gesagt: "Eine vollendete Interpretation kann zwei Aspekte haben, die in gleicher Weise der Partitur des Komponisten gerecht werden. Die eine kann man mechanisch vollendet nennen, die andere organisch vollendet. Die erste gibt die Schönheit mathematischen Gleichgewichts, der Symmetrie und Klarheit; die zweite ist der unteilbare, lebende, pulsierende élan vital der Komposition. In der anderen lebt die Komposition — ihre Grundidee — als eine Realität. Die eine kann mit einem völlig symmetrischen Gebäude verglichen werden, die andere mit einer großen gotischen Kathedrale mit ihrer teilweise unsymmetrischen, aber organischen Einheitsordnung. Die eine ist immer erfreulich, angenehm und entzückend, bleibt aber für den Hörer, wie eine schöne Szene, äußerlich. Die andere nimmt von ihm Besitz und trägt ihn mit dem élan vital des Werks fort, verschmilzt ihn mit der Realität der Grundidee und zwingt ihn, den élan vital der Komposition mitzuleben und mitzuerleben. Wie ein mystisches Erlebnis bringt die organische Interpretation den Hörer in direkte Beziehung zur absoluten Realität, die im großen Werk verborgen ist".

Koussevitzky gehört zu den über ihre Kunst nachdenkenden Dirigenten — und das ist ein weiterer Wesenszug dieses Mannes. Weil er denkt, hat er Irrtümer, so bald sie ihm klar wurden, erkannt und gut gemacht, und als denkender Mensch hat er sich nie vom Weltgeschehen isoliert, im Gegenteil immer den tätigsten Anteil daran genommen. Und noch etwas: das Motto von Koussevitzkys Berufsleben war Kompromißlosigkeit, die hier noch immer nicht ganz allgemein als unveräußerlicher Bestandteil jeglicher Musikbetätigung anerkannt ist. Insbesondere in seinen Bostoner Anfängen — aber auch früher schon in Rußland — hat er Schwierigkeiten überwinden müssen, die einem weniger von seiner Sache überzeugten Mann das Rückgrat gebrochen hätten. Koussevitzky ist sich immer treu geblieben, er hat seine Programme so gebildet, wie er sie für richtig hielt, und als einer der ganz wenigen hier tätigen Dirigenten auch eine zielbewußte Musikpolitik betrieben, die in allererster Linie unseren eigenen zeitgenössischen Tonsetzern, aber in gleichem Mäße auch den jungen Komponisten anderer Länder zugute gekommen ist.

Ein Mann wie Koussevitzky kann wie kaum eine zweite Persönlichkeit des Musiklebens allen als Vorbild dienen. Er kann uns als ein Vertreter der idealen, von jedem Kommerzialismus freien Kunst gelten, als einer, der auf dem Fundament ruht, das der Dichter August von Platens einmal so formuliert hat:

Dem ergibt die Kunst sich völlig,
Der sich völlig ihr ergibt,
Der die Freiheit heißer
Als er Not und Hunger fürchtet, liebt.

Vorträge und Tänze La Meris

Im Ethnological Dance Center, 110 Ost 59. Str., spricht morgen nachm. 5 Uhr die bekannte Tänzerin La Meri über den hawaiianischen Tanz und Donnerstag um dieselbe Stunde über die Entwicklung des Tanzes in Spanien. Dienstag abend 9 Uhr führt La Meri mit ihren Natya Dancers ebendort ein Programm hawaiianischer und indischer Tänze auf.

FILME am BROADWAY

ASTOR THEATER
"Bathing Beauty"
(4. Woche)

CAPITOL THEATER
"Since You Went Away"
(1. Woche)

HOLLYWOOD THEATER
"Mr. Skeffington"
(9. Woche)

PARAMOUNT THEATER
"And the Angels Sing"
(2. Woche)

RADIO CITY MUSIC HALL
"Dragon Seed"
(1. Woche)

RIVOLI THEATER
"The Story of Dr. Wassell"
(7. Woche)

ROXY THEATER
"Take It or Leave It"
(2. Woche)

STRAND THEATER
"The Adventures of Mark Twain"
(2. Woche)

PASTE OVER

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
BEAUMONT, TEXAS
JOURNAL
JUL 27 1944

BIDDEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL

YORK, PA.
DISPATCH
JUL 26 1944

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JUL 26 1944

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
JUL 30 1944

This Clipping From
LAWTON, OKLA.
PRESS
JUL 28 1944

This Clipping From VICKSBURG, MISS.
HERALD
JUL 27 1944

This Clipping From
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
JUL 27 1944

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
JUL 27 1944

ST. CHARLES, MO.
BANNER-NEWS
JUL 26 1944

CAIRO, ILL.
CITIZEN
JUL 26 1944

EUGENE, ORE.
REGISTER-GUARD
JUL 28 1944

CORNING, N. Y.
LEADER

LA CROSSE, WIS.
RIBUNE AND LEADER PRESS
JUL 27 1944

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JUL 30 1944

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
JUL 26 1944

Music at Peace Table Urged to Insure Success

Lenox, Mass., July 26.—(AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain

---

ALEXANDRIA, LA.
TOWN TALK
JUL 26 1944

CROWLEY, LA.
SIGNAL
JUL 26 1944

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL
JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
JUL 26 1944

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS
JUL 26 1944

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
JUL 26 1944

BANNER
JUL 26 1944

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
JUL 26 1944

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
JUL 26 1944

MEADVILLE, PA.
REPUBLICAN
JUL 26 1944

ARK. DEMOCRAT
JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD
JUL 26 1944

SAYRE, PA.
TIMES
JUL 26 1944

GALESBURG, ILL.
REGISTER MAIL
JUL 26 1944

LOCKPORT, N. Y.
UNION SUN JOURNAL
JUL 27 1944

This Clipping From
STATESVILLE, N. C.
DAILY
JUL 27 1944

WEST POINT, MISS.
DAILY TIMES LEADER
JUL 26 1944

Music Held Up as Only Hope

LENOX, Mass., July 26. —(AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

PASTE OVER

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

JUL 26 1944

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUL 26 1944

ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS

JUL 26 1944

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL

JUL 26 1944

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES

JUL [illegible] 1944

This Clipping From WILKES BARRE, PA.
TIMES LEADER NEWS

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

JUL 26 1944

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
HERALD

JUL 26 1944

ROCKFORD, ILL.
STAR

JUL 26 1944

TARRYTOWN, N. Y.
NEWS

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From TARENTUM, PA.
VALLEY NEWS

LEHIGHTON, PA.
LEADER

JUL 26 1944

Prophesies Music As World Saver

Lenox, Mass., July 26 (AP) — To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

ago.

ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

JUL 26 1944

Rome N. Y.
Sentinel

JUL 26 1944

BELLEVILLE, ILL.
ADVOCATE

JUL

MEADVILLE, PA.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 27 1944

INDIANA, PA.
GAZETTE

JUL 27 1944

This Clipping From
PORTCHESTER, N. Y.
ITEM

JUL 27 1944

This Clipping From
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JUL 27 1944

DECATUR, ILL.
HERALD

JUL 27 1944

E NEW YORK TIMES, T

AUSTIN, MINN.
HERALD

JUL 26 1944
Circ. (D 4,206)

This Clipping From McALLEN, TEXAS
MONITOR

JUL 26 1944

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JONESBORO, ARK.
SUN

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
KEWANEE, ILL.
STAR COURIER

JUL 26 1944

WAUKEGAN, ILL.
NEWS-SUN

JUL 26 1944

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

JUL 27 1944

McCOMB, ILL.
JOURNAL

JUL 26 1944

Music At Peace Parley Is Conductor's Plan

Lenox, Mass., July 26—(AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, desiribed an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music ran save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

JUL 26 1944

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

JUL 26 1944

SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
PLAINFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

JUL 26 1944

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREENVILLE, TENN.
SUN

JUL 26 1944

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

JUL 26 1944

OSSINING, N. Y.
CITIZEN-REGISTER

JUL 26 1944

ELGIN, ILL.
COURIER NEWS

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN

JUL 26 1944

OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM TIMES

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
TARRYTOWN, N. Y.
NEWS

JUL 26 1944

DECATUR, ILL.
REVIEW

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From STREATOR, ILL.
TIMES PRESS

JUL 26 1944

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

JUL 26 1944

Koussevitzky Suggests Music at Peace Talks

LENOX, Mass., July 26 (AP).—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, suggested an international music festival to be held with it. That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 70 years old today.

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony (the Boston is willing) to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work," Dr. Koussevitzky said.

and joy of the finest entertainment It would inspire and facilitate thei work."

This Clipping From
RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL TIMES

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From ADRIAN, MICH.
TELEGRAM

JUL 26 1944

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

JUL 27 1944

WAYNESBORO, PA.
RECORD HERALD

JUL 26 1944

DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

JUL 26

JACKSONVILLE, ILL.
COURIER

JUL 26 1944

THIS CLIPPING FROM FULTON, KY.
LEADER

CLARKSDALE, MISS.
REGISTER

JUL 29 1944

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

JUL 27 1944

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

JUL 27 1944

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH

SAULT STE. MARIE, MICH.
NEWS

JUL 26 1944

LITTLE FALLS, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 28 1944

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JUL 26 1944

Music Fest to Sway Peace Meet Urged by Koussevitky

Lenox, Mass. — (AP) — To ensure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise — we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

The Russian-born director is in excellent health and spirits, just as full of enthusiasm as he was when he took over the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 20 years ago.

---

e, oted Conductor

work."

There would be no peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

ould consider it a mission to be ne for world peace."

There is every reason to believe at the composers of the world uld be fired to create new works the event, perhaps some eace Conference

ler it a mission to be done for rld peace."

There is every reason to believe
at the composers of the world

one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

ggests Music
s of Peace

lone for world peace."

There is every reason to belie hat the composers of the wor

The World" ge Koussevitsky orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their

---

NGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 27 1944

LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA

JUL 26 1944

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

26 1944

This Clipping From
HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN

JUL 26 1944

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
SUN

JUL 26 1944

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS

JUL 26

EXPRESS

JUL 26 1944

HERALD PRESS

JUL 26 1944

PROVIDENCE, R.
~~JOURNAL~~
Bulletin

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTIN

JUL 26

JOHNSON CI[illegible] TENN.
PRESS-CHRO[illegible]CLE

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

JUL 26

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

JUL 27 1944

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES

JUL 26 1944

Dr. Koussevitzky, As Saving Influence

Lenox, Mass., July 26 (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other na-

PASTE OVER

...e,
...oted Conductor S...

work."

There would be no difficulty ... the artists, Koussevitzky, ...

peace conference delegates th... rest, peace and joy of the fines... entertainment. It would inspi... and facilitate their work."

...d consider it a mission to be ... for world peace."

...ere is every reason to believe ... the composers of the world ...d be fired to create new works ... the event, perhaps some that

...ace Conference

...r it a mission to be done for ...ld peace."

...here is every reason to believe ... the composers of the world ...e that would give the pea... ...nference delegates the res... ...ace and joy of the finest enter... ...inment. It would inspire an... ...ilitate their work."

...gests Music ...of Peace

...e for world peace."

There is every reason to believe ...t the composers of the world

...The World" ...Koussevitsky

...orchestra to the ...ace conference—and if other na... ...ns would do likewise—we would ...ve an international music event ... the highest spiritual value and ...e that would give the peace con... ...ence delegates the rest, peace and ... of the finest entertainment. It ...uld inspire and facilitate their

...Peace ...oussevitky

...est singers, players and a ...g symphony orchestra to the ... conference—and if other ...ns would do likewise — we ... have an international music ... of the highest spiritual ... and one that would give the ... conference delegates the ...peace and joy of the finest ...ainment. It would inspire ...acilitate their work."

...Russian-born director is in ...ent health and spirits, just ...l of enthusiasm as he was ...he took over the leadership ... Boston Symphony Orches... ...years ago.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 27 19...

LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN

JUL 26 1944

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
SUN

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS

EXPRESS

...JOSEPH, MICH.
HERALD PRESS

JUL [illegible] 1944

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUL 26 ...

This Clipping From
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL

JUL 26 1944

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

JUL 26 1944

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

JUL 27 1944

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES

JUL 26 1944

...Music Festival ...Could Aid Unity

...usic Festival, ...ss of Peace

...Would Smooth ...nductor Says

... peace conference—and if ...er nations would do likewise

...onductors' ...ld Peace

ELIMINATE ... PEACE TABLE

...t the composers of the world ...ld be fired to create new ...ks for the event, perhaps some ...

...ductor Says ...e World

...Today, Sees ...wer In Music

...es Music ...World Peace

...Has Plan ...e Conference

...ony Orchestra ...y, Music Can

...Believes ...Seal Peace

...e for world peace."

...usic Festival ...n Peace Talks

...entertainment. It would inspire and ...facilitate their work.

"Musicians always are the best am... ...bassadors between countries, and all ...invited would eagerly attend and per... ...form because they would consider it ... mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe ...that the composers of the world ...would be fired to create new works ... perhaps some that

---

This Clipping From AUSTIN, TEXAS
STATESMAN

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From GALVESTON, TEXAS
TRIBUNE

JUL 26 1944

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

JUL 27 1944

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE

JUL 27 1944

This Clipping From JOLIET, ILL.
HERALD-NEWS

JUL 26 1944

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 26 1944

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

JUL 26 1944

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

JUL 26 1944

...Suggested ...eacemaking

...Proposed ...Peace

The Russian-born director is ...sting at his summer home and ...eparing for the revival at Tan...ewood this weekend and next ... abbreviated version of the

...Would Set ...To Music

...would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if oth...r nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of ...

...Place At Peace ...vitzky Says

...phony orchestra, 70 years old

...by Koussevitzky

...illes, he is equally certain. ...is is his suggestion: ... our nation should send its ...est singers, players and a ...ng symphony orchestra to the

...orld, Says ...s Music ...nference

...dors between countries, and ...ed would eagerly attend and ...

... be a lasting inspiration ...nity, he added.

...ld the Boston Symphony Or... ...a undertake such an assign...

... course," smiled the con...

...sic Festival ...Conference

... rank in the musical world. At ...t time the orchestra will give ...r concerts devoted entirely to ... works of Mozart

---

MUSIC FESTIVAL AT PEACE PARLEY

Dr. Koussevitzky Tells of Idea In Birthday Interview

Lenox, Mass., July 26 (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston Symphony orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor.

"I feel sure that if this great music festival were to be held at the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

The Russian-born director is resting at his summer home and preparing for the revival at Tanglewood this week-end and next of an abbreviated version of the Berkshire Festival which he raised to top rank in the musical world. At that time the orchestra will give four con-

...America and ...glad to allow us to ac...

Dr. Koussevitzky, 70, Sees Music As Saving Influence of World

Lenox, Mass., July 26 (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

Musicians Are Ambassadors

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is very reason to believ... that the composers of the worl... would be fired to created new work... for the event, perhaps some th... would be a lasting inspiration ... humanity, he added.

Would the Boston symphony ...chestra undertake such an assi...ment?

"Of course," smiled the cond...or.

Would the Bosto...

Children Flock to Concert; Long Army Week Ordered; Reich Repatriates Warned

The World's Day—July 26, 1944

Boston: 4,000 Youngsters Attend Symphony

More than 4,000 children and their companions attended the opening concert of the Boston Symphony children series on the Charles River Esplanade. [Page 2.]

BURLINGTON, IOWA
GAZETTE
JUL 28 1944

Editorial

MUSIC HATH CHARMS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, who celebrated his 70th birthday this week, suggests to insure the success of the next world's peace conference, that an international music festival be held with it.

We believe the good maestro has an idea there. The world, especially Europe, has been so long deprived of its music, that an international music event on the side might put all concerned in the negotiations in a more harmonious state of mind.

Someone has said music is the universal language of mankind. In the discussions over world peace that will come after the war, various tongues will be spoken foreign to the ears of different consultants. What could be better when the babel of the spoken word is getting out of hand, to cut loose with a big symphony orchestra and with soothing tones restore the equanimity?

There was no music at Versailles, and see how that turned out? The suggestion is well worth trying when the time comes. A limited installment of jazz interspersed in the program might do no harm.

ROCKFORD, ILL.
STAR

JUL 28 1944

NO, THANK YOU, DOCTOR

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, believes that the world can use a little musical therapy in combatting war shock. He suggests that there be sent to the next world peace conference the best orchestras, the best singers and choruses and players to take part in an international music festival to be run off simultaneously with the conference. We would have, he says, "an international musical event of the highest spiritual value, one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment," facilitating and inspiring their work.

We wish heartily that we might agree with Dr. Koussevitzky. But in the train of that congress of musicians would be a host of press agents, musical critics, aesthetic chauvinists. If an oboe player from Estonia hit a sour note, it would be magnified to world importance. If the soprano from Rio took second place to the contralto from Lisbon, it might be an incident.

We think there is something to Dr. Koussevitzky's idea of musical therapy for the world, just as there is to using music in individual shock therapy. But we are timid both about the size of the dosage and about the doctors and their retinues who would administer it. Diplomats are hard enough to ride herd on; let's spare ourselves a brawl in the choir loft.

PASTE OVER

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 27 19

LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

JUL 26 1944

Music Festival Would Smooth Peace Talks, Conductor Says

LENOX, Mass., July 26 (AP)—To insure the success of the next the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS

EXPRESS

HERALD PRESS

JUL 26 1944

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL

JUL 26 1944

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

JUL 26 1944

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

JUL 27 1944

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES

JUL 26 1944

Music Festival Could Aid Unity

usic Festival ss of Peace

onductors' rld Peace

ELIMINATE PEACE TABLE

t the composers of the world uld be fired to create new rks for the event, perhaps some

ductor Says e World

Today, Sees wer In Music

es Music World Peace

Has Plan e Conference

ony Orchestra y, Music Can

Believes Seal Peace

e for world peace."

usic Festival n Peace Talks

entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that

---

This Clipping From
AUSTIN, TEXAS
STATESMAN

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From GALVESTON, TEXAS
TRIBUNE

JUL 26 1944

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

JUL 27 1944

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE

JUL 27 1944

This Clipping From JOLIET, ILL.
HERALD-NEWS

JUL 26 1944

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 26 1944

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD

JUL 26 1944

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

JUL 26 1944

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

JUL 26 1944

Suggested eacemaking

Proposed Peace

The Russian-born director is sting at his summer home and eparing for the revival at Tanglewood this weekend and next abbreviated version of the

Would Set To Music

would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of

Place At Peace vitzky Says

phony orchestra, 70 years old

by Koussevitzky

illes, he is equally certain. is is his suggestion: our nation should send its est singers, players and a ng symphony orchestra to the

ld, Says s Music nference

dors between countries, and ed would eagerly attend and be a lasting inspiration nity, he added.

ld the Boston Symphony Ora undertake such an assign-course," smiled the con-

sic Festival Conference

rank in the musical world. At t time the orchestra will give r concerts devoted entirely to works of Mozart

---

MUSIC FESTIVAL AT PEACE PARLEY

Dr. Koussevitzky Tells of Idea In Birthday Interview

Lenox, Mass., July 26 (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years old today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise —we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps some that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston Symphony orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor.

"I feel sure that if this great music festival were to be held at the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

The Russian-born director is resting at his summer home and preparing for the revival at Tanglewood this week-end and next of an abbreviated version of the Berkshire Festival which he raised to top rank in the musical world. At that time the orchestra will give four con-

---

Children Flock to Concert; Long Army Week Ordered; Reich Repatriates Warned

The World's Day—July 26, 1944

Boston: 4,000 Youngsters Attend Symphony
More than 4,000 children and their companions attended the opening concert of the Boston Symphony children series on the Charles River Esplanade. [Page 2.]

BURLINGTON, IOWA
GAZETTE

JUL 28 1944

Editorial

MUSIC HATH CHARMS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, fa. conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, who celebrated his 70th birthday this week, suggests to insure the success of the next world's peace conference, that an international music festival be held with it.

We believe the good maestro has an idea there. The world, especially Europe, has been so long deprived of its music, that an international music event on the side might put all concerned in the negotiations in a more harmonious state of mind.

Someone has said music is the universal language of mankind. In the discussions over world peace that will come after the war, various tongues will be spoken foreign to the ears of different consultants. What could be better when the babel of the spoken word is getting out of hand, to cut loose with a big symphony orchestra and with soothing tones restore the equanimity?

There was no music at Versailles, and see how that turned out? The suggestion is well worth trying when the time comes. A limited installment of jazz interspersed in the program might do no harm.

ROCKFORD, ILL.
STAR

JUL 28 1944

NO, THANK YOU, DOCTOR

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, believes that the world can use a little musical therapy in combatting war shock. He suggests that there be sent to the next world peace conference the best orchestras, the best singers and choruses and players to take part in an international music festival to be run off simultaneously with the conference. We would have, he says, "an international musical event of the highest spiritual value, one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment," facilitating and inspiring their work.

We wish heartily that we might agree with Dr. Koussevitzky. But in the train of that congress of musicians would be a host of press agents, musical critics, aesthetic chauvinists. If an oboe player from Estonia hit a sour note, it would be magnified to world importance. If the soprano from Rio took second place to the contralto from Lisbon, it might be an incident.

We think there is something to Dr. Koussevitzky's idea of musical therapy for the world, just as there is to using music in individual shock therapy. But we are timid both about the size of the dosage and about the doctors and their retinues who would administer it. Diplomats are hard enough to ride herd on; let's spare ourselves brawl in the choir loft.

Dr. Koussevitzky, 70, Sees Music as Saving Influence of World

Lenox, Mass., July 26 (AP)—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 70 years today.

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

Musicians Are Ambassadors

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is very reason to believ that the composers of the worl would be fired to created new work for the event, perhaps some th would be a lasting inspiration humanity, he added.

Would the Boston symphony chestra undertake such an assi ment?

"Of course," smiled the cond or.

---

e, oted Conductor S

work."

There would be no difficult ting the artists, Koussevitzky peace conference delegates t rest, peace and joy of the fine entertainment. It would inspi and facilitate their work."

uld consider it a mission to be ne for world peace."

There is every reason to believe at the composers of the world uld be fired to create new works the event, perhaps some that

eace Conference

er it a mission to be done for rld peace."

There is every reason to believe at the composers of the world one that would give the pea conference delegates the res peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire an facilitate their work."

ggests Music s of Peace done for world peace."

There is every reason to believ hat the composers of the worl

The World" ge Koussevitsky

orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise — we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

way Peace Koussevitky

The Russian-born director is in excellent health and spirits, just as full of enthusiasm as he was when he took over the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 20 years ago.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 27 1944

Koussevitzky, at 70, Tells Of Plans for Pet Project

Energetic Maestro of Boston Symphony to Subsidize Promising Young Composers

By JOSEPH NOLAN

Lenox, July 27—Yesterday was Dr Serge Koussevitzky's 70th birthday but the energetic maestro of the Boston Symphony orchestra had too many things on his mind to think much about celebrating the occasion.

Lenox's most famous squire was busy preparing for the Berkshire music festival at which he will direct his musicians in a Mozart concert Saturday and Sunday. He was thinking, too, about his pet project for subsidizing promising young composers. But he wasn't thinking at all about retiring from the symphony post he has held for the past 20 years.

"Why should I retire when there is so much for me to work for in music now?" The Russian-born conductor wanted to know.

Birthday Highlight

Highlight of his birthday was a visit from the Lenox selectmen who presented him with a resolution commending him as "a gentleman who by his many acts of kindness, by his friendly neighborliness as well as by his ability and foresight in establishing the Berkshire music center, has earned the deep respect and sincere gratitude of his fellow townsmen."

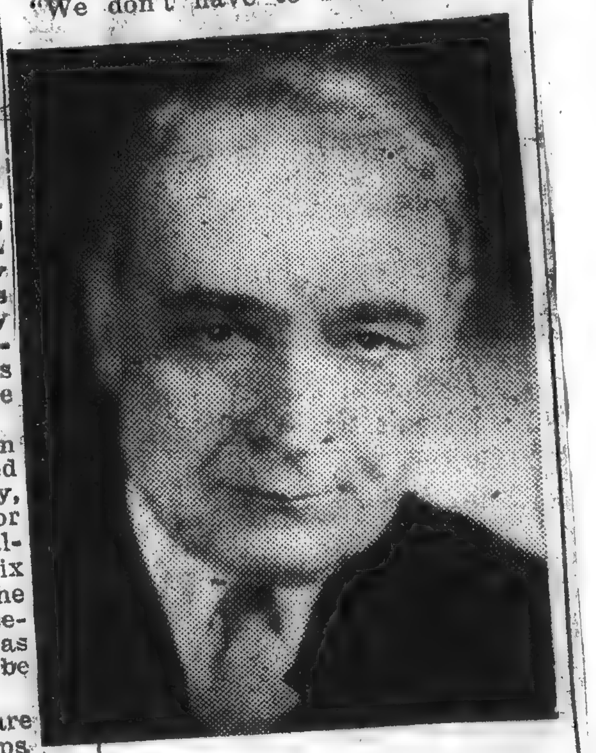
A consistent champion of modern music, whose salary once was quoted unofficially as $100,000 annually, Koussevitzky is planning to sponsor a project whereby ambitious and talented composers would be given six months or a year free to write. If the composition were worthwhile, Koussevitzky himself would see that it was played and royalties would all be turned over to the composer.

"The young musicians of today are working under certain handicaps, chief among which is lack of money," he remarked. "They have to be too much concerned with the commercial aspects of their work. Under such conditions, it is difficult—if not impossible—to turn out fine music."

Has Alger Career

Koussevitzky himself has known complete poverty as well as great wealth. He delights in recalling that he was born "of poor but musical parents," yet his father-in-law was one of Russia's wealthiest men. He it was who backed Koussevitzky in his first symphony orchestra.

When he became head of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924, Beacon hill Brahmans interpreted his flair for showmanship as unnecessarily theatrical, but they soon acknowledged that his repertoire was more varied than that of any other conductor in the United States. At first, Koussevitzky was forced to import many of his key performers from Europe. Such is no longer the case.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

"We don't have to search Europe for talented musicians," he said. "The best players are here in America and they are here in abundance. They are young and responsive to suggestion and coaching. From this kind of material—producted only in America—can you make the best orchestras for the future."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 28 1944

Music at Peace Table

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 70 years old Wednesday. In a birthday interview he said:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace-conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

This suggestion probably will be the cause of many tolerant smiles. It's a good idea, but it couldn't be done and it wouldn't work and so on—that will be the comment. Yet the soothing power of music has long been known and is becoming more and more recognized, especially by physicians. So why should there not be greater effort to supply soothing music to persons who need it, and when they need it?

Ordinarily a person hears a soothing piece of music when he is already relaxed, at ease, at peace with the world, instead of when he is tense, angry, and with fists ready for action, real or imaginary. Why not try a little co-ordination? Why not bring the soothing tune to the individual or crowd in need of soothing? It could be tried on a small scale, at some meeting, before the postwar peace conference. A certain amount of caution would be required. The music would need to be a certain kind. Some so-called tunes would promote riots and civil war.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 29 1944

SEATS ARE SOLD OUT FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony to Feature Mozart at Tanglewood—Dorothy Maynor Soloist—240 Extra Seats Installed

Pittsfield, July 28—Dr Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra of 35 Boston Symphony orchestra musicians were rehearsing today for the initial concert tomorrow at 8.30 p. m. in the Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. The theater which seats 1150 has been sold out for tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon at 3.30. Miss Dorothy Maynor, tomorrow's soloist, arrived tonight at the Wendell-Sheraton hotel, Pittsfield.

So great has been the demand for seats that 240 chairs have been placed on the stage back of the orchestra. A tent also has been erected just outside the main entrance as protection for the overflow of Mozart devotees who will hear the music on the lawn. Ward E. Gaston, Tanglewood superintendent, has been plagued with manpower shortage, but the gardens and lawns reveal no lack of upkeep. James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Cal., who with Mrs Francis is at the Lenox club, was assisting Mr Gaston today in the final work.

An object of interest to many visitors at Tanglewood will be Mr Gaston's weedless garden, 60 by 100 feet in size. There are no backaches in this garden, where Mr Gaston is raising celery, cabbage, carrots, Swiss chard, cucumbers, beets, parsnips, beans, tomatoes, corn, onions, melon summer and winter squash. The son not a weed has grown Tanglewood garden is the layer o inch and a half of sandy gravel th Mr Gaston spread over the heavy black soil before he planted it. The crops flourish, the weeds are smothered by the sand.

In the group of Mozart music critics expected will be representatives of The Springfield Republican, the New York Times and the Boston Globe. The telephone company has installed pay stations in the old icehouse near the theater and Manager E. H. Cowieson of the Western Union, Pittsfield, is to have messenger service between Tanglewood and the Pittsfield office.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

JUL 28 1944

Boston Symphony Plays Mozart At Summer Home in Tanglewood

The first of two broadcasts from the Tanglewood, Mass., estate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard over CFCF and the Blue network at its regular time of 8.30 tomorrow night. Dorothy Maynor, noted American soprano, will be the soloist.

The program is an all-Mozart one, coming as it does during the Boston Symphony's Mozart Festival. From the Opera Concert Hall on the Lenox Estate, which is the orchestra's summer home, the program will be heard under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, permanent conductor of the orchestra.

Under Dr. Koussevitsky's baton will be played the Mozart Symphony in A Major and his Divertimento in B flat major. This latter competition was written for strings with two horns.

Then Miss Maynor will be heard in arias from the Mozart operas, Don Giovanni and The Magic Flute. To conclude the program, the orchestra will play the Symphony in C major, No. 34.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

JUL 28 1944

Music As a Starter Toward World Reconstruction

AT THE OBSERVATION of the seventieth birthday anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, long the honored conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the great leader advocated a world music festival to crown the successful culmination of the war.

That the United States could well afford to enter such an arrangement can well be held in that this country is so deeply endebted to so many races and nationalities for its music that we should be only paying back in part of that debt by participating in such a festival. Dr. Koussevitsky in his suggestion made at Lenox said:

> If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work.

If it should prove too extensive a plan to concentrate the music festival at one place, it could be held simultaneously at designated places in the various capitals of the nations which are united in the strife to produce a warless world. If it is world harmony that people desire, this would be the direct way to attain it.

For a decade now the world has been rent by war and destruction. Since the burning of the books by Hitler, creative effort and the higher arts have been lost in the horrible festival of death and demolition. Edifices which had stood for six to ten centuries as monuments to the higher achievements of mankind have fallen before the destruction of war. If the world is to be saved from suicide, a start will have to be made somewhere to lift its mind and stir its soul to the higher aspirations of the spirit.

This Clipping From
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JUL 31 1944

Music Hath Charms

"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," so the suggestion of Dr. Serrge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that an international music festival be arranged as a sedative for peace conference disputes, should be interesting in this section favored by Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra's harmony.

Koussevitzky could select the music that would quiet a raging lion, but with so many factions trying to slip an oar into the peace conference boat the question is whether the jazz band brigades would yield him full sway. Music's charms have been conceded since even before the boy David's harp lulled to sleep the troubled King Saul of Israel. But, remembering that once the king was displeased and hurled his spear at the youth—thus setting the pace for modern disapproval—music's infallibility, so lauded by the Boston leader, may be discounted.

If the delegates trying to form a peace preserving association should meaningfully sing, "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," it might have international effect; but if a more majestic production only lulled them into inactive contentment, the scene would be set for some smoke-filled room sessions beyond reach of music and its charms.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 29 1944

Mozart Festival Reported Sell-Ou

Initial Concert to be Given Tonight—Additional 250 Chairs Placed on Stage in Rear of Orchestra.

Rehearsals, for the initial concert of the Mozart festival this evening at 8.30 o'clock in Tanglewood, were held yesterday afternoon by 35 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Miss Dorothy Maynor, today's soloist, arrived last night.

In order to accommodate the large demand for seats in the theater, which holds 1,150 persons, and is at present sold out for this evening's and tomorrow afternoon's performances, 250 chairs have been placed on the stage back of the orchestra. A tent has been installed t an anticipated overflow of Mozart devotees, who will hear the music on the lawn.

The gardens and lawns show no lack of upkeep despite the lack of manpower that has plagued Ward E. Gaston, Tanglewood superintendent. James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Cal., and Mrs. Francis were assisting Mr. Gaston in the final arrangements yesterday.

The telephone company has installed pay stations in the old icehouse near the theater and Manager E. H. Cowieson of the Western Union, Pittsfield, is to have messenger service between Tanglewood and the Pittsfield office.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JUL 28 1944

Music and Peace

The problems that will beset the coming peace conference would be made easier under the influence of music, in the opinion of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, for twenty years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has just passed his seventieth birthday in Lenox. In order to supply that influence, the famous conductor suggests that the finest musicians in the world be sent to the conference, including the best singers and players and a leading symphony orchestra representing not only America but other countries. The result, he believes, would inspire the peacemakers and facilitate their work.

The music so provided, Dr. Koussevitzky believes, would tend to bring about quite different and more lasting results than came from the peace table at Versailles. He believes the finest artists would eagerly welcome the opportunity to take part in extending the harmonizing influence over the peace conference.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries," he says. Surely if the influence they could exert is not overrated, no higher function could well be imagined than to have a part, even indirectly, in shaping the momentous deliberations affecting future generations of the entire world.

Whether the admitted influence of music is something overrated by Dr. Koussevitzky is something that cannot be determined because no yardstick can be applied. Hard-headed students of world affairs will be likely to scoff at his suggestion as that of an impractical dreamer.

Care would have to be exercised to differentiate between a spiritual influence that in some indefinable but potent way would harmonize the deliberations on the highest plane and a purely emotional appeal that might lend itself to abuses or at least influence of doubtful value to the outstanding cause of world peace. If the role of music be granted as important a place as Dr. Koussevitzky gives it, the peace conference music program maker would occupy a place so exalted that his selection would be of greater importance than that of any other personage attending.

[97]

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 27 1944

Koussevitzky, at 70, Tells Of Plans for Pet Project

Energetic Maestro of Boston Symphony to Subsidize Promising Young Composers

By JOSEPH NOLAN

Lenox, July 27—Yesterday was Dr Serge Koussevitzky's 70th birthday but the energetic maestro of the Boston Symphony orchestra had too many things on his mind to think much about celebrating the occasion.

Lenox's most famous squire was busy preparing for the Berkshire music festival at which he will direct his musicians in a Mozart concert Saturday and Sunday. He was thinking, too, about his pet project for subsidizing promising young composers. But he wasn't thinking at all about retiring from the symphony post he has held for the past 20 years.

"Why should I retire when there is so much for me to work for in music now?" The Russian-born conductor wanted to know.

Birthday Highlight

Highlight of his birthday was a visit from the Lenox selectmen who presented him with a resolution commending him as "a gentleman who by his many acts of kindness, by his friendly neighborliness as well as by his ability and foresight in establishing the Berkshire music center, has earned the deep respect and sincere gratitude of his fellow townsmen."

A consistent champion of modern music, whose salary once was quoted unofficially as $100,000 annually, Koussevitzky is planning to sponsor a project whereby ambitious and talented composers would be given six months or a year free to write. If the composition were worthwhile, Koussevitzky himself would see that it was played and royalties would all be turned over to the composer.

"The young musicians of today are working under certain handicaps, chief among which is lack of money," he remarked. "They have to be too much concerned with the commercial aspects of their work. Under such conditions, it is difficult—if not impossible—to turn out fine music."

Has Alger Career

Koussevitzky himself has known complete poverty as well as great wealth. He delights in recalling that he was born "of poor but musical parents," yet his father-in-law was one of Russia's wealthiest men. He it was who backed Koussevitzky in his first symphony orchestra.

When he became head of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924, Beacon hill Brahmans interpreted his flair for showmanship as unnecessarily theatrical, but they soon acknowledged that his repertoire was more varied than that of any other conductor in the United States. At first, Koussevitzky was forced to import many of his key performers from Europe. Such is no longer the case.

"We don't have to search Europe for talented musicians," he said. "The best players are here in America and they are here in abundance. They are young and responsive to suggestion and coaching. From this kind of material—producted only in America—can you make the best orchestras for the future."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 28 1944

Music at Peace Table

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 70 years old Wednesday. In a birthday interview he said:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace-conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

This suggestion probably will be the cause of many tolerant smiles. It's a good idea, but it couldn't be done and it wouldn't work and so on—that will be the comment. Yet the soothing power of music has long been known and is becoming more and more recognized, especially by physicians. So why should there not be greater effort to supply soothing music to persons who need it, and when they need it?

Ordinarily a person hears a soothing piece of music when he is already relaxed, at ease, at peace with the world, instead of when he is tense, angry, and with fists ready for action, real or imaginary. Why not try a little co-ordination? Why not bring the soothing tune to the individual or crowd in need of soothing? It could be tried on a small scale, at some meeting, before the postwar peace conference. A certain amount of caution would be required. The music would need to be a certain kind. Some so-called tunes would promote riots and civil war.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 29 1944

SEATS ARE SOLD OUT FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony to Feature Mozart at Tanglewood—Dorothy Maynor Soloist—240 Extra Seats Installed

Pittsfield, July 28—Dr Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra of 35 Boston Symphony orchestra musicians were rehearsing today for the initial concert tomorrow at 8.30 p. m. in the Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. The theater which seats 1150 has been sold out for tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon at 3.30. Miss Dorothy Maynor, tomorrow's soloist, arrived tonight at the Wendell-Sheraton hotel, Pittsfield.

So great has been the demand for seats that 240 chairs have been placed on the stage back of the orchestra. A tent also has been erected just outside the main entrance as protection for the overflow of Mozart devotees who will hear the music on the lawn. Ward E. Gaston, Tanglewood superintendent, has been plagued with manpower shortage, but the gardens and lawns reveal no lack of upkeep. James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Cal., who with Mrs Francis is at the Lenox club, was assisting Mr Gaston today in the final work.

An object of interest to many visitors at Tanglewood will be Mr Gaston's weedless garden, 60 by 100 feet, in size. There are no backaches in this garden, where Mr Gaston is raising celery, cabbage, carrots, Swiss chard, cucumbers, beets, parsnips, beans, tomatoes, corn, onions, melons, summer and winter squash. The reason not a weed has grown in Tanglewood garden is the layer of inch and a half of sandy gravel that Mr Gaston spread over the heavy black soil before he planted it. The crops flourish, the weeds are smothered by the sand.

In the group of Mozart music critics expected will be representatives of The Springfield Republican, the New York Times and the Boston Globe. The telephone company has installed pay stations in the old icehouse near the theater and Manager E. H. Cowieson of the Western Union, Pittsfield, is to have messenger service between Tanglewood and the Pittsfield office.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

JUL 28 1944

Music As a Starter Toward World Reconstruction

AT THE OBSERVATION of the seventieth birthday anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, long the honored conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the great leader advocated a world music festival to crown the successful culmination of the war.

That the United States could well afford to enter such an arrangement can well be held in that this country is so deeply endebted to so many races and nationalities for its music that we should be only paying back in part of that debt by participating in such a festival. Dr. Koussevitsky in his suggestion made at Lenox said:

> If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work.

If it should prove too extensive a plan to concentrate the music festival at one place, it could be held simultaneously at designated places in the various capitals of the nations which are united in the strife to produce a warless world. If it is world harmony that people desire, this would be the direct way to attain it.

For a decade now the world has been rent by war and destruction. Since the burning of the books by Hitler, creative effort and the higher arts have been lost in the horrible festival of death and demolition. Edifices which had stood for six to ten centuries as monuments to the higher achievements of mankind have fallen before the destruction of war. If the world is to be saved from suicide, a start will have to be made somewhere to lift its mind and stir its soul to the higher aspirations of the spirit.

This Clipping From
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL

JUL 31 1944

Music Hath Charms

"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," so the suggestion of Dr. Serrge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that an international music festival be arranged as a sedative for peace conference disputes, should be interesting in this section favored by Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra's harmony.

Koussevitzky could select the music that would quiet a raging lion, but with so many factions trying to slip an oar into the peace conference boat the question is whether the jazz band brigades would yield him full sway. Music's charms have been conceded since even before the boy David's harp lulled to sleep the troubled King Saul of Israel. But, remembering that once the king was displeased and hurled his spear at the youth—thus setting the pace for modern disapproval—music's infallibility, so lauded by the Boston leader, may be discounted.

If the delegates trying to form a peace preserving association should meaningfully sing, "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," it might have international effect; but if a more majestic production only lulled them into inactive contentment, the scene would be set for some smoke-filled room sessions beyond reach of music and its charms.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

JUL 28 1944

Boston Symphony Plays Mozart At Summer Home in Tanglewood

The first of two broadcasts from the Tanglewood, Mass., estate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard over CFCF and the Blue network at its regular time of 8.30 tomorrow night. Dorothy Maynor, noted American soprano, will be the soloist.

The program is an all-Mozart one, coming as it does during the Boston Symphony's Mozart Festival. From the Opera Concert Hall on the Lenox Estate, which is the orchestra's summer home, the program will be heard under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, permanent conductor of the orchestra.

Under Dr. Koussevitsky's baton will be played the Mozart Symphony in A Major and his Divertimento in B flat major. This latter competition was written for strings with two horns.

Then Miss Maynor will be heard in arias from the Mozart operas, Don Giovanni and The Magic Flute. To conclude the program, the orchestra will play the Symphony in C major, No. 34.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JUL 2 [illegible]

Music and Peace

The problems that will beset the coming peace conference would be made easier under the influence of music, in the opinion of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, for twenty years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has just passed his seventieth birthday in Lenox. In order to supply that influence, the famous conductor suggests that the finest musicians in the world be sent to the conference, including the best singers and players and a leading symphony orchestra representing not only America but other countries. The result, he believes, would inspire the peacemakers and facilitate their work.

The music so provided, Dr. Koussevitzky believes, would tend to bring about quite different and more lasting results than came from the peace table at Versailles. He believes the finest artists would eagerly welcome the opportunity to take part in extending the harmonizing influence over the peace conference.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries," he says. Surely if the influence they could exert is not overrated, no higher function could well be imagined than to have a part, even indirectly, in shaping the momentous deliberations affecting future generations of the entire world.

Whether the admitted influence of music is something overrated by Dr. Koussevitzky is something that cannot be determined because no yardstick can be applied. Hard-headed students of world affairs will be likely to scoff at his suggestion as that of an impractical dreamer.

Care would have to be exercised to differentiate between a spiritual influence that in some indefinable but potent way would harmonize the deliberations on the highest plane and a purely emotional appeal that might lend itself to abuses or at least influence of doubtful value to the outstanding cause of world peace. If the role of music be granted as important a place as Dr. Koussevitzky gives it, the peace conference music program maker would occupy a place so exalted that his selection would be of greater importance than that of any other personage attending.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 29 1944

Mozart Festival Reported Sell-Out

Initial Concert to be Given Tonight—Additional 250 Chairs Placed on Stage in Rear of Orchestra.

Rehearsals, for the initial concert of the Mozart festival this evening at 8.30 o'clock in Tanglewood, were held yesterday afternoon by 35 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Miss Dorothy Maynor, today's soloist, arrived last night.

In order to accommodate the large demand for seats in the theater, which holds 1,150 persons, and is at present sold out for this evening's and tomorrow afternoon's performances, 250 chairs have been placed on the stage back of the orchestra. A tent has been installed an anticipated overflow of Mozart devotees, who will hear the music on the lawn.

The gardens and lawns show no lack of upkeep despite the lack of manpower that has plagued Ward E. Gaston, Tanglewood superintendent. James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Cal., and Mrs. Francis were assisting Mr. Gaston in the final arrangements yesterday.

The telephone company has installed pay stations in the old icehouse near the theater and Manager E. H. Cowieson of the Western Union, Pittsfield, is to have messenger service between Tanglewood and the Pittsfield office.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 29 1944

Mozart Festival Will Open At Tanglewood This Evening

Concert Hall Is Sellout—Dorothy Maynor Soloist Tonight—Luboshutz And Nemenoff Play Tomorrow

With all reserved seats sold for this evening and tomorrow afternoon it is expected the overflow area surrounding the concert hall at Tanglewood will be utilized by several hundred for the Mozart festival. The programs to be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be given this week end and next week end. Both evening performances will be broadcast by the Blue Network and it is therefore impressive that all be seated by 8.30. The afternoon programs on both Sundays will be at 3.30.

Dorothy Maynor, soprano and soloist for tonight, arrived yesterday afternoon accompanied by her husband, Rev. Shelby Rooks, pastor of St. James' Presbyterian Church in New York. They are house guests of Dr. Koussevitzky. Miss Maynor made her debut at Tanglewood a few years ago.

Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, piano soloists for tomorrow's concert, have been in the Berkshires most of the week. They arrived Tuesday from Rockport, Me., for Dr. Koussevitzky's birthday observance Wednesday. They are staying at the Wendell-Sheraton.

The orchestra, consisting of 35 members of the Boston Symphony, have been arriving throughout the week, most of them participating in rehearsals the past two days.

The Programs

Miss Maynor will sing three arias instead of two as originally planned. The programs for the week end are as follows:

TONIGHT—8.30

Symphony in A major (No. 29, K. 201)
Divertimento in B-flat major, for strings with two horns (K. 287)

* * *

Aria—L'Amero, Saro Costante, from Il Re Pastore (K. 208)
Violin obbligato—Richard Burgin.)
Recitative, Ch'io Mi Scordi Di Te, and Rondo, Non Temer, Amato Bene (K. 505)
Soloist—Dorothy Maynor, soprano.
Piano obbligato—Bernard Zighera.

SUNDAY—3.30

Symphony in D major (Haffner), (No. 35, K. 385)
Concerto in E-flat major for two pianos and orchestra,. (K. 365)
Soloists—Pierre Luboschutz, Genia Nemenoff

* * *

Overture to La Clemenza Di Tito, (K. 621)
Symphony in G minor, (No. 40, K. 550)

The box office will open at noon today and tomorrow for the sale of admission tickets, which will entitle the holders to listen on the grounds to the music that is said to carry clearly. Early arrivals will have seats on benches east and north of the auditorium. No seats remain unsold for tonight and tomorrow, and few for next week's two concerts.

To Aid Ushers

Willard M. Sistare, chairman of ushers for the Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, will be assisted by Carl W. Germeck, Fred T. Francis and Norman B. Hollister in charge of sections of the opera-concert hall. Miss Martha Hick will direct the program girls and tickets will be taken by George P. Hunt Jr., Franklin C. Pillsbury Jr., Leonard F. Johnson, David M. Cullen and Harry B. Johnson.

The audiences will include many music lovers from out of town, of necessity arriving by train and bus, and willing to take a chance on transportation to Tanglewood from surrounding towns. ODT regulations permit additional bus service on regular routes, and a fleet of taxis is expected to shuttle to the concerts from Lenox and Stockbridge.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

JUL 30 1944

Many Attend Lenox, Mass., Mozart Fete

Lenox, Mass., July 29—(AP)—The 1,152 seats in Opera Hall were sold tonight and hundred of people, who came in from nearby farms, stood outside to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first of four programs of a Mozart festival.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who marked his 70th birthday anniversary last Wednesday and his 20th year with the Boston Symphony, described the festival and the response of this Berkshire Hills community as "another milestone in the history of the Boston orchestra."

Dr. Koussevitsky, who recently offered his plan to send the great artists and orchestras of each nation to the postwar peace conference tonight gave a sample of his "peace music."

Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, in arias from Li Re Pastore, and The Magic Flute was soloist, marking the fifth anniversary of her discovery by Dr. Koussevitsky at a Berkshire music festival.

The orchestra of 38 players, which Dr. Koussevitsky directed, was not much larger than the one for which Mozart wrote. Thirty-two of the players are Boston Symphony members, who in prewar days, were members of Dr. Koussevitsky's Berkshire music center.

Music critics tonight were agreed that "Mozart himself never heard his music played as beautifully, partly because of higher instrumental standards today and partly because the director has an affinity for the youthful music of the composer and took the trouble to rehearse exhaustively."

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

JUL 30 1944

Composers Honored by "Grants"

LENOX, Mass., July 29. (AP)—Four composers, two of American roots and two of foreign extraction, have been honored by "composer grants" from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. They are Aaron Copland, Burrill Phillips, Darius Milhaud and Nikolai Lopatnikoff.

If the project matures, the result will be symphonies by Messrs. Copland and Milhaud, a concertino by Loptnikoff, and an overture by Phillips. No time has been set, but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky hopes that some of the compositions will be ready for performance by his Boston Symphony next season.

One of the few one-man ventures of its kind, the music foundation grew directly out of the life-long interest taken by the late Natilie Koussevitzky in the career of her famous conductor-husband. When Koussevitzky and she were married, he was famous as a base viol player, and ambitious to conduct.

Mme. Koussevitzky put a very large fortune at the service of her husband's career. Immediately after her death her husband organized the foundation in her honor, devoting most of its money to subsidizing composers of serious music.

In his years with the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky has insisted on the right of the present day composers to a hearing, even when his subscribers threatened re-

---

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

JUL 31 1944

Concert Interrupted By Storm

Lenox, Mass., July 31—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky and the weather man broke yesterday. Thunder, lightning and the roar of a Berkshire hills cloudburst stopped the second of four Mozart concerts which this summer substitutes for the large and elaborate Berkshire Symphonic festival.

Dr. Koussevitzky and 38 musicians who compose his orchestra for the festival had completed a performance of the "Haffner" symphony and Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff were well into the first movement of the E flat concerto for two pianos when the storm struck.

Although the thin-roofed opera hall vibrated as if a thousand tympani players were at work, both orchestra and soloists continued through the second movement and had commenced the last, when Dr. Koussevitsky, without stopping the music, turned to the audience and called an intermission.

Thus the audience was provided a dividend since the slow movement, one of the finest in all Mozart, had been almost drowned out and was repeated after the storm.

It is unusual for the Lenox-Stockbridge neighborhood to experience delays and unscheduled intermissions in its music festival. Dr. Koussevitsky has enjoyed phenomenal cooperation from the weatherman. His luck resumed last night when the evening concert progressed without interruption.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 30 1944

Tanglewood Acclaims Boston Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 29.—The opera-concert hall and surrounding grounds of the Berkshire music center were filled tonight with the exquisite music of Mozart. The capacity audience of 1400 also filled the auditorium with earnest applause for Serge Koussevitsky and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dorothy Maynor, soprano, was the soloist.

This is obviously more than a Mozart festival of four concerts. The orchestra's application to its task as well as the audience's reverence for the conductor gave the impression that an important landmark has been reached in the career of this great orchestra. As a matter of fact, the program notes revealed that Dr. Koussevitsky's idea is that Tanglewood should take the place of the Salzburg Mozart festivals which the war has discontiuued.

Significant Celebration

Dr. Koussevitsky was 70 years old last Wednesday. It is significant that the music of Mozart should be chosen to celebrate the occasion. One might perhaps have expected the dramatic utterances of Tschaikowsky or other Russians to whom the conductor is particularly devoted.

The term "ovation" does not fully describe the response to tonight's performances. Quite part from the affection which this Tanglewod audience clearly demonstrated for the veteran conductor, the fact remains that Mozart's music, in its sheer simplicity of beauty, has never ceased to be highly exciting.

Dr. Koussevitsky's concept of Mozart eradicates every mannerism and affectation that would mar in any way the essential purity of the composer's style. This was not achieved as the evening progressed, but virtually from the first theme of the "Allegro Moderato" movement or the "Symphony in A Major."

35 in Orchestra

The orchestra was happily depleted from its original size to 35 members, to conform with the authentic orchestra of Mozart's day. Although this early work is filled with contrivances that might well appear naive with less skillful treatment, the absolute tonal unit, and extraordinary concise rhythms gave eloquence to the interpretation. The "Menuetto" movement abounded in spontaneous "joie de vivre" that has been excelled, in the opinion of this reviewer, only by some performances of similar Haydn movements that have remained undimmed recollection of classic perfection.

The unusual but tonally agreeable, combination of strings and two horns were represented by the "Divertimento in B-flat Major." As we have many times stated without reservation, the Boston Symphony strings produce a tone for which there is no rival. Of the six movements played, the outstanding were the "Andante Grazioso" which demonstrated extraordinary technical velocity and precision, and the "Adagio" which interrupted the program for an ovation. The two horn players, Willem Valkenier and Walter MacDonald, met the challenge of their difficult score with brilliance.

Miss Maynor Sincere

Miss Maynor was heard in three recitatives and arias from "Il Re Pastore" and the "Magic Flute." There were obligatos by violinist Richard Burgin and pianist Bernard Zighera. On every occasion when we have heard Miss Maynor, we have been impressed with the intelligence of her interpretations. That she is a meticulous artist is unquestioned. Her tone, although not of unprecedented warmth, is clear, accurate, and rich.

However, her approach to the classic style is that of the academician and not the soulful singer. We are basing this opinion on the conviction that Mozart's arias were profoundly human utterances from which the personal element can not be dissociated.

One must, nevertheless, credit Miss Maynor with being a truly sincere classic exponent even if limitedly moving.

Tomorrow afternoon's concert will feature Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, duo-pianists who are to be heard at the Worcester music festival in October.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 31 1944

Hub Orchestra Opens Series of Mozart Concerts

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, returned to Tanglewood, at Lenox, this weekend for the first two of a series of four concerts in a Mozart festival.

Rain and thunder brought an interruption of more than a half hour in yesterday afternoon's program, but failed to dampen the enthusiasm of the capacity audience for the music which preceded and followed the pause.

The last two concerts in the series will be presented Saturday night and Sunday afternoon at the small shell on the Tanglewood grounds.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

JUL 31 1944

Tanglewood Concerts Open

Hundreds of music lovers went to Tanglewood yesterday to hear one of the biggest musical events on the East Coast this season.

They paid homage to two men, separated by a century and a half, whom the majority have recognized as the most qualified musicians of their times: Mozart and Serge Koussevitzky, the latter celebrating his 70th birthday this year.

The Mozart Festival, presented last weekend and next, is the first music to be heard at Tanglewood in two years. For the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky chose the best men from his Boston Symphony Orchestra, picked the country's ace soloists and packed off to the Berkshires with the scores of Mozart's representative works.

Guest artists were Luboshutz and Nemenoff, playing the two-piano concerto (k 365) with the G minor and "Haffner" symphonies and the "Titus" overture. The two pianists played excellently, competing with a thunderstorm.

Next week's artists will be Ruth Posselt and Robert Casadesus.—J. C.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 31 1944

Thunder, Lightning, Rain Interrupt Berkshire Concert

Lenox, Mass., July 30—(AP)—Serge Koussevitsky and the weather man broke today. Thunder, lightning and the roar of a Berkshire hills cloudburst stopped the second of four Mozart concerts which this summer substitutes for the large and elaborate Berkshire Symphonic festival.

Dr. Koussevitsky and 38 musicians who compose his orchestra for the festival had completed a performance of the "Haffner" symphony and Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff were well into the first movement of the E flat concerto for two pianos when the storm struck.

Although the thin-roofed opera hall vibrated as if a thousand tympani players were at work, both orchestra and soloists continued through the second movement and had commenced the last, when Dr. Koussevitsky, without stopping the music, turned to the audience and called an intermission.

Thus the audience was provided a dividend since the slow movement, one of the finest in all Mozart, had been almost drowned out and was repeated after the storm.

It is unusual for the Lenox-Stockbridge neighborhood to experience delays and unscheduled intermissions in its music festival. Dr. Koussevitsky has enjoyed phenomenal cooperation from the weatherman. His luck resumed tonight when the evening concert progressed without interruption.

GALVESTON, TEXAS
NEWS

JUL 30 1944

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, celebrated his 70th birthday the other day. In an interview he stated his belief that "music can save the world." In fact, he extended his remarks about this philosophy to a proposal for an international music festival to insure the success of the next world peace conference.

The idea has, we believe, considerable merit. We have spoken before of the power music can exert for good in our lives, if we will only let it. Great progress has been made in the therapeutic use of music and Dr. Leake indicated in this department last May that music would be piped into all private rooms and wards in new buildings at John Sealy Hospital.

One unfortunate effect which music has is its ability to inspire a great deal of nonsense when its advocates set forth to explain it. This, we believe, is responsible for keeping it out of the lives of many people, particularly because so much of this nonsense, written with the best of intention, gives an entirely false impression of the nature of music.

It is good to read Dr. Koussevitsky's cheerful statement that "music can save the world." There is nothing new in the theory of music as a political force, or even as an instrument for the expression of political dogma. Ancient writers also recognized, and sometimes feared, the insidious power of music. Plato banned new music from his republic. He said quite bluntly that "styles of music are never disturbed without affecting the most important political institutions."

It isn't unlikely that there will be national musical festivals in the United States following the war. We shall certainly be ready to sing and to rejoice in our victory. We should like to see Texas have a music festival of its own at that time. Why not in Galveston? We believe the city ideally situate for such an event and, certainly, the state has a plentitude of fine musicians to contribute their art. For the rest, let Galveston have more music in its community life as a matter of course.

We wonder why the municipal band so consistently follows a pattern in its thrice-weekly programs? There is very little offered that is new, and many of the compositions date well back to the early years of this century, We refer, especially, to popular numbers. We do not mean to imply that such music should not be played, but we do think that Mr. Stella would enhance the reputation of his band if he played more recent compositions by contemporary composers.

These compositions we offer as suggestions. There are many, many others whose names are readily available. For a starter we suggest Wanda Landowska's "Liberation Fanfare"; Samuel Barber's "Commando March"; Erik Leidsen's overture "Springtime"; Vaughn Williams' "Toccata Marziale" and English Folklore Suite; Tschaikovsky's "Marche Militaire"; Holtz's First Suite for band and Weinberger's "Homage to the Pioneers." Any one of these compositions, all written especially for band, would be a welcome addition to his programs which have, we suggest, become rather hackneyed. It should be worth a trial. We believe the audience would demand more. da capo al segno . . . tgR.

ASS.

OLD OUT
EVITZKY

to Feature lewood —
Soloist—Installed

Serge Koustra of 35 Bostra musicians for the initial 0 p. m. in the ewood, Lenox.
1150 has been ight and Sun-Miss Dorothy oloist, arrived
-Sheraton hoe demand for ve been placed the orchestra.

ected just out-as protection zart devotees on the lawn.
lewood super-plagued with t the gardens ck of upkeep.
of Santa Barrs Francis is assisting Mr al work. to many visi-l be Mr Gas-60 by 100 feet backaches in Gaston is raisarrots, Swiss
ets, parsnips, onions, melon uash. The grown he layer o
y gravel th er the heavy anted it. The ds are smoth-rt music crit-resentatives of ican, the New Boston Globe. has installed icehouse near r E. H. Cowie-nion, Pittsfield, rvice between ittsfield office.

ozart
wood

From MASS.
ION

4 and Peace will beset the coming ld be made easier under ic, in the opinion of Dr.

for twenty years con-Symphony Orchestra, who seventieth birthday in upply that influence, the gests that the finest musi-e sent to the conference, ngers and players and a chestra representing not er countries. The result, pire the peacemakers and ded, Dr. Koussevitzky be-bring about quite difsting results than came at Versailles. He believes uld eagerly welcome the part in extending the e over the peace con-

are the best ambassadors e says. Surely if the inert is not overrated, no well be imagined than indirectly, in shaping the ons affecting future gene world.
ted influence of music is oussevitzky is something mined because no yard-Hard-headed students of e likely to scoff at his an impractical dreamer.
be exercised to differenual influence that in some nt way would harmonize the highest plane and a peal that might lend it-east influence of doubtful ng cause of world peace.
granted as important a zky gives it, the peace am maker would occupy his selection would be than that of any other

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 29 1944

Mozart Festival Will Open At Tanglewood This Evening

Concert Hall Is Sellout—Dorothy Maynor Soloist Tonight—Luboshutz And Nemenoff Play Tomorrow

With all reserved seats sold for this evening and tomorrow afternoon it is expected the overflow area surrounding the concert hall at Tanglewood will be utilized by several hundred for the Mozart festival. The programs to be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be given this week end and next week end. Both evening performances will be broadcast by the Blue Network and it is therefore impressive that all be seated by 8.30. The afternoon programs on both Sundays will be at 3.30.

Dorothy Maynor, soprano and soloist for tonight, arrived yesterday afternoon accompanied by her husband, Rev. Shelby Rooks, pastor of St. James' Presbyterian Church in New York. They are house guests of Dr. Koussevitzky. Miss Maynor made her debut at Tanglewood a few years ago.

Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, piano soloists for tomorrow's concert, have been in the Berkshires most of the week. They arrived Tuesday from Rockport, Me., for Dr. Koussevitzky's birthday observance Wednesday. They are staying at the Wendell-Sheraton.

The orchestra, consisting of 35 members of the Boston Symphony, have been arriving throughout the week, most of them participating in rehearsals the past two days.

The Programs

Miss Maynor will sing three arias instead of two as originally planned. The programs for the week end are as follows:

TONIGHT—8.30

Symphony in A major (No. 29, K. 201)
Divertimento in B-flat major, for strings with two horns (K. 287)

* * *

Aria—L'Amero, Saro Costante, from Il Re Pastore (K. 208)
Violin obbligato—Richard Burgin.)
Recitative, Ch'io Mi Scordi Di Te, and Rondo, Non Temer, Amato Bene (K. 505)
Soloist—Dorothy Maynor, soprano.
Piano obbligato—Bernard Zighera.

SUNDAY—3.30

Symphony in D major (Haffner), (No. 35, K. 385)
Concerto in E-flat major for two pianos and orchestra, (K. 365)
Soloists—Pierre Luboschutz, Genia Nemenoff

* * *

Overture to La Clemenza Di Tito, (K. 621)
Symphony in G minor, (No. 40, K. 550)

The box office will open at noon today and tomorrow for the sale of admission tickets, which will entitle the holders to listen on the grounds to the music that is said to carry clearly. Early arrivals will have seats on benches east and north of the auditorium. No seats remain unsold for tonight and tomorrow, and few for next week's two concerts.

To Aid Ushers

Willard M. Sistare, chairman of ushers for the Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, will be assisted by Carl W. Germeck, Fred T. Francis and Norman B. Hollister in charge of sections of the opera-concert hall. Miss Martha Hick will direct the program girls and tickets will be taken by George P. Hunt Jr., Franklin C. Pillsbury Jr., Leonard F. Johnson, David M. Cullen and Harry B. Johnson.

The audiences will include many music lovers from out of town, of necessity arriving by train and bus, and willing to take a chance on transportation to Tanglewood from surrounding towns. ODT regulations permit additional bus service on regular routes, and a fleet of taxis is expected to shuttle to the concerts from Lenox and Stockbridge.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

JUL 30 1944

Many Attend Lenox, Mass., Mozart Fete

Lenox, Mass., July 29—(AP)—The 1,152 seats in Opera Hall were sold tonight and hundred of people, who came up from nearby farms, stood outside to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first of four programs of a Mozart festival.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who marked his 70th birthday anniversary last Wednesday and his 20th year with the Boston Symphony, described the festival and the response of this Berkshire Hills community as "another milestone in the history of the Boston orchestra."

Dr. Koussevitsky, who recently offered his plan to send the great artists and orchestras of each nation to the postwar peace conference tonight gave a sample of his "peace music."

Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, in arias from Il Re Pastore, and The Magic Flute was soloist, marking the fifth anniversary of her discovery by Dr. Koussevitsky at a Berkshire music festival.

The orchestra of 38 players, which Dr. Koussevitsky directed, was not much larger than the one for which Mozart wrote. Thirty-two of the players are Boston Symphony members, who in prewar days, were members of Dr. Koussevitsky's Berkshire music center.

Music critics tonight were agreed that "Mozart himself never heard his music played as beautifully: partly because of higher instrumental standards today and partly because the director has an affinity for the youthful music of the composer and took the trouble to rehearse exhaustively."

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

JUL 31 1944

Concert Interrupted By Storm

Lenox, Mass., July 31—(AP)—Serge Koussevitsky and the weather man broke yesterday. Thunder, lightning and the roar of a Berkshire hills cloudburst stopped the second of four Mozart concerts which this summer substitutes for the large and elaborate Berkshire Symphonic festival.

Dr. Koussevitsky and 38 musicians who compose his orchestra for the festival had completed a performance of the "Haffner" symphony and Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff were well into the first movement of the E flat concerto for two pianos when the storm struck.

Although the thin-roofed opera hall vibrated as if a thousand tympani players were at work, both orchestra and soloists continued through the second movement and had commenced the last, when Dr. Koussevitsky, without stopping the music, turned to the audience and called an intermission.

Thus the audience was provided a dividend since the slow movement, one of the finest in all Mozart, had been almost drowned out and was repeated after the storm.

It is unusual for the Lenox-Stockbridge neighborhood to experience delays and unscheduled intermissions in its music festival. Dr. Koussevitsky has enjoyed phenomenal cooperation from the weatherman. His luck resumed last night when the evening concert progressed without interruption.

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

JUL 30 1944

Composers Honored by "Grants"

LENOX, Mass., July 29. (AP)—Four composers, two of American roots and two of foreign extraction, have been honored by "composer grants" from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. They are Aaron Copland, Burrill Phillips, Darius Milhaud and Nikolai Lopatnikoff.

If the project matures, the result will be symphonies by Messrs. Copland and Milhaud, a concertino by Loptnikoff, and an overture by Phillips. No time has been set, but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky hopes that some of the compositions will be ready for performance by his Boston Symphony next season.

One of the few one-man ventures of its kind, the music foundation grew directly out of the life-long interest taken by the late Natilie Koussevitzky in the career of her famous conductor-husband. When Koussevitzky and she were married, he was famous as a base viol player, and ambitious to conduct.

Mme. Koussevitzky put a very large fortune at the service of her husband's career. Immediately after her death her husband organized the foundation in her honor, devoting most of its money to subsidizing composers of serious music.

In his years with the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky has insisted on the right of the present day composers to a hearing, even when his subscribers threatened re-

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 30 1944

Tanglewood Acclaims Boston Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 29.—The opera-concert hall and surrounding grounds of the Berkshire music center were filled tonight with the exquisite music of Mozart. The capacity audience of 1400 also filled the auditorium with earnest applause for Serge Koussevitsky and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dorothy Maynor, soprano, was the soloist.

This is obviously more than a Mozart festival of four concerts. The orchestra's application to its task as well as the audience's reverence for the conductor gave the impression that an important landmark has been reached in the career of this great orchestra. As a matter of fact, the program notes revealed that Dr. Koussevitsky's idea is that Tanglewood should take the place of the Salzburg Mozart festivals which the war has discontiuued.

Significant Celebration

Dr. Koussevitsky was 70 years old last Wednesday. It is significant that the music of Mozart should be chosen to celebrate the occasion. One might perhaps have expected the dramatic utterances of Tschaikowsky or other Russians to whom the conductor is particularly devoted.

The term "ovation" does not fully describe the response to tonight's performances. Quite part from the affection which this Tanglewod audience clearly demonstrated for the veteran conductor, the fact remains that Mozart's music, in its sheer simplicity of beauty, has never ceased to be highly exciting.

Dr. Koussevitsky's concept of Mozart eradicates every mannerism and affectation that would mar in any way the essential purity of the composer's style. This was not achieved as the evening progressed, but virtually from the first theme of the "Allegro Moderato" movement or the "Symphony in A Major."

35 in Orchestra

The orchestra was happily depleted from its original size to 35 members, to conform with the authentic orchestra of Mozart's day. Although this early work is filled with contrivances that might well appear naive with less skillful treatment, the absolute tonal unit, and extraordinary concise rhythms gave eloquence to the interpretation. The "Menuetto" movement abounded in spontaneous "joie de vivre" that has been excelled, in the opinion of this reviewer, only by some performances of similar Haydn movements that have remained undimmed recollection of classic perfection.

The unusual but tonally agreeable combination of strings and two horns were represented by the "Divertimento in B-flat Major." As we have many times stated without reservation, the Boston Symphony strings produce a tone for which there is no rival. Of the six movements played, the outstanding were the "Andante Grazioso" which demonstrated extraordinary technical velocity and precision, and the "Adagio" which interrupted the program for an ovation. The two horn players, Willem Valkenier and Walter MacDonald, met the challenge of their difficult score with brilliance.

Miss Maynor Sincere

Miss Maynor was heard in three recitatives and arias from "Il Re Pastore" and the "Magic Flute." There were obligatos by violinist Richard Burgin and pianist Bernard Zighera. On every occasion when we have heard Miss Maynor, we have been impressed with the intelligence of her interpretations. That she is a meticulous artist is unquestioned. Her tone, although not of unprecedented warmth, is clear, accurate, and rich.

However, her approach to the classic style is that of the academician and not the soulful singer. We are basing this opinion on the conviction that Mozart's arias were profoundly human utterances from which the personal element can not be disassociated.

One must, nevertheless, credit Miss Maynor with being a truly sincere classic exponent even if limitedly moving.

Tomorrow afternoon's concert will feature Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, duo-pianists who are to be heard at the Worcester music festival in October.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 31 1944

Hub Orchestra Opens Series of Mozart Concerts

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, returned to Tanglewood, at Lenox, this weekend for the first two of a series of four concerts in a Mozart festival.

Rain and thunder brought an interruption of more than a half hour in yesterday afternoon's program, but failed to dampen the enthusiasm of the capacity audience for the music which preceded and followed the pause.

The last two concerts in the series will be presented Saturday night and Sunday afternoon at the small shell on the Tanglewood grounds.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 31 1944

Thunder, Lightning, Rain Interrupt Berkshire Concert

Lenox, Mass., July 30—(AP)—Serge Koussevitsky and the weather man broke today. Thunder, lightning and the roar of a Berkshire hills cloudburst stopped the second of four Mozart concerts which this summer substitutes for the large and elaborate Berkshire Symphonic festival.

Dr. Koussevitsky and 38 musicians who compose his orchestra for the festival had completed a performance of the "Haffner" symphony and Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff were well into the first movement of the E flat concerto for two pianos when the storm struck.

Although the thin-roofed opera hall vibrated as if a thousand tympani players were at work, both orchestra and soloists continued through the second movement and had commenced the last, when Dr. Koussevitsky, without stopping the music, turned to the audience and called an intermission.

Thus the audience was provided a dividend since the slow movement, one of the finest in all Mozart, had been almost drowned out and was repeated after the storm.

It is unusual for the Lenox-Stockbridge neighborhood to experience delays and unscheduled intermissions in its music festival. Dr. Koussevitsky has enjoyed phenomenal cooperation from the weatherman. His luck resumed tonight when the evening concert progressed without interruption.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

JUL 31 1944

Tanglewood Concerts Open

Hundreds of music lovers went to Tanglewood yesterday to hear one of the biggest musical events on the East Coast this season.

They paid homage to two men, separated by a century and a half, whom the majority have recognized as the most qualified musicians of their times: Mozart and Serge Koussevitzky, the latter celebrating his 70th birthday this year.

The Mozart Festival, presented last weekend and next, is the first music to be heard at Tanglewood in two years. For the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky chose the best men from his Boston Symphony Orchestra, picked the country's ace soloists and packed off to the Berkshires with the scores of Mozart's representative works.

Guest artists were Luboshutz and Nemenoff, playing the two-piano concerto (k 365) with the G minor and "Haffner" symphonies and the "Titus" overture. The two pianists played excellently, competing with a thunderstorm.

Next week's artists will be Ruth Posselt and Robert Casadesus.—J. C.

GALVESTON, TEXAS
NEWS

JUL 30 1944

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, celebrated his 70th birthday the other day. In an interview he stated his belief that "music can save the world." In fact, he extended his remarks about this philosophy to a proposal for an international music festival to insure the success of the next world peace conference.

The idea has, we believe, considerable merit. We have spoken before of the power music can exert for good in our lives, if we will only let it. Great progress has been made in the therapeutic use of music and Dr. Leake indicated in this department last May that music would be piped into all private rooms and wards in new buildings at John Sealy Hospital.

One unfortunate effect which music has is its ability to inspire a great deal of nonsense when its advocates set forth to explain it. This, we believe, is responsible for keeping it out of the lives of many people, particularly because so much of this nonsense, written with the best of intention, gives an entirely false impression of the nature of music.

It is good to read Dr. Koussevitsky's cheerful statement that "music can save the world." There is nothing new in the theory of music as a political force, or even as an instrument for the expression of political dogma. Ancient writers also recognized, and sometimes feared, the insidious power of music. Plato banned new music from his republic. He said quite bluntly that "styles of music are never disturbed without affecting the most important political institutions."

It isn't unlikely that there will be national musical festivals in the United States following the war. We shall certainly be ready to sing and to rejoice in our victory. We should like to see Texas have a music festival of its own at that time. Why not in Galveston? We believe the city ideally situate for such an event and, certainly, the state has a plentitude of fine musicians to contribute their art. For the rest, let Galveston have more music in its community life as a matter of course.

We wonder why the municipal band so consistently follows a pattern in its thrice-weekly programs? There is very little offered that is new, and many of the compositions date well back to the early years of this century. We refer, especially, to popular numbers. We do not mean to imply that such music should not be played, but we do think that Mr. Stella would enhance the reputation of his band if he played more recent compositions by contemporary composers.

These compositions we offer as suggestions. There are many others whose names are readily available. For a starter we suggest Wanda Landowska's "Liberation Fanfare"; Samuel Barber's "Commando March"; Erik Leidsen's overture "Springtime"; Vaughn Williams' "Toccata Marziale" and English Folklore Suite; Tschaikovsky's "Marche Militaire"; Holtz's First Suite for band and Weinberger's "Homage to the Pioneers." Any one of these compositions, all written especially for band, would be a welcome addition to his programs which have, we suggest, become rather hackneyed. It should be worth a trial. We believe the audience would demand more. da capo al segno . . . tgR.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

JUL 31 1944

CRITICAL and AMUSEMENT

—Blom—

HEARD AND OVERHEARD

On Warnow and Koussevitzky

A recent column about Mark Warnow who was criticizing Serge Koussevitzky for criticizing Warnow ~~now for hiring~~ the composer David Diamond as a Hit Parade violinist, has drawn protest of sorts from Eugene V. Epstein, of Port Washington. He says:

Koussevitzky

"No conductor in this world has devoted so much time and thought to the young generation of composers . . . as Dr. Koussevitzky.

"I am sure that no composer, no real musician is so mercenary as to expect a living from a symphony orchestra or from anyone else. The living must come from his very soul.

"If he is a true musician his music will be heard in time."

I think, Mr. Epstein, it's a question of theory versus fact. Unless he has a patron, or independent means, most composers, have to work for a living. It may be regrettable—in an ideal world the government would subsidize him—but that's the way things are here and now. Warnow says, and I agree, that symphony conductors actually do very little for struggling young composers; the fee paid for first performance rights is usually very small, $100 or perhaps even less.

In Diamond's case, Warnow pays him enough to keep him going; at his own expense he rehearses Diamond's work, so the composer knows what it is like.

Cash vs. Credit

In short, the symphony conductor gives Diamond a lot of honor, but little cash; Warnow says he is there with practical and essential help. (If Diamond himself wants to get into the argument his views will be welcomed.)

Nor is Diamond the only young composer who has found a benefactor in Warnow. Mark is now employing four other composers:

Warnow

John Klein, 27, of Philadelphia; studied under Hindemith and Stravinsky; won a scholarship to the Mozart Academy in Austria in 1935; has just sold six orchestral and 12 smaller works to a New York publisher; discharged from the Army last December for medical reasons. Warnow hired him as arranger.

Walter Mourant, 33, of Chicago; has a master's degree from Eastman School of Music; won fellowships there and at Juilliard; has been a copyist for Warnow about five years; one orchestral work published, a suite just finished; several of his works have been performed by the Rochester Philharmonic and the NBC Symphony [illegible] bus, O., now in the Coast Guard was professor of music at Ohio State University, got tired of teaching, and Warnow hired him; composed original music for March of Time and Helen Hayes' radio programs.

Herbert Paulson, 25, winner of a number of scholarships, is now a copyist and general assistant.

Nat Novick, with Warnow about a year as viola player, won a Philharmonic-Symphony Society prize several years ago with his Russian Sketches.

As with Diamond, these composers hear their work rehearsed and performed by Warnow's orchestra, at Warnow's expense.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At New England Mutual Hall last evening the Boston Symphony began a second season of concerts for chamber orchestra, four pairs now instead of seven, as was the case a year ago. The opening pair, the second concert of which takes place tonight, has been entrusted to Bernard Zighera, who fashioned a singularly adroit programme that covered various styles and schools. So far as performance was concerned the outcome was generally successful.

It was a happy thought to contrast Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 (for strings) with Mozart's C minor Serenade for paired oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons. Something of a rarity in our concert halls, the Serenade is delightful Mozart and it was exquisitely played last evening by the Symphony virtuosi.

The alliteration was probably accidental, but Mozart was followed by Mahler and Martinu. The former's "Kindertotenlieder," freely translatable as "Songs on the Death of Children," was performed for the second time in this city, now with Mary Davenport, contralto, as the soloist. Martinu's Three Ricercari were given here for the first time, with Rita La Plante and Leo Litwin as the assisting pianists. Not yet has Boston heard an adequate performance of the "Kindertotenlieder." That of last evening was irreparably ruined by Miss Davenport's complete incompetence. The Martinu piece proved thoroughly delightful.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 31 1944

Capacity Audience Hears Concert at Tanglewood

By VICTOR PRAHL

The second concert of the Mozart festival, directed by Serge Koussevitzky with the assistance ~~of mem~~bers of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in the Opera-Concert hall of Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood. Another capacity audience larger even than that at the opening concert on the night before, filled every available seat in the auditorium, as well as numerous rows on the stage behind the orchestra, and the benches in the tent, which was erected in front of the hall. Although the sides of the hall are not open as in the larger shed, all of the entrance and exit doors were kept open, allowing the sound to carry well into the outer yard.

Program Announced

The Symphony in D major, written expressly for the Haffner family of Salzburg during his second year in Vienna, when Mozart was 26, served as the opening number. This bright, cheerful work, a marked contrast to the Symphony in A major, No 29, which opened the preceding concert, was given an energetic performance in the best Mozart style. The fourth movement, "Finale: Presto," taken at a breathtaking tempo, provided an exciting experience and the first violin section again distinguished itself as a virtuoso-ensemble in its clean-cut precision.

The master's concerto in E flat major for two pianos, the best known and most played work in the repertoire for this combination of instruments, was given a sensitive reading by Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff. Their delicate style becomes the music of Mozart and the echoing passages of the "Allegro," the tonal balance of the "Andante" and the sparkling clarity of the runs in the final "Rondo" might have emanated from one player, so perfect was the ensemble.

Storm Breaks

The two pianists had just struck the final chords of the first movement of the concerto when dark clouds, which had been gathering for some time, broke into such a mighty downpour of rain that it would have been futile for them to have continued with the quiet second movement, so Dr Koussevitzky sat down for about five minutes until the storm had somewhat subsided. Even so, the accompaniment of the celestial tympani and the noise of the rain on the roof spoiled the performance. After starting the introduction of the final movement, Dr Koussevitzky stopped the orchestra and announced that they would continue after intermission. This was done, much to the satisfaction of the audience. Naturally, there was much applause after the artists finished the concerto and they were recalled a number of times. Then followed the seldom heard Overture to the opera "La Clemenza do Tito" and the program closed with one of Mozart's three greatest symphonies, that in G minor, No 40 (K. 550).

Written Within Six Weeks

Incredible as it may seem, these three symphonies (the other two, the E-flat major, No. 39, and the C major, "Jupiter," No. 41, will be played at next week's concerts) as well as a group of other compositions, were written within a period of six weeks, June 26 to August 10, 1788, during one of the most distressing years of Mozart's life. This symphony must be a favorite with Dr Koussevitzky, for he performs it often, giving it a personal interpretation of intimacy and warmth. If the tempo of the opening movement is slower than that of some other conductors, in this instance, it seems more appropriate. At the close of the concert, enthusiasm ran high and the audience brought the conductor back repeatedly.

The two final concerts of the series will take place Saturday night at 8.30, when Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be soloist and, on Sunday afternoon at 3.30, when Robert Casadesus will play the "Coronation" Concerto, No. 26, for piano and orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 31 1944

TANGLEWOOD HAS RECESS AFTER ONE OF TWO SHOWERS

Storm Interrupts Second Mozart Festival, Attended by Record Crowd—Theater Roof Leaks

Tanglewood, Lenox, July 30—Showers, with thunder, lightning and rain pattering on the Tanglewood theater roof interrupted this afternoon the second Mozart festival concert given by a 35-piece Boston Symphony orchestra. The half-hour delay occurred during the second number in the concerto in E-flat major for two pianos and orchestra. After waiting for 15 minutes in vain for a rain let-up Dr Serge Koussevitzky ~~declared~~ an early recess. The storm recalled an August night in 1937, when the Berkshire Symphonic festival was being held under a tent at Tanglewood and Wagner had to capitulate to the storm king.

Many Persons Drenched

This afternoon, a second shower, less severe than the first, just started at the conclusion of the final number and many were drenched before they reached their cars. Some waited in the theater for half an hour, when the sun shone again. Ward E. Gaston, Tanglewood superintendent, said there were exactly 412 cars in the parking areas this afternoon. Although the grounds were oozy, not an automobile was stalled.

Willard M. Sistare, chief usher, estimated the crowd at 2200. Every seat in the theater was taken with 240 back of the orchestra on the stage and 800 in the outdoor audience, many of whom were protected under a tent. Others crowded into the back of the theater when the shower broke.

Roof Leaks

This theater is ultramodern, a sort of surrealist type of architecture and the roof leaked this afternoon in at least two places. Canon Anson Phelps almost felt the impact of drops in his seat near the center. He was accompanied by Mrs Stokes and Rt Rev James De Wolf Perry, Protestant Episcopal bishop of Rhode Island, and Mrs Perry.

Has Homey Appearance

Sheathed in natural pine, the walls and ceiling of Tanglewood present a homey appearance. There are no boxes and no gallery. The auditorium has just the proper slope toward the stage. The individual metal chairs, with leather bottoms, rest on impacted coarse gravel. The acoustics, designed by Harvard experts, are perfect. George E. Judd, Boston symphony manager, had a sanopy stretched from the main theater entrance to Mr Gaston's home driveway. Traffic was directed at the main Tanglewood entrance on West street by State Patrolman Chester Sarmuk of Lee and Deputy Sheriff Fred N. Cummings was in charge of the excellent parking arrangements.

Dr Koussevitzky was the honored guest at a dinner given tonight by Mrs Carlos M. De Heredia at Wheatleigh.

With Lieut-Comdr John D. Kennedy, USN, and Mrs Kennedy were Commodore Frederick G. Reinicke and Mrs Reinicke, in whose honor the Kennedys entertained today at luncheon at Stonover farm.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 31 1944

Famous Duo-Pianists Heard at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 30.—The second of the Mozart festival concerts was given this afternoon at Tanglewood. A capacity audience again appeared to do homage to Serge Koussevitzky, who is celebrating his 70th anniversary, and to the 35 members of the Boston Symphony. The soloists were the celebrated duo-pianists, Genia Nemenoff and Pierre Luboshutz.

The elements evidently wanted to contribute to the occasion, for as the pianists finished the first movement of the "Concerto in E-Flat," there was a terrific downpour, accompanied by some particularly heavy percussion from above which temporarily halter the concert. The pianists remained at their instruments while Dr. Koussevitsky found a comfortable chair on the stage. After an intermission of ten minutes the concerto was resumed, but throughout the slow, gentle "Andante" the audience patiently strained to hear what they could in spite of the persistent but diminishing roof staccato. However, after a few bars of the final "Rondo," the conductor abruptly called an intermission until the accoustics were more conducive to the transmission of the lacy score. All of which might cast some doubt upon the advisability on holding concerts in comparatively open country auditoriums. Judging from the patience and determination with which the situation was handled any such doubts might well be dismissed.

Skilled Orchestra

The Mozart "Concerto" was playe two Summers ago by Nemenoff and Luboshutz at Tanglewood. On that occasion the performance took place in the vast open air arena and the orchestra was the admirable but comparatively limited student orchestra. This afternoon, the orchestra was composed of 35 skilled players—the exact Mozart requirement.

One of the many remarkable gifts of these, the world's outstanding duo-pianists is their adaptitude to virtually all schools of composition. In their many Worcester concerts, their repertory has ranged from the polyphony of Bach to the cacophony of Stravinsky.

Today's score was in many respects their most exacting. The delicate and filigree phrases, the unfettered technical fragments, and the sharp demand for a pure, singing tone, allow no compromise with crystal-clear rendition. With their ingenuity for Mozart style and spirit, supported by an orchestra and conductor that acquiesced to every inflection, the ovation they received is easily explained. Incidentally, the second movement was repeated when they resumed the work for the third and last time.

Concluding Symphonies

The symphonies chosen were of a more mature period than at last night's concert. They were the "Symphony in C Major" ("Haffner"), and the familiar "Symphony in G Minor" No. 40. The first of these, although a miniature of some of the later extensive ones, nevertheless, is filled with technical and tonal advantages. The sole theme of the first movement was sustained in interest through its many repetitions by subtle interpretive contrasts. The middle section of the "Menuetto" was tonal perftion, and the final "Rondo" brought the work to a close in a rush of good spirits. The program was completed with the overture to the opera "La Clemenza Di Tito."

The two remaining concerts will be given next Saturday night, Aug. 5, at which Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be soloist. Robert Casadesus, pianist, will play the "Concerto in D Major" ("Coronation Concerto"), at the concluding concert Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6. Although all seats within the auditorium have been sold, there will be admission tickets for those who wish to listen from outside.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

JUL 31 1944

Concert Interrupted By Storm

Lenox, Mass., July 31—(AP)—Serge Koussevitsky and the weather man broke yesterday. Thunder, lightning and the roar of a Berkshire hills cloudburst stopped the second of four Mozart concerts which this summer substitutes for the large and elaborate Berkshire Symphonic festival.

Dr. Koussevitsky and 38 musicians who compose his orchestra for the festival had completed a performance of the "Haffner" symphony and Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff were well into the first movement of the E flat concerto for two pianos when the storm struck.

Although the thin-roofed opera hall vibrated as if a thousand tympani players were at work, both orchestra and soloists continued through the second movement and had commenced the last, when Dr. Koussevitsky, without stopping the music, turned to the audience and called an intermission.

Thus the audience was provided a dividend since the slow movement, one of the finest in all Mozart, had been almost drowned out and was repeated after the storm.

It is unusual for the Lenox-Stockbridge neighborhood to experience delays and unscheduled intermissions in its music festival. Dr. Koussevitsky has enjoyed phenomenal cooperation from the weatherman. His luck resumed last night when the evening concert progressed without interruption.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 2 - 1944

Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, who celebrated ~~his 70th birthday~~ at Lenox, Mass., last week suggested an international music festival to be held in conjunction with the world peace conference. "If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

"The artistic temperament is a disease that afflicts amateurs", according to G. K. Chesterton.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 5 - 1944

Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

The Mozart Festival, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky at Tanglewood, Mass., will come to its conclusion tomorrow afternoon with a concert in which Robert Casadesus will be soloist in the "Coronation" Concerto. The soloist this evening will be Ruth Posselt, violinist. The orchestra personnel, as at the two concerts last week end, will be drawn from the Boston Symphony. The festival is in observance of Mr. Koussevitsky's seventieth birthday.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 2 - 1944

The Mozart festival which Dr Sergei Koussevitzky is conducting at ~~Tanglewood, Stockbridge~~, Mass., is presenting Ruth Posselt, violinist, as soloist this Saturday night and Robert Casadesus, pianist, as soloist on Sunday afternoon. The programs follow:

Saturday evening, Aug. 5, at 8:30:

Symphony in G minor, (No. 25, K. 183); allegro con brio; andante; menuetto; allegro.

Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, (No. 4, K. 218); allegro; andante cantabile; rondo: andante grazioso; soloist, Ruth Posselt.

Intermission.

Overture to "Idomeneo, Re di Creta," K. 366. Symphony in E-flat major, (No. 39, K. 543); adagio: allegro; andante con moto; menuetto: allegretto; finale: allegro.

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6, at 3:30:

Serenade ("Nacht Musique") in C minor, for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons, K. 388: allegro; andante; menuetto in Canone; allegro.

Concerto in D major for piano and orchestra ("Coronation Concerto"), (No. 26, K. 537): allegro; larghetto; allegretto; soloist, Robert Casadesus.

Intermission.

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (Serenade for Strings), in G major, K. 525; allegro; romanze: andante; menuetto, allegretto; rondo: allegro.

Symphony in C major ("Jupiter"), (No. 41, K. 551): allegro vivace; andante cantabile; menuetto: allegro; molto allegro.

There is definitely a movement toward revival of interest in the more intimate type of chamber music which was so popular in the 18th century. Modern composition is away from the larger orchestral forms and towards small ensembles. Much of the interesting writing which has had a hearing in recent years has been of this type. There are probably many factors which are contributing to this tendency—so many players being taken by the armed forces, high rates for union players, etc., but whatever the reason, it is an interesting development.

99

LAWRENCE, MASS.
IAGLE

1 1944

Eddie Reebenacher Is the Man Behind And in Front of the Festival Scenes

Stage Manager Of Orchestra Has Many Jobs

Introducing Eddie Reebenacher, stage manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who does more tugging and hauling at Tanglewood during a Festival concert than the average professional wrestler does in a season.

One of the most indispensable persons at Tanglewood this week at the Mozart Festival is Edward Reebenacher, stage manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To Tanglewood audiences he is a familiar figure of a man (he has the build of Bull Montana). His virtuosity in his field, however, was not generally realized until Sunday. Then, because the rain made necessary an intermission not called for in the program, Eddie had to rearrange alone the entire stage, including two grand pianos and 35 chairs, and music stands and the conductor's podium while an audience of over a thousand people waited for the next work.

In due respect to the tradition of Boston gentility, Eddie did not so much as remove his coat during his virtuoso performance as the entire Mozart audience sympathetically watched him steam. He accomplished the feat in four minutes flat.

Mr. Reebenacher, known to members of the orchestra and staff as Eddie Rickenbacker, as just Eddie, has been with the symphony for 17 years and is behind the scenes of every concert moving music stands, instruments, trunks, platforms, chairs and, of course, grand pianos, which he does with a touch of artistic power which befits his environment. He even acts as interference when over-enthusiastic autograph hunters try to crash the green room.

Although the Tanglewood Festivals and the Berkshire Music School means work, and many headaches for him, he says he would rather have them than not. He likes the activity and does not mind working from 7.30 to 11 some nights, or even once or twice all night, before an opera performance. The Mozart Festival, he says, is for him like playing marbles, compared to the work connected with the school and festivals in the ned.

rved Overseas

Before Eddie was appointed to e that everything runs smoothly ckstage, he was a painter at mphony Hall. Born in Arling- n, was in France for 23 months World War I, enlisting when he s 15 in the 104th Infantry, 26th vision, the first regiment ever be decorated by a foreign na- n, which was France. Often said be the youngest member of the F, he was in many major engagements, including the 2d Marne, St. Mihel and Meuse Argonne. He lives in Ashland, with his wife and six-month-old son.

When asked his opinion of musicians he smiled and said, "Some times I dislike some of the things they do, but more often I like them. It is fascinating to work for them. Of course, sometimes they make impossible requests and ask foolish questions, but I get along with them."

At the mention of Dr. Koussevitzky's name he said, "I don't believe I should ever be happy working for any other conductor. To me he is the only conductor. I am not trying to plug the boss either," he added.

Knows Good From Bad

When asked if he had learned anything about music in 17 years he says cryptically: "I believe I have learned to distinguish between the good and the bad."

Eddie's season is a long one, taking in the eight months of the Boston season, including trips to Cambridge, Providence and six weeks on tour, the Pops concerts, which are held every night for 70 nights, and now the Esplanade concerts on the Charles River. His duties include stage arrangements for many soloists and guest conductors, as well as the 100-piece orchestra.

While at Tanglewood he lives in the house, using "Lizzie's room," he says, which is true, for on the door is the name of the maid who occupied it when it was the summer home of the Tappen family. He looking forward to spending summers there again as soor the war is over.

LIMA, OHIO
NEWS

OCT 3 - 1944

o o o

END OF POLITICAL FREE-LUNCH

VICE PRESIDENT WALLACE'S speech at Madison Square Garden the other night may have overshadowed a turning point in the history of American politics. The immediate cause of this turning point is not readily apparent. Perhaps it was Mr. Wallace's personal popularity. Perhaps it was the presence and performance of such notables as Sinclair Lewis, Serge Koussevitzky, Bette Davis, Fredric March and Orson Welles—jointly or severally.

But whatever the reason, the epoch-making fact remains that 22,000 people paid from 55 cents to $2.40 for the privilege of being told how wrong they were in case they favored Mr. Dewey, or of having their choice complimented and reaffirmed if for Mr. Roosevelt.

Recalling the free drinks, free cigars, free compacts for the ladies, free kisses for the babies, and other more substantial largess that has characterized every other presidential campaign, it can only be concluded that the political millennium must have arrived.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

AUG 1 - 1944

Mozart Program at Berkshire Resort Stresses Quality, Charm

By Jay Clarke
News Drama-Music-Art Critic

LENNOX, Mass.—For anyone ic, with bus or train fare, and orthwhile to go out of one's way Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, it erience of the first order.

with a taste for superlative music with a weekend free, it is not only to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's is a rewarding

Here in this famous Berkshire music resort the war has truncated the long and varied program that used to feature the summer season, and last summer there was not festival at all. This year, however, Dr. Koussevitzky has scheduled an abbreviated program devoted to all-Mozart, and extending over two weekends. The first program was presented Saturday and Sunday and the last will be held next week.

PRODUCES COMPARISON

Working with an orchestra of less than 40 pieces, ideal for Mozart, the doctor has stinted on neither craftsmanship nor inspiration. He has, in fact, produced a standard of comparison.

His orchestra is comprised of the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while there can be little criticism of what they have done, of appreciation there can be no end.

Ordinarily one might expect that two full programs of all-Mozart might become a bit trying. Indeed it might, under a lesser conductor or with a lesser orchestra, but by careful selection of his program Dr. Koussevitzky has mirrored many facts of the composer's genius, and has presented a program that is both varied and well-rounded.

AVOIDS THE MECHANICAL

Keeping his interpretation light and graceful, he has succeeded in avoiding making Mozart sound mechanical or prefunctory. He has brought out the fullness of the human quality of the music, as well as its charm. This department has never heard the music so fully interpreted before, not even by Walter or Beecham, who are pretty good too, when it comes right down to it.

Musically, the program is a triumph.

As far as attendance is concerned, while all but the most expensive seats in the Concert Hall on the Tanglewood grounds, have been sold out, one may be admitted to the grounds for a nominal fee, and there spread a blanket on the grass and hear the program in the open air, a delight in itself.

Although the noise of thunder halted Sunday's program briefly, rain is no problem for those outside because the management has thoughtfully provided large canvas canopies near the entrances where people on the outside may sit and listen.

ON NEXT WEEK'S

Next week's program will include, on Saturday evening, the Symphony No. 25 in G Minor, Concerto No. 4 in D Major for violin and orchestra, Overture to "Idomento, King of Crete," and Symphony No. 39 in E. Flat Major. Ruth Posselt will be violin soloist.

Sunday afternoon the program will be the Serenade in C Minor for two oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons, Coronation Concerto for piano and orchestra, the popular Eine Kleine Nachtmusic, and the widely famous Jupiter Symphony in C Major. Piano soloist will be Robert Casadesus.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 1 - 1944

BUT NOT ENOUGH CHARMS

Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, is reported to have said on his 70th birthday that music will insure the success of the next world peace conference.

He said the harmonizing influence of music would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles.

Said he, "If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference and if other nations would do likewise, we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There is no doubt that music hath charms—but not enough, we think, to prevent a group of peace conferees from wrangling among themselves making deals secretly, and what's more, returning home in a huff, if they've a mind to. However much the delegates might enjoy listening to "Largo," "To a Wild Rose" or even perchance to "Mairzy Doats," it's likely they would be at each others' throats with the same old enthusiasm born of national pride.

And has Dr. Koussevitsky considered the fact some of the world's best music was the brainchild of Germans? That ought to have made Germans the most "restful, peaceful and joyous" people on earth. But it didn't.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD
AUG 2 - 1944

Music News And Views

By ROGER S. VREELAND

KOUSSEVITZKY FINDS LITTLE EMOTION IN MODERN MUSIC

I should like to avoid any erudite entanglement over the definition of emotion. One can think of the simple feelings of pleasure, jealousy, sadness, and so forth, that even a dog is heir to; or of the deeper flights of mind and heart that the human being knows. Either will suffice to leave the way clear for comment on Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's unusual confession.

"I can find little emotion in modern music," said the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the country's outstanding champion of modern music, especially American music. "The bes of it sounds very well as music, i beautifully written. But try as I have, I can find very little emotion in it. Perhaps other conductors can." The quotation is from an interview by Cyrus W. Durgin of the Boston Globe, in an article in the Victor Record Review.

To those of the school of mus appreciation who consider the emo tional value of music one of i chief ingredients, this leaves th position of modern music very pre carious. The emotional content music isn't a matter of superfici sentiment in the melodic lin grandiose dynamics, or luscio tional music is that in which the i tional music is that where the i trinsic quality is carried in an i tellectual plane, as found in mus of Bach and Brahms. Not that intellectual music has emotior content. Music can be scholar clever, and still be dull, unmovi

But there are those who believe (and I am among them) that the prime object of serious composition should be to stir emotions. Therefore if we accept Dr. Koussevitzky's verdict (it isn't really a verdict, but an opinion), modern music is quite useless.

"American music," Dr. Koussevitzky was quoted as saying, "can be said to be in its third generation. The first included such men as Edward MacDowell, George Chadwi and Arthur Foote. Between the and the next generation, Edwa Burlingame Hill is a connecting link. The outstanding men of America's second musical generation are Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roger Sessions, and Roy Harris. Now we have a third young generation led by William Schuman, David Diamond, and Nicolai Berezowsky.

"Styles in American composition have changed enormously since I first came to Boston in 1924. The technique has developed so that now men like Copland and Piston possess the highest, most universal technique of writing."

It is no one's province to suggest that Dr. Koussevitzky didn't mean to condemn modern music as completely as he seemed to. Perhaps the emotional quality of music isn't as essential to his appreciation, yet knowing his stature as an artist, that is hard to understand. He made his frank statement, we are told, with the smiling simplicity and the honesty of a great artist with a vast knowledge and understanding of musical evolution. Certainly he doesn't champion modern music merely as a polite gesture.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 2 - 1944

Festival Concerts Are Again Sold Out

Hundreds of Music Lovers Expected at Tanglewood This Week-End — Celebrated Violinist to Play.

With all seats sold for the final concerts of the Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, hundreds of music lovers are expected to listen this week-end from the grounds surrounding the opera-concert hall where Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the opening concerts last week-end the hall was filled, including 240 stage seats, and despite the rain on Sunday many enjoyed the music from benches on the lawns, continuing a Berkshire Festival custom.

Ruth Posselt, celebrated violinist, who played with the orchestra in the Berkshire Festival days, will appear at the Saturday concert, and at the Sunday matinee Robert Casadesus, the French pianist, will be heard.

The program Saturday evening, at 8.30 will be as follows: Symphony in G Minor, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D Major, Overture to "Idomeneo, Re di Creta," and Symphony in E-flat Major.

The program for Sunday afternoon at 3.30 follows: Serenade ("Nacht Musique") in C Minor, for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Concerto in D Major for piano and ochestra ("Coronation Concerto"); "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (Serenade for Strings) in G Major; Symphony in C Major ("Jupiter").

Admission to the grounds, where the music can be heard clearly and the musicians seen through the open doors, will be on sale from noon of each concert day, at the box office.

WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER

AUG 4 - 1944

MUSIC HATH CHARMS

"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," so the suggestion of Dr. Serrge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that an international music festival be arranged as a sedative for peace conference disputes, should be interesting in this section favored by Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra's harmony.

Koussevitzky could select the music that would quiet a raging lion, but with so many factions trying to slip an oar into the peace conference boat the question is whether the jazz band brigades would yield him full sway. Music's charms have been conceded since even before the boy David's harp lulled to sleep the troubled King Saul of Israel. But, remembering that once the king was displeased and hurled his spear at the youth—thus setting the pace for modern disapproval—music's infallibility, so lauded by the Boston leader, may be discounted.

If the delegates tryin gto form a peace preserving association should meaningfully sing, "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," it might have international effect; but if a more majestic production only lulled them into inactive contentment, the scene would be set for some smoke-filled room sessions beyond reach of music and its charms.

[100]

ts ood rt festival con-

A capacity auussevitzky, who 35 members of celebrated duo-was in many ret exacting. The ree phrases, the nical fragments,

mand for a pure,
ow no compro-
tal-clear rendi-ingenuity for spirit, support-tra and conduced to every ination they re-explained. In-econd movement when they refor the third and Symphonies

es chosen were e period than at ert. They were in C Major" d the familiar
G Minor" No. 40.
hese, although a me of the later nevertheless, is nical and tonal
e sole theme of nt was sustained ough its many subtle interpre-
The middle secnuetto" was tonal
e final "Rondo" k to a close in a pirits. The propleted with the opera "La Clem-maining concerts next Saturday at which Ruth t, will be solo-sadesus, pianist,

"Concerto in D ation Concerto"),
g concert Sunday
6. Although all auditorium have will be admis-those who wish outside.

ECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

- 1944

rt festival which Dr ssevitzky is conducting idge, Mass.,
Ruth Posselt, violin-st this Saturday night
Casadesus, pianist, as Sunday afternoon. The llow:
evening, Aug. 5, at 8:30:
in G minor, (No. 25,
egro con brio; andante;
llegro.
for violin and orchestra
(No. 4, K. 218); allegro;
ntabile; rondo: andante
loist, Ruth Posselt. on:
to "Idomeneo, Re di
366. Symphony in E-flat
39, K. 543); adagio: al-nte con moto; menuetto:
finale: allegro.
fternoon, Aug. 6, at 3:30:
("Nacht Musique") in C wo oboes, two clarinets, nd two bassoons, K. 388:
lante; menuetto in Can-o.
in D major for piano stra ("Coronation Con-
o. 26, K. 537): allegro;
allegretto; soloist, Rob-sus.
ion.
eine Nachtmusik" (Ser-Strings), in G major, K.
o; romanze: andante;
allegretto; rondo: alley in C major ("Jupiter"), 551): allegro vivace; an-abile; menuetto: allegro;

ro.

defintiely a movement vival of interest in the mate type of chamber h was so popular in the ry. Modern composition om the larger orchestral towards small ensembles.
the interesting writing had a hearing in recent been of this type. There bly many factors which uting to this tendency—ayers being taken by the es, high rates for union
, but whatever the rea-an interesting develop-

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

Eddie Reebenacher Is the Man Behind And in Front of the Festival Scenes

Stage Manager Of Orchestra Has Many Jobs

Introducing Eddie Reebenacher, stage manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who does more tugging and hauling at Tanglewood during a Festival concert than the average professional wrestler does in a season.

One of the most indispensable persons at Tanglewood this week at the Mozart Festival is Edward Reebenacher, stage manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To Tanglewood audiences he is a familiar figure of a man (he has the build of Bull Montana). His virtuosity in his field, however, was not generally realized until Sunday. Then, because the rain made necessary an intermission not called for in the program, Eddie had to rearrange alone the entire stage, including two grand pianos and 33 chairs and music stands and the conductor's podium while an audience of over a thousand people waited for the next work.

In due respect to the tradition of Boston gentility, Eddie did not so much as remove his coat during his virtuoso performance as the entire Mozart audience sympathetically watched him steam. He accomplished the feat in four minutes flat.

Mr. Reebenacher, known to members of the orchestra and staff as Eddie Rickenbacker, as just Eddie, has been with the symphony for 17 years and is behind the scenes of every concert moving music stands, instruments, trunks, platforms, chairs and, of course, grand pianos, which he does with a touch of artistic power which befits the environment. He even acts as interference when over-enthusiastic autograph hunters try to crash the green room.

Although the Tanglewood Festivals and the Berkshire Music School means work, and many headaches for him, he says he would rather have them than not. He likes the activity and does not mind working from 7.30 to 11 some nights, or even once or twice all night, before an opera performance. The Mozart Festival, he says, is for him like playing marbles, compared to the work connected with the school and festivals in the ned.

erved Overseas

Before Eddie was appointed to e that everything runs smoothly ckstage, he was a painter at mphony Hall. Born in Arlingn, was in France for 23 months World War I, enlisting when he as 15 in the 104th Infantry, 26th vision, the first regiment ever be decorated by a foreign nan, which was France. Often said be the youngest member of the F, he was in many major engagements, including the 2d Marne, St. Mihel and Meuse Argonne. He lives in Ashland, with his wife and six-month-old son.

When asked his opinion of musicians he smiled and said, "Some times I dislike some of the things they do, but more often I like them. It is fascinating to work for them. Of course, sometimes they make impossible requests and ask foolish questions, but I get along with them."

At the mention of Dr. Koussevitzky's name he said, "I don't believe I should ever be happy working for any other conductor. To me he is the only conductor. I am not trying to plug the boss either," he added.

Knows Good From Bad

When asked if he had learned anything about music in 17 years he says cryptically: "I believe I have learned to distinguish between the good and the bad."

Eddie's season is a long one, taking in the eight months of the Boston season, including trips to Cambridge, Providence and six weeks on tour, the Pops concerts, which are held every night for 70 nights, and now the Esplanade concerts on the Charles River. His duties include stage arrangements for many soloists and guest conductors, as well as the 100-piece orchestra.

While at Tanglewood he lives in the house, using "Lizzie's-room," he says, which is true, for on the door is the name of the maid who occupied it when it was the summer home of the Tappen family. He looking forward to spending summers there again as soon the war is over.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD
AUG 2 - 1944

Music News And Views

By ROGER S. VREELAND

KOUSSEVITZKY FINDS LITTLE EMOTION IN MODERN MUSIC

I should like to avoid any erudite entanglement over the definition of emotion. One can think of the simple feelings of pleasure, jealousy, sadness, and so forth, that even a dog is heir to; or of the deeper flights of mind and heart that the human being knows. Either will suffice to leave the way clear for comment on Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's unusual confession.

"I can find little emotion in modern music," said the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the country's outstanding champion of modern music, especially American music. "The best of it sounds very well as music, is beautifully written. But try as I have, I can find very little emotion in it. Perhaps other conductors can." The quotation is from an interview by Cyrus W. Durgin of the Boston Globe, in an article in the Victor Record Review.

To those of the school of music appreciation who consider the emotional value of music one of its chief ingredients, this leaves the position of modern music very precarious. The emotional content of music isn't a matter of superficial sentiment in the melodic line, grandiose dynamics, or lucio tional music is that in which the i tonal music is that where the i trinsic quality is carried in an i tellectual plane, as found in mus of Bach and Brahms. Not that intellectual music has emotion content. Music can be scholar clever, and still be dull, unmovin But there are those who believe and I am among them) that the prime object of serious composition should be to stir emotions. Therefore if we accept Dr. Koussevitzky's verdict (it isn't really a verdict, but an opinion), modern music is quite useless.

"American music," Dr. Koussevitzky was quoted as saying, "can be said to be in its third generation. The first included such men as Edward MacDowell, George Chadwick and Arthur Foote. Between them and the next generation, Edward Burlingame Hill is a connecting link. The outstanding men of America's second musical generation [illegible] Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roger Sessions, and Roy Harris. Now we have a third young generation led by William Schuman, David Diamond, and Nicolai Berezowsky.

"Styles in American composition have changed enormously since I first came to Boston in 1924. The technique has developed so that now men like Copland and Piston possess the highest, most universal technique of writing."

It is no one's province to suggest that Dr. Koussevitzky didn't mean to condemn modern music as completely as he seemed to. Perhaps the emotional quality of music isn't as essential to his appreciation, yet knowing his stature as an artist, that is hard to understand. He made his frank statement, we are told, with the smiling simplicity and the honesty of a great artist with a vast knowledge and understanding of musical evolution. Certainly he doesn't champion modern music merely as a polite gesture.

on to the grounds, where can be heard clearly and ns seen through the open be on sale from noon of t day, at the box office.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
AUG 2 - 1944

Festival Concerts Are Again Sold Out

Hundreds of Music Lovers Expected at Tanglewood This Week-End — Celebrated Violinist to Play.

With all seats sold for the final concerts of the Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, hundreds of music lovers are expected to listen this week-end from the grounds surrounding the opera-concert hall where Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the opening concerts last week-end the hall was filled, including 240 stage seats, and despite the rain on Sunday many enjoyed the music from benches on the lawns, continuing a Berkshire Festival custom.

Ruth Posselt, celebrated violinist, who played with the orchestra in the Berkshire Festival days, will appear at the Saturday concert, and at the Sunday matinee Robert Casadesus, the French pianist, will be heard.

The program Saturday evening, at 8.30 will be as follows: Symphony in G Minor, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D Major, Overture to "Idomeneo, Re di Creta," and Symphony in E-flat Major.

The program for Sunday afternoon at 3.30 follows: Serenade ("Nacht Musique") in C Minor, for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Concerto in D Major for piano and ochestra ("Coronation Concerto"); "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (Serenade for Strings) in G Major; Symphony in C Major ("Jupiter").

LIMA, OHIO
NEWS
OCT 3 - 1944

o o o

END OF POLITICAL FREE-LUNCH

VICE PRESIDENT WALLACE'S speech at Madison Square Garden the other night may have overshadowed a turning point in the history of American politics. The immediate cause of this turning point is not readily apparent. Perhaps it was Mr. Wallace's personal popularity. Perhaps it was the presence and performance of such notables as Sinclair Lewis, Serge Koussevitzky, Bette Davis, Fredric March and Orson Welles—jointly or severally.

But whatever the reason, the epoch-making fact remains that 22,000 people paid from 55 cents to $2.40 for the privilege of being told how wrong they were in case they favored Mr. Dewey, or of having their choice complimented and reaffirmed if for Mr. Roosevelt.

Recalling the free drinks, free cigars, free compacts for the ladies, free kisses for the babies, and other more substantial largess that has characterized every other presidential campaign, it can only be concluded that the political millennium must have arrived.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
AUG 1 - 1944

BUT NOT ENOUGH CHARMS

Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, is reported to have said on his 70th birthday that music will insure the success of the next world peace conference.

He said the harmonizing influence of music would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles.

Said he, "If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference and if other nations would do likewise, we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There is no doubt that music hath charms—but not enough, we think, to prevent a group of peace conferees from wrangling among themselves making deals secretly, and what's more, returning home in a huff, if they've a mind to. However much the delegates might enjoy listening to "Largo," "To a Wild Rose" or even perchance to "Mairzy Doats," it's likely they would be at each others' throats with the same old enthusiasm born of national pride.

And has Dr. Koussevitsky considered the fact some of the world's best music was the brainchild of Germans? That ought to have made Germans the most "restful, peaceful and joyous" people on earth. But it didn't.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
AUG 1 - 1944

Mozart Program at Berkshire Resort Stresses Quality, Charm

By Jay Clarke
News Drama-Music-Art Critic

LENNOX, Mass.—For anyone with a taste for superlative music, with bus or train fare, and with a weekend free, it is not only worthwhile to go out of one's way to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, it is a rewarding and enriching experience of the first order.

Here in this famous Berkshire music resort the war has truncated the long and varied program that used to feature the summer season, and last summer there was not festival at all. This year, however, Dr. Koussevitsky has scheduled an abbreviated program devoted to all-Mozart, and extending over two weekends. The first program was presented Saturday and Sunday and the last will be held next week.

PRODUCES COMPARISON

Working with an orchestra of less than 40 pieces, ideal for Mozart, the doctor has stinted on neither craftsmanship nor inspiration. He has, in fact, produced a standard of comparison.

His orchestra is comprised of the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while there can be little criticism of what they have done, of appreciation there can be no end.

Ordinarily one might expect that two full programs of all-Mozart might become a bit trying. Indeed it might, under a lesser conductor or with a lesser orchestra, but by careful selection of his program Dr. Koussevitsky has mirrored many facts of the composer's genius, and has presented a program that is both varied and well-rounded.

AVOIDS THE MECHANICAL

Keeping his interpretation light and graceful, he has succeeded in avoiding making Mozart sound mechanical or prefunctory. He has brought out the fullness of the human quality of the music, as well as its charm. This department has never heard the music so fully interpreted before, not even by Walter or Beecham, who are pretty good too, when it comes right down to it.

Musically, the program is a triumph.

As far as attendance is concerned, while all but the most expensive seats in the Concert Hall on the Tanglewood grounds, have been sold out, one may be admitted to the grounds for a nominal fee, and there spread a blanket on the grass and hear the program in the open air, a delight in itself.

Although the noise of thunder halted Sunday's program briefly, rain is no problem for those outside because the management has thoughtfully provided large canvas canopies near the entrances where people on the outside may sit and listen.

ON NEXT WEEK'S

Next week's program will include, on Saturday evening, the Symphony No. 25 in G Minor, Concerto No. 4 in D Major for violin and orchestra, Overture to "Idomento, King of Crete," and Symphony No. 39 in E. Flat Major. Ruth Posselt will be violin soloist.

Sunday afternoon the program will be the Serenade in C Minor for two oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons, Coronation Concerto for piano and orchestra, the popular Eine Kleine Nachtmusic, and the widely famous Jupiter Symphony in C Major. Piano soloist will be Robert Casadesus.

WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER

MUSIC HATH CHARMS

"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," so the suggestion of Dr. Serrge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that an international music festival be arranged as a sedative for peace conference disputes, should be interesting in this section favored by Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra's harmony.

Koussevitzky could select the music that would quiet a raging lion, but with so many factions trying to slip an oar irto the peace conference boat the question is whether the jazz band brigades would yield him full sway. Music's charms have been conceded since even before the boy David's harp lulled to sleep the troubled King Saul of Israel. But, remembering that once the king was displeased and hurled his spear at the youth—thus setting the pace for modern disapproval—music's infallibility, so lauded by the Boston leader, may be discounted.

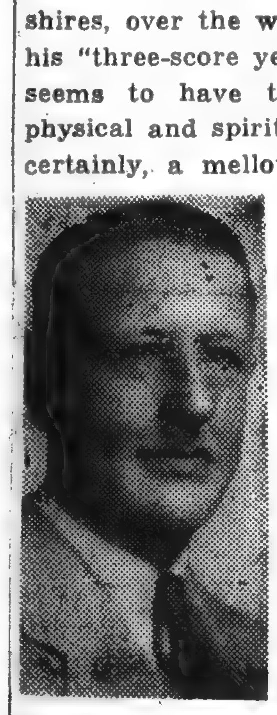
If the delegates tryin gto form a peace preserving association should meaningfully sing, "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," it might have international effect; but if a more majestic production only lulled them into inactive contentment, the scene would be set for some smoke-filled room sessions beyond reach of music and its charms.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
AUG 2 - 1944

AROUND THE TOWN

By Edgar S.
Van Olinda

WE ENJOYED tremendously the 70th birthday party of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as he translated his full life into terms of the exquisite music of Mozart at the orchestra's estate, "Tanglewood" in the heart of the Berkshires, over the weekend. Belieing his "three-score years and ten" he seems to have taken on added physical and spiritual powers, and certainly, a mellowness and good nature not generally associated with the minimum biblical span of life. And he may well be proud of his achievements in America. To him, more than to any man in America, is due the credit for moving the musical capital of the old world to America, and "Tanglewood" in particular, which bids fair to become "The American Salzburg" and inheritor of all the musical traditions of prewar Austria.



E. S. VAN OLINDA

There is something very American over at the "Tanglewood" festival. The democracy of music attains its highest expression in this beautiful sector of New England. Everyone speaks to his neighbor as if they were old friends, and one hears more kinds of accents during the intermissions than are described in the scriptural account of the building of the Tower of Babel. But when Mr. Koussevitsky raises his left hand, a silence which can be felt takes possession of the audience, and the hush of anticipation moves over the vast assemblage, not unlike some of the black clouds overhead and outside the auditorium, presaging the great symphony of nature, which for a few scattered moments endeavored to out-Mozart Mozart. Even this unseemly interruption could not disturb the outward calm and beaming good nature of Mr. Koussevitzky and his two charming guest soloists, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemehoff (Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz) as they worked together to make a magnificent musical experience of the Concerto in E-flat major for two pianos and orchestra. The thunder of applause which followed the performance—Mozart with sound effects a la Beethoven—put the demonstration of the elements to an ashamed silence.

It seemed, also, that there was a general exodus of Albany music lovers across the state line to Massachusetts. Among those noted Sunday afternoon were Murray Smouse, president of the Civic music association and Mrs. Smouse, Ned Wheeler, Mrs. Ester Griswold, Mr. and Mrs. John Davis Hatch, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. H. Judson Lipes, Mr. and Mrs. Neils Jules-Larsen and their son, Peter; Mr. and Mrs. George Skolsky, Laurence McKinney, president of the Albany Symphony orchestra and his mother-in-law, Mrs. Dwight Marvin, of Troy; Mr. and Mrs. Reid Callanan and Mr. and Mrs. Donald B. Robinson, of Loudonville, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Hollister, Otto Janda, Father John J. Gaffigan of Averill Park and many others whom we missed owing to the restrictions of the storm during the intermission. Truly a demonstration of the Democracy of Music in a land unshackled by the whims of a dictator.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
AUG 4 - 1944

THESE DAYS

By George E. Sokolsky

The Logic of Civilization.

The other night, at Tanglewood in Stockbridge, Mass. Mr. Koussevitzky directed a Mozart concert. Mozart was a German. So was Beethoven. So was Wagner. Brahms was a Hungarian. During the last war there were wild men who protested the playing of Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms. This time we have more sense. We do not visit upon the culture and civilization of all mankind our antipathies to a particular country.

Art, like religion, is universal. It belongs to all people. It knows neither politics nor economics nor the madnesses of hate which every so often beset human beings. Art, like religion, knows neither race nor creed nor nationality. It raises the weak and backward as it humbles the strong and aggressive.

And that is what is so hard to understand about the Germans. In music, they have excelled all the peoples upon this earth. If German composers were removed from the symphonic and operatic programs they would indeed become thin. Yet these same Germans can produce a Hitler, a Goering, a Himmler. What curious psychology makes this people, so rich in mind and emotions, and yet so ruthless in the pursuit of their political ends? Perhaps politics is a strange region for them and not knowing where to go they lose their way. The Japanese unquestionably have lost their way, for when they are not fighting they appear so meek and gentle.

As one listened to Mozart at Tanglewood the war was for a moment forgotten, although there were plenty of young people there in the uniforms of all the services. And they, too, for the moment forgot, for Mozart is timeless and one listens as though in another century, the facts of the moment being driven far away from the miserable reality of campaigns and speeches and wars and radio commentators. Yet it was impossible not to recall just this: Politics and economics are absorbing us too completely in this generation. These mechanisms of our living are grinding us instead of being managed by us. We have erected machines that are so intricate that we no longer altogether understand how to handle them. They play tricks on us—and they frighten us.

Man invented politics to set up rules for his relations with other men. He invented government as an agency for the management of communal affairs. At first it was all very simple. The father controlled his offspring and their communal relationships, which in time became tribal. By now, however, government is a frighteningly complex organism which relates itself not only to communal matters but to everything that an individual does. In some countries it even attempts to control the mind, determining what the individual is to believe and think and pray for. Government has grown from a mechanism of utility to a master of man.

This has happened often before. In fact history is a record of endless struggle between the need for some kind of government and the tendency of all governments to expand their functions and powers until they overwhelm the individual into slavery. Then there is resistance—at first, passive resistance, as with the Chinese, who when they weary of a tyrannous officialdom shut up their shops and schools and houses and do nothing. And doing nothing, they produce such a stagnation that the state itself might die of desuetude. Officials soon cringe before that type of passive resistance, which is utterly paralyzing. But when that fails revolution is the only course—the fight of free minds for freedom of thought and action.

It is another curiosity of history that those who praise revolution in other countries abhor it in their own. The Russians have at various times stimulated revolutions in every country, but they put down any form of opposition as ruthlessly as Hitler does in Germany. The hero of freedom elsewhere becomes the traitor in his own country. Yet free minds and free men will ever appear in lands where cruel tyranny and oppression become the tools of government.

I don't know what Mozart has to do with all this. Yet as I passed from Lenox through Lee to Otis, hidden deep in the hills, my mind played not upon melody but upon liberty.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 13 1944

Announce Soloists for Chamber Programs

Boston Symphony Members to Play in Concert Series

For four weeks on Sunday and Monday evenings at 8:30 the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will ~~play~~ in Boston's New England Mutual Hall. The series of four programs, each of which will be given twice, will be devoted to music in the smaller forms. The programs follow:

First pair: Aug 13-14; conductor, Bernard Zighera.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major (for three violins, three violas, three violoncelles and bass), Bach. Serenade in C minor, K. 388 (for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons), Mozart; "Kindertotenlieder," for contralto and orchestra, Mahler, soloist Mary Davenport; "Tre Ricercari," Martinu.

Second pair: Aug. 20-21; conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth.

Sinfonia and Choruses from "Solomon," Handel; Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Concerto in C major (for three harpsichords and orchestra), Bach, soloists Putnam Aldrich, Sylvia Marlowe, Daniel Pinkham; Symphony in B-flat, K. 319, Mozart; Two Contradances and Minuet, Beethoven.

Third pair: Aug. 27-28; the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Alfred Zighera director.

Sonata (for flute, viola da gamba and harpsichord), Lotti; Sonata (viola da gamba and harpsichord), Bach; Suite in C major (for four viols and harpsichord), Telemann.

The Boston Flute Players Club, Georges Laurent music director

Trio (for flute, violoncelo and piano), Weber; Suite (for flute, violin, viola, violoncello and harp), D'Indy.

Fourth pair: Sept. 3-4; conductor, Richard Burgin.

Suite for Strings (arr. Mitropoulos), Purcell; Theme with Variations, according to the Four Temperaments, for strings and piano, Hindemith, solo pianist Lukas Foss; Two Preludes for String Orchestra, Op. 11, Shostakovitch; Serenade for Strings, Op. 48, Tchaikovsky

---

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
AUG 5 - 1944

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

THE LOGIC OF CIVILIZATION

The other night, at Tanglewood in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, Mr. Koussevitzky directed a Mozart concert. Mozart was a German. So was Beethoven. So was Wagner. Brahms was a Hungarian. During the last war, there were wild men who protested the playing of Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms. This time, we have more sense. We do not visit upon the culture and civilization of all mankind our antipathies to a particular country.

Art, like religion, is universal. It belongs to all people. It knows neither politics nor economics nor the madnesses of hate which every so often beset human beings. Art, like religion, knows neither race nor creed nor nationality. It raises the weak and backward as it humbles the strong and aggressive.

And that is what is so hard to understand about the Germans. In music, they have excelled all the peoples upon this earth. If German composers were removed from the symphonic and operatic programs, they would indeed become thin. Yet, these same Germans can produce a Hitler, a Goering, a Himmler. What curious psychology makes this people so rich in mind and emotions and yet so ruthless in the pursuit of their political ends? Perhaps politics is a strange region for them and not knowing where to go, they lose their way. The Japanese unquestionably have lost their way, for when they are not fighting, they appear so meek and gentle.

As one listened to Mozart at Tanglewood, the war was for a moment forgotten, although there were plenty of young people there in the uniforms of all the services. And they, too, for the moment forgot, for Mozart is timeless and one listens as though in another century, the facts of the moment being driven far away from the miserable reality of campaigns and speeches and wars and radio commentators. Yet, it was impossible not to recall just this: Politics and economics are absorbing us too completely in this generation. These mechanisms of our living are grinding us instead of being managed by us. We have erected machines that are so intricate that we no longer altogether understand how to handle them. They play tricks on us—and they frighten us.

Man invented politics to set up rules for his relations with other men. He invented government as an agency for the management of communal affairs. At first it was all very simple. The father controlled his offspring and their communal relationships which in time became tribal. By now however, government is a frighteningly complex organism which relates itself not only to communal matters but to everything that an individual does. In some countries, it even attempts to control the mind, determining what the individual is to believe and think and pray for. Government has grown from a mechanism of utility to a master of man.

This has happened often before. In fact, history is an endless struggle between the need for some kind of government and the tendency of all governments to expand their functions and powers until they overwhelm the individual into slavery. Then there is resistance—at first, passive resistance as with the Chinese who when they weary of a tyrannous officialdom, shut up their shops and schools and houses and do nothing. And doing nothing, they produce such a stagnation that the state itself might die of desuetude. Officials soon cringe before that type of passive resistance which is utterly paralyzing. But when that fails, revolution is the only course—the fight of free minds for freedom of thought and action.

It is another curiosity of history that those who praise revolution in other countries, abhor it in their own. The Russians have at various times stimulated revolutions in every country, but they put down any form of opposition as ruthlessly as Hitler does in Germany. The hero of freedom elsewhere becomes the traitor in his own country. Yet, free minds and free men will ever appear in lands where cruel tyranny and oppression become the tools of government.

I don't know what Mozart has to do with all this. Yet, as I passed from Lenox through Lee to Otis hidden deep in the hills, my mind played not upon melody but liberty.

(Copyright, 1944)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
AUG 4 - 1944

Who's News Today

Koussevitzky—His Mu
May ~~Help~~ in the Peace.

A symphony orchestra never sounds better than within proportions of Brooklyn's shabby Academy of Music. And no or tra ever sounds better there or anywhere else than the wowser masterful Dr. Serge Koussevitzky parades every so often every season down from Boston.

For the doctor and his band all the music lovers over the river turn out. Even the borough's manorial aristocrats break through the cobwebs before their ancestral doors. Brooklyn's aristocrats consider the oldest name in Manhattan's social register a little parvenu, but they yield to Koussevitzky. The dowagers come and even the shy gray spinsters fit their herringboned hips into the Academy's happily wide seats. They do not cheer. They did not cheer even when Koussevitzky conducted "Finlandia" as Sibelius dreamed it might be conducted, once. But they applauded until their ivory cheeks grew pink above their high-necked dresses.

And doubtless they applaud the Koussevitzky plan for an international festival of music to insure the success of the coming world peace conference. Over their teacups they may wonder why the doctor didn't suggest a Brooklyn festival which would amount practically to the same thing, but they approve.

Koussevitzky favors an international festival because he is a world citizen for all that he has his shop in Boston and sells so much of his wares in Brooklyn. He has conducted orchestras in Russia, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy and England. And in most of them he has played his bull fiddle. When he was a boy in Russia he conducted imaginary orchestras, but he started his career in music on the double bass.

The Moscow Conservatory had a bull fiddle scholarship open, an poor he had to have a sch he stood up like a man sepulchral instrument. He termined to be a conductor he loafed at his new job. lax that his teacher wa give him up, but then he new leaf and grew to good. In the end he w although soloists on the are almost as rare as so tympani. He was, in bull fiddle player in the w

One day at a concert he girl listening intently to while the bulk of the a Such good taste, he felt, notable reward so he marri they went abroad and th and then they went abroad he conducted here and there they came to this country.

The Koussevitzky Am began twenty years ago over the down-at-heels B phony. He put his bass aside, but he made good beyond compare, and honorary degrees galore. he spends his summers in Berkshire music center, his his symphonic home town, spare moments wishing he play his bull fiddle. With world at his feet he still could go back to the instru was forced upon him, and weeps because, worse luck, can find the time. If his plan international festival goes may dust it off for a solo or

DELOS W. L

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
AUG 6 - 1944

POSSELT IS SOLOIST AT MOZART FESTIVAL

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PITTSFIELD, Mass., Aug. 5—The final week-end of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's Mozart festival at Tanglewood began here this evening with a concert featuring Ruth Posselt as violin soloist in the D major concerto (K 218). Dr. Koussevitzky again presided over his festival orchestra, which is composed of thirty-eight principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Besides the concerto, this evening's program listed the early G minor symphony (K 183), the overture to "Idomeneo, Re di Creta" (K 366) and the E-flat major symphony (K 543).

For the concert, the 1,142 seats in the Tanglewood Opera Concert Hall were sold out. Several hundred additional patrons heard the concert by purchasing general admissions to the grounds.

Tomorrow afternoon's program, the last of this year's festival, will have the services of Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist in the D major "Coronation" concerto (K 537).

The orchestral works on the program will include the serenade in C minor for wind instruments (K 338) "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (K 525) and the "Jupiter" symphony (K 551).

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
AUG 6 - 1944

Four Composers Get Koussevitzky Grants

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 5.—(AP)—Four composers, two of American roots and two of foreign extraction, have been honored by "composer grants" from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. They are Aaron Copland, Burrill Phillips, Darius Milhaud and Nikolai Lopatnikoff.

If the project matures, the result will be symphonies by Messrs. Copland and Milhaud, a concertino by Lopatnikoff, and an overture by Phillips. No time limit has been set, but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky hopes that some of the compositions will be ready for performance by his Boston Symphony next season.

One of the few one-man ventures of its kind, the music foundation grew directly out of the life-long interest taken by the late Natalie Koussevitzky in the career of her famous conductor-husband. When Koussevitzky and she were married, he was famous as a bass viol player, and ambitious to conduct. Mrs. Koussevitzky put a very large fortune at the service of her husband's career. Immediately after her death her husband organized the foundation in her honor, devoting most of its money to subsidizing composers of serious music.

In his years with the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky has insisted on the right of the present day composer to a hearing, even when his subscribers threatened rebellion.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

AUG 2 - 1944

Around THE Town

By Edgar S.
Van Olinda

WE ENJOYED tremendously the 70th birthday party of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as he translated his full life into terms of the exquisite music of Mozart at the orchestra's estate, "Tanglewood" in the heart of the Berkshires, over the weekend. Belieing his "three-score years and ten" he seems to have taken on added physical and spiritual powers, and certainly, a mellowness and good nature not generally associated with the minimum biblical span of life. And he may well be proud of his achievements in America. To him, more than to any man in America, is due the credit for moving the musical capital of the old world to America, and "Tanglewood" in particular, which bids fair to become "The American Salzburg" and inheritor of all the musical traditions of prewar Austria.

E. S. VAN OLINDA

There is something very American over at the "Tanglewood" festival. The democracy of music attains its highest expression in this beautiful sector of New England. Everyone speaks to his neighbor as if they were old friends, and one hears more kinds of accents during the intermissions than are described in the scriptural account of the building of the Tower of Babel. But when Mr. Koussevitsky raises his left hand, a silence which can be felt takes possession of the audience, and the hush of anticipation moves over the vast assemblage, not unlike some of the black clouds overhead and outside the auditorium, presaging the great symphony of nature, which for a few scattered moments endeavored to out-Mozart Mozart. Even this unseemly interruption could not disturb the outward calm and beaming good nature of Mr. Koussevitzky and his two charming guest soloists, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemehoff (Mr. and Mrs. Luboshutz) as they worked together to make a magnificent musical experience of the Concerto in E-flat major for two pianos and orchestra. The thunder of applause which followed the performance—Mozart with sound effects a la Beethoven—put the demonstration of the elements to an ashamed silence.

It seemed, also, that there was a general exodus of Albany music lovers across the state line to Massachusetts. Among those noted Sunday afternoon were Murray Smouse, president of the Civic music association and Mrs. Smouse, Ned Wheeler, Mrs. Ester Griswold, Mr. and Mrs. John Davis Hatch, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. H. Judson Lipes, Mr. and Mrs. Neils Jules-Larsen and their son, Peter; Mr. and Mrs. George Skolsky, Laurence McKinney, president of the Albany Symphony orchestra and his mother-in-law, Mrs. Dwight Marvin, of Troy; Mr. and Mrs. Reid Callanan and Mr. and Mrs. Donald B. Robinson, of Loudonville, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Hollister, Otto Janda, Father John J. Gaffigan of Averill Park and many others whom we missed owing to the restrictions of the storm during the intermission. Truly a demonstration of the Democracy of Music in a land unshackled by the whims of a dictator.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 4 - 1944

THESE DAYS

By George E. Sokolsky

The Logic of Civilization.

The other night, at Tanglewood in Stockbridge, Mass. Mr. Koussevitzky directed a Mozart concert. Mozart was a German. So was Beethoven. So was Wagner. Brahms was a Hungarian. During the last war there were wild men who protested the playing of Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms. This time we have more sense. We do not visit upon the culture and civilization of all mankind our antipathies to a particular country.

Art, like religion, is universal. It belongs to all people. It knows neither politics nor economics nor the madnesses of hate which every so often beset human beings. Art, like religion, knows neither race nor creed nor nationality. It raises the weak and backward as it humbles the strong and aggressive.

And that is what is so hard to understand about the Germans. In music, they have excelled all the peoples upon this earth. If German composers were removed from the symphonic and operatic programs they would indeed become thin. Yet these same Germans can produce a Hitler, a Goering, a Himmler. What curious psychology makes this people, so rich in mind and emotions, and yet so ruthless in the pursuit of their political ends? Perhaps politics is a strange region for them and not knowing where to go they lose their way. The Japanese unquestionably have lost their way, for when they are not fighting they appear so meek and gentle.

As one listened to Mozart at Tanglewood the war was for a moment forgotten, although there were plenty of young people there in the uniforms of all the services. And they, too, for the moment forgot, for Mozart is timeless and one listens as though in another century, the facts of the moment being driven far away from the miserable reality of campaigns and speeches and wars and radio commentators. Yet it was impossible not to recall just this: Politics and economics are absorbing us too completely in this generation. These mechanisms of our living are grinding us instead of being managed by us. We have erected machines that are so intricate that we no longer altogether understand how to handle them. They play tricks on us—and they frighten us.

Man invented politics to set up rules for his relations with other men. He invented government as an agency for the management of communal affairs. At first it was all very simple. The father controlled his offspring and their communal relationships, which in time became tribal. By now, however, government is a frighteningly complex organism which relates itself not only to communal matters but to everything that an individual does. In some countries it even attempts to control the mind, determining what the individual is to believe and think and pray for. Government has grown from a mechanism of utility to a master of man.

This has happened often before. In fact history is a record of endless struggle between the need for some kind of government and the tendency of all governments to expand their functions and powers until they overwhelm the individual into slavery. Then there is resistance—at first, passive resistance, as with the Chinese, who when they weary of a tyrannous officialdom shut up their shops and schools and houses and do nothing. And doing nothing, they produce such a stagnation that the state itself might die of desuetude. Officials soon cringe before that type of passive resistance, which is utterly paralyzing. But when that fails revolution is the only course—the fight of free minds for freedom of thought and action.

It is another curiosity of history that those who praise revolution in other countries abhor it in their own. The Russians have at various times stimulated revolutions in every country, but they put down any form of opposition as ruthlessly as Hitler does in Germany. The hero of freedom elsewhere becomes the traitor in his own country. Yet free minds and free men will ever appear in lands where cruel tyranny and oppression become the tools of government.

I don't know what Mozart has to do with all this. Yet as I passed from Lenox through Lee to Otis, hidden deep in the hills, my mind played not upon melody but upon liberty.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 1 6 1944

Announce Soloists for Chamber Programs

Boston Symphony Members to Play in Concert Series

For four weeks on Sunday and Monday evenings at 8:30 the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Boston's New England Mutual Hall. The series of four programs, each of which will be given twice, will be devoted to music in the smaller forms. The programs follow:

First pair, Aug. [illegible]; conductor, Bernard Zighera.

Brandenburg Concerto No. [illegible] major (for three violins, three violas, three violoncellos and bass) Bach; Serenade [illegible] C minor K. 388 [illegible] horns and two bassoons [illegible] Kindertotenlieder [illegible] contralto and orchestra [illegible] Mahler, soloist [illegible] Martinu.

Second pair, Aug. 20 [illegible], conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth.

Sinfonia and Choruses from "Solomon," Handel, Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Concerto [illegible] C major (for three harpsichords and orchestra) Bach, soloists Putnam [illegible] Daniel Pinkham; Symphony [illegible] K. 319, Mozart; Two Contradances and Minuet, Beethoven.

Third pair, Aug. 27-28, the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Alfred Zighera director.

Sonata (for flute, viola da gamba and harpsichord), Lotti, [illegible] viola da gamba and harpsichord) Bach; Suite in C major (for four viols and harpsichord) Telemann.

The Boston Flute Players Club, Georges Laurent music director.

Trio (for flute, [illegible] and [illegible]) Weber; Suite (for flute, violin, viola, violoncello and harp), D'Indy.

Fourth pair, Sept. 3-4, conductor, Richard Burgin.

Suite for String [illegible] Purcell; Theme with Variations according to the Four Temperaments (for strings and piano) Hindemith, [illegible] Lukas Foss; Two Preludes for String Orchestra, Op. 11 Shostakovitch; Serenade for Strings, Op. 48 Tchaikovsky.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

AUG 5 - 1944

These Days

By George E. Sokolsky

THE LOGIC OF CIVILIZATION

The other night, at Tanglewood in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, Mr. Koussevitzky directed a Mozart concert. Mozart was a German. So was Beethoven. So was Wagner. Brahms was a Hungarian. During the last war, there were wild men who protested the playing of Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms. This time, we have more sense. We do not visit upon the culture and civilization of all mankind our antipathies to a particular country.

Art, like religion, is universal. It belongs to all people. It knows neither politics nor economics nor the madnesses of hate which every so often beset human beings. Art, like religion, knows neither race nor creed nor nationality. It raises the weak and backward as it humbles the strong and aggressive.

And that is what is so hard to understand about the Germans. In music, they have excelled all the peoples upon this earth. If German composers were removed from the symphonic and operatic programs, they would indeed become thin. Yet, these same Germans can produce a Hitler, a Goering, a Himmler. What curious psychology makes this people so rich in mind and emotions and yet so ruthless in the pursuit of their political ends? Perhaps politics is a strange region for them and not knowing where to go, they lose their way. The Japanese unquestionably have lost their way, for when they are not fighting, they appear so meek and gentle.

As one listened to Mozart at Tanglewood, the war was for a moment forgotten, although there were plenty of young people there in the uniforms of all the services. And they, too, for the moment forgot, for Mozart is timeless and one listens as though in another century, the facts of the moment being driven far away from the miserable reality of campaigns and speeches and wars and radio commentators. Yet, it was impossible not to recall just this: Politics and economics are absorbing us too completely in this generation. These mechanisms of our living are grinding us instead of being managed by us. We have erected machines that are so intricate that we no longer altogether understand how to handle them. They play tricks on us—and they frighten us.

Man invented politics to set up rules for his relations with other men. He invented government as an agency for the management of communal affairs. At first it was all very simple. The father controlled his offspring and their communal relationships which in time became tribal. By now however, government is a frighteningly complex organism which relates itself not only to communal matters but to everything that an individual does. In some countries, it even attempts to control the mind, determining what the individual is to believe and think and pray for. Government has grown from a mechanism of utility to a master of man.

This has happened often before. In fact, history is an endless struggle between the need for some kind of government and the tendency of all governments to expand their functions and powers until they overwhelm the individual into slavery. Then there is resistance—at first, passive resistance as with the Chinese who when they weary of a tyrannous officialdom, shut up their shops and schools and houses and do nothing. And doing nothing, they produce such a stagnation that the state itself might die of desuetude. Officials soon cringe before that type of passive resistance which is utterly paralyzing. But when that fails, revolution is the only course—the fight of free minds for freedom of thought and action.

It is another curiosity of history that those who praise revolution in other countries, abhor it in their own. The Russians have at various times stimulated revolutions in every country, but they put down any form of opposition as ruthlessly as Hitler does in Germany. The hero of freedom elsewhere becomes the traitor in his own country. Yet, free minds and free men will ever appear in lands where cruel tyranny and oppression become the tools of government.

I don't know what Mozart has to do with all this. Yet, as I passed from Lenox through Lee to Otis hidden deep in the hills, my mind played not upon melody but liberty.

(Copyright, 1944)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 4 - 1944

Who's News Today

Koussevitsky—His Music May Help in the Peace.

A symphony orchestra never sounds better than within the proportions of Brooklyn's shabby Academy of Music. And no orchestra ever sounds better there or anywhere else than the wowser masterful Dr. Serge Koussevitzky parades every so often every season down from Boston.

For the doctor and his band all the music lovers over the river turn out. Even the borough's manorial aristocrats break through the cobwebs before their ancestral doors. Brooklyn's aristocrats consider the oldest name in Manhattan's social register a little parvenu, but they yield to Koussevitzky. The dowagers come and even the shy gray spinsters fit their herringboned hips into the Academy's happily wide seats. They do not cheer. They did not cheer even when Koussevitzky conducted "Finlandia" as Sibelius dreamed it might be conducted, once. But they applauded until their ivory cheeks grew pink above their high-necked dresses.

And doubtless they applaud the Koussevitzky plan for an international festival of music to insure the success of the coming world peace conference. Over their teacups they may wonder why the doctor didn't suggest a Brooklyn festival which would amount practically to the same thing, but they approve.

Koussevitzky favors an international festival because he is a world citizen for all that he has his shop in Boston and sells so much of his wares in Brooklyn. He has conducted orchestras in Russia, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy and England. And in most of them he has played his bull fiddle. When he was a boy in Russia he conducted imaginary orchestras, but he started his career in music on the double bass.

The Moscow Conservatory had a bull fiddle scholarship open, and poor he had to have a sch he stood up like a man sepulchral instrument. He termined to be a conductor he loafed at his new job. lax that his teacher wa give him up, but then he new leaf and grew to good. In the end he although soloists on the are almost as rare as sol tympani. He was, in fa bull fiddle player in the wo

One day at a concert he girl listening intently to while the bulk of the audie Such good taste, he felt, notable reward so he married they went abroad and the and then they went abroad he conducted here and there they came to this country.

The Koussevitzky Ameri began twenty years ago wh over the down-at-heels Bo phony. He put his sonoro bass aside, but he made hi good beyond compare, and honorary degrees galore. he spends his summers in Berkshire music center, his symphonic home town spare moments wishing he play his bull fiddle. With the world at his feet he still could go back to the instru was forced upon him, and weeps because, worse luck, can find the time. If his pla international festival goes may dust it off for a solo or

DELOS W. L

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 6 - 1944

POSSELT IS SOLOIST AT MOZART FESTIVAL

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PITTSFIELD, Mass., Aug. 5—The final week-end of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's Mozart festival at Tanglewood began here this evening with a concert featuring Ruth Posselt as violin soloist in the D major concerto (K 218). Dr. Koussevitzky again presided over his festival orchestra, which is composed of thirty-eight principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Besides the concerto, this evening's program listed the early G minor symphony (K 183), the overture to "Idomeneo, Re di Creta" (K 366) and the E-flat major symphony (K 543).

For the concert, the 1,142 seats in the Tanglewood Opera Concert Hall were sold out. Several hundred additional patrons heard the concert by purchasing general admissions to the grounds.

Tomorrow afternoon's program, the last of this year's festival, will have the services of Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist in the D major "Coronation" concerto (K 537).

The orchestral works on the program will include the serenade in C minor for wind instruments (K 338) "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (K 525) and the "Jupiter" symphony (K 551).

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 6 - 1944

Four Composers Get Koussevitzky Grants

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 5.—(AP)—Four composers, two of American roots and two of foreign extraction, have been honored by "composer grants" from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. They are Aaron Copland, Burrill Phillips, Darius Milhaud and Nikolai Lopatnikoff.

If the project matures, the result will be symphonies by Messrs. Copland and Milhaud, a concertino by Lopatnikoff, and an overture by Phillips. No time limit has been set, but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky hopes that some of the compositions will be ready for performance by his Boston Symphony next season.

One of the few one-man ventures of its kind, the music foundation grew directly out of the life-long interest taken by the late Natalie Koussevitzky in the career of her famous conductor-husband. When Koussevitzky and she were married, he was famous as a bass viol player, and ambitious to conduct. Mme. Koussevitzky put a very large fortune at the service of her husband's career. Immediately after her death her husband organized the foundation in her honor, devoting most of its money to subsidizing composers of serious music.

In his years with the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky has insisted on the right of the present day composer to a hearing, even when his subscribers threatened rebellion.

LD TRIBUNE
G 13 1944

Soloists for ber Programs

phony Members
Concert Series

eeks on Sunday and
ngs at 8:30 the prin-
her members of the hony Orchestra will
ton's New England
The series of four ch of which will be will be devoted to smaller forms. The ow:

13-14; conductor, Bernard

erto No. 3 in G major (for ree violas, three violoncellos
ch; Serenade in C minor,
o oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons). Mozart; "Kinder-
r contralto and orchestra,
Mary Davenport; "Tre Ricer-

20-21; conductor, G. Wal-ruses from "Solomon," Han-ee Club and Radcliffe Choral rto in C major (for three nd orchestra), Bach, soloists

h; Sylvia Marlowe, Daniel phony in B-flat, K. 319, Mo-tradances and Minuet, Bee-

27-28; the Boston Society of ents, Alfred Zighero director.
viola da gamba and harpsi-Sonata (viola da gamba and Bach: Suite in C major (for harpsichord), Telemann.
e Players Club, Georges Lau-
ctor.
violoncelo and piano), Weber:
, violin, viola, violoncello and

pt. 3-4; conductor, Richard s (arr. Mitropoulos), Purcell;

Variations, according to the ments, for strings and piano,
lo pianist Lukas Foss; Two
tring Orchestra, Op. 11, Shos-
renade for Strings, Op. 48.

Koussevitsky—His Mu
May Help in the Peac

nds better than within he sup demy of Music. And no other orch here else than the wowser which t fiddle scholarship open, and he wa poor he had to have a scholarship, he stood up like a man to the h sepulchral instrument. He was still termined to be a conductor, and at f he loafed at his new job. He was lax that his teacher was inclined give him up, but then he turned ov new leaf and grew to be incred good. In the end he was a solo although soloists on the double are almost as rare as soloists on tympani. He was, in fact, the bull fiddle player in the world.

One day at a concert he saw a pr girl listening intently to the m while the bulk of the audience tal
Such good taste, he felt, deserve notable reward so he married her.
they went abroad and then retur
and then they went abroad again w he conducted here and there. And t they came to this country.
The Koussevitzky American ca began twenty years ago when he t
over the down-at-heels Boston S phony. He put his sonorous dou bass aside, but he made his orche good beyond compare, and in proof honorary degrees galore. Seventy n
he spends his summers in his fam
Berkshire music center, his winter his symphonic home town, and spare moments wishing he had tim play his bull fiddle. With the mu world at his feet he still wishes could go back to the instrument t was forced upon him, and someti
weeps because, worse luck, he ne can find the time. If his plan for international festival goes through, may dust it off for a solo or two.

DELOS W. LOVELAC

---

ed additional patrons heard the ncert by purchasing general ad-ssions to the grounds.
Tomorrow afternoon's program,
e last of this year's festival, will ve the services of Robert Casa-sus, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist in the D major
"Coronation" concerto (K 537).
The orchestral works on the program will include the serenade in minor for wind instruments
(K 388) "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"
(K 525) and the "Jupiter" symphony (K 551).

WONDER OF WORLD OF ENTERTAINMENT: THE ESPLANADE

SECOND THOUGHTS OF A FIRST-NIGHTER

Aug 6

BY ELLIOT NORTON

THE wonder of the entertainment world at this time is an outdoor thing, the concert season by the Boston orchestra on the Esplanade. More than 150,000 persons, for a very conservative estimate, are attending these concerts every week. This is a great many more than attend the professional ball games and, although the orchestra gives only six performances a week and he gave 30 during seven dreary days at the RKO Boston Theatre, it is 35,000 more than Frank Sinatra attracted at the peak of his popularity. That is something to ponder. It could be the beginning of the milennium.

ELLIOT NORTON

The wonder of it is that the orchestra is not presenting swing or sway, but the world's most pretentious music. A further marvel is that no one is under any kind of obligation, social or other, to go; there can be only one reason for attendance, a desire for pleasure and enjoyment.

There are some musical events which are good enough and worthy enough but which are patronized largely by those who feel that it is a prudent thing to be present, what with the society reporters being there and perhaps photographers, too. But if the society editors attend the Esplanade it is because they like music and for no other reason. Though they are given at the foot of Beacon Hill, the Esplanade concerts are not fashionable. You can tell that at a glance, or by the way the audiences behave.

FEWER THAN 2000 AT FIRST ONE

THERE were fewer than 2000 people present on the night of July 4, 1929, when the first of the Esplanade concerts was given. The attendance didn't get much larger than that during the first season. Mr. Fiedler and his musicians, all recruited from the Boston Symphony orchestra, made their programmes cautiously in those days, not knowing what such an audience would accept. There had been dullards around to warn that the whole idea was silly, that fine music was for fine people only and not for the mob. Mr. Fiedler didn't believe this but he moved carefully.

For the first programmes, he gave them beer-garden music—Strauss waltzes, march medleys, musical comedy medleys and an occasional group of opera arias, with instrumental soloists taking the melodies carried in opera by the human voice. From such music, played with the remarkable precision which distinguishes the work of the Boston orchestra, Mr. Fiedler moved on to more pretentious stuff and as he grew bolder the audiences became larger, even more attentive and appreciative.

When he first tried a piano concerto, he found it advisable to give only one part of it, for fear it might prove boresome to the mightily mixed audience. Tonight, he is offering an entire Grieg concerto. In the meantime, he has presented almost every kind of fine music in its entirety. In one recent season he played the nine symphonies of Beethoven and the audience of white and colored, people of every social and racial background conceivable, were so enthralled and so elated that he was forced to do all nine of them over again the following year. The next season he did the four Brahms symphonies and was similarly required to repeat those.

TWENTY THOUSAND EACH EVENING

TWENTY THOUSAND people sit on the camp chairs or on the grass of the Esplanade night after night, six nights a week, and listen with eager interest and with increasingly sharp perception to Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra. They are not the audience of the Friday Symphony concerts, though some of the Friday group appear; they are a cross-section of democratic America, proving by their presence that great music and, if you please, great art of any kind, is something which the average man and woman will accept and embrace if it is properly presented.

For a good many years, the programmes which are distributed at these concerts contained only the bare facts, the name of the works to be played and the identity of the composers. These programmes were thrown away by one and all. Attendants will tell you with a shudder that it took three hours every night to pick them up. Three or four years ago, Laning Humphreys of the concert staff conceived the idea of making a larger programme to include information about the music and the composers. Now the folks keep their programmes and take them home to read and discuss. Not only do they like the music, but they also want to know something about it and the people who wrote it.

It seems to me worth stressing that this nightly audience, larger even than the record crowds which attended the professional hockey games in the pre-war days, is not a one-class group. It is not the old Back Bay, or Beacon Hill, or Chestnut Hill either. These sections are represented, but so is every neighborhood in the city. This is not the old Boston, the old Hub of the Universe of the last century, but the new one rising on the cultural ashes of the old.

COUNT BASIE NEEDN'T WORRY

IT IS not likely that Count Basie's band is headed for doom and destruction in a new wave of musical appreciation, though that might not be a bad thing. It is certain that the Guy Lombardos and the Duke Ellingtons and most of the rest of the sweets and the hots will continue to prosper and that will be a good thing. There is no evidence of a cultural revolution; this is just a coming of age, an awakening. There will always be jitterbugs or their equivalents. The encouraging thing is that there is now a great and intelligent audience for something better.

The Esplanade concerts are a credit to Boston and an inspiration. Their success is a wonderful tribute to Mr. Fiedler and his musicians.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 7 - 1944

TANGLEWOOD ENDS MOZART FESTIVAL

2,000 Attend Each of the Last 2 Koussevitzky Concerts—Posselt, Casadesus Heard

By MARK A. SCHUBART

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PITTSFIELD, Mass., Aug. 6—The Berkshire Mozart Festival came to an end at Tanglewood this afternoon with the last of four all-Mozart concerts by an orchestra made up of thirty-eight principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. More than 2,000 people attended each of the last two concerts for which Ruth Posselt, violinist, and Robert Casadesus, pianist, were soloists.

Organized originally to keep alive the tradition of music at the Boston Orchestra's summer home, despite wartime problems, the Mozart festival actually accomplished more than its avowed purpose. For it has clearly shown, through its devoted audiences, that a series of concerts such as this one, designed primarily to serve the musical needs of a summer community, have a concrete and important place on the American scene.

In pre-war years, when transportation was relatively a simple matter, thousands of persons came from all over the country to hear the full Boston Symphony in works from the standard repertoire. The Mozart Festival, however, had much more of the quality of a community affair, as a majority of its patrons live in Pittsfield, Stockbridge, Lenox, and other near-by communities. That it could be a popular as well as an artistic triumph under these conditions offers encouragement to similar musical plans in other localities.

Resemble European Fêtes

Not every community, it is true, could obtain the services of a Koussevitzky or of first desk men of the incomparable Boston Symphony. But even more important than the excellence of the music was the neighborly quality of the festival, which created the setting for the music and gave it significance and flavor. Certainly the comparisons drawn between the Berkshire programs and the famous European festivals were neither idle nor unjustified.

That Dr. Koussevitzky is not unaware of the potentialities of this festival must be taken for granted, since he not only expressed himself as being eminently pleased with the results, but committed himself to further musical activity at Tanglewood next year, war or no war. Just what sort of festival would be given Dr. Koussevitzky could not say, but there will be music at Tanglewood and it will be the best Dr. Koussevitzky can furnish.

As far as standards of performances are concerned, this week-end's concerts were fully as good as last week-end's. Outstanding among last evening's offerings was a truly extraordinary performance of the great E-flat major symphony (K 543), which seemed to be one of those rare readings in which conductor and orchestra are fired by a common enthusiasm and play with a taut excitement which produces the most telling performances. Other orchestral works on the program were the early symphony in G minor (K 183), which is strangely prophetic of the much later and much more famous work in the same key, and the overture to "Idomeneo, Re di Creta" (K 366).

Miss Posselt's vehicle for the evening was the charming D major concerto (K 218), which she played with enthusiasm and skill. Like most Mozart concertos, this one is cruelly difficult, since almost every note of the solo part is clearly exposed, and there can be no "covering up" by the orchestra. Miss Posselt's playing did not escape from this trial unscathed, especially since her style leans more toward the romantic than toward the classic. But her interpretation of the work had great energy and vitality and won an ovation from the audience.

Today's program brought the festival to a fitting climax with the appearance of Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist in the D major "Coronation" concerto (K 537). Few artists can combine dramatic expression with stylistic distinction, as does Mr. Casadesus, a factor which made his performance outstanding.

The orchestral part of the program was designed to display the talents of the two major sections of the orchestra as it included the charming serenade in C minor (K 388) for pairs of oboes, bassoons, clarinets and horns, as well as the more familiar "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" for string orchestra. Both departments acquitted themselves with honor under Dr. Koussevitzky's meticulous direction, and the concert was brought to a close with a dashing performance of the majestic "Jupiter" symphony (K 551).

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

AUG 5 - 1944

Who's News Today:

Koussevitsky Longs for His Bull Fiddle

By Delos W. Lovelace

New York—A symphony orchestra never sounds better than within the superb proportions of Brooklyn's shabby Academy of Music. And no other orchestra ever sounds better there or anywhere else than the wowser which the masterful Dr. Serge Koussevitsky parades every so often every season down from Boston.

For the doctor and his band all the music lovers over the river turn out. Even the borough's manorial aristocrats break through the cobwebs before their ancestral doors. Brooklyn's aristocrats consider the oldest name in Manhattan's social register a little parvenu, but they yield to Koussevitsky. The dowagers come and even the shy gray spinsters fit their herring-boned hips into the academy's happily wide seats. They do not cheer. They did not cheer even when Koussevitsky conducted "Finlandia" as Sibelius dreamed it might be conducted. But they applauded until their ivory cheeks grew pink above their high necked dresses.

And doubtless they applaud the Koussevitsky plan for an international festival of music to insure the success of the coming world peace conference. Over their teacups they may wonder why the doctor didn't suggest a Brooklyn festival which would amount practically to the same thing, but they approve.

* * *

Koussevitsky favors an international festival because he is a world citizen for all that he has his shop in Boston and sells so much of his wares in Brooklyn. He has conducted orchestras in Russia, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy and England. And in most of them he has played his bull fiddle. When he was a boy in Russia he conducted imagniary orchestras, but he started his career in music on the double bass.

The Moscow conservatory had a bull fiddle scholarship open, and he was so poor he had to have a scholarship, so he stood up like a man to the huge sepulchral instrument. He was still determined to be a conductor and at first he loafed at his new job. He was so lax that his teacher was inclined to give him up, but when he turned over a new leaf he grew incredibly good. In the end he was a soloist, although soloists on the double bass are almost as rare as soloists on the tympani. He was, in fact, the best bull fiddle player in the world.

He was also, to some degree, a political revolutionist. The czar was still reigning over Russia and every intelligent citizen, Koussevitsky said, participated in the revolution. His participation resulted in a hurried flight from the country, but not until he took a wife.

One day at a concert he saw a pretty girl listening intently to the music while the bulk of the audience talked. Such good taste, he felt, deserved a notable reward so he married her. And they went abroad and then returned. They went aboard again while he conducted here and there. And then they came to this country.

* * *

The Koussevitsky American career began 20 years ago when he took over the down-at-heels Boston symphony. He put his sonorous double bass aside, but he made his orchestras good beyond compare, and in proof has honorary degrees galore.

Seventy now, he spends his summers in his famous Berkshire music center, his winters in his symphonic home town, and his spare moments wishing he had time to play his bull fiddle. With the musical world at his feet he still would like to go back to the instrument that was forced upon him, and sometimes weeps because, worse luck, he never can find the time. If his plan for the international festival goes through, he may dust it off for a solo or so.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 7 - 1944

Who's News Today

By Delos W. Lovelace

New York, Aug. 7—A symphony orchestra never sounds better than within the superb proportions of Brooklyn's shabby academy of music. And no other orchestra ever sounds better there or anywhere else than the wowser which the masterful Dr Serge Koussevitsky parades every so often every season down from Boston

For the doctor and his band all the music lovers over the river turn out. Even the borough's manorial aristocrats break through the cobwebs before their ancestral doors. Brooklyn's aristocrats consider the oldest name in Manhattan's social register a little parvenu, but they yield to Koussevitsky. The dowagers come and even the sky gray spinsters fit their herringboned hips into the academy's happily wide seats. They do not cheer. They did not cheer even when Koussevitsky conducted Finlandia as Sibelius dreamed it might be conducted. But they applauded until their ivory cheeks grew pink above their high-necked dresses.

And doubtless they applaud the Koussevitsky plan for an international festival of music to insure the success of the coming world peace conference. Over their teacups they may wonder why the doctor didn't suggest a Brooklyn festival which would amount practically to the same thing, but they approve.

Koussevitsky favors an international festival because he is a world citizen for all that he has his shop in Boston and sells so much of his wares in Brooklyn. He was conducted orchestras in Russia, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy and England. And in most of them he has played his bull fiddle. When he was a boy in Russia he conducted imaginary orchestras, but he started his career in music on the double bass.

The Moscow conservatory had a bull fiddle scholarship open, and he was so poor he had to have a scholarship, so he stood up like a man to the huge sepulchral instrument. He was still determined to be a conductor and at first he loafed at his new job. He was so lax that his teacher was inclined to give him up, but when he turned over a new leaf he grew incredibly good. In the end he was a soloist, although soloists on the double bass are almost as rare as soloists on the tympani. He was, in fact, the best bull fiddle player in the world.

He was also, to some degree, a political revolutionist. The czar was still reigning over Russia and every intelligent citizen, Kousseyitsky said, participated in the revolution. His participation resulted in a hurried flight from the country, but not until he took a wife.

One day at a concert he saw a pretty girl listening intently to the music while the bulk of the audience talked. Such good taste, he felt, deserved a notable reward so he married her. And they went abroad and then returned. They went abroad again while he conducted here and there. And then they came to this country.

The Koussevitsky American career began 20 years ago when he took over the down-at-heels Boston symphony. He put his sonorous double bass aside, but he made his orchestra good beyond compare, and in proof has honorary degrees galore. Seventy now, he spends his summers in his famous Berkshire music center, his winters in his symphonic home town, and his spare moments wishing he had time to play his bull fiddle. With the musical world at his feet he still would like to go back to the intrument that was forced upon him, and sometimes weeps because, worse luck, he never can find the time. If his plan for the international festival goes through, he may dust it off for a solo or so.

LIBBY, MONT.
NEWS

AUG 10 1944

Five Low Notes Added To Play New Symphony

BOSTON.—The bass clarinet has hit a new note with the Boston Symphony orchestra. For its first performance of the Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony the Boston orchestra introduced the new instrument, which has five new low notes below the usual final bass. The instrument's lowest tone is equivalent to the lowest A-flat on a piano. Rosario Mezzeo, bass clarinetist of the orchestra, spent several months perfecting the instrument to get the exact effect wanted by the composer.

YORK, N.Y.
ALD TRIBUNE

UG 1 3 1944

Soloists for ber Programs

phony Members
Concert Series

eeks on Sunday and
ngs at 8:30 the prin-
her members of the hony Orchestra will
ton's New England
The series of four ch of which will be will be devoted to smaller forms. The ow:

13-14; conductor, Bernard

erto No. 3 in G major (for ree violas, three violoncellos
ch; Serenade in C minor.
o oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons), Mozart; "Kindercontralto and orchestra,
Mary Davenport; "Tre Ricer-

20-21; conductor, G. Wal-uses from "Solomon," Han-ee Club and Radcliffe Choral to in C major (for three nd orchestra), Bach, soloists

h, Sylvia Marlowe, Daniel phony in E-flat, K. 319, Mo-
tradances and Minuet, Bee-

27-28; the Boston Society of
ents, Alfred Zighero director.
viola da gamba and harpsi-
Sonata (viola da gamba and Bach; Suite in C major (for harpsichord), Telemann.
e Players Club, Georges Lau-
ctor.
violoncelo and piano), Weber.
violin, viola, violoncello and

pt. 3-4; conductor, Richard

s (arr. Mitropoulos), Purcell;
Variations, according to the
ments, for strings and piano.
lo pianist Lukas Foss; Two
tring Orchestra, Op. 11, Shos-
renade for Strings, Op. 48.

Koussevitsky~~—~~His Music
May ~~Help~~ in the Peace.

nds better than within the supe demy of Music. And no other orche here else than the wowser which t fiddle scholarship open, and he was poor he had to have a scholarship, he stood up like a man to the hu sepulchral instrument. He was still termined to be a conductor, and at fi he loafed at his new job. He was lax that his teacher was inclined give him up, but then he turned ove new leaf and grew to be incredi good. In the end he was a solo although soloists on the double b are almost as rare as soloists on tympani. He was, in fact, the bull fiddle player in the world.

One day at a concert he saw a pr girl listening intently to the mu
while the bulk of the audience tal
Such good taste, he felt, deserve notable reward so he married her.
they went abroad and then retur
and then they went abroad again w
he conducted here and there. And t
they came to this country.

The Koussevitzky American ca
began twenty years ago when he t
over the down-at-heels Boston S phony. He put his sonorous do bass aside, but he made his orche
good beyond compare, and in proof honorary degrees galore. Seventy n
he spends his summers in his fam
Berkshire music center, his winter
his symphonic home town, and spare moments wishing he had tim play his bull fiddle. With the mus world at his feet he still wishes
could go back to the instrument t
was forced upon him, and someti
weeps because, worse luck, he ne can find the time. If his plan for international festival goes through,
may dust it off for a solo or two.

DELOS W. LOVELAC

---

ed additional patrons heard the ncert by purchasing general ad-ssions to the grounds.

Tomorrow afternoon's program,
e last of this year's festival, will ve the services of Robert Casa-sus, the distinguished French anist, as soloist in the D major Coronation" concerto (K 537).

The orchestral works on the pro-am will include the serenade in minor for wind instruments
K 388) "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"
K 525) and the "Jupiter" symhony (K 551).

WONDER OF WORLD OF ENTERTAINMENT: THE ESPLANADE

SECOND THOUGHTS OF A FIRST-NIGHTER

BY ELLIOT NORTON

THE wonder of the entertainment world at this time is an outdoor thing, the concert season by the Boston orchestra on the Esplanade. More than 150,000 persons, for a very conservative estimate, are attending these concerts every week. This is a great many more than attend the professional ball games and, although the orchestra gives only six performances a week and he gave 30 during seven dreary days at the RKO Boston Theatre, it is 35,000 more than Frank Sinatra attracted at the peak of his popularity. That is something to ponder. It could be the beginning of the milennium.

ELLIOT NORTON

The wonder of it is that the orchestra is not presenting swing or sway, but the world's most pretentious music. A further marvel is that no one is under any kind of obligation, social or other, to go; there can be only one reason for attendance, a desire for pleasure and enjoyment.

There are some musical events which are good enough and worthy enough but which are patronized largely by those who feel that it is a prudent thing to be present, what with the society reporters being there and perhaps photographers, too. But if the society editors attend the Esplanade it is because they like music and for no other reason. Though they are given at the foot of Beacon Hill, the Esplanade concerts are not fashionable. You can tell that at a glance, or by the way the audiences behave.

FEWER THAN 2000 AT FIRST ONE

THERE were fewer than 2000 people present on the night of July 4, 1929, when the first of the Esplanade concerts was given. The attendance didn't get much larger than that during the first season. Mr. Fiedler and his musicians, all recruited from the Boston Symphony orchestra, made their programmes cautiously in those days, not knowing what such an audience would accept. There had been dullards around to warn that the whole idea was silly, that fine music was for fine people only and not for the mob. Mr. Fiedler didn't believe this but he moved carefully.

For the first programmes, he gave them beer-garden music—Strauss waltzes, march medleys, musical comedy medleys and an occasional group of opera arias, with instrumental soloists taking the melodies carried in opera by the human voice. From such music, played with the remarkable precision which distinguishes the work of the Boston orchestra, Mr. Fiedler moved on to more pretentious stuff and as he grew bolder the audiences became larger, even more attentive and appreciative.

When he first tried a piano concerto, he found it advisable to give only one part of it, for fear it might prove boresome to the mightily mixed audience. Tonight, he is offering an entire Grieg concerto. In the meantime, he has presented almost every kind of fine music in its entirety. In one recent season he played the nine symphonies of Beethoven and the audience of white and colored, people of every social and racial background conceivable, were so enthralled and so elated that he was forced to do all nine of them over again the following year. The next season he did the four Brahms symphonies and was similarly required to repeat those.

TWENTY THOUSAND EACH EVENING

TWENTY THOUSAND people sit on the camp chairs or on the grass of the Esplanade night after night, six nights a week, and listen with eager interest and with increasingly sharp perception to Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra. They are not the audience of the Friday Symphony concerts, though some of the Friday group appear; they are a cross-section of democratic America, proving by their presence that great music and, if you please, great art of any kind, is something which the average man and woman will accept and embrace if it is properly presented.

For a good many years, the programmes which are distributed at these concerts contained only the bare facts, the name of the works to be played and the identity of the composers. These programmes were thrown away by one and all. Attendants will tell you with a shudder that it took three hours every night to pick them up. Three or four years ago, Laning Humphreys of the concert staff conceived the idea of making a larger programme to include information about the music and the composers. Now the folks keep their programmes and take them home to read and discuss. Not only do they like the music, but they also want to know something about it and the people who wrote it.

It seems to me worth stressing that this nightly audience, larger even than the record crowds which attended the professional hockey games in the pre-war days, is not a one-class group. It is not the old Back Bay, or Beacon Hill, or Chestnut Hill either. These sections are represented, but so is every neighborhood in the city. This is not the old Boston, the old Hub of the Universe of the last century, but the new one rising on the cultural ashes of the old.

COUNT BASIE NEEDN'T WORRY

IT IS not likely that Count Basie's band is headed for doom and destruction in a new wave of musical appreciation, though that might not be a bad thing. It is certain that the Guy Lombardos and the Duke Ellingtons and most of the rest of the sweets and the hots will continue to prosper and that will be a good thing. There is no evidence of a cultural revolution; this is just a coming of age, an awakening. There will always be jitterbugs or their equivalents. The encouraging thing is that there is now a great and intelligent audience for something better.

The Esplanade concerts are a credit to Boston and an inspiration. Their success is a wonderful tribute to Mr. Fiedler and his musicians.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 7 - 1944

TANGLEWOOD ENDS MOZART FESTIVAL

2,000 Attend Each of the Last 2 Koussevitzky Concerts—Posselt, Casadesus Heard

By MARK A. SCHUBART
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PITTSFIELD, Mass., Aug. 6—The Berkshire Mozart Festival came to an end at Tanglewood this afternoon with the last of four all-Mozart concerts by an orchestra made up of thirty-eight principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. More than 2,000 people attended each of the last two concerts for which Ruth Posselt, violinist, and Robert Casadesus, pianist, were soloists.

Organized originally to keep alive the tradition of music at the Boston Orchestra's summer home, despite wartime problems, the Mozart festival actually accomplished more than its avowed purpose. For it has clearly shown, through its devoted audiences, that a series of concerts such as this one, designed primarily to serve the musical needs of a summer community, have a concrete and important place on the American scene.

In pre-war years, when transportation was relatively a simple matter, thousands of persons came from all over the country to hear the full Boston Symphony in works from the standard repertoire. The Mozart Festival, however, had much more of the quality of a community affair, as a majority of its patrons live in Pittsfield, Stockbridge, Lenox, and other near-by communities. That it could be a popular as well as an artistic triumph under these conditions offers encouragement to similar musical plans in other localities.

Resemble European Fêtes

Not every community, it is true, could obtain the services of a Koussevitzky or of first desk men of the incomparable Boston Symphony. But even more important than the excellence of the music was the neighborly quality of the festival, which created the setting for the music and gave it significance and flavor. Certainly the comparisons drawn between the Berkshire programs and the famous European festivals were neither idle nor unjustified.

That Dr. Koussevitzky is not unaware of the potentialities of this festival must be taken for granted, since he not only expressed himself as being eminently pleased with the results, but committed himself to further musical activity at Tanglewood next year, war or no war. Just what sort of festival would be given Dr. Koussevitzky could not say, but there will be music at Tanglewood and it will be the best Dr. Koussevitzky can furnish.

As far as standards of performances are concerned, this week-end's concerts were fully as good as last week-end's. Outstanding among last evening's offerings was a truly extraordinary performance of the great E-flat major symphony (K 543), which seemed to be one of those rare readings in which conductor and orchestra are fired by a common enthusiasm and play with a taut excitement which produces the most telling performances. Other orchestral works on the program were the early symphony in G minor (K 183), which is strangely prophetic of the much later and much more famous work in the same key, and the overture to "Idomeneo, Re di Creta" (K 366).

Miss Posselt's vehicle for the evening was the charming D major concerto (K 218), which she played with enthusiasm and skill. Like most Mozart concertos, this one is cruelly difficult, since almost every note of the solo part is clearly exposed, and there can be no "covering up" by the orchestra. Miss Posselt's playing did not escape from this trial unscathed, especially since her style leans more toward the romantic than toward the classic. But her interpretation of the work had great energy and vitality and won an ovation from the audience.

Today's program brought the festival to a fitting climax with the appearance of Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French pianist, as soloist in the D major "Coronation" concerto (K 537). Few artists can combine dramatic expression with stylistic distinction, as does Mr. Casadesus, a factor which made his performance outstanding.

The orchestral part of the program was designed to display the talents of the two major sections of the orchestra as it included the charming serenade in C minor (K 388) for pairs of oboes, bassoons, clarinets and horns, as well as the more familiar "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" for string orchestra. Both departments acquitted themselves with honor under Dr. Koussevitzky's meticulous direction, and the concert was brought to a close with a dashing performance of the majestic "Jupiter" symphony (K 551).

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

AUG 5 - 1944

Who's News Today:

Koussevitsky Longs for His Bull Fiddle

By Delos W. Lovelace

New York—A symphony orchestra never sounds better than within the superb proportions of Brooklyn's shabby Academy of Music. And no other orchestra ever sounds better there or anywhere else than the wowser which the masterful Dr. Serge ~~Koussevitsky~~ parades every so often every season down from Boston.

For the doctor and his band all the music lovers over the river turn out. Even the borough's manorial aristocrats break through the cobwebs before their ancestral doors. Brooklyn's aristocrats consider the oldest name in Manhattan's social register a little parvenu, but they yield to Koussevitsky. The dowagers come and even the shy gray spinsters fit their herringboned hips into the academy's happily wide seats. They do not cheer. They did not cheer even when Koussevitsky conducted "Finlandia" as Sibelius dreamed it might be conducted. But they applauded until their ivory cheeks grew pink above their high necked dresses.

And doubtless they applaud the Koussevitsky plan for an international festival of music to insure the success of the coming world peace conference. Over their teacups they may wonder why the doctor didn't suggest a Brooklyn festival which would amount practically to the same thing, but they approve.

* * *

Koussevitsky favors an international festival because he is a world citizen for all that he has his shop in Boston and sells so much of his wares in Brooklyn. He has conducted orchestras in Russia, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy and England. And in most of them he has played his bull fiddle. When he was a boy in Russia he conducted imagniary orchestras, but he started his career in music on the double bass.

The Moscow conservatory had a bull fiddle scholarship open, and he was so poor he had to have a scholarship, so he stood up like a man to the huge sepulchral instrument. He was still determined to be a conductor and at first he loafed at his new job. He was so lax that his teacher was inclined to give him up, but when he turned over a new leaf he grew incredibly good. In the end he was a soloist, although soloists on the double bass are almost as rare as soloists on the tympani. He was, in fact, the best bull fiddle player in the world.

He was also, to some degree, a political revolutionist. The czar was still reigning over Russia and every intelligent citizen, Koussevitsky said, participated in the revolution. His participation resulted in a hurried flight from the country, but not until he took a wife.

One day at a concert he saw a pretty girl listening intently to the music while the bulk of the audience talked. Such good taste, he felt, deserved a notable reward so he married her. And they went abroad and then returned. They went aboard again while he conducted here and there. And then they came to this country.

* * *

The Koussevitsky American career began 20 years ago when he took over the down-at-heels Boston symphony. He put his sonorous double bass aside, but he made his orchestras good beyond compare, and in proof has honorary degrees galore.

Seventy now, he spends his summers in his famous Berkshire music center, his winters in his symphonic home town, and his spare moments wishing he had time to play his bull fiddle. With the musical world at his feet he still would like to go back to the instrument that was forced upon him, and sometimes weeps because, worse luck, he never can find the time. If his plan for the international festival goes through, he may dust it off for a solo or so.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 7 - 1944

Who's News Today

By Delos W. Lovelace

New York, Aug. 7—A symphony orchestra never sounds better than within the superb proportions of Brooklyn's shabby academy of music. And no other orchestra ever sounds better there or anywhere else than the wowser which the masterful Dr Serge Koussevitsky parades every so often ~~every season~~ down from Boston

For the doctor and his band all the music lovers over the river turn out. Even the borough's manorial aristocrats break through the cobwebs before their ancestral doors. Brooklyn's aristocrats consider the oldest name in Manhattan's social register a little parvenu, but they yield to Koussevitsky. The dowagers come and even the sky gray spinsters fit their herringboned hips into the academy's happily wide seats. They do not cheer. They did not cheer even when Koussevitsky conducted Finlandia as Sibelius dreamed it might be conducted. But they applauded until their ivory cheeks grew pink above their high-necked dresses.

And doubtless they applaud the Koussevitsky plan for an international festival of music to insure the success of the coming world peace conference. Over their teacups they may wonder why the doctor didn't suggest a Brooklyn festival which would amount practically to the same thing, but they approve.

Koussevitsky favors an international festival because he is a world citizen for all that he has his shop in Boston and sells so much of his wares in Brooklyn. He was conducted orchestras in Russia, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy and England. And in most of them he has played his bull fiddle. When he was a boy in Russia he conducted imaginary orchestras but he started his career in music on the double bass.

The Moscow conservatory had a bull fiddle scholarship open, and he was so poor he had to have a scholarship, so he stood up like a man to the huge sepulchral instrument. He was still determined to be a conductor and at first he loafed at his new job. He was so lax that his teacher was inclined to give him up, but when he turned over a new leaf he grew incredibly good. In the end he was a soloist, although soloists on the double bass are almost as rare as soloists or the tympani. He was, in fact, the best bull fiddle player in the world.

He was also, to some degree, a political revolutionist. The czar was still reigning over Russia and every intelligent citizen, Koussevitsky said participated in the revolution. His participation resulted in a hurried flight from the country, but not until he took a wife.

One day at a concert he saw a pretty girl listening intently to the music while the bulk of the audience talked. Such good taste, he felt, deserved a notable reward so he married her. And they went abroad and then returned. They went abroad again while he conducted here and there. And then they came to this country.

The Koussevitsky American career began 20 years ago when he took over the down-at-heels Boston symphony. He put his sonorous double bass aside, but he made his orchestra good beyond compare, and in proof has honorary degrees galore. Seventy now, he spends his summers in his famous Berkshire music center, his winters in his symphonic home town, and his spare moments wishing he had time to play his bull fiddle. With the musical world at his feet he still would like to go back to the intrument that was forced upon him, and sometimes weeps because, worse luck, he never can find the time. If his plan for the international festival goes through, he may dust it off for a solo or so.

LIBBY, MONT.
NEWS

AUG 1 0 1944

Five Low Notes Added To Play New Symphony

BOSTON.—The bass clarinet has hit a new note with the Boston Symphony orchestra. For its first performance of the Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony the Boston orchestra introduced the new instrument, which has five new low notes below the usual final bass. The instrument's lowest tone is equivalent to the lowest A-flat on a piano. Rosario Mezzeo, bass clarinetist of the orchestra, spent several months perfecting the instrument to get the exact effect wanted by the composer.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS
AUG 20 1944

Born to make MUSIC

BY BETTY A. DIETZ

Birthday Anniversaries This Week: Leonard Bernstein, Aug. 25, 1918; Jacopo Peri, Aug. 20, 1561; Ernst Krenek, Aug. 23, 1900; Queena Mario, Aug. 21, 1896; Maud Powell, Aug. 22, 1868; Claude Debussy, Aug. 22, 1862.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, the symphonic sensation of the year, goes in for snappy bow ties and close haircuts. He has been called the "most exciting white boogie-woogie player," but his serious piano is big-time too. He writes both swing and symphonies.

Bernstein

Ten months ago his was just another name. Just another name until unrehearsed, he stepped onto the podium at Carnegie hall to substitute for Bruno Walter last November. Bernstein, who had only celebrated his 25th birthday the previous Aug. 25, became the youngest man ever to conduct a New York Philharmoni· subscription program. The young man, who three months before had been signed by Rodzinski as assistant conductor, found himself up to his ears in fame.

And only five years before, Bernstein claims, he "didn't know a baton from a tree trunk."

Music has always been important to young Bernstein. As a youngster he used to sit for hours at the piano with his sister, Shirley, sing favorite arias. Later at Harvard he majored in music and spent most of his time on composition and piano. Adding conducting to his schedule, he studied with Fritz Reiner and eventually Koussevitzky, with whom Bernstein shares a passion for modern music, gave him a scholarship at Tanglewood. Within two years, both men stepped aside to let the younger conductor direct his own symphony, Jeremiah.

The Jeremiah symphony, incidentally, was written in a mad dash to get under the deadline of a contest he didn't win. A number of loyal friends were on hand at write in key signatures and bars for the 102 pages of the work.

The "pin-up boy of the podium," as the handsome young musician has been called, has been swamped with sweet-smelling letters and deluged with telephone calls—a la Sinatra—since his phenominal debut. Even more time-absorbing are the new duties which have come his way recently. In the first three days following the Carnegie hall episode, for instance, he faced a battery of photographers for a total of 110 pictures. Warner Brothers even offered him a test for the leading role in the film on George Gershwin. He is now scoring a production for a run on Broadway.

About his conducting, authorities agree that he holds immeasurable promise for the future. Eloquence and fire—uninhibited emotionalism—magnetism—basic honesty—with all these Bernstein has been credited. One writer, commenting upon his gesturing and intense concentration went so far as to predict that some day he will "destroy himself on the podium."

Kostelanetz, Pons Back From Overseas

NEW YORK, Aug. 19.—Lily Pons, Metropolitan Opera soprano, and her conductor-husband, Andre Kostelanetz, arrived Wednesday night at La Guardia Field aboard an air transport command plane after a three-month USO-sponsored concert tour of North Africa, Italy and the Persian gulf area.

GALLUP, N. M.
INDEPENDENT
AUG 11 1944

A LITTLE OF EVERYTHING

By WALLACE BARNES

David Rubinoff, whom members and guests of the Kiwanis club were privileged to meet and hear Thursday noon, not only lived up to his reputation as a violin artist, but also revealed an engaging personality and a keen sense of humor. Although handicapped by the lack of an accompanist he played a composition of his own, "The Dance of the Russian Peasant," and Victor Herbert's well known number, "Ah Sweet Mystery of Life," dedicating the latter to the people of Gallup as a tribute to their men in the armed forces. In conclusion he lead his audience in "The Star Spangled Banner."

* * *

Of almost as much interest to his hearers as his musical renditions were the artist's references to his early struggles and his glowing tribute to America as the land of opportunity. "The United States government asked me to appear before school children all over this country to impress upon them something of what American liberty means," he said. "I am not a public speaker. My English is poor and my accent pronounced. When I appear with Eddie Cantor over the radio I have a stooge do the talking for me and he makes it even worse than I do. But I have been telling boys and girls that if they amount to anything, they have to do it themselves, not accept everything on a silver platter. I used to walk eight miles to and from school in Russia. My parents were poor. It was a struggle to get schooling and training. God has been good to me. I won the degree of a doctor in music at the age of 14 and an American gentleman became interested in me and brought our whole family to America. I lived for a year in the home of Victor Herbert. He told me America was the land of freedom—that I could go as far as I wanted to and I have found it true America is the greatest land in the world."

* * *

Rubinoff said he regarded the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the greatest symphony orchestra in the entire world, with the Philadelphia Symphony second and the New York Philharmonic third. The violin on which he played here was not his famous $100,000 Stradivarius, he said, but one made especially for him by a Baltimore man. It bears carvings of his head and face—"its greatest weakness," he remarked. With a keen sense of humor he told the story of a Jewish storekeeper in Ireland who had advertised a sale of American cigarettes for which a long queue of customers formed. The little Jew tried to approach the door of his store and every time he did so somebody jerked him back in line with threats of bodily punishment. Finally a policeman came along and demanded to know the trouble. The Jew meekly said, "I tell you, if this big man hit me again, I won't open the store!"

MUSIC

N. E. MUTUAL HALL
Symphony Chamber Concert

By JOHN WILLIAM RILEY

The second program of the Boston Symphony Chamber Concerts, which G. Wallace Woodworth conducted in New England Mutual Hall last evening, was one the listener could savor and wish to hear again. Music of Handel, Bach, Mozart and Beethoven was nicely complementary.

Of Handel, Mr. Woodworth offered excerpts from the oratorio, "Solomon," for which he recruited a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. The small group produced a homogeneous tone in which the parts shone with utmost clarity.

Bach's Concerto in C Major for Three Harpsichords recalled the concerts of four or more pianos given in New York and Chicago in recent seasons. Although no one actually said as much, readers were given to understand that concerts by massed pianos were something n[illegible] as often happens, Bach was ahead of the game. He wrote three for two claviers, two for three claviers and orchestra (D and C major). Bach does surprising and inventive things with this odd combination. Mr. Woodworth led the piece along at a sprightly pace while his soloists, Putnam Aldrich, Sylvia Marlowe and Daniel Pinkham, played very neatly indeed.

After the interval we heard the plain but gay little Symphony in B-flat (K. 319) of Mozart and Six Contradances and Two Minuets of Beethoven, all without opus number Symphony Series Opened

---

– August 14, 1944 –

ames Abresch

Mary Davenport

Soloist in Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder" at the first of the Boston Symphony's summer series of concerts.

Mary Davenport Is Soloist, Bernard Zighera Conductor

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Mary Davenport, contralto, gave the opening event of the Chamber Music Concerts of the Boston Symphony its particular character at New England Mutual Hall last night, taking the vocal solo part in Mahler's songs that go under the title of "Kindertotenlieder."

Miss Davenport is one of those singers who know precisely what to do and how to manage, carrying a melody to accompaniment of a condensed orchestral group. There is something about this type of task that mere good tone and skillful execution cannot alone take care of. A highly sensitive musician and masterfully alert interpreter are demanded; somebody the artistic peers of the players, somebody who understands ensemble, and somebody who can dominate the situation without, at the same time, overtopping it.

* * *

Instrumentalists like the Boston Symphony front desk men, who compose the foundation membership of the summer chamber orchestra, seem to know where to go to find such a singer; and there always seems to be one available somewhere. Strange, too; because opportunity for practice and experience in the line is very small indeed. Perhaps tact for the special sort of performance is worked into by thought and imagination rather than by drill and instruction.

At any rate, Miss Davenport made a success of the five pieces comprised in her part of the program, her voice being at once excellent at speech (English text used) and ideal for blending with the rich, varied, and beautiful tone coloring of Mahler's assemblage of strings, wood and brass.

Times come when Mahler captivates, and here was one of them. What a great advance the modern orchestral ensemble is over the old paired group of executants became evident when the "Kindertotenlieder" as a piece was considered in comparison with the Mozart Serenade in C minor for oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons. That eighteenth-century bald mechanism is indeed happily outgrown.

* * *

Nevertheless, take these twentieth-century notions and inventions the least bit too far, and we get an exasperatingly complicated and distressingly ingenious construction like the three-movement work of Martinů, presented for the first time in Boston, carrying the title Tre Ricercare. The Italian form known as ricercare, if it is a form, implies something written with effort. It boldly makes pretense to technical profundity; and the composer in this case lives up to all expectations. The only difficulty is going to be to make a listener like the sound of it. But the modern man is allowed to be deep in his fancyings and be a harmonic and contrapuntal virtuoso if he thinks he must; that is no more than Bach, whose Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, with which the program began, is permitted.

Seems as though certain old chamber orchestra works could safely go unconducted. A conductor, however, is the rule; and for the first of the four concerts of the series, Bernard Zighera was the man.

Aug 14

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night presented the first in a series of chamber concerts by the principals and others of the orchestra in New England Mutual Hall under the direction of Bernard Zighera. The soloist was Mary Davenport, contralto, and assisting artists were Rita LaPlante and Leo Litwin, pianists. The program was as follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G Major .... Bach
Serenade in C Minor, for wind instruments (K. 388) .... Mozart
"Kindertotenlieder," for Contralto and Orchestra .... Mahler
Tre Ricercari .... Martinu

As if it were not enough to have the opportunity to sit in the New England Mutual Hall's lovely ice box last night for a couple of hours, there was a choice group of Boston Symphony orchestra principals on hand to make some very pleasant music as the second series of its kind began, and so it would be ungrateful indeed to suggest the concert was anything but superb. And, as a matter of fact, taking things by and large, it more or less was.

The two complaints—to get them out of the way quickly—focus on the Mahler and the Martinu, the first because it wasn't too well communicated by the soloist, and the second because the piano tone seemed smothered, but whether this was because of the positions of the instruments or the acoustical value of the hall I don't know.

By their very nature, Mahler's heart rending songs of a loss of his children (and incidentally, the poems were inspired by such a loss and set prophetically to music by Mahler who was shortly afterwards to experience a similar tragedy), must be projected with overwhelming emotion. Miss Davenport, although she sometimes achieved admirable vocal quality, failed to do this, and thus the intrinsic quality of the songs was never adequately set forth. The Martinu, as exciting a contrapuntal essay in the modern idiom as comes to mind, was very brightly done by the orchestra under Mr. Zighera's crisp, clear beat, but it didn't have the clarity of line it needed.

This leaves the Brandenburg Concerto, which seems more marvelous with every hearing (and we hear it a good deal hereabouts), and the Mozart Serenade, which always has been incomparable. The orchestral force for the Brandenburg was pared down to the limit, thus making every instrumentalist a soloist, and, given their heads, they played it with enormous bite and gusto. The Mozart was exquisitely played by the first desk wind instrument players of the orchestra, moulded into virtually perfect balance by Mr. Zighera, whose conducting throughout was skillful and musical. The concert will be repeated tonight, and if it is very hot, don't miss it. As a matter of fact, don't miss it in any case.

MUSIC

Summer Symphony

The third concert in the summer series by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at New England Mutual Hall. The participants in last night's concert were members of the Society of Ancient Instruments, headed by Alfred Zighera, and of the Boston Flute Players Club, Georges Laurent directing. The program was as follows:

Sonata .... Antonio Lotti
Sonata .... J. S. Bach
Suite in C Major .. Georg Philipp Telemann
Trio for Flute, Violoncello and Piano, Op. 63 .... Weber
Suite for Flute, Violin, Viola, Violoncello and Harp .... d'Indy

The concerts of both the Boston Flute Players Club and the Society of Ancient Instruments are noteworthy as much for what they play as for the way they play it. Anyone who is interested in music off the beaten path should run, not walk, to New England Mutual Hall this evening, where members of both these groups will repeat the delightful program presented there last night.

The Society of Ancient Instruments held sway for the first part of the evening, playing some of the 18th century music that has come to Boston to be associated with them. Perhaps most enchanting was the Lotti Sonata for flute, viola da gamba and harpsichord, which is exquisite in its serenity. Mr. Zighera was joined in this by Mr. Laurent and Putnam Aldrich, who also played with him in Bach's Sonata for viola da gamba and harpsichord. The other members of the group joined Mr. Zighera and Mr. Aldrich in Telemann's Suite for four viols and harpsichord. Their ensemble work has been noted many times before, so suffice it to say that they upheld their reputation superbly.

The selections chosen by the Flute Players Club for its portion of the program were less classical, although equally unusual. Mr. Laurent played Weber's Trio for flute, 'cello, and piano with Jean Bedetti and Leo Litwin. Although it was well played, the music itself is not an unadulterated delight, being in many places thin and obvious. Far more satisfactory was the Suite by Vincent d'Indy, in which the flute and 'cello were joined by violin, viola and harp, played by Richard Burgin, Jean Le Franc, and Bernard Zighera. The music has the crispness and astringency of the modern idiom, which never lets you know just what is coming next. It sounds fiendishly difficult, and was played well-nigh perfectly.

The audience was not as large as it should have been, but perhaps tonight more people will take advantage of this rare musical treat.

D. W. S.

CHAMBER SYMPHONY

The plastic acoustical qualities which proved annoying at least week's concerts were not present last evening, happily, as Leo Litwin, pianist; Bernard Zighera, playing the harp, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichordist, joined forces of the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments and members of what is known as the Boston Flute Players' Club to present the third and next to the last programme in the current Chamber Symphony series at New England Mutual Hall. The list will be repeated tonight.

The opening half of the concert assembled three period pieces: a Sonata for flute, viola de gamba and harpsichord by Antonio Lotti, another for the last two named instruments by J. S. Bach, and a grand Suite in C by a contemporary of these composers who was quite highly regarded in his time, Georg Philipp Telemann. The Telemann, written for four viols and harpsichord, fairly scintillated in all its 18th century brilliance; somehow seemed completely in place in the ultra-modern surroundings of Mutual Hall.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER
AUG 20 1944

THE summer is passing on and most of the summer music series have come to an end and the few remaining will close within the next two or three weeks. Then the musicians will have a short rest before time to take up the winter music. It is time now to think about the 1944-45 season and many of the leading orchestras and opera companies have announced their plans. The local season will be of especial interest. The Tri-City Symphony orchestra will present Zinka Milanov, soprano of the Metropolitan, Patricia Travers, youthful violinist, James Melton, distinguished American tenor and Jesus Maria Sanroma, Cuban pianist of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Civic Music association has listed Fritz Kreisler, world famous violinist, Thomas L. Thomas, Welsh radio singer and Alexander Uninsky, Russian pianist.

OUTSIDE OF OUR

. . . own season probably the ones of most interest are those in Chicago and each week many Tri-citians go to that city to hear the music. Last season the Chicago Opera company did not put on any performances. There were many protests but it was thought best to wait until this season. Therefore the only opera in Chicago was that given in April by the Metropolitan Opera company. Plans have been made this year to begin the fall season of opera in Chicago on Oct. 16 and continue for five weeks, thru Nov. 18 with performances each Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday nights and on Saturday afternoon.

THE OPERA'S

. . . repertoire while not yet complete includes such familiar items as "Aida," "Otello," "Rigoletto," "Traviata," "Il Trovatore," "Carmen," "Pelleas and Melisande," "Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," "La Bohme," and "Die Walkure." The last named has not been heard in Chicago since 1940 when Lauritz Melchior and Kirsten Flagstad presented it.

[103]

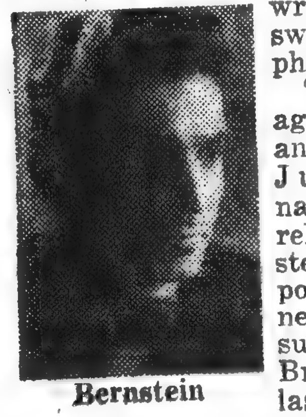
DAYTON, O.
NEWS
AUG 20 1944

Born to make MUSIC

BY BETTY A. DIETZ

Birthday Anniversaries This Week: Leonard Bernstein, Aug. 25, 1918; Jacopo Peri, Aug. 20, 1561; Ernst Krenek, Aug. 23, 1900; Queena Mario, Aug. 21, 1896; Maud Powell, Aug. 22, 1868; Claude Debussy, Aug. 22, 1862.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, the symphonic sensation of the year, goes in for snappy bow ties and close haircuts. He has been called the "most exciting white boogie-woogie player," but his serious piano is big-time too. He writes both swing and symphonies.



Bernstein

Ten months ago his was just another name. Just another name until unrehearsed, he stepped onto the podium at Carnegie hall to substitute for Bruno Walter last November. Bernstein, who had only celebrated his 25th birthday the previous Aug. 25, became the youngest man ever to conduct a New York Philharmoni subscription program. The young man, who three months before had been signed by Rodzinski as assistant conductor, found himself up to his ears in fame.

And only five years before, Bernstein claims, he "didn't know a baton from a tree trunk."

Music has always been important to young Bernstein. As a youngster he used to sit for hours at the piano with his sister, Shirley, sing favorite arias. Later at Harvard he majored in music and spent most of his time on composition and piano. Adding conducting to his schedule, he studied with Fritz Reiner and eventually Koussevitzky, with whom Bernstein shares a passion for modern music, gave him a scholarship at Tanglewood. Within two years, both men stepped aside to let the younger conductor direct his own symphony, Jeremiah.

The Jeremiah symphony, incidentally, was written in a mad dash to get under the deadline of a contest he didn't win. A number of loyal friends were on hand at write in key signatures and bars for the 102 pages of the work.

The "pin-up boy of the podium," as the handsome young musician has been called, has been swamped with sweet-smelling letters and deluged with telephone calls—a la Sinatra—since his phenominal debut. Even more time-absorbing are the new duties which have come his way recently. In the first three days following the Carnegie hall episode, for instance, he faced a battery of photographers for a total of 110 pictures. Warner Brothers even offered him a test for the leading role in the film on George Gershwin. He is now scoring a production for a run on Broadway.

About his conducting, authorities agree that he holds immeasurable promise for the future. Eloquence and fire—uninhibited emotionalism—magnetism—basic honesty—with all these Bernstein has been credited. One writer, commenting upon his gesturing and intense concentration went so far as to predict that some day he will "destroy himself on the podium."

Kostelanetz, Pons Back From Overseas

NEW YORK, Aug. 19.—Lily Pons, Metropolitan Opera soprano, and her conductor-husband, Andre Kostelanetz, arrived Wednesday night at La Guardia Field aboard an air transport command plane after a three month USO-sponsored concert tour of North Africa, Italy and the Persian gulf area.

MUSIC

N. E. MUTUAL HALL

Symphony Chamber Concert

By JOHN WILLIAM RILEY

The second program of the Boston Symphony Chamber Concerts, which G. Wallace Woodworth conducted in New England Mutual Hall last evening, was one the listener could savor and wish to hear again. Music of Handel, Bach, Mozart and Beethoven was nicely complementary.

Of Handel, Mr. Woodworth offered excerpts from the oratorio, "Solomon," for which he recruited a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. The small group produced a homogeneous tone in which the parts shone with utmost clarity.

Bach's Concerto in C Major for Three Harpsichords recalled the concerts of four or more pianos given in New York and Chicago in recent seasons. Although no one actually said as much, readers were given to understand that concerts by massed pianos were something n[illegible]. As often happens, Bach was ahead of the game. He wrote three for two claviers, two for three claviers and orchestra (D and C major). Bach does surprising and inventive things with this odd combination. Mr. Woodworth led the piece along at a sprightly pace while his soloists, Putnam Aldrich, Sylvia Marlowe and Daniel Pinkham, played very neatly indeed.

After the interval we heard the plain but gay little Symphony in B-flat (K. 319) of Mozart and Six Contradances and Two Minuets of Beethoven, all without opus num-

---

GALLUP, N. M.
INDEPENDENT
AUG 11 1944

A LITTLE OF EVERYTHING

By WALLACE BARNES

David Rubinoff, whom members and guests of the Kiwanis club were privileged to meet and hear Thursday noon, not only lived up to his reputation as a violin artist, but also revealed an engaging personality and a keen sense of humor. Although handicapped by the lack of an accompanist he played a composition of his own, "The Dance of the Russian Peasant," and Victor Herbert's well known number, "Ah Sweet Mystery of Life," dedicating the latter to the people of Gallup as a tribute to their men in the armed forces. In conclusion he lead his audience in "The Star Spangled Banner."

* * *

Of almost as much interest to is hearers as his musical renditions were the artist's references o his early struggles and his glowng tribute to America as the land f opportunity. "The United States overnment asked me to appear efore school children all over this ountry to impress upon them omething of what American liberty means," he said. "I am not a ublic speaker. My English is poor nd my accent pronounced. When appear with Eddie Cantor over he radio I have a stooge do the alking for me and he makes it ven worse than I do. But I have een telling boys and girls that if hey amount to anything, they have o do it themselves, not accept everything on a silver platter. I used to walk eight miles to and rom school in Russia. My parents were poor. It was a struggle o get schooling and training. God has been good to me. I won the degree of a doctor in music at the age of 14 and an American gentleman became interested in me and brought our whole family to America. I lived for a year in the home of Victor Herbert. He told me America was the land of freedom—that I could go as far as I wanted to and I have found it true America is the greatest land in the world."

* * *

Rubinoff said he regarded the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the greatest symphony orchestra in the entire world, with the Philadelphia Symphony second and the New York Philharmonic third. The violin on which he played here was not his famous $100,000 Stradivarius, he said, but one made especially for him by a Baltimore man. It bears carvings of his head and face—"its greatest weakness," he remarked. With a keen sense of humor he told the story of a Jewish storekeeper in Ireland who had advertised a sale of American cigarettes for which a long queue of customers formed. The little Jew tried to approach the door of his store and every time he did so somebody jerked him back in line with threats of bodily punishment. Finally a policeman came along and demanded to know the trouble. The Jew meekly said, "I tell you, if this big man hit me again, I won't open the store!"

* * *

---

ber Symphony Series Opened

— August 14, 1944 —

Mary Davenport Is Soloist, Bernard Zighera Conductor

By Winthrop P. Tryon

ames Abresch

Mary Davenport

Soloist in Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder" at the first of the Boston Symphony's summer series of concerts.

Mary Davenport, contralto, gave the opening event of the Chamber Music Concerts of the Boston Symphony its particular character at New England Mutual Hall last night, taking the vocal solo part in Mahler's songs that go under the title of "Kindertotenlieder."

Miss Davenport is one of those singers who know precisely what to do and how to manage, carrying a melody to accompaniment of a condensed orchestral group. There is something about this type of task that mere good tone and skillful execution cannot alone take care of. A highly sensitive musician and masterfully alert interpreter are demanded; somebody the artistic peers of the players, somebody who understands ensemble, and somebody who can dominate the situation without, at the same time, overtopping it.

* * *

Instrumentalists like the Boston Symphony front desk men, who compose the foundation membership of the summer chamber orchestra, seem to know where to go to find such a singer: and there always seems to be one available somewhere. Strange, too; because opportunity for practice and experience in the line is very small indeed. Perhaps tact for the special sort of performance is worked into by thought and imagination rather than by drill and instruction.

At any rate, Miss Davenport made a success of the five pieces comprised in her part of the program, her voice being at once excellent at speech (English text used) and ideal for blending with the rich, varied, and beautiful tone coloring of Mahler's assemblage of strings, wood and brass.

Times come when Mahler captivates, and here was one of them. What a great advance the modern orchestral ensemble is over the old paired group of executants became evident when the "Kindertotenlieder" as a piece was considered in comparison with the Mozart Serenade in C minor for oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons. That eighteenth-century bald mechanism is indeed happily outgrown.

* * *

Nevertheless, take these twentieth-century notions and inventions the least bit too far, and we get an exasperatingly complicated and distressingly ingenious construction like the three-movement work of Martinū, presented for the first time in Boston, carrying the title Tre Ricercare. The Italian form known as ricercare, if it is a form, implies something written with effort. It boldly makes pretense to technical profundity; and the composer in this case lives up to all expectations. The only difficulty is going to be to make a listener like the sound of it. But the modern man is allowed to be deep in his fancyings and be a harmonic and contrapuntal virtuoso if he thinks he must; that is no more than Bach, whose Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, with which the program began, is permitted.

Seems as though certain old chamber orchestra works could safely go unconducted. A conductor, however, is the rule; and for the first of the four concerts of the series, Bernard Zighera was the man.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night presented the first in a series of chamber concerts by the principals and others of the orchestra in New England Mutual Hall under the direction of Bernard Zighera. The soloist was Mary Davenport, contralto, and assisting artists were Rita LaPlante and Leo Litwin, pianists. The program was as follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G Major	Bach
Serenade in C Minor, for wind instruments (K. 388)	Mozart
"Kindertotenlieder," for Contralto and Orchestra	Mahler
Tre Ricercari	Martinu

As if it were not enough to have the opportunity to sit in the New England Mutual Hall's lovely ice box last night for a couple of hours, there was a choice group of Boston Symphony orchestra principals on hand to make some very pleasant music as the second series of its kind began, and so it would be ungrateful indeed to suggest the concert was anything but superb. And, as a matter of fact, taking things by and large, it more or less was.

The two complaints—to get them out of the way quickly—focus on the Mahler and the Martinu, the first because it wasn't too well communicated by the soloist, and the second because the piano tone seemed smothered, but whether this was because of the positions of the instruments or the acoustical value of the hall I don't know.

By their very nature, Mahler's heart rending songs of a loss of his children (and incidentally, the poems were inspired by such a loss and set prophetically to music by Mahler who was shortly afterwards to experience a similar tragedy), must be projected with overwhelming emotion. Miss Davenport, although she sometimes achieved admirable vocal quality, failed to do this, and thus the intrinsic quality of the songs was never adequately set forth. The Martinu, as exciting a contrapuntal essay in the modern idiom as comes to mind, was very brightly done by the orchestra under Mr. Zighera's crisp, clear beat, but it didn't have the clarity of line it needed.

This leaves the Brandenburg Concerto, which seems more marvelous with every hearing (and we hear it a good deal hereabouts), and the Mozart Serenade, which always has been incomparable. The orchestral force for the Brandenburg was pared down to the limit, thus making every instrumentalist a soloist, and, given their heads, they played it with enormous bite and gusto. The Mozart was exquisitely played by the first desk wind instrument players of the orchestra, moulded into virtually perfect balance by Mr. Zighera, whose conducting throughout was skillful and musical. The concert will be repeated tonight, and if it is very hot, don't miss it. As a matter of fact, don't miss it in any case.

MUSIC

Summer Symphony

The third concert in the summer series by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at New England Mutual Hall. The participants in last night's concert were members of the Society of Ancient Instruments, headed by Alfred Zighera, and of the Boston Flute Players Club, Georges Laurent directing. The program was as follows:

Sonata	Antonio Lotti
Sonata	J. S. Bach
Suite in C Major	Georg Philipp Telemann
Trio for Flute, Violoncello and Piano, Op. 63	Weber
Suite for Flute, Violin, Viola, Violoncello and Harp	d'Indy

The concerts of both the Boston Flute Players Club and the Society of Ancient Instruments are noteworthy as much for what they play as for the way they play it. Anyone who is interested in music off the beaten path should run, not walk, to New England Mutual Hall this evening, where members of both these groups will repeat the delightful program presented there last night.

The Society of Ancient Instruments held sway for the first part of the evening, playing some of the 18th century music that has come to Boston to be associated with them. Perhaps most enchanting was the Lotti Sonata for flute, viola da gamba and harpsichord, which is exquisite in its serenity. Mr. Zighera was joined in this by Mr. Laurent and Putnam Aldrich, who also played with him in Bach's Sonata for viola da gamba and harpsichord. The other members of the group joined Mr. Zighera and Mr. Aldrich in Telemann's Suite for four viols and harpsichord. Their ensemble work has been noted many times before, so suffice it to say that they upheld their reputation superbly.

The selections chosen by the Flute Players Club for its portion of the program were less classical, although equally unusual. Mr. Laurent played Weber's Trio for flute, 'cello, and piano with Jean Bedetti and Leo Litwin. Although it was well played, the music itself is not an unadulterated delight, being in many places thin and obvious. Far more satisfactory was the Suite by Vincent d'Indy, in which the flute and 'cello were joined by violin, viola and harp, played by Richard Burgin, Jean Le Franc, and Bernard Zighera. The music has the crispness and astringency of the modern idiom, which never lets you know just what is coming next. It sounds fiendishly difficult, and was played well-nigh perfectly.

The audience was not as large as it should have been, but perhaps tonight more people will take advantage of this rare musical treat.

D. W. S.

CHAMBER SYMPHONY

The plastic acoustical qualities which proved annoying at least week's concerts were not present last evening, happily, as Leo Litwin, pianist; Bernard Zighera, playing the harp, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichordist, joined forces of the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments and members of what is known as the Boston Flute Players' Club to present the third and next to the last programme in the current Chamber Symphony series at New England Mutual Hall. The list will be repeated tonight.

The opening half of the concert assembled three period pieces: a Sonata for flute, viola de gamba and harpsichord by Antonio Lotti, another for the last two named instruments by J. S. Bach, and a grand Suite in C by a contemporary of these composers who was quite highly regarded in his time, Georg Philipp Telemann. The Telemann, written for four viols and harpsichord, fairly scintillated in all its 18th century brilliance; somehow seemed completely in place in the ultra-modern surroundings of Mutual Hall.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER
AUG 20 1944

THE summer is passing on and most of the summer music series have come to an end and the few remaining will close within the next two or three weeks. Then the musicians will have a short rest before time to take up the winter music. It is time now to think about the 1944-45 season and many of the leading orchestras and opera companies have announced their plans. The local season will be of especial interest. The Tri-City Symphony orchestra will present Zinka Milanov, soprano of the Metropolitan, Patricia Travers, youthful violinist, James Melton, distinguished American tenor and Jesus Maria Sanroma, Cuban pianist of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Civic Music association has listed Fritz Kreisler, world famous violinist, Thomas L. Thomas, Welsh radio singer and Alexander Uninsky, Russian pianist.

OUTSIDE OF OUR

. . . own season probably the ones of most interest are those in Chicago and each week many Tricitians go to that city to hear the music. Last season the Chicago Opera company did not put on any performances. There were many protests but it was thought best to wait until this season. Therefore the only opera in Chicago was that given in April by the Metropolitan Opera company. Plans have been made this year to begin the fall season of opera in Chicago on Oct. 16 and continue for five weeks, thru Nov. 18 with performances each Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday nights and on Saturday afternoon.

THE OPERA'S

. . . repertoire while not yet complete includes such familiar items as "Aida," "Otello," "Rigoletto," "Traviata," "Il Trovatore," "Carmen," "Pelleas and Melisande," "Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," "La Bohme," and "Die Walkure." The last named has not been heard in Chicago since 1940 when Lauritz Melchior and Kirsten Flagstad presented it.

pened loist, onductor foundation member-summer chamber m to know where to h a singer; and there to be one available

Strange, too; because for practice and ex-he line is very small ps tact for the special ormance is worked ght and imagination
y drill and instruc-te, Miss Davenport ss of the five pieces her part of the pro-voice being at once speech (English text eal for blending with ried, and beautiful of Mahler's assem-ngs, wood and brass, me when Mahler

nd here was one of a great advance the hestral ensemble is ld paired group of ecame evident when otenlieder" as a piece
ered in comparison ozart Serenade in C boes, clarinets, horns
s. That eighteenth-d mechanism is inoutgrown.

ss, take these twen-notions and inven-
st bit too far, and we eratingly complicated ngly ingenious cone the three-movement
inû, presented for the Boston, carrying the icercare. The Italian as ricercare, if it is a es something written
It boldly makes pre-nical profundity; and r in this case lives up pectations. The only going to be to make a the sound of it. But man is allowed to be fancyings and be a d contrapuntal virtu-nks he must; that is no
Bach, whose Branden-rto No. 3, with which began, is permitted.
though certain old chestra works could unconducted. A con-ever, is the rule; and of the four concerts of Bernard Zighera was

PORT, IOWA
CRAT-LEADER

AUG 20 1944

mer is passing on and f the summer music come to an end and the ning will close within o or three weeks. Then ans will have a short time to take up the
sic. It is time now to t the 1944-45 season
f the leading orchestras companies have an-heir plans. The local be of especial interest.
ty Symphony orchestra nt Zinka Milanov, soe Metropolitan, Patricia uthful violinist, James istinguished American Jesus Maria Sanroma, ist of the Boston Symestra. ~~The Civic Music~~ has listed Fritz Kreisfamous violinist,
Thomas, Welsh radio
Alexander Uninsky,
anist.

SIDE OF OUR

ason probably the ones erest are those in Chi-each week many Trio that city to hear the st season the Chicago pany did not put on any
es. There were many t it was thought best to this season. Therefore pera in Chicago was in April by the Metro-era company. Plans made this year to begin son of opera in Chicago and continue for five
Nov. 18 with perform-
Monday, Wednesday,
Saturday nights and y afternoon.

HE OPERA'S

ire while not yet com-des such familiar items
"Otello," "Rigoletto,"
"Il Trovatore," "Car-lleas and Melisande," Romeo and Juliet," "La nd "Die Walkure." The has not been heard in nce 1940 when Lauritz
nd Kirsten Flagstad pre-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 6 - 1944

inal Mozart Program at Tanglewood—Two Ballet Evenings at the Stadium

Nilss

Mozart Festival in the Berkshires comes to a close this afternoon, with Robert Casadesus appearing as piano soloist with member of the Boston Symphony. Above is a view of the Opera Concert Hall at Tanglewood and a section of the overflow audience.

DAY, AUGUST 21, 19

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Chamber Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra last night presented the second in a series of chamber concerts by principal and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New England Mutual Hall under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth. Assisting were the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Sylvia Marlowe, Putnam Aldrich and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichordists. The program was as follows:

Handel—Choruses and orchestral pieces from "Solomon"
Bach—Concerto in C major for three harpsichords and strings
Mozart—Symphony No. 33 in B flat (K.319)
Beethoven — Six Contradances and two Minuets

There can be no question that the New England Mutual Hall does things to a concert of music that must be taken into account in the discussion of that concert. It was so last night, and last week, and last season, whether the musicians numbered one or 100, and it is therefore regrettable to state that what the musicians and conductors (not to mention the composers) are putting into their music is not coming out in that hall.

This is not to say it isn't any good at all to listen to, because it is. But there is always a feeling of straining to hear, or of foreshortening, or of limitation, or of miniature quality or something, I do not know what, which gets between the listener and the music. It is like listening to a good recording except that you accept a recording for what it is, while here you feel you have to climb right up on the stage to get the full sonority or "liveness" of the music.

Well, however, last night's concert was delightful. The choruses, incomparably comfortable melodic from "Solomon" are filled with that ease it is almost impossible to find so consistently outside of Handel, while the orchestral interludes are wonderfully fresh. And Mr. Woodworth, whose conducting is a joy to watch and listen to, saw to it we did not miss the subtlety of the final section.

As in listening to music in a modern idiom, you have to listen very closely to Bach, for the joy is in the contours of the several melodic lines rather than in the total effect. The triple clavier concerto, while its fast movements may have seemed to be all of a color to those whose ears are not attuned to the especial pleasures of the harpsichord, was in fact performed with as much expressive clarity as the hall would allow, and with fine technical skill on the part of Putnam Aldrich, Sylvia Marlowe and Daniel Pinkham, the guest artists.

The Mozart Symphony, rarely heard, was beautifully done and the Beethoven Contradances and and Minuets were ripped off in smart style by the orchestra under Mr. Woodworth's driving, but light-handed beat. The concert will be repeated tonight, and if you think I am all wrong on the hall, I wish you'd let me know. It has me baffled.

MUSIC NEWS: CHECK-

from Post Aug ~~20~~ '44

Survey of Programmes of 19 Orches

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

TO THIS desk has lately come a questionnaire sent out by an advertising agency in the interests of the radio sponsor of one of our leading orchestras. One gets the impression that the sponsor, rather than the conductor, or the audience in the hall, is to have the determining voice in the matter of programmes. Such a state of affairs would bode ill for the future, and if it threatens to become an actuality, it will be dealt with in this column. Just now it is not the point at issue.

This point is raised by question 3, which reads as follows: "Do you think listeners prefer more classical music or strictly modern music?" Well, in the first place, the answer to that one depends on the intended inclusiveness of the term "classical." If it is to embrace not only Bach and Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner but also Tchaikovsky, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov, Strauss and Sibelius, the "strictly moderns" are out of luck. Anyway, it is not a matter of conjecture since the statisticians are always with us.

For example, in the July issue of Musical America, there is an article by Robert Sabin in which the 1943-44 programmes of 19 leading symphony orchestras are surveyed and tabulated. As Mr. Sabin acknowledges, programmes vary somewhat from season to season and they are chosen not by audiences but by the conductors. The latter are, however, "extremely responsive to public trends" and it is quite obvious that in the main audiences get about what they want. It might be argued, indeed, that outside their contemporary novelties for which they are seldom thanked at the moment, our conductors make it their business to give their respective publics what they think they want, and for that reason the standard repertory, instead of being broadened as well it might be, is actually subjected to a shrinking process.

Three Most Popular

Getting back to Mr. Sabin's survey, we find that the three most popular composers during the past season were Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky, with Mozart, Wagner and Bach close behind them. Incidentally, you would never guess the Wagner part of it here in Boston. Dr. Koussevitzky has become increasingly wary of Wagner's music—in which he does not particularly excel —and not a note of it was heard at Symphony Hall in the course of the regular season.

The only living composer in the top 10, which, also, included Debusey and Ravel, was Richard Strauss, with 63 performances. Stravinsky trailed with 40. After him came Shostakovitch and Rachmaninoff, with 35 each, while Sibelius' score was only 34, a little more than half that of Strauss. After Prokofieff, with 31 performances to his credit, there is a drop to Falla with 18, followed by Hindemith and Milhaud with 16 apiece.

Since this list excludes the Americans, it should immediately be added that the latter scored as follows: Gershwin 32, Copland 24, Gould 17, Barber 15, Creston 12, Harris 8, Bernstein (the "Jeremiah" Symphony) 7, Hanson, McDonald and Schuman 6.

The intrinsic dullness of a row of statistics is offset by the interesting conclusions so often to be drawn from them. Of particular interest in the above tabulation is the fact that the "strictly modern" Shostakovitch nosed in ahead of the well-established Sibelius and that Roy Harris, proclaimed by so many as our outstanding native composer, had six of his fellows leading him. For comparative purposes it may be mentioned that Beethoven's score was 187, Brahms' 149 and Tchaikovsky's 131. No, it doesn't look as though the moderns were exactly preferred.

Mr. Sabin notes the general slighting of Delius and the complete absence of any symphony by Bruckner (preferred to Brahms in his native Austria), though Bruno Walter and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony performed the great Te Deum. The latest bulletin of the Bruckner Society, just received, reports a "requested" performance of the Bruckner Fourth by the Houston (Texas) Symphony, not one of the orchestras on Mr. Sabin's list. In little Holland, another Bruckner-conscious country, there were 110 Bruckner performances between the years 1934 and 1939, an average of 22 a year.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES

AUG 29 1944

Music to Charm Peace Parleys

(The Associated Press)

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 29.—To insure the success of the next world peace conference, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, in a birthday interview, described an international music festival to be held with it.

That "music can save the world," long has been the philosophy of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~70 years old today.~~

That its harmonizing influence would assist the new peace conference to avoid the bickering of Versailles, he is equally certain.

This is his suggestion:

"If our nation should send its greatest singers, players and a leading symphony orchestra to the peace conference—and if other nations would do likewise—we would have an international music event of the highest spiritual value and one that would give the peace conference delegates the rest, peace and joy of the finest entertainment. It would inspire and facilitate their work."

There would be no difficulty getting the artists, Koussevitzky said.

"Musicians always are the best ambassadors between countries, and all invited would eagerly attend and perform because they would consider it a mission to be done for world peace."

There is every reason to believe that the composers of the world would be fired to create new works for the event, perhaps som that would be a lasting inspiration to humanity, he added.

Would the Boston Symphon Orchestra undertake such an assignment?

"Of course," smiled the conductor.

"I feel sure that if this grea music festival were to be held a the peace conference the trustees of the orchestra and the people of Boston would realize that we are doing a service for America and would be glad to allow us to accept."

The Russian-born director is resting at his summer home and preparing for the revival at Tanglewood this week-end and next of an abbreviated version of the Berkshire festival which he raised to top rank in the musical world. At that time the orchestra will give four concerts devoted entirely to the works of Mozart.

Koussevitzky is in excellent health and spirits, just as full of enthusiasm as he was when he took over the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 20 years ago.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL

AUG 20 1944

MUSIC

Pianist Willie Kapell Builds Fame On Concerto

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Art Editor

LEE, Mass.—William Kapell, to whom have gone the most impressive musical breaks of the last two years, is the kind of 21-year-old pianist you'd expect to be called Bill. But everybody calls him Willie, and nobody knows exactly why.

Willie Kapell officially began his career at the stadium in New York, in July, 1942. Efrem Kurtz picked him out and paid him $75 for the date. But when Kurtz handed the score of Aram Khatchatourian's concerto to the slender, rather mercuric young man, he was handing over a career.

WILLIAM KAPELL
........21st birthday cake

Pinned down, Kapell will admit that he got pretty sick of the Khatchatourian concerto—"people called me Willie Khatchatourian Kapell," says he, "and it made me a little weary.

"But it was a break. Sometimes the stars just seem to gather over a fellow's head; it could have been some other fellow just as well."

IN THE FALL of 1943 Willie Kapell was engaged to play with the Boston symphony, the Khatchatourian concerto, of course. He stopped the show, and the two performances for which he had been engaged became seven. The same winter he was heard in the Khatchatourian concerto — with the Philadelphia orchestra, and it reengaged him for three successive winters.

This winter this young man from Manhattan has a solidly booked tour, and will be heard with 16 different orchestras. Six orchestra dates are considered a pretty good proportion.

Kapell is a native New Yorker, son of a navy man who left the sea and started a book shop. One of Willie Kapell's pleasures has been reading, and it cost nothing.

HE WAS NOT a very tractable boy, he admits. His mother once dressed him in his Sunday suit and sent him to one of the Saturday afternoon clubs frequented by children of the "better sort." "They telephoned my mother to come get me quick," says he, "and they said please not to let me come back. I didn't."

He has no musical ancestors; somewhat by chance he began piano study with Dorothy Anderson LaFollette. He learned very fast, but was as much interested in football and baseball as music. Then he earned a scholarship with Olga Samaroff Stokowski, at whose summer home near Lee he is working until October.

"I SHAN'T FORGET the way Willie came to me," says Mme. Stokowski. "His teacher held him by the hand, 'You take him,' she said. 'I can't do a thing with him.'"

Willie was not quite 15 then, and he still is learning. About 150 yards from the big white house is a middle-sized barn containing only two big pianos and a few chairs; the two doors are screened, and look out on hillside and nothing more.

"Madame keeps Pauline, the cook, busy bringing me notes," says Kapell. "She can sit in the house, or even luxuriate on a chaise longue, and still hear the mistakes I make. Then she writes me a note, and Pauline brings it out to me."

Oscar Smith, Beacon Journal music editor, is on vacation.

Kapell has no pronounced mannerisms at the piano, and likes practically all music. "They seem to think I'm a specialist in Russian music," he confesses, "but I'm not. I like Spanish music, and the classics, and—" this rather shyly "—I've even written three popular songs."

KAPELL FINDS music easy to memorize, excepting Bach fugues and the music of Shostakovich, both of which he has to think about pretty hard while playing. He has humor, which is a help—speaking of a friend, he says, "He's a nice chap; just normally egotistic for a pianist."

MUSIC

8/14

N. E. MUTUAL HALL

Symphony Chamber Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Another series of chamber concerts—or "seersucker symphonies" —began at New England Mutual Hall, last evening. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurated them a year ago, found the idea appealing to the public, and decided to repeat this Summer. Incidentally, the air-conditioned "coolth" of Mutual Hall was a perfect refuge from yesterday's heat.

The first program, which will be repeated at 8:30 tonight, is conducted by Bernard Zighera, the Boston Symphony's versatile first harp who conducts and plays the piano as easily as he does his major instrument. It begins with Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, which sounds much more spontaneous, and hence less mechanical, when played by 10 men rather than 60. Mr. Zighera follows the practice of Serge Koussevitzky by interpolating the Sinfonia from the Bach cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," between the two fast movements of the Concerto.

Bach was followed by Mozart of the bi-lingually titled "Nacht Musique" or Serenade for Wind Instruments (K. 388). It is a clever little score whose workaday ideas are turned into facets of jewelled brilliance by the beauties of the scoring, and was beautifully played.

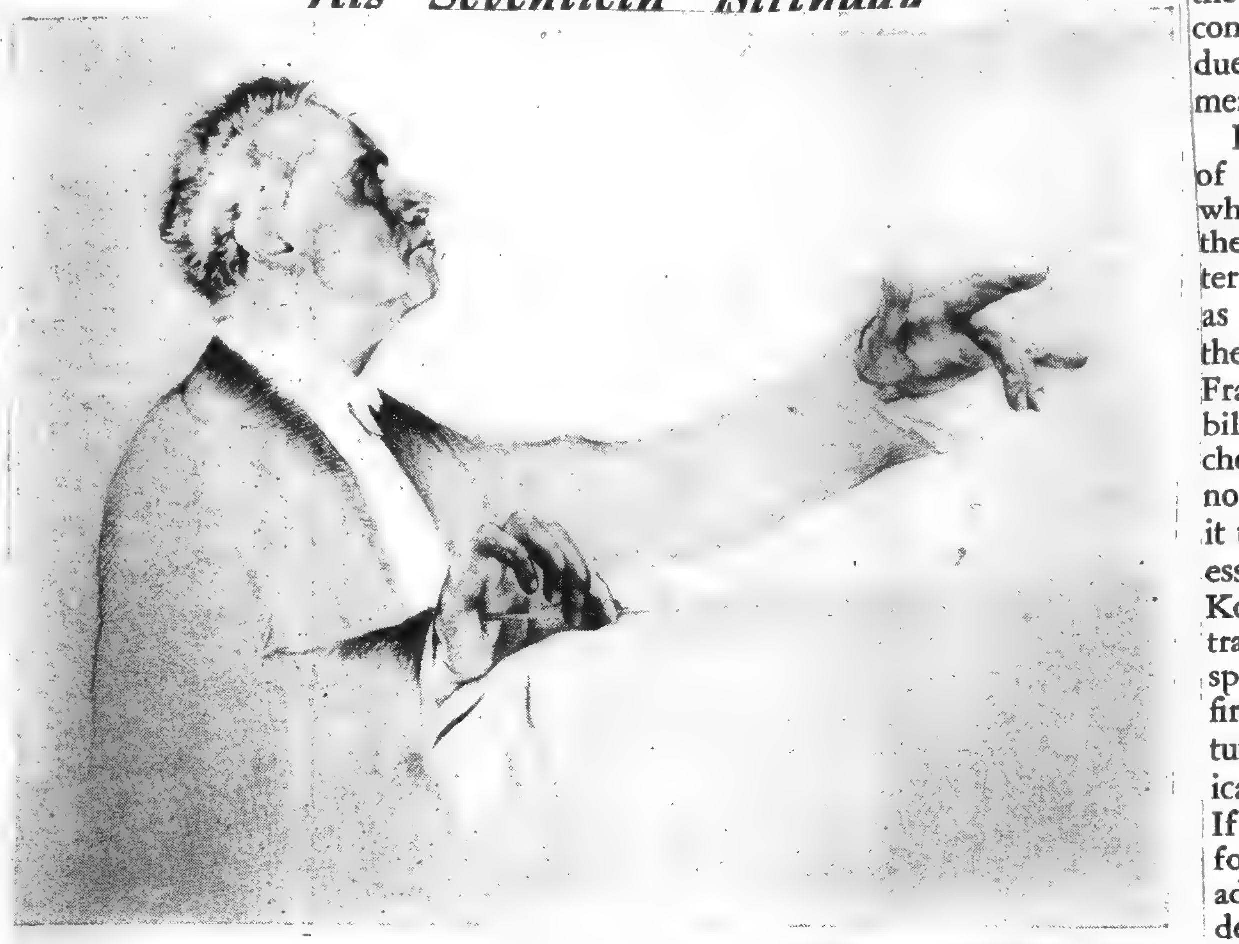
I had expected to find Mahler's lovely song-cycle, "Kindertotenlieder," the high point of the evening, but the singing of contralto soloist Mary Davenport was highly inexpressive, apart from a superficial smoothness of phrasing and tone. Her enunciation was far from clear. Perhaps that was just as well, for judging by the occasional "thees" and "thous" and fancy phrases that could occasionally be heard, the English translation seemed to be dreadful "poetese." The performance left me completely unmoved.

New to Boston were the Tre Ricercari by the contemporary Czech, Bohuslav Martinu. The slow movement is enchanting and the two fast ones are what the late W. J. Henderson would have called "pepper-and-vinegar-music." But they are skillfully wrought, and a touch of pepper and vinegar is always nice. The piano parts were played by Rita LaPlante and Leo Litwin.

[104]

Serge Koussevitzky

A Critical Evaluation of the Eminent Conductor, Great Educator and Pioneer of Contemporary Music at His Seventieth Birthday



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

NOTHING is quite as disturbing, quite as repulsive as a conductor who swerves his arms in ritual gestures which impress the hearts of lovelorn ladies but not the minds of the orchestra's musicians. There is something ludicrous about wanting to hear Bruno Walter instead of Mozart, Toscanini in place of Brahms. Admittedly, it is a star conscious public which has turned the position of conductor into the degrading function of showman. A cult which has substituted elegance and good appearance of the leader for the qualities of the creative composer places tremendous burdens upon the shoulders of the conscientious conductor. There is hardly one of our outstanding conductors who has been able to free himself completely from the odium of acting on the stage. No matter how exclusively concerned he may be with the musical essence, management and the public demand a good portion of spectacle in addition to his musical activity. It is probably the hardest task to find the right balance between giving the public the show it demands and at the same time doing all the artistic justice to the composition.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a man who has understood how to capture the public attention without sacrificing the artistic ideals in a long and spectacular career. His seventieth birthday, on July 26th, finds him as strongly devoted to his avocation as ever. His efforts on behalf of the Boston Symphony during the past twenty years brought him great commendation on his anniversary. At a testimonial dinner in his honor he was presented with a volume of signatures and notations from the scores of all the composers now living in America whose works were once performed by the eminent conductor. Instead of the regular menu there were printed cards containing the titles of more than one hundred and fifty works by American composers—among them sixty-three first performances—which Koussevitzky had interpreted during his career. All the speakers outdid themselves in praising the unique quality of this musician who began his career in Czarist Russia, had left his fatherland shortly after the Bolshevik revolution and finally has found a new home in the United States.

Whenever such veneration is made public there are a few doubting Thomases who wonder whether this noise is not due to the well functioning drum of a publicity manager rather than to the excellent musicianship of the individual. The anniversary seems a good opportunity to evaluate honestly the merits of a man who appeared in the public light as prima donna to a greater extent than could possibly be pleasant for any serious artist.

Putting Koussevitzky's qualities as conductor momentarily aside one is mostly impressed by what this man has done for contemporary music. From the very beginning of his career he was firmly convinced that the attention of the audience could not be held for any length of time if not acquainted with the problems of the composer who slaves and starves under its very nose. Composers whose names today are common knowledge were encouraged by the conductor in their timid beginnings. When in Russia, he used a great part of his private fortune to build up a music company which, in contrast to the antiquated practices of the old established firms, was mainly concerned with the publication of modern works. Scriabine, the composer of religious-mystical-ecstatic music, skyrocketed to fame with the help of Koussevitzky. In 1913, Koussevitzy afforded Debussy, then only known to a small clique, the chance to conduct his own works in Russia.

WHEN after the Russian revolution Koussevitzky transferred his activities to Paris and London he followed the same principles. He commissioned Ravel for 10,000 francs to orchestrate Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," originally set for piano, and was instrumental in building up the high repute of such modernists as Stravinsky, Honegger and Prokofieff. He went as far as to give the first performance of a work by the Russian expatriate Obouhov whose composition utilized hushing, shrieking and hissing sounds in addition to straight singing. His emphasis in pioneering changed at this time. While in Russia he had attempted to bring closer to the Russian public the modern works of the West. Now he reversed the process by acquainting the West with the radical music of the Russian contemporaries who were gradually leaving Russia due to the increasing restrictions of the government's art policies in respect to modern style.

In 1924 Koussevitzky took over the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an institution which though excellent had suffered notably under the change of conductors in the previous years. After the German conductor Muck had been arrested as an enemy alien in 1918, first Henry Rabaud and then Pierre Monteux, now conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra, succeeded. Though some stability had been achieved under Monteux the orchestra still looked for a personality which would not merely create a temporary brilliance but give it the permanent education and feeling of security essential to a constant and evenly high level. Koussevitzky was this man. He trained the orchestra relentlessly and injected a completely new spirit. Most important of all, he was one of the first to open the doors of a major symphonic institution in the United States to contemporary American music. This step cannot be valued too highly. If one considers that the American composer was forced to go to Europe in order to receive an adequate hearing, and that by this practice the development of an independent American style was strangled at its very inception, one can measure how much the American public and composer owes to the Russian-born conductor.

Koussevitzky's choice of works was as diversified as in previous years. In his Boston programs one finds works as widely apart in style as the "E Minor Symphony" bv the extremely serious Roger Sessions and the flippant "Flivver 10,000,000, a Joyous Epic; Fantasy for Orchestra Inspired by the Familiar Legend 'The Tenth Millionth Ford is Now Serving Its Owner'!" by Frederick Converse. Composers like Aaron Copland, Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter Piston, even George Gershwin in his serious manner of writing, Roy Harris and Louis Gruenberg were brought to the attention of the public mainly through Koussevitzky's performances.

The conductor's efforts on behalf of modern music culminated in the commissioning of numerous works by contemporary composers for the fifteenth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra. The "G Minor Symphony" by Roussel, the "Metarmophoseon" by Respighi, the "Fourth Symphony" by Prokofieff, the "Symphony" by Honegger, the "Psalms Symphony" by Stravinsky, the "Konzertmusik" by Hindemith, the "Symphonic Ode" by Copland and the "Rhapsody No. 2" by Gershwin, all works widely known by now, were the results of this ambitious project. Only those who know the struggle for existence and performance of the modern serious composer can appreciate what this must have meant to the many who were fortunate enough to be honored by Koussevitzky's invitation.

It goes without saying that Koussevitzky did not render contemporary music exclusively. By keeping an equal balance between the masterworks of the past and the outstanding works of the present, he gave a well rounded and interesting picture to an audience which had some acquaintance with traditional but hardly any with the radical works. In Europe Koussevitzky had given some highly interesting performances of neglected works of the past, mainly in the operatic field. Borodin's "Prince Igor," Moussorgsky's masterpiece "Boris Goudonoff," Tchaikovsky's "Queen of Spades," were performed under Koussevitzky, both in Paris and Barcelona. In the United States he contributed a great deal to the wider and deeper understanding of many already accepted masters. In addition to the regular performances of the well know masterpieces, Koussevitzky organized a Beethoven festival in 1927, the centenary of the master's death, and made Boston the center of the Beethoven celebrations in America. In 1930, he conducted a six day Brahms festival and endeared this master to a wider public. As a builder of programs, which are balanced and all-inclusive Koussevitzky is excelled by no one.

THE MANNER in which Koussevitzky selects his program seems to stem from his philosophical beliefs. A decided adherent of democratic principles, he naturally set into effect in music what he believed to be good in the affairs of society. Here, as in music, Koussevitzky's record is impeccable and throws an interesting light upon the well rounded personality of the conductor. Back in Czarist Russia when the police suppressed all demonstrations following the death of the pacifist writer Tolstoi, who had opposed the autocratic regime of the Czar, Koussevitzky did not hesitate to make public his respect for the great apostle of humanity. A few days after Tolstoi's death he asked the audience at one of his concerts to stand up and remember the tragic event by a one minute silence.

Again when the Bolsheviks rose to power in 1917, he did not consider it possible to hold any of the high positions which the new regime had offered him in view of his democratic beliefs. In a letter to the government he stated politely that he could only submit to a government that would be appointed by a constituent assembly. He left Russia in 1920, but remained faithful to the culture of his fatherland. In spite of political differences with the Soviet regime he performed numerous Soviet composers, among them repeatedly Shostakovitch and Miaskovsky. During the present conflict he expressed clearly his sympathies with the anti-Hitler forces, setting aside all former arguments with the Russian government. At a time when it was still fashionable to hobnob with Hitler and his crowd, Koussevitzky made no secret of his feelings toward the German dictator though this meant financial loss and decline of prestige for the conductor in Germany, where he had spent many happy days in the pre-Hitler period. On April 1, 1933, only two months after Hitler had become chancellor, Koussevitzky together with several other courageous musicians, among them Damrosch, Toscanini and Reiner, sent a cable to the dictator urging him to stop discrimination. Consequently, the German commissar for radio ordered all music in which these musicians had any part banned from all broadcasts.

Democratic action in polit[illegible] as well as musical affairs and an eminent mus[illegible]ship (Koussevitzky was one of the foremost [illegible]osi on the double bass before he gained fame as a conductor) predestined this man for a lea[illegible] role. One question, however, still remains to be investigated: Are Koussevitzky's qualities as conductor combined with the above-mentioned characteristics sufficient to make him the foremost orchestra leader of our times?

THERE is an age-old argument in musical circles as to what constitutes the ideal conductor. Is it richness of orchestral sound, ease of performance, emphasis of the structural form, rhythmical clarity, melodic expressiveness or a combination of all? The answer seems much simpler than would follow from the complicated suggestions. The ideal conductor, obviously, can only be measured by the result of his work, i.e., the performance, which must do all possible justice to the style of a specific work. That means it must take into account all the musical and historical implications contained in the work. Naturally, educational ability, leadership, selection of program and intellectual personality are prerequisites but they cannot be measured solely by the performance.

A good performance will give the audience an indication of these qualities of the conductor, but there may be missing the one thing which is most important, namely the adequate picture of the composer's intentions and of the musical content of the work. From this it follows that the much abused word versatility possibly denotes best the chief virtue of the conductor. But versatility does not mean that slick and superficial handling of the score which can be noticed today in so many of the younger generation. Versatility implies the intellectual and emotional understanding of any composition, the capacity to transmit this understanding, first to the orchestra and then to the audience, and to re-live the spirit of the composer and the composer's times. No present performance can recapture quite the quality of a performance given in the past when the composition was performed first. Very often this is fortunate since our technique in playing, our construction of instruments and our respect for music is by and large superior to those of the past. But it has also the disadvantage that much of the original spirit is lost. Only too often the conductor injects his personality into the composition and destroys the independence of the work. The difficulty apparently lies in the contradiction that a good conductor must be a great personality and self-effacing as well. His personality must fade out that the music may live.

Unfortunately, there is hardly a conductor living who is capable of fulfilling this requirement. Instead of integrating his personality into the work the conductor does the opposite. What the public gets are occasional outstanding performances. Whenever the spirit of the work and the personality of the conductor happen to be identical then the audience receives a performance which may be termed ideal. Thus we have reached a point where the conductor has become a specialist. Toscanini's rendition of Brahms is probably the best performance to be heard. But when he interprets Beethoven he gives the work a similar epic impact and fails to re[illegible] imminent dramatic esprit of the compos[illegible]ham's Mozart and Haydn can hardly be s[illegible]n clarity. His similar treatment of Gluck and Handel, however, emasculates the imper[illegible] monumentality. The dramatic strength whi[illegible]z Reiner lends to Wagner and Strauss and [illegible] makes for a superb performance spoils a great deal when he conducts Debussy in the same manner. With the possible exception of Otto Klemperer [illegible] always manages to give a performance wh[illegible] not spectacular, is always within the [illegible] requirements of the work, there is no con[illegible] living who is capable of giving the impressi[illegible]rsatility.

KOUSSEVITZKY falls sh[illegible] this respect no less than his other [illegible]ding colleagues. Strongly impeded by [illegible]k of conductorial technique and a thorough fo[illegible] understanding of the classic Germanic music Koussevitzy possesses the one chief virtue, the skill of extracting the most magnificent and voluptuous sound. For this reason his renditions of French impressionist compositions, like the ones by Debussy and Ravel, or those of romantic and contemporary Slavic composers like Tchaikovsky, Stravinsky, Sibelius and Prokofieff, are unsurpassed. His Beethoven, though full of dramatic impact, suffers from the lack of formal organization, and his Haydn and Mozart lose their meaning somewhat through concentration on sound instead of emphasis of themati[c] and melodic substance.

However, all his other virtues easily supersede these weaknesses. He is an excellent educator of the orchestra and has molded the Boston Symphony into one of the foremost institutions of American musical life. He is in constant search for new talent and an inspiration to all his pupils. In a letter which I received several weeks ago from Lukas Foss, one-time pupil of Koussevitzky and recently appointed the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this talented young musician who is only twenty-two years old, writes enthusiastically about his teacher. 'Koussevitzky was like a father to me. I learned a [illegible] deal from him. At re[illegible] hearsals (when Foss conducted) he would [illegible] to me silently and offer suggestions in a [illegible] voice. At times I was alone in the studio, [illegible] and he would ma[illegible] [illegible] motions [illegible] Your motions must express [illegible] music is beautiful, so your [illegible] beautiful.' . . . Serge Kou[illegible] a teacher, he is a friend, [illegible] his grandson, but [illegible] heart bridges the [illegible] between [illegible] numerous young friends and discip[illegible] who is capable of [illegible] a young [illegible] such enthusiastic work [illegible] done [illegible] share for the growth [illegible] our younger generation.

Koussevitzky has not only educated musicians but also the audience. His numerous festivals featuring the outstanding works of the past, e.g., the aforementioned Brahms and Beethoven festivals and the forthcoming Mozart festival in Tanglewood, his summer concerts in the Berkshires, now unfortunately interrupted through the exigencies of the war, his continuous efforts on behalf of modern music in regard to performance as well as to financial aid and publication of scores (even at present there are generous plans underfoot by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation) and last, but not least, his numerous excellent recordings, have contributed a substantial part in making the American public conscious of the values of great and serious music. In the seventy years of his life Koussevitzky has experienced a great deal of important music history. He can be proud to know that he has made an essential part of it.

KURT LIST

Boston Sunday Globe SUNDAY, AUGUST 23, 1942

Recapitulation of the 14th Season of Esplanade Concerts

There are a number of remarkable things about the Esplanade Concerts whose 14th season Arthur Fiedler brought to a close on Tuesday evening last at the Edward Hatch Memorial Shell.

Not the least of these is the realization of an ideal which thinking men and friends of good music have long held. It is that the hope and the future of good music lies in its democratization. The wealthy patron no longer exists as such. And only a relatively small number of people can attend most concerts, for they are limited by price and the capacity of auditoriums. Still their number is not large enough to adequately support music. If music, as we know it, is to survive, the base of its support must be broadened. The music itself must be made available to great masses of people.

A little publicized fact about Boston's Esplanade Concerts is that they enjoy a greater attendance than any other free concerts in the United States. The ideal really approaches realization when 30,000 people can attend an Esplanade Concert, as they did on Sunday, Aug. 2, designated Coast Guard Night.

That the great public appreciates these concerts is proven in the healthier support given the Esplanade Concerts Fund this season. According to Mr. George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which come the 75 men who play in the Hatch Memorial Shell under Mr. Fiedler, all contributions to the fund have increased this year. Mail contributions alone have been 50 percent greater than last year.

Summarizing the Season

In every respect but one the 1942 season of the Esplanade Concerts reached a new peak of success. And that was something over which no one had control. Mr. Fiedler's proverbial luck with the weather did not hold out. Although the number of evening concerts had been extended by five, three could not start because of rain, and two were abandoned halfway through. There were four Wednesday morning children's concerts. At the second concert (July 29) the children voted for a request program, which was played Aug. 5. There were 10,000 present, the largest number ever to attend these children's concerts in the five years of their existence.

Arthur Fiedler conducted 20 of the 30 scheduled concerts. Paul Cherkassky, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, conducted three (one had to be abandoned halfway through). G. Wallace Woodworth of the faculty of Harvard Music School, conducted one; Joseph Wagner, composer-conductor and Assistant Director of Music in the Boston Public Schools, gave one concert; Wheeler Beckett, composer and conductor of the Youth Symphony Concerts, gave two.

No air of condescension is intended in remarking that the Esplanade Concerts programs have steadily improved in musical quality and interest. There were four concerti scheduled and two programs which included choral music for the first time in the history of these concerts. The informal musical talks given in collaboration with the Division of University Extension of the Massachusetts Department of Education were continued this season. There were also special events: War Bond Night; an All-Russian program; !Coast Guard Night; U. S. O. Night. The latter was intended to stimulate gifts of instruments for service men. And although the concert was canceled because of rain, a collection of instruments came in, nevertheless.—J. W. R.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
AUG 31 1944

Public Upholds Critics in Analysis of Music

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

While concert-goers are often eager to spot sharp cleavages of opinion between public and critics, any long-range analysis usually shows the two to be in fairly close agreement, at least about performers. About new music, I grant the situation is different.

Musical America recently conducted a poll of music editors and critics about their "air-wave favorites." Names of conductors, orchestras, singers balloted. The results were published in the magazine last June. Then came a flood of requests that readers be similarly polled so comparisons could be made.

This month's issue of the magazine carries the results of the readers' poll. The salient feature of the vote, as Musical America points out, "is the faithfulness with which it bears out the prior judgment of the gentlemen of the press."

Variations Cited.

Only three of the classifications showed any marked variation in top places. Readers gave Rise Stevens top ranking among the female vocalists. Nelson Eddy won out in the male vocalists group and Howard Barlow was the readers' first choice for "program conductor."

Critics' choices in these categories had been Marian Anderson, John Charles Thomas and Andre Kostelanetz.

Readers agreed the American premiere of Shostakovich's Eighth Symphony by Artur Rodzinski and the Philharmonic-Symphony was the year's outstanding music program of the air. Its date was Sunday, April 2.

The Philharmonic-Symphony came out first among symphony orchestras listed, the Boston Symphony and NBC units following in that order. As expected, the Metropolitan broadcasts lead in the open group, with the Metropolitan Auditions next and Eileen Farrell and the CBS symphony third.

Arturo Toscanini led the symphony conductors of the air, Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ coming after him and Bruno Walter third. Mr. Walter headed the three winners of the opera conductor class. Sir Thomas Beecham and Wilfred Pelletier were second and third.

Besides polling readers on radio favorites, the magazine also asked questions about broader issues raised in recent broadcasting. Some diversity of opinion, not very marked, showed up between readers and critics.

Intermission Criticized.

For instance, on the query of whether intermission features of the Philharmonic and NBC symphony programs were "appropriate," readers were more critical than the critics. Their "no" vote of 55 per cent contrasted with a "yes" vote of 54 per cent by the newspapermen.

Sharpest criticism was directed at the intermission features as "too far removed in subject matter from music." On the other hand, Metropolitan quiz programs and columns-of-the-air came in for warm praise. Requests for strictly musical comments on symphony programs were frequent.

On commercial announcements, readers showed greater leniency than critics, 58 per cent agreeing they were handled "in keeping with the character of the program." The critics were split 50-50 on the point. Most voters pleaded for shorter and fewer announcements.

Critics and readers revealed surprising unity in replying to the question, "Do you feel there is room for improvement in the quality of the average musical program on the air?" Readers voted 92 per cent "yes," critics 82 per cent. A major complaint was against "the same standard repertory."

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
AUG 21 1944

OVERTONES

BY HOWARD W. HESS

ON OCT. 7, the Allis-Chalmers's broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air. Meanwhile, the ~~Allis-Chalmers~~ Manufacturing Co. hopes to find better ways of serving the listening public. Since some of the parts of a questionnaire sent to me are of general interest, I am answering them in "Overtones."

1. "Do you think that program notes add or detract from a symphony broadcast?" They add greatly if they are concise, to the point and are stated as facts without high-pressure salesmanship. I always want to know something of the real personality of the composer—such as the wholesome, out-of-door joyousness of Haydn, the courtly charm and grace of Mozart, or the rugged individualistic force of Beethoven; also the period in which he lived, his political, social and religious affiliations, his nationality, the materials he worked with, his favorite instrument and the special field of composition in which he was most successful. I also like a suggestion as to the mood of the music, grave or gay.

2. "Do you think intermission features, talks or news periods add to the interest of a symphony broadcast?" Absolutely not. I dislike flowery or personalized dramatization of events historical or otherwise, for if music needs this extra sales attraction it has lost its true appeal and has degenerated into the kind of merchandise which gives a whole set of dishes free with each one-dollar purchase.

3. "Do you think listeners prefer more classical music or strictly modern music?" If the term "classical" is used to represent all music of the ages which has been established in value—music of meaning and of beauty—then [illegible] should say all classic, by all means because too much strictly modern music is pure experiment. Much of it follows the "Fauves'" ideals which were a worship of ugliness vulgarity and the deliberate attempt to shock, to disturb or to express [illegible] purely personal concept of some purely personal experience. A[illegible] worthwhile programs have variety balance and unity.

4. "Do you think the playing of one or two movements of a symphony offend listeners, or would they prefer more selections rather than one long symphony?" It depends entirely upon the work performed, for some of the great works of art in music are so unified that the whole story should be given. On the other hand, there are many many works of the best composers which contain sparkling gems hidden among pages of erudite and scholarly writing which should be given separately, because too much of the composition is of interest only to the bookworms. Music, like literature, frequently profits by judicious cutting.

Sponsors of all radio programs desire the listeners' point of view. All that is necessary to have more worthwhile music on the air is for those who are interested to write in and ask for it.

Gl

MUSIC

N. E. MUTUAL HALL

Symphony Chamber Concert

By JOHN WILLIAM RILEY

Two of Boston's more esoteric chamber music organizations, the Flute Players Club and the Society of Ancient Instruments, played the third program of the Boston Symphony's chamber orchestra concerts in New England Mutual Hall last evening.

Certainly the greatest interest was aroused by Vincent d'Indy's Suite for flute, violin, viola, cello and harp. (Respectively, the players were Georges Laurent, Richard Burgin, Jean Lefranc, Jean Bedetti, and Bernard Zighera.) Despite d'Indy's adherence to the rigorous logic of his own cyclic forms, the work is fresh as mountain air. There is nothing stiff or formal about the work. Cast in four movements, the Suite is full of fine themes, some flashing, some poetic, and resplendent sonoroties.

The d'Indy Suite seemed all the more refreshing since it followed Weber's exuberant but thin Trio for flute, cello and piano played by Messrs. Laurent, Bedetti and Leo Litwin. The trio has its pleasant moments, but a good deal of it is sheer musical rhetoric.

Early music by Bach, Telemann and Lotti, all from last Winter's programs of the Ancient Instrument Society, occupied the first part of the evening. Lotti's Sonata for flute, gamba and harpsichord, performed rather impersonally, would have benefited by a warmer attitude. And in Bach's Sonata for gamba and harpsichord, overly rigid tempi enchanced the dryness of the piece. But Telemann's Suite in C major, for four viols and harpsichord, had perfect ensemble and spirited performance. It is a debatable poi[nt] whether the acoustics of the h[all] were responsible for occasional d[is]tortions of tone color.

The members of the Society [of] Ancient Instruments are Paul Fe[illegible] revsky, descant viol; Albert B[illegible] nard, treble viol; Alfred Zighe[ra,] viola da gamba; Gaston Dufres[ne,] violone; Putnam Aldrich, harp[si]chord. Let's put in a vote for [the] group to record the early mu[sic] they play, since their performan[ces] are often definitive.

full of dramatic impact, suffers from the lack of formal organization, and his Haydn and Mozart lose their meaning somewhat through concentration on sound instead of emphasis of themat [illegible] substance.

[illegible] all his other virtues easily supersede [illegible]. He is an excellent educator of [illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible] institutions of American [illegible] for [illegible]

Koussevitzky [illegible] featuring the [illegible]
the aforementi[illegible] vals and the [illegible] glewood, his [illegible]
now unfortunat[illegible]
cies of the war [illegible] of modern musi[illegible]
as to financial a[illegible] at present there are [illegible] last [illegible] the Koussevitzky Music [illegible] things, have not least, his numerous [illegible] making the Amer-contributed a substantial [illegible] of great and ican public conscious of [illegible] of his life serious music. In the [illegible] deal of im-Koussevitzky has experie[illegible] portant music history. He [illegible] proud to know that he has made an essen[illegible] of it.

Boston Sunday Globe SUNDAY, AUGUST 23, 1942

Recapitulation of the 14th Season of Esplanade Concerts

There are a number of remarkable things about the Esplanade Concerts whose 14th season Arthur Fiedler brought to a close on Tuesday evening last at the Edward Hatch Memorial Shell.

Not the least of these is the realization of an ideal which thinking men and friends of good music have long held. It is that the hope and the future of good music lies in its democratization. The wealthy patron no longer exists as such. And only a relatively small number of people can attend most concerts, for they are limited by price and the capacity of auditoriums. Still their number is not large enough to adequately support music. If music, as we know it, is to survive, the base of its support must be broadened. The music itself must be made available to great masses of people.

A little publicized fact about Boston's Esplanade Concerts is that they enjoy a greater attendance than any other free concerts in the United States. The ideal really approaches realization when 30,000 people can attend an Esplanade Concert, as they did on Sunday, Aug. 2, designated Coast Guard Night.

That the great public appreciates these concerts is proven in the healthier support given the Esplanade Concerts Fund this season. According to Mr. George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which come the 75 men who play in the Hatch Memorial Shell under Mr. Fiedler, all contributions to the fund have increased this year. Mail contributions alone have been 50 percent greater than last year.

Summarizing the Season

In every respect but one the 1942 season of the Esplanade Concerts reached a new peak of success. And that was something over which no one had control. Mr. Fiedler's proverbial luck with the weather did not hold out. Although the number of evening concerts had been extended by five, three could not start because of rain, and two were abandoned halfway through. There were four Wednesday morning children's concerts. At the second concert (July 29) the children voted for a request program, which was played Aug. 5. There were 10,000 present, the largest number ever to attend these children's concerts in the five years of their existence.

Arthur Fiedler conducted 20 of the 30 scheduled concerts. Paul Cherkassky, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, conducted three (one had to be abandoned halfway through). G. Wallace Woodworth of the faculty of Harvard Music School, conducted one; Joseph Wagner, composer-conductor and Assistant Director of Music in the Boston Public Schools, gave one concert; Wheeler Beckett, composer and conductor of the Youth Symphony Concerts, gave two.

No air of condescension is intended in remarking that the Esplanade Concerts programs have steadily improved in musical quality and interest. There were four concerti scheduled and two programs which included choral music for the first time in the history of these concerts. The informal musical talks given in collaboration with the Division of University Extension of the Massachusetts Department of Education were continued this season. There were also special events: War Bond Night; an All-Russian program; Coast Guard Night; U. S. O. Night. The latter was intended to stimulate gifts of instruments for service men. And although the concert was canceled because of rain, a collection of instruments came in, nevertheless.—J. W. R.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 31 1944

Public Upholds Critics in Analysis of Music

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

While concert-goers are often eager to spot sharp cleavages of opinion between public and critics, any long-range analysis usually shows the two to be in fairly close agreement, at least about performers. About new music, I grant the situation is different.

Musical America recently conducted a poll of music editors and critics about their "air-wave favorites." Names of conductors, orchestras, singers balloted. The results were published in the magazine last June. Then came a flood of requests that readers be similarly polled so comparisons could be made.

This month's issue of the magazine carries the results of the readers' poll. The salient feature of the vote, as Musical America points out, "is the faithfulness with which it bears out the prior judgment of the gentlemen of the press."

Variations Cited.

Only three of the classifications showed any marked variation in top places. Readers gave Rise Stevens top ranking among the female vocalists. Nelson Eddy won out in the male vocalists group and Howard Barlow was the readers' first choice for "program conductor."

Critics' choices in these categories had been Marian Anderson, John Charles Thomas and Andre Kostelanetz.

Readers agreed the American premiere of Shostakovich's Eighth Symphony by Artur Rodzinski and the Philharmonic-Symphony was the year's outstanding music program of the air. Its date was Sunday, April 2.

The Philharmonic-Symphony came out first among symphony orchestras listed, the Boston Symphony and NBC units following in that order. As expected, the Metropolitan broadcasts lead in the open group, with the Metropolitan Auditions next and Eileen Farrell and the CBS symphony third.

Arturo Toscanini led the symphony conductors of the air, Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ coming after him and Bruno Walter third. Mr. Walter headed the three winners of the opera conductor class. Sir Thomas Beecham and Wilfred Pelletier were second and third.

Besides polling readers on radio favorites, the magazine also asked questions about broader issues raised in recent broadcasting. Some diversity of opinion, not very marked, showed up between readers and critics.

Intermission Criticized.

For instance, on the query of whether intermission features of the Philharmonic and NBC symphony programs were "appropriate," readers were more critical than the critics. Their "no" vote of 55 per cent contrasted with a "yes" vote of 54 per cent by the newspapermen.

Sharpest criticism was directed at the intermission features as "too far removed in subject matter from music." On the other hand, Metropolitan quiz programs and columns-of-the-air came in for warm praise. Requests for strictly musical comments on symphony programs were frequent.

On commercial announcements, readers showed greater leniency than critics, 58 per cent agreeing they were handled "in keeping with the character of the program." The critics were split 50-50 on the point. Most voters pleaded for shorter and fewer announcements.

Critics and readers revealed surprising unity in replying to the question, "Do you feel there is room for improvement in the quality of the average musical program on the air?" Readers voted 92 per cent "yes," critics 82 per cent. A major complaint was against "the same standard repertory."

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

AUG 21 1944

OVERTONES

BY HOWARD W. HESS

ON OCT. 7, the Allis-Chalmers's broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air. Meanwhile, the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. hopes to find better ways of serving the listening public. Since some of the parts of a questionnaire sent to me are of general interest, I am answering them in "Overtones."

1. "Do you think that program notes add or detract from a symphony broadcast?" They add greatly if they are concise, to the point and are stated as facts without high-pressure salesmanship. I always want to know something of the real personality of the composer—such as the wholesome, out-of-door joyousness of Haydn, the courtly charm and grace of Mozart, or the rugged individualistic force of Beethoven; also the period in which he lived, his political, social and religious affiliations, his nationality, the materials he worked with, his favorite instrument and the special field of composition in which he was most successful. I also like a suggestion as to the mood of the music, grave or gay.

2. "Do you think intermission features, talks or news periods add to the interest of a symphony broadcast?" Absolutely not. I dislike flowery or personalized dramatization of events historical or otherwise, for if music needs this extra sales attraction it has lost its true appeal and has degenerated into the kind of merchandise which gives a whole set of dishes free with each one-dollar purchase.

3. "Do you think listeners prefer more classical music or strictly modern music?" If the term "classical" is used to represent al[illegible] music of the ages which has been established in value—music o[illegible] meaning and of beauty—then [illegible] should say all classic, by all means because too much strictly modern music is pure experiment. Much of it follows the "Fauves'" ideals which were a worship of ugliness, vulgarity and the deliberate attemp[illegible] to shock, to disturb or to express [illegible] purely personal concept of som[illegible] purely personal experience. A[illegible] worthwhile programs have variety, balance and unity.

4. "Do you think the playing [illegible] one or two movements of a symphony offend listeners, or woul[illegible] they prefer more selections rathe[illegible] than one long symphony?" It depends entirely upon the work performed, for some of the great work[illegible] of art in music are so unified tha[illegible] the whole story should be giver[illegible] On the other hand, there are many many works of the best composer[illegible] which contain sparkling gem[illegible] hidden among pages of erudite an[illegible] scholarly writing which should b[illegible] given separately, because too muc[illegible] of the composition is of interes[illegible] only to the bookworms. Music, like literature, frequently profits by judicious cutting.

Sponsors of all radio programs desire the listeners' point of view. All that is necessary to have more worthwhile music on the air is for those who are interested to write in and ask for it.

MUSIC

N. E. MUTUAL HALL

Symphony Chamber Concert

By JOHN WILLIAM RILEY

Two of Boston's more esoteric chamber music organizations, the Flute Players Club and the Society of Ancient Instruments, played the third program of the Boston Symphony's chamber orchestra concerts in New England Mutual Hall last evening.

Certainly the greatest interest was aroused by Vincent d'Indy's Suite for flute, violin, viola, cello and harp. (Respectively, the players were Georges Laurent, Richard Burgin, Jean Lefranc, Jean Bedetti, and Bernard Zighera.) Despite d'Indy's adherence to the rigorous logic of his own cyclic forms, the work is fresh as mountain air. There is nothing stiff or formal about the work. Cast in four movements, the Suite is full of fine themes, some flashing, some poetic, and resplendent sonoroties.

The d'Indy Suite seemed all the more refreshing since it followed Weber's exuberant but thin Trio for flute, cello and piano played by Messrs. Laurent, Bedetti and Leo Litwin. The trio has its pleasant moments, but a good deal of it is sheer musical rhetoric.

Early music by Bach, Telemann and Lotti, all from last Winter's programs of the Ancient Instrument Society, occupied the first part of the evening. Lotti's Sonata for flute, gamba and harpsichord, performed rather impersonally, would have benefited by a warmer attitude. And in Bach's Sonata for gamba and harpsichord, overly rigid tempi enchanced the dryness of the piece. But Telemann's Suite in C major, for four viols and harpsichord, had perfect ensemble and spirited performance. It is a debatable poi[illegible] whether the acoustics of the h[illegible] were responsible for occasional d[illegible] tortions of tone color.

The members of the Society [illegible] Ancient Instruments are Paul Fe[illegible] rovsky, descant viol; Albert B[illegible] nard, treble viol; Alfred Zighe[illegible] viola da gamba; Gaston Dufres[illegible] violone; Putnam Aldrich, harp[illegible] chord. Let's put in a vote for t[illegible] group to record the early mu[illegible] they play, since their performan[illegible] are often definitive.

BLANK PAGE

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
BAKER, ORE.
DEMOCRAT-HERALD
LAUREL, MISS.
LEADER CALL
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~DISPATCH~~
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
MANITOWOC, WIS.
HERALD-TIMES
SUPERIOR, WIS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 13 1944

Stravinsky to Present His Version of Anthem

BOSTON.—(AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, will conduct his own harmonization of the national anthem at the coming Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra.

The noted Russian composer, who will lead a program of his own works, said he completed the harmonization "two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough."

In an interview Wednesday he explained that he "kept the same melody but the harmony is different."

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally. I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 9 - 1944

Igor Stravinsky will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast Saturday, directing his own works. Verdi's "The Masked Ball" will be presented by the Metropolitan Opera Company Saturday, with Jan Peerce, tenor; Leonard Warren, baritone; and Zinka Milanov, soprano, in the starring roles. Jascha Heiftez will be guest soloist on the Great Artist Series.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN [illegible] - 1944

Pianist Will Be Symphony Soloist

Hortense Monath, noted young American pianist, is soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, playing Mozart's C major Concerto (K. 467), on WTAG today at 3.

Dr. Artur Rodzinski conducts the orchestra in the program that also includes the first radio performance of "In Memoriam of Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy" by William Grant Still, and the Fifth Symphony in E minor ("From the New World") by Dvorak, which was given its first performance by the New York Philharmonic 50 years ago.

A member of an extremely musical family, Hortense Monath first studied piano with her mother and then with Ernest Hutcheson. Artur Schnabel was her teacher abroad, and that distinguished pianist-teacher has called her one of his most gifted pupils. Mis Monath made her debut in Hamburg, following this with concerts in other European musical centers.

On her return to the United States, one of Miss Monath's first appearances was with the Boston Symphony and she since has made extensive tours of the East, Middle West and South.

Miss Monath also is program-maker and innovator for the New Friends of Music, notable chamber-music society, of which her husband, I. A. Hirschmann, is the founder.

MENOMINEE, MICH.
HERALD-LEADER
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
FREEPORT, ILL.
JOURNAL STANDARD
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
ARK. DEMOCRAT
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
EVENING NEWS
PLAINFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS
APPLETON, WIS.
POST CRESCENT
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE
ADRIAN, MICH.
TELEGRAM
UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
HARTFORD, CONN.
~~COURANT~~
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA
KINGSTON, N.Y.
FREEMAN
GULFPORT, MISS.
HERALD
SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE
NEWARK, N. J.
~~STAR-LEDGER~~
WEST PALM BEACH, FLA
PALM BEACH TIMES
CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES
BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH
BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER
MICHIGAN CITY, IND.
NEWS-DISPATCH
MUNCIE, IND.
PRESS
GARY, IND.
POST-TRIBUNE
RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL TIMES
BELLEVILLE, ILL.
ADVOCATE
ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

JAN 1 2 1944

Russian Maestro Ready With His Version of Anthem

BOSTON, Jan. 12.—(AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, will conduct his own harmonization of the national anthem at the coming Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The noted Russian composer, who will lead a program of his own works, said he completed the harmonization "two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough."

In an interview today he explained that he "kept the same melody, but the harmony is different."

Stravinsky said that he went back to music of Puritan times to obtain his choral-like treatment of the anthem.

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally.

"I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

JAN 1 2 1944

Stravinsky Ignores Call of Movies

Composer Busy Harmonizing 'Star Spangled Banner'

CAN'T DO IT—Composing music for movies not one of his abilities declares Igor Stravinsky.

BOSTON.—(AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, is doing the unusual again—living in Hollywood and ignoring the motion picture industry.

In his home on the dividing line between Hollywood and Beverly Hills he listens to his flock of chickens of a morning—"I like their rhythmic clucking," he says with gestures—and writes music. But not for the films.

"I'm a symphonist and I do not like to write background music," he declared today during an interview between rehearsals for the all Stravinsky program he is conducting with the Boston symphony orchestra this Friday and Saturday.

"When the movie people ask you to compose for films you know it will be cut," he explained. "I've tried it. The score is cut once and then the film is edited and some more taken out. After that the local operator goes to work.

The 61-year old Russian born composer who startled the world with his orchestral suite "Le Sacre Du Printemps," shrugged expressive shoulders.

"I want to be happy when I compose," he added almost plaintively. "I love the beautiful sun and the air in Hollywood. But write for the motion pictures? No.

Stravinsky adjusted his glasses and his lean face grew animated. "Recently," he said, "I heard some very interesting film music. It was in 'Flesh and Fantasy' and was composed by Alexander Tansman.

"He is a good composer, especially in the portions he wrote for the French fair scene. You understand, I do not mean Hollywood music is bad. Just that I—I can not write for the films."

PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 1 4 1944

KOUSSEVITZKY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to be heard at the Mosque Theatre on Thursday evening, February 10, as the first of the Griffith Music Foundation series of 1944 concerts will present the following program:

"Concerto Grosso" for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12, Largo-Allegro; Larghetto; Largo-Allegro Handel; "A Lincoln Portrait," Copland, Will Geer, narrator; Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73 1. Allegro non troppo, 2. Adagio non troppo, 3. Adagietto grazioso quasi andantino, 4. Allegro con spirito, Brahms.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
~~REPUBLICAN~~
News

JAN 1 4 1944

Stravinsky Batons 'Pachyderm Polka

Boston, Jan. 14—A Boston Symphony orchestra audience will hear the "Pachyderm Polka" today for the first time.

Two years ago, at the request of the circus management, Igor Stravinsky composed the polka for the Ringling Brothers elephant ballet.

Conducting the Boston orchestra today in an All-Stravinsky program, the composer will include the elephant music. Without violins, the orchestra will render the composition which Stravinsky describes as "A brilliant piece whose beauty has been lost amid a chorus of peanut vendors."

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

JAN 1 2 1944

Stravinsky Lives In Hollywood But Has No Use For Movies

States His Policy In Interview At Boston Symphony Orchestra Rehearsal

BOSTON, Jan. 12 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, is doing the unusual again—living in Hollywood and ignoring the motion picture industry.

In his home on the dividing line between Hollywood and Beverly Hills he listens to his flock of chickens of a morning—"I like their rhythmic clucking," he says with gestures—and writes music. But not for the films.

No Background Work

"I'm a symphonist and I do not like to write background music," he declared today during an interview between rehearsals for the all-Stravinsky program he is conducting with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Friday and Saturday.

"When the movie people ask you to compose for films you know it will be cut," he explained. "I've tried it. The score is cut once and then the film is edited and some more taken out. After that the local operator goes to work."

The 61-year-old Russian-born composer who startled the world with his orchestral suite Le Sacre du Printempts, shrugged expressive shoulders.

"I want to be happy when I compose," he added, "almost plaintively. "I love the beautiful sun and the air in Hollywood. But write for the motion pictures? No. Not if you want to be responsible for your own work."

Stravinsky adjusted his glasses and his lean face grew animated. "Recently," he said, "I heard some very interesting film music. It was in Flesh and Fantsy and was composed by Alexander Tansman.

"He is a good composer, especially in the portions he wrote for the French fair scene. You understand I do not mean Hollywood music is bad. Just that I—I can not write for the films."

Stravinski moved about the room with short, swift strides and then picked up a score, thereby changing the subject.

"With the Boston Symphony this week-end," he said, "I am conducting the world premiere of Four Norwegian Moods. It is intended as a compliment to Norway.

"I wrote it after studying Norwegian folklore and used a style similar to that employed by Joseph Haydn in his treatment of folk material.

The noted Russian composer then revealed that he was going to use his own harmonization of the national anthem at the coming concerts.

"I completed it two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough," he said. "I kept the same melody but the harmony is different. It has a very full choral sound and is in 17th century style."

He explained that he had gone back to music of Puritan times in his treatment of the harmony.

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally. I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

Stravinsky said that one of his most "astonishing commissions" was composing a circus polka intended as a ballet for elephants for the Ringling Brothers Barnum and Bailey Circus in 1942.

"George Balanchine, the choreographer, chased me all across the Country to get me to do it. I'm playing it, too, as well as my card game ballet in three deals.

"The elephant polka is wonderful—but of course elephants don't dance."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 13 1944

REVISES NATION'S ANTHEM

Stravinsky to Offer in Boston His Harmonization of Work

BOSTON, Jan. 12 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky will conduct his own harmonization of the national anthem at the Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The noted Russian composer, who will lead a program of his own works, said he completed the harmonization "two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough."

In an interview today Stravinsky said that he went back to music of Puritan times to obtain his choral-like treatment of the anthem.

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally.

"I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

[108]

PASTE OVER

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
BAKER, ORE.
DEMOCRAT-HERALD
LAUREL, MISS.
LEADER CALL
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DISPATCH
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
MANITOWOC, WIS.
HERALD-TIMES
SUPERIOR, WIS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 13 1944

Stravinsky to Present His Version of Anthem

BOSTON.—(AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, will conduct his own harmonization of the national anthem at the coming Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra.

The noted Russian composer, who will lead a program of his own works, said he completed the harmonization "two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough."

In an interview Wednesday he explained that he "kept the same melody but the harmony is different."

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally. I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 8 - 1944

Igor Stravinsky will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast Saturday, directing his own works. Verdi's "The Masked Ball" will be presented by the Metropolitan Opera Company Saturday, with Jan Peerce, tenor; Leonard Warren, baritone; and Zinka Milanov, soprano, in the starring roles. Jascha Heiftez will be guest soloist on the Great Artist Series.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

1944

Pianist Will Be Symphony Soloist

Hortense Monath, noted young American pianist, is soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, playing Mozart's C major Concerto (K. 467), on WTAG today at 3.

Dr. Artur Rodzinski conducts the orchestra in the program that also includes the first radio performance of "In Memoriam of Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy" by William Grant Still, and the Fifth Symphony in E minor ("From the New World") by Dvorak, which was given its first performance by the New York Philharmonic 50 years ago.

A member of an extremely musical family, Hortense Monath first studied piano with her mother and then with Ernest Hutcheson. Artur Schnabel was her teacher abroad, and that distinguished pianist-teacher has called her one of his most gifted pupils. Mis Monath made her debut in Hamburg, following this with concerts in other European musical centers.

On her return to the United States, one of Miss Monath's first appearances was with the Boston Symphony and she since has made extensive tours of the East, Middle West and South.

Miss Monath also is programmaker and innovator for the New Friends of Music, notable chamber-music society, of which her husband, I. A. Hirschmann, is the founder.

MENOMINEE, MICH.
HERALD-LEADER
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
FREEPORT, ILL.
JOURNAL STANDARD
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
ARK. DEMOCRAT
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
EVENING NEWS
PLAINFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS
APPLETON, WIS.
POST CRESCENT
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE
ADRIAN, MICH.
TELEGRAM
UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
HARTFORD, CONN.
~~COURANT~~
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA
KINGSTON, N.Y.
FREEMAN
GULFPORT, MISS.
HERALD
SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE
NEWARK, N. J.
~~STAR-LEDGER~~
WEST PALM BEACH, FLA
PALM BEACH TIMES
CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES
BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH
BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER
MICHIGAN CITY, IND.
NEWS-DISPATCH
MUNCIE, IND.
PRESS
GARY, IND.
POST-TRIBUNE
RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL TIMES
BELLEVILLE, ILL.
ADVOCATE
ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

JAN 12 1944

Russian Maestro Ready With His Version of Anthem

BOSTON, Jan. 12.—(AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, will conduct his own harmonization of the national anthem at the coming Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The noted Russian composer, who will lead a program of his own works, said he completed the harmonization "two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough."

In an interview today he explained that he "kept the same melody, but the harmony is different."

Stravinsky said that he went back to music of Puritan times to obtain his choral-like treatment of the anthem.

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally.

"I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

JAN 12 1944

Stravinsky Ignores Call of Movies

Composer Busy Harmonizing 'Star Spangled Banner'

CAN'T DO IT—Composing music for movies not one of his abilities declares Igor Stravinsky.

BOSTON.—(AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, is doing the unusual again—living in Hollywood and ignoring the motion picture industry.

In his home on the dividing line between Hollywood and Beverly Hills he listens to his flock of chickens of a morning—"I like their rhythmic clucking," he says with gestures—and writes music. But not for the films.

"I'm a symphonist and I do not like to write background music," he declared today during an interview between rehearsals for the all Stravinsky program he is conducting with the Boston symphony orchestra this Friday ~~and Saturday~~.

"When the movie people ask you to compose for films you know it will be cut," he explained. "I've tried it. The score is cut once and then the film is edited and some more taken out. After that the local operator goes to work.

The 61-year old Russian born composer who startled the world with his orchestral suite "Le Sacre Du Printemps," shrugged expressive shoulders.

"I want to be happy when I compose," he added almost plaintively. "I love the beautiful sun and the air in Hollywood. But write for the motion pictures? No.

Stravinsky adjusted his glasses and his lean face grew animated. "Recently," he said, "I heard some very interesting film music. It was in 'Flesh and Fantasy' and was composed by Alexander Tansman.

"He is a good composer, especially in the portions he wrote for the French fair scene. You understand, I do not mean Hollywood music is bad. Just that I—I can not write for the films."

PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 14 1944

KOUSSEVITZKY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to be heard at the Mosque Theatre on Thursday evening, February 10, as the first of the Griffith Music Foundation series of 1944 concerts will present the following program:

"Concerto Grosso" for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12, Largo-Allegro; Larghetto; Largo-Allegro Handel; "A Lincoln Portrait," Copland, Will Geer, narrator; Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73 1. Allegro non troppo, 2. Adagio non troppo, 3. Adagietto grazioso quasi andantino, 4. Allegro con spirito, Brahms.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 14 1944

Stravinsky Batons 'Pachyderm Polka

Boston, Jan. 14—A Boston Symphony orchestra audience will hear the "Pachyderm Polka" today for the first time.

Two years ago, at the request of the circus management, Igor Stravinsky composed the polka for the Ringling Brothers elephant ballet.

Conducting the Boston orchestra today in an All-Stravinsky program, the composer will include the elephant music. Without violins, the orchestra will render the composition which Stravinsky describes as "A brilliant piece whose beauty has been lost amid a chorus of peanut vendors."

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

JAN 12 1944

Stravinsky Lives In Hollywood But Has No Use For Movies

States His Policy In Interview At Boston Symphony Orchestra Rehearsal

BOSTON, Jan. 12 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, is doing the unusual again—living in Hollywood and ignoring the motion picture industry.

In his home on the dividing line between Hollywood and Beverly Hills he listens to his flock of chickens of a morning—"I like their rhythmic clucking," he says with gestures—and writes music. But not for the films.

No Background Work

"I'm a symphonist and I do not like to write background music," he declared today during an interview between rehearsals for the all-Stravinsky program he is conducting with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Friday ~~and Saturday~~.

"When the movie people ask you to compose for films you know it will be cut," he explained. "I've tried it. The score is cut once and then the film is edited and some more taken out. After that the local operator goes to work."

The 61-year-old Russian - born composer who startled the world with his orchestral suite Le Sacre du Printempts, shrugged expressive shoulders.

"I want to be happy when I compose," he added, "almost plaintively. "I love the beautiful sun and the air in Hollywood. But write for the motion pictures? No. Not if you want to be responsible for your own work."

Stravinsky adjusted his glasses and his lean face grew animated. "Recently," he said, "I heard some very interesting film music. It was in Flesh and Fantsy and was composed by Alexander Tansman.

"He is a good composer, especially in the portions he wrote for the French fair scene. You understand I do not mean Hollywood music is bad. Just that I—I can not write for the films."

Stravinski moved about the room with short, swift strides and then picked up a score, thereby changing the subject.

"With the Boston Symphony this week-end," he said, "I am conducting the world premiere of Four Norwegian Moods. It is intended as a compliment to Norway.

"I wrote it after studying Norwegian folklore and used a style similar to that employed by Joseph Haydn in his treatment of folk material.

The noted Russian composer then revealed that he was going to use his own harmonization of the national anthem at the coming concerts.

"I completed it two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough," he said. "I kept the same melody but the harmony is different. It has a very full choral sound and is in 17th century style."

He explained that he had gone back to music of Puritan times in his treatment of the harmony.

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally. I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

Stravinsky said that one of his most "astonishing commissions" was composing a circus polka intended as a ballet for elephants for the Ringling Brothers Barnum and Bailey Circus in 1942.

"George Balanchine, the choreographer, chased me all across the Country to get me to do it. I'm playing it, too, as well as my card game ballet in three deals.

"The elephant polka is wonderful—but of course elephants don't dance."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 13 1944

REVISES NATION'S ANTHEM

Stravinsky to Offer in Boston His Harmonization of Work

BOSTON, Jan. 12 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky will conduct his own harmonization of the national anthem at the Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The noted Russian composer, who will lead a program of his own works, said he completed the harmonization "two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough."

In an interview today Stravinsky said that he went back to music of Puritan times to obtain his choral-like treatment of the anthem.

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally.

"I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

[108]

ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
JAN 13 1944

District Choirmaster Arranges 'Easy-to-Sing' National Anthem

Igor Stravinsky's harmonization of "The Star Spangled Banner," which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tomorrow and Saturday, has focused attention on an "easy-to-sing" version of the national anthem arranged by Edward J. Smith, McKownville organist and choirmaster.

The noted Russian composer told Boston music critics he retained the familiar melody of the anthem but changed the harmony, going back to music of Puritan times for a choral-like treatment.

E. J. Smith

After hundreds of experiments, resulting in many versions aiming to satisfy all the conditions, Mr. Smith arrived at an arrangement which is now being published. The words of a fourth stanza have been taken from a poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes, and Mr. Smith said he has asked Archibald MacLeish, librarian of Congress, to compose another stanza.

Mr. Smith first began to work on the revision in 1917 while he was arranger for a 100-voice choir in First Methodist Church, Cleveland. Later he served at Western Reserve University 14 years.

His new version, bringing the melody into "a more practical range for general use," has had several public tests before Albany audiences in the last few years, notably by the Albany High School choir under the direction of Dr. Frank B. Bailey.

"I have been told," said Mr. Smith, "that my version has solved the century-old problem presented by the wide range and high notes in the traditional melody. My score provides a better and more uniform tone color, particularly for amateur singers who were unable to maintain good tone quality on the high notes of the old version, and often were forced to stop singing at this point.

"Singers can swing easily into the new key, for the second part, at B, by observing that the note pitch does not drop, at A, as in the old version. The new phrase, at A, begins on the same pitch level as for the ending of the preceding phrase."

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
ROCK ISLAND, ILL.
ARGUS
DES MOINES, IA.
TRIBUNE
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGON JOURNAL
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR-JOURNAL
PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
JAN 13 1944

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
JAN 15 1944

Puerto Rico Buys Power Facilities

San Juan, Puerto Rico — (AP) — Through acquisition of the properties of two public service corporations, the insular government of Puerto Rico has become the first state or territory under the American flag to own and control all electric facilities within its borders.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 15 1944

Stravinsky Leads the Boston In an All-Stravinsky Program

By Paul Bowles

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Igor Stravinsky ~~conducting, in~~ Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Symphony in C Major.........Stravinsky
Four Norwegian Moods (first performance). Stravinsky
Circus Polka (first concert performance). Stravinsky
Suite from "Pulcinella"........Stravinsky
"Jeu de Cartes"..............Stravinsky

BOSTON, Jan. 14.—The Friday afternoon audience at Symphony Hall gave an extremely warm reception to the program of his own works which Igor Stravinsky conducted with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

Any all-Stravinsky program is news, and this was not an ordinary Stravinsky program, which is to say that no works of the so-called first period were given. And of those played, all but one were of the most recent output—representative of the period in Stravinsky's development which has been a most frequent target for critical excoriation. Such abuse has generally been made on the grounds that the well of invention is nearly dry. It would be difficult for a serious musician to entertain such an opinion even momentarily after hearing today's concert.

Symphony in C Played

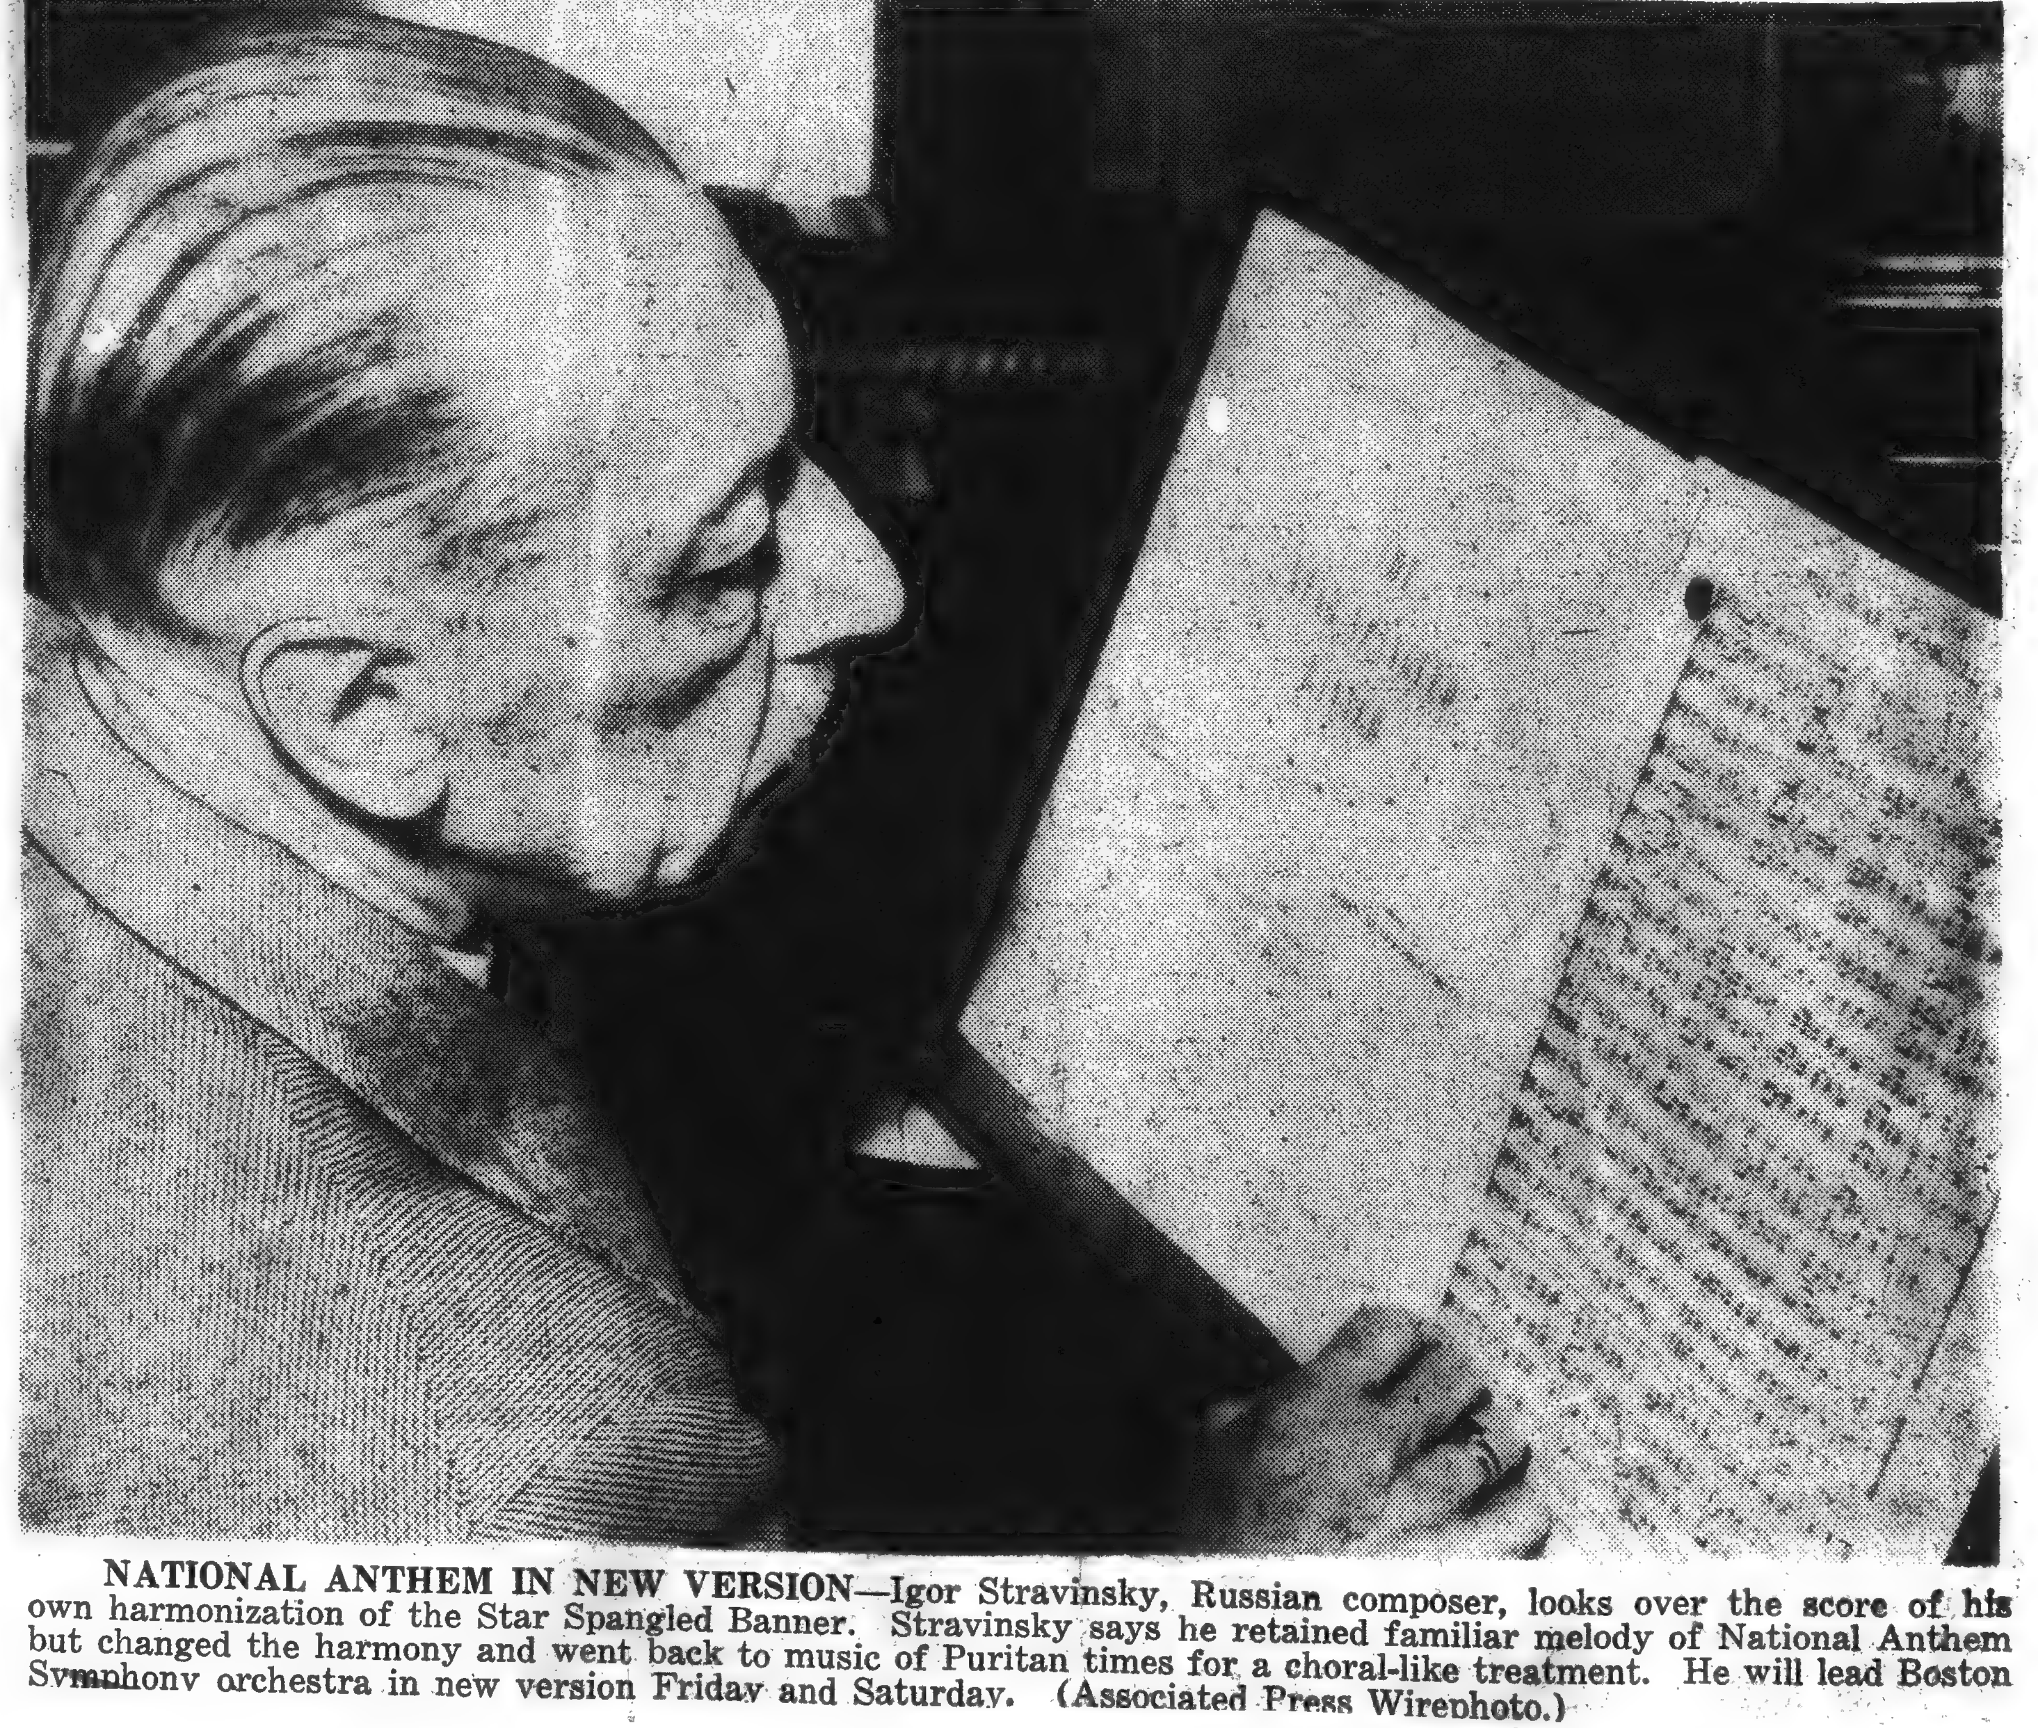
The Symphony in C, like most of the master's works dating from the last fifteen years, is a pastiche of romantic music, but it is more than romantic music in modern dress. It is twentieth-century music which relies almost completely on the psychological overtones of sonorities and harmonies which came into being in the nineteenth century, and which could mean nothing to an audience not conversant with romantic music. And like the other recent works, it is classical only in the sense that the music is climaxless. This reviewer had heard the composer conduct the work with the Orquestra Sinfonica in Mexico, and the two performances were almost equally good. The orchestra today seemed tense and somewhat unsure, and sonorous balance came undone in the third movement. This was unfortunate, inasmuch as the work is practically a problem in instrumental proportions which, if they are not exact, give it a halting aspect. Yet at any point in any movement what is going on is more interesting than in a work of any other contemporary composer.

The Four Norwegian Moods proved to be four short numbers written to coincide comfortably with popular taste. The subtitles are Intrada, Song, Wedding Dance and Cortege, and the subject matter, in spite of the composer's assurances that all themes are right out of Norway, ranges from themes which might be Irish to others which might be Levantine. The first sounds like a fanfare for a procession in a motion picture, the second like a tone poem, perhaps about snow, the third like a beer garden and the last rather like Stravinsky, with threats of becoming "Petrouchka" now and then. Incidentally, the word "mood" here does not denote what one might think, but is used in a generic sense which Webster defines as "distinction of form in a verb to express the manner in which the action of state it denotes is conceived." Which may or may not have something to do with the four little pieces. The audience reaction was extremely favorable. One would expect this work to figure on many symphonic programs next season.

"Circus Polka" Is Repeated

The Circus Polka enjoyed the distinction of being the first work to be repeated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston since 1924, when "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" was replayed for enthusiastic listeners. This piece is about elephants; it evokes their grave and dignified movements perfectly. The circus band is there, with the bass drums and calliope, and it is a brilliant tour de force, ending with a bit of Schubert.

Mr. Stravinsky is the perfect conductor for his own works because he aims directly at clarity of sound in line and balance, and in this music, which can be made to sound clearer than any music written since Mozart, utter clarity is the only way to achieve dramatic effect. There was no underbrush in his orchestral forest today; one felt that one could walk between the groups of sounds. No orchestra ever sounded more diaphanous than his did today in certain passages of "Jeu De Cartes." All these recent scores, when conducted by him, are the epitome of sonorous richness; indeed, one could say that texture has come to be the motivating passion that rhythm once was with him. And it is this reviewer's contention that the music remains as stimulating as ever.



NATIONAL ANTHEM IN NEW VERSION—Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer, looks over the score of his own harmonization of the Star Spangled Banner. Stravinsky says he retained familiar melody of National Anthem but changed the harmony and went back to music of Puritan times for a choral-like treatment. He will lead Boston Symphony orchestra in new version Friday and Saturday. (Associated Press Wirephoto.)

Yankee Blood Boils at Stravinsky's Act

To the Editor—It was with mixed feelings of sorrow and amazement that I read of the efforts of Stravinsky to present a new version of our beloved national anthem, "The Star Spangled Banner," at Symphony Hall. I have been told that the version is so remote from the real anthem as to be scarcely recognizable.

It seems incredible that a man of Starvinsky's education, in these parlous times when Poland is looking to this country as a mediator in her postwar affairs, should so far forget himself as to endeavor to pervert the one song that is officially our national anthem. It is not surprising that the thought is being expressed that there be some underhand and sinister motive in the action.

Is nothing in America sacred to these iconoclastic foreign minds? Because a man has so specialized his mind that he truly believes he is the great "I am," is it any reason why he should feel that a nation of free men should not know what they want? Have we thrown open our gates to this man because he is an artist only to have him bite the hand that frees him? I should not now be surprised if he took our good "Old Hundred" and versionized it into swing for saxophones in a night club.

And then comes a thought. What were the promoters of these concerts thinking of to allow a semi-sacred place like Symphony Hall to be used for this purpose? I thought we all knew the anthem was officially indorsed; I knew it was illegal to use any other version of it, though I understand that was a Federal regulation.

Even in this cold Wintry weather my Yankee blood boiled as I learned of the sacrilege.

LEONARD M. LIBBEY.
West Somerville.

(Editor's Note—An interesting article on the law and the musical forms of the National Anthem will be found on Page 38.)

ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
JAN 13 1944

District Choirmaster Arranges 'Easy-to-Sing' National Anthem

Igor Stravinsky's harmonization of "The Star Spangled Banner," which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play tomorrow and Saturday, ~~has focused~~ attention on an "easy-to-sing" version of the national anthem arranged by Edward J. Smith, McKownville organist and choirmaster.

The noted Russian composer told Boston music critics he retained the familiar melody of the anthem but changed the harmony, going back to music of Puritan times for a choral-like treatment.

E. J. Smith

After hundreds of experiments, resulting in many versions aiming to satisfy all the conditions, Mr. Smith arrived at an arrangement which is now being published. The words of a fourth stanza have been taken from a poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes, and Mr. Smith said he has asked Archibald MacLeish, librarian of Congress, to compose another stanza.

Mr. Smith first began to work on the revision in 1917 while he was arranger for a 100-voice choir in First Methodist Church, Cleveland. Later he served at Western Reserve University 14 years.

His new version, bringing the melody into "a more practical range for general use," has had several public tests before Albany audiences in the last few years, notably by the Albany High School choir under the direction of Dr. Frank B. Bailey.

"I have been told," said Mr. Smith, "that my version has solved the century-old problem presented by the wide range and high notes in the traditional melody. My score provides a better and more uniform tone color, particularly for amateur singers who were unable to maintain good tone quality on the high notes of the old version, and often were forced to stop singing at this point.

"Singers can swing easily into the new key, for the second part, at B, by observing that the note pitch does not drop, at A, as in the old version. The new phrase, at A, begins on the same pitch level as for the ending of the preceding phrase."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 15 1944

Stravinsky Leads the Boston In an All-Stravinsky Program

By Paul Bowles

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Igor Stravinsky [redacted] in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:
Symphony in C Major..........Stravinsky
Four Norwegian Moods (first performance). Stravinsky
Circus Polka (first concert performance). Stravinsky
Suite from "Pulcinella"........Stravinsky
"Jeu de Cartes"..............Stravinsky

BOSTON, Jan. 14.—The Friday afternoon audience at Symphony Hall gave an extremely warm reception to the program of his own works which Igor Stravinsky conducted with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

Any all-Stravinsky program is news, and this was not an ordinary Stravinsky program, which is to say that no works of the so-called first period were given. And of those played, all but one were of the most recent output—representative of the period in Stravinsky's development which has been a most frequent target for critical excoriation. Such abuse has generally been made on the grounds that the well of invention is nearly dry. It would be difficult for a serious musician to entertain such an opinion even momentarily after hearing today's concert.

Symphony in C Played

The Symphony in C, like most of the master's works dating from the last fifteen years, is a pastiche of romantic music, but it is more than romantic music in modern dress. It is twentieth-century music which relies almost completely on the psychological overtones of sonorities and harmonies which came into being in the nineteenth century, and which could mean nothing to an audience not conversant with romantic music. And like the other recent works, it is classical only in the sense that the music is climaxless. This reviewer had heard the composer conduct the work with the Orquestra Sinfonica in Mexico, and the two performances were almost equally good. The orchestra today seemed tense and somewhat unsure, and sonorous balance came undone in the third movement. This was unfortunate, inasmuch as the work is practically a problem in instrumental proportions which, if they are not exact, give it a halting aspect. Yet at any point in any movement what is going on is more interesting than in a work of any other contemporary composer.

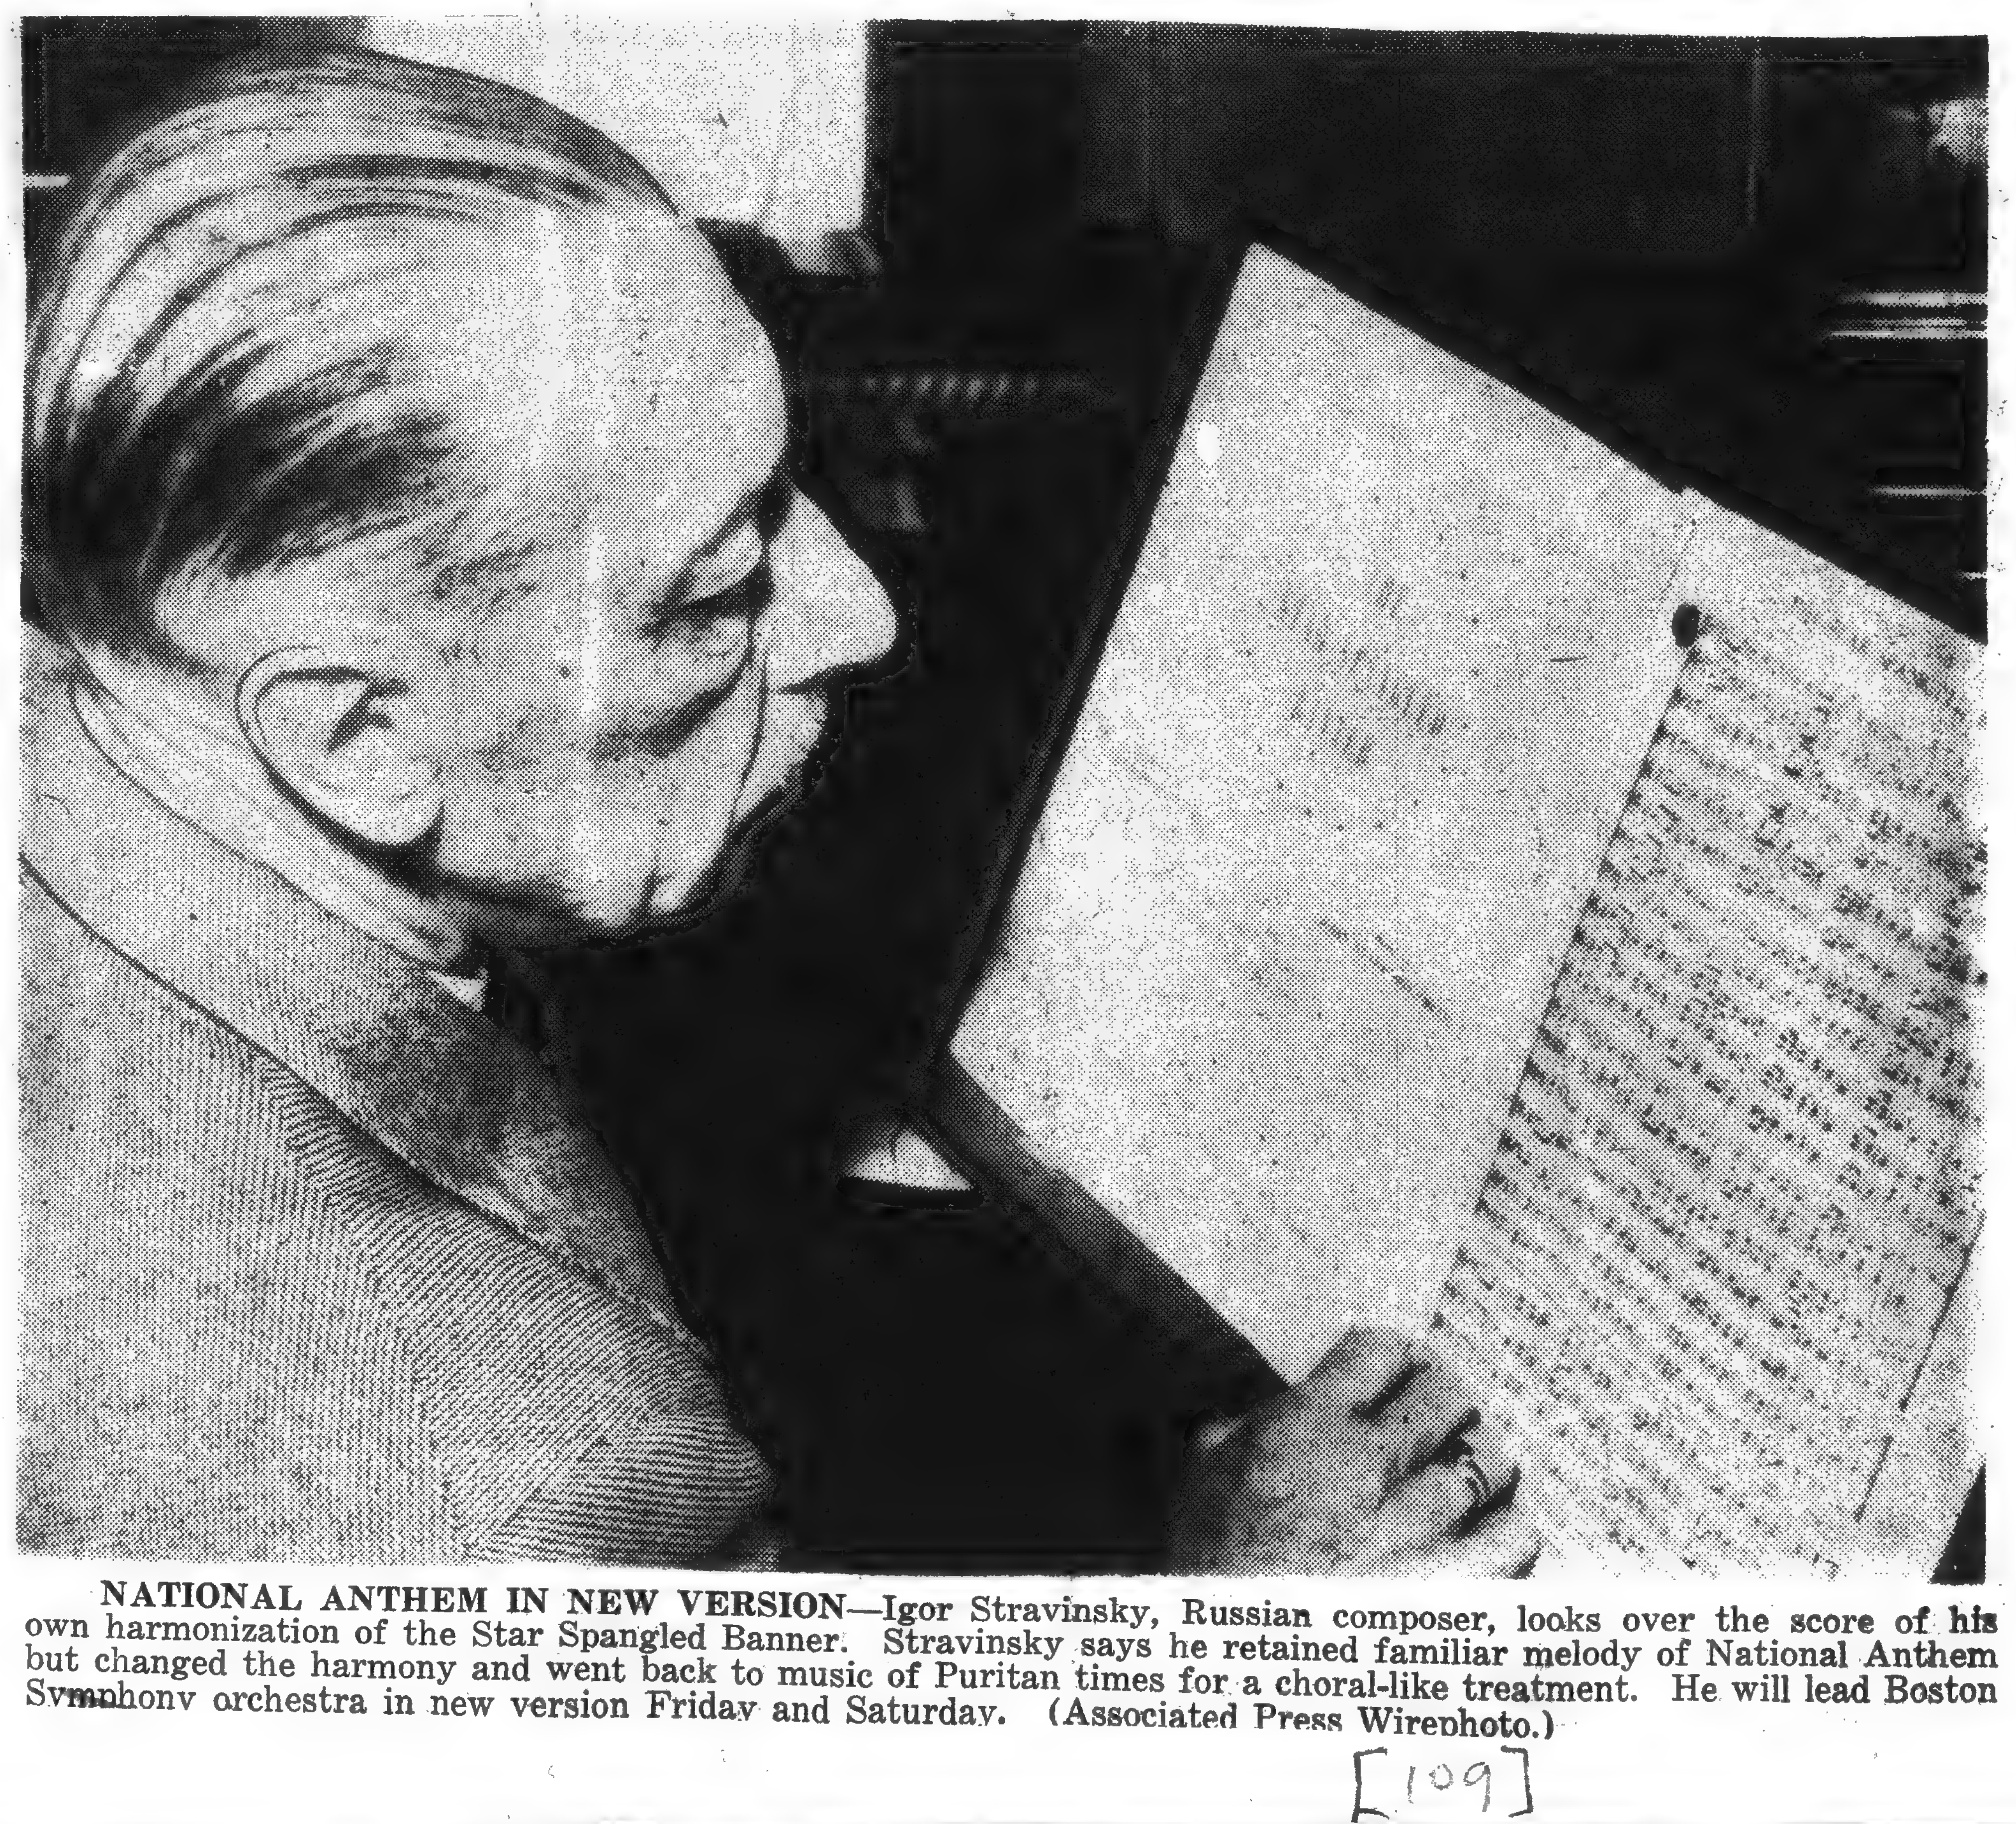
The Four Norwegian Moods proved to be four short numbers written to coincide comfortably with popular taste. The subtitles are Intrada, Song, Wedding Dance and Cortege, and the subject matter, in spite of the composer's assurances that all themes are right out of Norway, ranges from themes which might be Irish to others which might be Levantine. The first sounds like a fanfare for a procession in a motion picture, the second like a tone poem, perhaps about snow, the third like a beer garden and the last rather like Stravinsky, with threats of becoming "Petrouchka" now and then. Incidentally, the word "mood" here does not denote what one might think, but is used in a generic sense which Webster defines as "distinction of form in a verb to express the manner in which the action of state it denotes is conceived." Which may or may not have something to do with the four little pieces. The audience reaction was extremely favorable. One would expect this work to figure on many symphonic programs next season.

"Circus Polka" Is Repeated

The Circus Polka enjoyed the distinction of being the first work to be repeated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston since 1924, when "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" was replayed for enthusiastic listeners. This piece is about elephants; it evokes their grave and dignified movements perfectly. The circus band is there, with the bass drums and calliope, and it is a brilliant tour de force, ending with a bit of Schubert.

Mr. Stravinsky is the perfect conductor for his own works because he aims directly at clarity of sound in line and balance, and in this music, which can be made to sound clearer than any music written since Mozart, utter clarity is the only way to achieve dramatic effect. There was no underbrush in his orchestral forest today; one felt that one could walk between the groups of sounds. No orchestra ever sounded more diaphanous than his did today in certain passages of "Jeu De Cartes." All these recent scores, when conducted by him, are the epitome of sonorous richness; indeed, one could say that texture has come to be the motivating passion that rhythm once was with him. And it is this reviewer's contention that the music remains as stimulating as ever.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
ROCK ISLAND, ILL.
ARGUS
DES MOINES, IA.
TRIBUNE
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGON JOURNAL
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR-JOURNAL
PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
JAN 1 5 1944



NATIONAL ANTHEM IN NEW VERSION—Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer, looks over the score of his own harmonization of the Star Spangled Banner. Stravinsky says he retained familiar melody of National Anthem but changed the harmony and went back to music of Puritan times for a choral-like treatment. He will lead Boston Symphony orchestra in new version Friday and Saturday. (Associated Press Wirephoto.)

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
JAN 15 1944

Puerto Rico Buys Power Facilities

San Juan, Puerto Rico — (AP) — Through acquisition of the properties of two public service corporations, the insular government of Puerto Rico has become the first state or territory under the American flag to own and control all electric facilities within its borders.

Yankee Blood Boils at Stravinsky's Act

To the Editor—It was with mixed feelings of sorrow and amazement that I read of the efforts of Stravinsky to present a new version of our beloved national anthem, "The Star Spangled Banner," at Symphony Hall. I have been told that the version is so remote from the real anthem as to be scarcely recognizable.

It seems incredible that a man of Starvinsky's education, in these parlous times when Poland is looking to this country as a mediator in her postwar affairs, should so far forget himself as to endeavor to pervert the one song that is officially our national anthem. It is not surprising that the thought is being expressed that there be some underhand and sinister motive in the action.

Is nothing in America sacred to these iconoclastic foreign minds? Because a man has so specialized his mind that he truly believes he is the great "I am," is it any reason why he should feel that a nation of free men should not know what they want? Have we thrown open our gates to this man because he is an artist only to have him bite the hand that frees him? I should not now be surprised if he took our good "Old Hundred" and versionized it into swing for saxophones in a night club.

And then comes a thought. What were the promoters of these concerts thinking of to allow a semi-sacred place like Symphony Hall to be used for this purpose? I thought we all knew the anthem was officially indorsed; I knew it was illegal to use any other version of it, though I understand that was a Federal regulation.

Even in this cold Wintry weather my Yankee blood boiled as I learned of the sacrilege.

LEONARD M. LIBBEY.
West Somerville.

(Editor's Note—An interesting article on the law and the musical forms of the National Anthem will be found on Page 38.)

[109]

PASTE OVER

Globe Jan. 15

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Here it is the middle of the Boston Symphony season and the time when Mr. Koussevitzky, departing on his vacation, relinquishes the orchestra to guest conductors. Igor Stravinsky, the first of the two guests we shall have this year, appeared at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and will do so again tonight.

Mr. Stravinsky brings not only himself but a whole program of his own music, which may be a mixed pleasure, depending on how you look at it. Some in yesterday's audience had a fine time, and some would have settled for about half the amount of Stravinsky. But all told, the Friday subscribers were in a good mood, and applause brought the composer-conductor back to the stage a number of times. He began with his C major Symphony, and followed with Four Norwegian Moods (first performance), "Circus Polka" (first concert performance), the ballet suite "Pulcinella" after Pergolesi, and the "Card Game" ballet score.

On the stand Mr. Stravinsky was a wry, dynamic little figure, his gray-trousered legs fixed in a spreading stance that supported the gesticulations of his arms. As he beat out the meters, the lights glinted from his wrist watch and the balding spot on the back of his head, his angular profile bobbed from side to side and his knees dipped and bent.

As conductor Mr. Stravinsky is mostly concerned with rhythm. He likes animation and metrical complication. For tone quality, color, nuances and balance of sound he has little evident interest. About the same can be said of the music he has composed in the last 20 years. The colorist of "The Firebird" and the forceful creator of "Petrouchka" and "The Rite of Spring" has grown dryer and dryer until his work seems to be structure and mathematics.

The C major Symphony, which strongly impressed this reviewer when Stravinsky first conducted it here three years ago, now seems, apart from the first movement, dull and much too long. It is all bustle and structure, with no memorable melodies, no mixed colors or emotional drive.

The "Circus Polka" was written for the Ringling circus band and an elephant ballet two years ago. Later it was scored for orchestra. It has the immediate value of unconventiality and its circus humor.

Four Norwegian Moods—An Intrada, Song, Wedding Dance and Cortege—are a stylistic treatment of Norse folktunes, and the use of the word Moods is, it seems, obscurely academic. The pieces are pleasant, mildly racial in flavor, and probably of no lasting worth. Stravinsky's "Card Game" is not without diversion, but the best music of all was "Pulcinella."—C. W. D.

REVISED ANTHEM PLAYED

Stravinsky's Version Puzzles the Boston Symphony Audience

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP)—The modern composer Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner" today, startling a huge Symphony Hall audience. The Russian-born musician also led an encore of his "Circus Polka"—the third time the orchestra has played an encore since 1885.

Stravinsky's version of the national anthem overshadowed everything else on the precedent-breaking program. At the start the audience began to sing with the orchestra in customary manner, but soon the odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old composer's arrangement became evident. Eyebrows lifted, voices faltered, and before the close practically everyone gave up even trying to accompany the score.

'Star-Spangled Banner' Version Of Stravinsky Startles Audience

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP).—The noted modern composer Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner" today, startling a huge symphony hall audience into what amounted to stunned silence.

The Russian-born musician, who also led an encore of his "Circus Polka"—the third time the orchestra has played an encore since 1885—generally created as much excited comment among sedate Bostonians as once greeted his controversial orchestral suite 'Le Sacre du Printemps."

Mr. Stravinsky's version of the national anthem overshadowed everything else on the precedent-breaking program. At the start, the audience began to sing with the orchestra in customary manner, but soon the odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the sixty-one-year-old composer's arrangement became evident. Eyebrows lifted, voices faltered, and before the close practically every one gave up even trying to accompany the score.

Earlier, Mr. Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of "The Star-Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style.

The composer described the orchestral sound as full, rich, more like a church hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song, as the anthem was originally. But Bostonians found little religious feeling. Their reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version.

MIDDLESBORO, KY.
NEWS

JAN 15 1944

GIVES ELEPHANT BALLET

Boston, Jan. 14—(UP)— For the third time in 63 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra encored Igor Stravinsky's "Pachyderm Polka," originally composed at the request of the circus management for the Ringingland Brothers elephant ballet.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
~~JOURNAL~~

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
CITIZEN NEWS

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGON JOURNAL

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 15 1944

STRAVINSKY ADAMANT

Boston, Jan. 15 (A. P.).—Igor Stravinsky, noted Russian-born composer, planned to conduct his own arrangement of the Star-Spangled Banner with the Boston Symphony Orchestra again tonight despite the fact that yesterday's performance was received with something less than enthusiasm by a large Symphony Hall audience. The odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies proved virtually unsingable yesterday.

Mr. Stravinsky explained that he wrote his harmonization in early American spirit, intending the score to sound more like a hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song.

Philadelphia, Jan. 15 (A. P.).—The Philadelphia Orchestra tonight will repeat its all-Russian program, including the new Hymn of the Soviet Union, but without the presence of Soviet Ambassador Andrei Gromyko and Mrs. Gromyko, who attended yesterday's premier.

The Soviet anthem, included as a part of the fifth program of the orchestra's United Nation's Cycle, is played on a stage displaying the hammer and sickle as well as the Stars and Stripes.

PLAINFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

MANSFIELD, OHIO
NEWS JOURNAL

HAZLETON, PA.
PLAIN SPEAKER

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH
PRESS

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD

ESCANABA, MICH.
PRESS

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

CANANDAIGUA, N. Y.
MESSENGER

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
BEE

MACON, GA.
NEWS

SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

MONROE, MICH.
NEWS

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

GREENWOOD, S. C.
INDEX-JOURNAL

GREENVILLE, S. C.
PIEDMONT

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

LANCASTER, PA.
INTELLIGENCER-JOURNAL

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS LIGHT

BUFFALO, N.Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

READING, PA.
EAGLE

ASHTABULA, OHIO
STAR-BEACON

MARQUETTE, MICH.
MINING JOURNAL

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.
OUTLOOK

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD

LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

N. ATTLEBORO, MASS.
EVE. CHRONICLE

JAN 15 1944

BOSTON PREFERS THE ORIGINAL STAR SPANGLED BANNER

Audience Stunned By New New Orchestration By Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON (INS)—Boston music lovers turned thumbs down today on a new orchestration of The Star Spangled Banner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arranged and conducted by Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer.

When the number was announced the sedate audience rose to join in the singing but after a few bars subsided into stunned silence.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

ZANESVILLE, OHIO SIGNAL

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

HAZELTON, PA.
STANDARD SENTINEL

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
LEADER-REPUBLICAN

PASADENA, CAL.
STAR-NEWS

YORK, PA.
DISPATCH

KLAMATH FALLS, ORE.
HERALD-NEWS

Bridgeport Conn
Post

STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
ADVANCE

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

ALLIANCE, O.
REVIEW

PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

PALO ALTO, CAL.
TIMES

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
PALM BEACH TIMES

STOCKTON, CALIF.
RECORD

LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER

DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
EVENING NEWS

Burlington Vt
News

MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER

YAKIMA, WASH.
REPUBLIC

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

TULARE, CALIF.
ADVANCE REGISTER

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 15 1944

Dubious on Anthem

BOSTON, January 15 (INS)—Boston music lovers turned thumbs down today on a new orchestration of "The Star Spangled Banner" played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, arranged and conducted by Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer. When the number was announced the sedate audience rose to join in the singing but after a few bars subsided into stunned silence.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
JAN 1 6 1944

Boston Bans Stravinsky's Anthem Idea

He Must Play Song As Key Wrote It

Boston, Jan. 15—(AP)—Composer Igor Stravinsky tonight was informed that he had run afoul of Massachusetts law when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of The Star-Spangled Banner.

The Russian-born musician startled a huge Symphony Hall audience yesterday by his unusual arrangement. Tonight police informed him that he was liable to a $100 fine under Massachusetts law, which forbids rearrangement of the national anthem in whole or in part.

Boston Police Commissioner Thomas F. Sullivan and Police Captain Thomas F. Harvey attended tonight's concert after receiving complaints aroused by yesterday's program.

Stravinsky said that he was unaware that he was in contravention with Massachusetts law and that hereafter he would be more than glad to play the anthem in its original form.

Commissioner Sullivan said that there would be no action by Boston police.

'Star Spangled Banner' Version Of Stravinsky Startles Audience

Monitor Jan 15 '44

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP).—The noted modern composer Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner" today, startling a huge symphony hall audience into what amounted to stunned silence.

The Russian-born musician, who also led an encore of his "Circus Polka"—the third time the orchestra has played an encore since 1885—generally created as much excited comment among sedate Bostonians as once greeted his controversial orchestral suite "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Mr. Stravinsky's version of the national anthem overshadowed everything else on the precedent-breaking program. At the start, the audience began to sing with the orchestra in customary manner, but soon the odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the sixty-one-year-old composer's arrangement became evident. Eyebrows lifted, voices faltered, and before the close practically everyone gave up even trying to accompany the score.

Earlier, Mr. Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of "The Star-Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style.

The composer described the orchestral sound as full, rich, more like a church hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song, as the anthem was originally. But Bostonians found little religious feeling. Their reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version.

Stravinsky Leads the Boston In an All-Stravinsky Program

Jan 15 N.Y. Trib

By Paul Bowles

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Igor Stravinsky conducting, in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Symphony in C Major	Stravinsky
Four Norwegian Moods (first performance),	Stravinsky
Circus Polka (first concert performance),	Stravinsky
Suite from "Pulcinella"	Stravinsky
"Jeu de Cartes"	Stravinsky

BOSTON, Jan. 14.—The Friday afternoon audience at Symphony Hall gave an extremely warm reception to the program of his own works which Igor Stravinsky conducted with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

Any all-Stravinsky program is news, and this was not an ordinary Stravinsky program, which is to say that no works of the so-called first period were given. And of them played, all ut one were of the most recent output — representatives of the period in Stravinsky's development which has een a most frequent target for critical excoriation. Such abuse has generally been made on the grounds that the well of invention is nearly dry. It would be difficult for a serious musician to entertain such an opinion even momentarily after hearing today's concert.

Symphony in C Played

The Symphony in C, like most of the master's works dating from the last fifteen years, is a pastiche of romantic music, but it is more than romantic music in modern dress. It is twentieth century music which relies almost completely on the psychological overtones of sonorities and harmonies which came into being in the nineteenth century, and which could mean nothing to an audience not conversant with romantic music. And like the other recent works, it is classical only in the sense that the music is climaxless. This reviewer had heard the composer conduct the work with the Orquesta Sonfonica in Mexico, and the two performances were almost equally good. The orchestra today seemed tense and somewhat unsure, and sonorous balance came undone in the third movement. This was unfortunate, inasmuch as the work is practically a problem in instrumental proportions which, if they are not exact, give it a halting aspect. Yet at any point in any movement what is going on is more interesting than in a work of any other contemporary composer.

The Four Norwegian Moods proved to be four short numbers written to coincide comfortably with popular taste. The subtitles are Intrada, Song, Wedding Dance and Cortege, and the subject matter, in spite of the composer's assurances that all themes are right out of Norway, ranges from themes which might be Irish to others which might be Levantine. The rst sounds like a fanfare for a procession in a motion picture, the second like a tone poem, perhaps about snow, the third like a beer garden and the last rather like Stravinsky, with reats of becoming "Petrouchka" now and then. Incidentally, the word "mood" here does not denote what one might think, but is used in a generic sense which Webster defines as "distinction of form in a verb to express the manner in which the action of state it denotes is conceived." Which may or may not have something to do with the four little pieces. The audience reaction was extremely favorable. One would expect this work to figure on many symphonic programs next season.

"Circus Polka" Is Repeated

The Circus Polka enjoyed the distinction of being the first work to be repeated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston since 1924, when "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" was replayed for enthusiastic listeners. This piece is about elephants; it evokes their grave and dignified movements perfectly. The circus band is there, with the bass drums and calliope, and it is a brilliant tour de force, ending with a bit of Schubert.

Mr. Stravinsky is the perfect conductor for his own works because he aims directly at clarity of sound in line and balance, and in this music, which can be made to sound clearer than any music written since Mozart, utter clarity is the only way to achieve dramatic effect. There was no underbrush in his orchestral forest today; one felt that one could walk between the groups of sounds. No orchestra ever sounded more diaphanous than his did today in certain passages of "Jeu De Cartes." All these recent scores, when conducted by him, are the epitome of sonorous richness; indeed, one could say that texture has come to be the motivating passion that rhythm once was with him. And it is this reviewer's contention that the music remains as stimulating as ever.

Stravinsky Shocks Hu
In Star Spangled T

Jan 15 American

The talk of the town today was Igor Stravinsky's new, strange-sounding ve Star Spangled Banner," which thousands of radio listeners are in hopes of h when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a repeat performance over Stati the NBC Blue Network at 8:30.

Music lovers, filling Symphony Hall to capacity to hear an "All-Stravinsky" program conducted by the Russian-born composer yesterday afternoon, were stunned into bewildered silence soon after they had risen to sing the National Anthem, traditional wartime concert opener.

VOICES FALTER

Only a few of the first bars had been played when voices began to falter, eyebrows lifted and nearly everybody stopped singing, to let the orchestra finish alone its dissonant rendition of the well-known music.

Igor Stravinsky

Excited comment and a buzz of conversation swept the hall when the strains ended, leaving most of the listeners trying to recall any of the familiar phrases of the song.

Stravinsky, hailed by many critics as the world's greatest living composer, explained earlier that he completed his harmonization of "The Star Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July, as an expresison of gratitude for the peace and opportunity he had found in America.

SOUNDS LIKE HYMN

He said he retained the melody—changing it slightly to fit the voice range better—but introduced different harmonies to suggest Puritan times, with chords in the old contrapuntal style. The orchestra's sound at times was powerful, rich and full, more like a church hymn than a warlike tune.

However, few persons found the hymn "singable." It contained too much of the odd music responsible for the racket accompanying the earthquakes and creeping dinosaurs in "The Rite of Spring," featured in Walt Disney's "Fantasia."

Another near-sensation was caused by Stravinsky during the concert when he responded to the audience's enthusiasm over his first performance of the "Circus Polka" by repeating this number. It marked the third time since the Boston Symphony was founded in 1885 that the orchestra had played an encore.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 1 6 1944

POLICE LEAVE AS IGOR PLAYS TRUE ANTHEM

Officers Set to Arrest Boston Conductor If He Repeated His Unorthodox Rendition

Special to the N. Y. Journal-American

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer who shocked a symphony hall audience by playing a strange and weird version of the Star-Spangled Banner Friday night, took the podium tonight and led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the approved, orthodox version before a packed assembly.

Whereupon a squad of 12 police—including a captain, sergeant and members of the Radical Squad—nodded to each other that "everything is OK" and departed.

They had been all set, Police Capt. Harvey disclosed, to arrest the noted composer and guest-director of the orchestra, had he repeated his Friday night rendition which had baffled the audience and some of the critics.

"WE'LL GRAB HIM."

Just before the concert got under way, Harvey remarked:

"Let him change it just once, and we'll grab him."

It was not made clear whether the policemen were under specific orders or were "covering as a matter of routine" after the outcry from the first rendition.

The audience received the "straight" playing with no demonstration.

Stravinsky appeared on the platform at exactly 8:30 and strode with dignity, unsmiling, to the podium. He bowed to the right, to the left and then turned for the first number.

UTTER SILENCE.

There was a complete silence throughout the hall. Would he repeat the much-criticized improvisation of the night before?

Then the strains of true Star Spangled Banner burst forth. The audience went to its feet, and some joined in the words. The tenseness was gone.

There was a moderate amount of applause afterward, and the concert proceeded. Blue uniforms and brass buttons disappeared.

Post Jan 15

Symphony Orchestra

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For those who eagerly pursue the latest musical wrinkles yesterday afternoon's Symphony programme, all-Stravinsky with Stravinsky conducting, offered a veritable feast, while the reactionaries may have felt that it yielded nothing more nourishing than flannel pancakes and rock candy with real rocks; and this particular middle-of-the-roader found himself both bored and entertained.

Things began to happen before the programme-proper, when Mr. Stravinsky introduced to us his own curiously uncouth harmonization of "The Star-Spangled Banner," which he conceives to be early American in spirit. The general effect is a little as though the Squeedunk town band were trying to harmonize the tune by ear and not making a very good job of it.

For the "first time anywhere," were heard the "Four Norwegian Moods" and by mood Mr. Stravinsky says he means mode, or mood in the grammatical issue. Anyway, he has dished up bits df folk songs less appetizingly than Grieg might have done it but quite fetchingly, at that.

The other novelty was the "Circus Polka" which, though heard here in its original form when the Ringling Bros.—Barnum and Bailey show visited the Boston Garden in 1942, received yesterday its first concert performance. The entertaining article by George Brinton Beal, printed in the programme book, informed us that the polka didn't go very big with the pachyderms and that "it would have taken very little at any time during the many performances of the ballet music to cause a stampede."

Yesterday's more sophisticated audience liked the polka so much, that Mr. Stravinsky saw fit to repeat it, something that had not happened at a Symphony Concert since Dr. Koussevitz repeated "The Flight of the Bumt Bee," in October, 1924.

This week's pair of concerts are giv ing us a second chance at the C majo Symphony.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
JAN 1 6 1944

Boston Bans Stravinsky's Anthem Idea

He Must Play Song As Key Wrote It

Boston, Jan. 15—(AP)—Composer Igor Stravinsky tonight was informed that he had run afoul of Massachusetts law when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in ~~his own~~ arrangement of The Star-Spangled Banner.

The Russian-born musician startled a huge Symphony Hall audience yesterday by his unusual arrangement. Tonight police informed him that he was liable to a $100 fine under Massachusetts law, which forbids rearrangement of the national anthem in whole or in part.

Boston Police Commissioner Thomas F. Sullivan and Police Captain Thomas F. Harvey attended tonight's concert after receiving complaints aroused by yesterday's program.

Stravinsky said that he was unaware that he was in contravention with Massachusetts law and that hereafter he would be more than glad to play the anthem in its original form.

Commissioner Sullivan said that there would be no action by Boston police.

'Star Spangled Banner' Version Of Stravinsky Startles Audience

Monday Jan 15 '44

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP).—The noted modern composer Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner" today, startling a huge symphony hall audience into what amounted to stunned silence.

The Russian-born musician, who also led an encore of his "Circus Polka"—the third time the orchestra has played an encore since 1885—generally created as much excited comment among sedate Bostonians as once greeted his controversial orchestral suite "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Mr. Stravinsky's version of the national anthem overshadowed everything else on the precedent-breaking program. At the start, the audience began to sing with the orchestra in customary manner, but soon the odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the sixty-one-year-old composer's arrangement became evident. Eyebrows lifted, voices faltered, and before the close practically everyone gave up even trying to accompany the score.

Earlier, Mr. Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of "The Star-Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style.

The composer described the orchestral sound as full, rich, more like a church hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song, as the anthem was originally. But Bostonians found little religious feeling. Their reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version.

Stravinsky Leads the Boston In an All-Stravinsky Program

Jan 15 N.Y. Trib

By Paul Bowles

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Igor Stravinsky conducting, in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Symphony in C Major	Stravinsky
Four Norwegian Moods (first performance)	Stravinsky
Circus Polka (first concert performance)	Stravinsky
Suite from "Pulcinella"	Stravinsky
"Jeu de Cartes"	Stravinsky

BOSTON, Jan. 14.—The Friday afternoon audience at Symphony Hall gave an extremely warm reception to the program of his own works which Igor Stravinsky conducted with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

Any all-Stravinsky program is news, and this was not an ordinary Stravinsky program, which is to say that no works of the so-called first period were given. And of them played, all ut one were of the most recent output—representatives of the period in Stravinsky's development which has een a most frequent target for critical excoriation. Such abuse has generally been made on the grounds that the well of invention is nearly dry. It would be difficult for a serious musician to entertain such an opinion even momentarily after hearing today's concert.

Symphony in C Played

The Symphony in C, like most of the master's works dating from the last fifteen years, is a pastiche of romantic music, but it is more than romantic music in modern dress. It is twentieth century music which relies almost completely on the psychological overtones of sonorities and harmonies which came into being in the nineteenth century, and which could mean nothing to an audience not conversant with romantic music. And like the other recent works, it is classical only in the sense that the music is climaxless. This reviewer had heard the composer conduct the work with the Orquesta Sonfonica in Mexico, and the two performances were almost equally good. The orchestra today seemed tense and somewhat unsure, and sonorous balance came undone in the third movement. This was unfortunate, inasmuch as the work is practically a problem in instrumental proportions which, if they are not exact, give it a halting aspect. Yet at any point in any movement what is going on is more interesting than in a work of any other contemporary composer.

The Four Norwegian Moods proved to be four short numbers written to coincide comfortably with popular taste. The subtitles are Intrada, Song, Wedding Dance and Cortege, and the subject matter, in spite of the composer's assurances that all themes are right out of Norway, ranges from themes which might be Irish to others which might be Levantine. The rst sounds like a fanfare for a procession in a motion picture, the second like a tone poem, perhaps about snow, the third like a beer garden and the last rather like Stravinsky, with threats of becoming "Petrouchka" now and then. Incidentally, the word "mood" here does not denote what one might think, but is used in a generic sense which Webster defines as "distinction of form in a verb to express the manner in which the action of state it denotes is conceived." Which may or may not have something to do with the four little pieces. The audience reaction was extremely favorable. One would expect this work to figure on many symphonic programs next season.

"Circus Polka" Is Repeated

The Circus Polka enjoyed the distinction of being the first work to be repeated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston since 1924, when "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" was replayed for enthusiastic listeners. This piece is about elephants; it evokes their grave and dignified movements perfectly. The circus band is there, with the bass drums and calliope, and it is a brilliant tour de force, ending with a bit of Schubert.

Mr. Stravinsky is the perfect conductor for his own works because he aims directly at clarity of sound in line and balance, and in this music, which can be made to sound clearer than any music written since Mozart, utter clarity is the only way to achieve dramatic effect. There was no underbrush in his orchestral forest today; one felt that one could walk between the groups of sounds. No orchestra ever sounded more diaphanous than his did today in certain passages of "Jeu De Cartes." All these recent scores, when conducted by him, are the epitome of sonorous richness; indeed, one could say that texture has come to be the motivating passion that rhythm once was with him. And it is this reviewer's contention that the music remains as stimulating as ever.

Stravinsky Shocks Hu
In Star Spangled Tw

Jan 15

The talk of the town today was Igor Stravinsky's new, strange-sounding ve Star Spangled Banner," which thousands of radio listeners are in hopes of h when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a repeat performance over Statio
the NBC Blue Network at 8:30.

Music lovers, filling Symphony Hall to capacity to hear an "All-Stravinsky" program conducted by the Russian-born composer yesterday afternoon, were stunned into bewildered silence soon after they had risen to sing the National Anthem, traditional wartime concert opener.

VOICES FALTER

Only a few of the first bars had been played when voices began to falter, eyebrows lifted and nearly everybody stopped singing, to let the orchestra finish alone its dissonant rendition of the well-known music.

Igor Stravinsky

Excited comment and a buzz of conversation swept the hall when the strains ended, leaving most of the listeners trying to recall any of the familiar phrases of the song.

Stravinsky, hailed by many critics as the world's greatest living composer, explained earlier that he completed his harmonization of "The Star Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July, as an expresison of gratitude for the peace and opportunity he had found in America.

SOUNDS LIKE HYMN

He said he retained the melody—changing it slightly to fit the voice range better—but introduced different harmonies to suggest Puritan times, with chords in the old contrapuntal style. The orchestra's sound at times was powerful, rich and full, more like a church hymn than a warlike tune.

However, few persons found the hymn "singable." It contained too much of the odd music responsible for the racket accompanying the earthquakes and creeping dinosaurs in "The Rite of Spring," featured in Walt Disney's "Fantasia."

Another near-sensation was caused by Stravinsky during the concert when he responded to the audience's enthusiasm over his first performance of the "Circus Polka" by repeating this number. It marked the third time since the Boston Symphony was founded in 1885 that the orchestra had played an encore.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN [illegible] 1944

POLICE LEAVE AS IGOR PLAYS TRUE ANTHEM

Officers Set to Arrest Boston Conductor If He Repeated His Unorthodox Rendition

Special to the N. Y. Journal-American

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer who shocked a symphony hall audience by playing a strange and weird version of the Star-Spangled Banner Friday night, took the podium tonight and led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the approved, orthodox version before a packed assembly.

Whereupon a squad of 12 police—including a captain, sergeant and members of the Radical Squad—nodded to each other that "everything is OK" and departed.

They had been all set, Police Capt. Harvey disclosed, to arrest the noted composer and guest-director of the orchestra, had he repeated his Friday night rendition which had baffled the audience and some of the critics.

"WE'LL GRAB HIM."

Just before the concert got under way, Harvey remarked:

"Let him change it just once, and we'll grab him."

It was not made clear whether the policemen were under specific orders or were "covering as a matter of routine" after the outcry from the first rendition.

The audience received the "straight" playing with no demonstration.

Stravinsky appeared on the platform at exactly 8:30 and strode with dignity, unsmiling, to the podium. He bowed to the right, to the left and then turned for the first number.

UTTER SILENCE.

There was a complete silence throughout the hall. Would he repeat the much-criticized improvisation of the night before?

Then the strains of true Star Spangled Banner burst forth. The audience went to its feet, and some joined in the words. The tenseness was gone.

There was a moderate amount of applause afterward, and the concert proceeded. Blue uniforms and brass buttons disappeared.

Post Jan 15

Symphony Orchestra

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For those who eagerly pursue the latest musical wrinkles yesterday afternoon's Symphony programme, all-Stravinsky with Stravinsky conducting, offered a veritable feast, while the reactionaries may have felt that it yielded nothing more nourishing than flannel pancakes and rock candy with real rocks; and this particular middle-of-the-roader found himself both bored and entertained.

Things began to happen before the programme-proper, when Mr. Stravinsky introduced to us his own curiously uncouth harmonization of "The Star-Spangled Banner," which he conceives to be early American in spirit. The general effect is a little as though the Squeedunk town band were trying to harmonize the tune by ear and not making a very good job of it.

For the "first time anywhere," were heard the "Four Norwegian Moods" and by mood Mr. Stravinsky says he means mode, or mood in the grammatical issue. Anyway, he has dished up bits of folk songs less appetizingly than Grieg might have done it but quite fetchingly, at that.

The other novelty was the "Circus Polka" which, though heard here in its original form when the Ringling Bros.—Barnum and Bailey show visited the Boston Garden in 1942, received yesterday its first concert performance. The entertaining article by George Brinton Beal, printed in the programme book, informed us that the polka didn't go very big with the pachyderms and that "it would have taken very little at any time during the many performances of the ballet music to cause a stampede."

Yesterday's more sophisticated audience liked the polka so much, that Mr. Stravinsky saw fit to repeat it, something that had not happened at a Sym phony Concert since Dr. Koussevitz repeated "The Flight of the Bumb Bee," in October, 1924.

This week's pair of concerts are giv ing us a second chance at the C majo Symphony.

Chattanooga Tenn

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
BUFFALO NY
COURIER EXPRES
TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
BELLINGHAM, WASH.
HERALD
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER-PRESS
NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
JOURNAL
ELMIRA, N. Y.
~~ADVERTISER~~
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
SELMA, ALA.
TIMES-JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
POST-STANDARD
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NEWARK, N. J.
CALL ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT
AUGUSTA, GA.
CHRONICLE
OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS-SUN
KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
ORLANDO, FLA.
SENTINEL-STAR
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
HUNTSVILLE, ALA.
TIMES
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

JAN 1 6 1944

PASTE OVER

MANSFIELD, OHIO
NEWS JOURNAL
SELMA, ALA.
TIMES-JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

JAN 1 6 1944

Change Whitens Red's 'Blueing' Of U. S. Anthem

Boston, Jan. 15 (INS)—Police Capt. Thomas Harvey and a squad of police waited inside Symphony Hall tonight while Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Last night Stravinsky caused a commotion in the audience when he played a special arrangement of the anthem. A Massachusetts statute makes it illegal to embellish the work when it is played publicly.

Stravinsky appeared tonight, walked to the podium, and proceeded to play the piece in its original form.

Harvey disclosed that he was all set to arrest Stravinsky "if he changed it just once."

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Igor Stravinsky conducting, gave the 12th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The all-Stravinsky program included the following compositions:

Symphony in C major
Four Norwegian Moods
Circus Polka
Suite from "Pulcinella"
"Jeu de Cartes"

It is a harsh and possibly foolish thing to say and all that, but the fact remains that two hours of Stravinsky—and good Stravinsky—with the composer himself conducting, is the apotheosis of rhythmic frustration.

This, concerning the man who more than any other is responsible for the new horizons in rhythm, is a paradox, yet there can be little question that it is true. The compositions yesterday, considered individually, were fine and striking in many ways. Combined, they offered an indigestible mass, and it is to be questioned if any person in the auditorium, audience or musician, came away with any feeling whatever of fulfillment.

The reason for this lies wholly in Stravinsky's incredibly varied rhythm. Considered from sequence to sequence, almost from bar to bar, the rhythms are extraordinary. There is invention, sublety, even great excitement in them. Yet the moment the pulse falls in step and feels led to an impending climax, a devastating new rhythm develops, and the pulse is baffled. For the duration of an extended work, such as the Symphony, this is an exhilarating experience, both emotionally and intellectually. When it goes on for two hours in five widely separate works, however, it can only reduce its hearers to confused emotional tatters—and that it did yesterday.

It must not be inferred, from all this, that the concert was without reward. The C major Symphony improves vastly on second hearing. It would indeed, be hard to think of a more evocative movement in contemporary music than the Larghetto concertante. The "Four Norwegian Moods," heard yesterday for the first time, are truly marvelous. They—and not the "Circus Polka"—should have been repeated. (This astonishing repetition, by the way, was the first time such a thing had happened since Koussevitzky had to repeat "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" in 1924, and that, in turn, was the first time since Gericke had to repeat "Danse Macabre" in 1885.)

The "Norwegian Moods" present lovely folk material in an unusual but exceedingly becoming idiom; and one of great purity of expression; the whole suffused with radiance, gentleness and nostalgia. As a composition for orchestra, too, the Moods are miracles of tonal balance and transparence, and find the composer at the pinnacle of his technical capacities. The "Polka," composed for a ballet of elephants, was suitably funny, and the grotesque quotation of Schubert's "Marche Militaire" brought an immediate repetition. "Pulcinella," of course, is one of the finest things Stravinsky ever did, and "Jeu de Cartes" never fails to make its point, with or without choreography. As always, the composer conducted with great authority and no personality, but he made the orchestra play like fiends. Next time he comes back though, let us hope he devotes only half of his program to Stravinsky.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

JAN 1 6 1944

O, Say Can U See?-Maestro Can and Does

IGOR STRAVINSKY
Police check on his concert.

Stravinsky Plays U. S. Anthem Correctly as Police Listen

BY DONALD M'PHAIL.
Special to The Chicago Herald-American.

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer, who shocked a Symphony Hall audience by playing a strange and weird version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" Friday night, took the podium tonight and led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the approved, orthodox version before a packed assembly.

Whereupon a squad of 12 police, including a captain, sergeant and members of the radical squad nodded to each other that "everything is O. K." and departed.

They had been all set, Police Capt. Thomas Harvey disclosed to arrest the noted composer and guest director of the orchestra had he repeated his Friday night rendition, which had baffled the audience and some of the critics.

SET TO 'GRAB' COMPOSER.

Just before the concert got under way, Capt. Harvey remarked:

"Let him change it just once and we'll grab him."

With Harvey were five other uniformed officers and six plainclothes men, including members of the radical squad.

The audience received the "straight" playing with no demonstration.

Stravinsky appeared on the platform at exactly 8:30 and strode with dignity, unsmiling, to the podium.

He bowed to the right, to the left, and then turned for the first number.

AUDIENCE SILENT.

There was complete silence throughout the hall. Would he repeat the much-criticized improvisation of the night before?

Then the strains of the true "Star-Spangled Banner" burst forth. The audience went to its feet, and some joined in the words. The tenseness was gone.

There was a moderate amount of applause afterward, and the concert proceeded. Blue uniforms and brass buttons disappeared.

Stravinsky was not available for comment. But his press representative, Frances Cuniff, said:

"He never intended to hurt any one's feelings by his rendition of the 'Star-Spangled Banner.' Not every one can sing the anthem as it is written now because of the numerous high notes. Only an expert singer can carry it through to completion."

Police at the hall were equipped with a copy of Chapter 264, Section 9, Paragraph 4, of the Massachusetts statutes, which says:

"Whoever plays, sings or renders the 'Star-Spangled Banner' in any public place . . . other than as a whole and separate composition or number without embellishment or addition . . . is punishable to a $100 fine."

BUFFALO NY
COURIER EXPRES

JAN 1 6 1944

Radio, Records Enhance Fame Of Orchestra

Threefold Appeal In Symphony's Concert

When Dr. Frank Black conducts the Cleveland Orchestra at Kleinhans Music Hall next February 18th, the concert will have a threefold appeal. Radio fans will delight in this personal appearance of Dr, Black, who, in a recent poll of editors, critics and listeners, was voted next to Toscanini in popular esteem and ahead of such conductors as Leopold Stokowski and Serge Koussevitzky.

Fireside listeners are familiar not only with the radio broadcasts of Dr. Black and of the Cleveland Orchestra, but also with the recordings of these leaders in the music world. Under the baton of Artur Rodzinski, the Cleveland Orchestra, recognized as one of the few top flight orchestras, perpetuated its interpretations of musical masterpieces on numerous fine records. Dr. Black, is equally prominent in the fields of film and records.

Influence on Music Great

Concertgoers esteem Dr. Black for his pioneering of the best in music. No one has influenced more the startling rate of improvement and present high standard of radio music than this fine American conductor. Many successful appearances as guest conductor of major orchestras of the country have contributed to his present status among the elite of symphony leaders.

Mail orders are being filled in the order of receipt when sent (with check or money order and self-addressed envelope) to: The Cleveland Orchestra Concert, Kleinhans Music Hall box office. Tickets are: Balcony, $1.10, $1.65, $2.20; main floor, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
JOURNAL
CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
TOLEDO, OHIO
~~BLADE~~
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

JAN 1 6 1944

Stravinsky's Anthem Illegal

BOSTON, Jan. 15—(AP)—Composer Igor Stravinsky tonight was informed he had run afoul of Massachusetts law when he conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star Spangled Banner."

The Russian born musician startled a huge Symphony hall audience yesterday by his unusual arrangement. Tonight police informed him he was liable to a $100 fine under Massachusetts law which forbids re-arrangement of the National Anthem in whole or in part.

Stravinsky said that he was unaware that he was in contravention with Massachusetts law and that hereafter he would be more than glad to play the anthem in its original form.

One capable employe will be worth the cost of a thousand Help Wanted ads. Phone DAly 3900.

PASTE OVER

★4-BURN!
Shown above at left. tanks—1 for top burne insulated oven; 3 fast ers; big oven heating synthetic enamel fin
roadway, St. Matthe

HARTFORD, CO
COURANT
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
BUFFALO NY
COURIER EXPRES
TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
BELLINGHAM, WASH.
HERALD
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER-PRESS
NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
JOURNAL
ELMIRA, N. Y.
~~ADVERTISER~~
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
SELMA, ALA.
TIMES-JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
POST-STANDARD
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NEWARK, N. J.
CALL ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT
AUGUSTA, GA.
CHRONICLE
OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS-SUN
KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
JAN 1 6 1944
SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
ORLANDO, FLA.
SENTINEL-STAR
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
HUNTSVILLE, ALA.
TIMES
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

JAN 1 6 1944

---

in- … had run afoul of … setts law when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star Spangled Banner."

The Russian-born musician startled a huge Symphony Hall uadience Friday by his unusual arrangement. Last night police informed him that he was liable to a $100 fine under Massachusetts law which forbids rearrangement of the national anthem in whole or in part.

Boston Police Com. Thomas F. Sullivan and Police Capt. Thomas F. Harvey attended last night's concert after receiving complaints aroused by Friday's program.

Stravinsky said that he was unaware that he was in contravention with Massachusetts law and that hereafter he would be more than glad to play the anthem in its original form.

Com. Sullivan said that there would be no action by Boston police.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Igor Stravinsky conducting, gave the 12th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The all-Stravinsky program included the following compositions:

Symphony in C major
Four Norwegian Moods
Circus Polka
Suite from "Pulcinella"
"Jeu de Cartes"

It is a harsh and possibly foolish thing to say and all that, but the fact remains that two hours of Stravinsky—and good Stravinsky—with the composer himself conducting, is the apotheosis of rhythmic frustration.

This, concerning the man who more than any other is responsible for the new horizons in rhythm, is a paradox, yet there can be little question that it is true. The compositions yesterday, considered individually, were fine and striking in many ways. Combined, they offered an indigestible mass, and it is to be questioned if any person in the auditorium, audience or musician, came away with any feeling whatever of fulfillment.

The reason for this lies wholly in Stravinsky's incredibly varied rhythm. Considered from sequence to sequence, almost from bar to bar, the rhythms are extraordinary. There is invention, sublety, even great excitement in them. Yet the moment the pulse falls in step and feels led to an impending climax, a devastating new rhythm develops, and the pulse is baffled. For the duration of an extended work, such as the Symphony, this is an exhilarating experience, both emotionally and intellectually. When it goes on for two hours in five widely separate works, however, it can only reduce its hearers to confused emotional tatters—and that it did yesterday.

It must not be inferred, from all this, that the concert was without reward. The C major Symphony improves vastly on second hearing. It would indeed, be hard to think of a more evocative movement in contemporary music than the Larghetto concertante. The "Four Norwegian Moods," heard yesterday for the first time, are truly marvelous. They—and not the "Circus Polka"—should have been repeated. (This astonishing repetition, by the way, was the first time such a thing had happened since Koussevitzky had to repeat "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" in 1924, and that, in turn, was the first time since Gericke had to repeat "Danse Macabre" in 1885.)

The "Norwegian Moods" present lovely folk material in an unusual but exceedingly becoming idiom; and one of great purity of expression; the whole suffused with radiance, gentleness and nostalgia. As a composition for orchestra, too, the Moods are miracles of tonal balance and transparence, and find the composer at the pinnacle of his technical capacities. The "Polka," composed for a ballet of elephants, was suitably funny, and the grotesque quotation of Schubert's "Marche Militaire" brought an immediate repetition. "Pulcinella," of course, is one of the finest things Stravinsky ever did, and "Jeu de Cartes" never fails to make its point, with or without choreography. As always, the composer conducted with great authority and no personality, but he made the orchestra play like fiends. Next time he comes back though, let us hope he devotes only half of his program to Stravinsky.

[112]

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

JAN 1 6 1944

O, Say Can U See?-Maestro Can and Does

IGOR STRAVINSKY
Police check on his concert.

Stravinsky Plays U. S. Anthem Correctly as Police Listen

BY DONALD M'PHAIL.
Special to The Chicago Herald-American.

BOSTON, Jan. 15.—Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer, who shocked a Symphony Hall audience by playing a strange and weird version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" Friday night, took the podium tonight and led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the approved, orthodox version before a packed assembly.

Whereupon a squad of 12 police, including a captain, sergeant and members of the radical squad nodded to each other that "everything is O. K." and departed.

They had been all set, Police Capt. Thomas Harvey disclosed to arrest the noted composer and guest director of the orchestra had he repeated his Friday night rendition, which had baffled the audience and some of the critics.

SET TO 'GRAB' COMPOSER.

Just before the concert got under way, Capt. Harvey remarked:

"Let him change it just once and we'll grab him."

With Harvey were five other uniformed officers and six plain-clothes men, including members of the radical squad.

The audience received the "straight" playing with no demonstration.

Stravinsky appeared on the platform at exactly 8:30 and strode with dignity, unsmiling, to the podium.

He bowed to the right, to the left, and then turned for the first number.

AUDIENCE SILENT.

There was complete silence throughout the hall. Would he repeat the much-criticized improvisation of the night before?

Then the strains of the true "Star-Spangled Banner" burst forth. The audience went to its feet, and some joined in the words. The tenseness was gone.

There was a moderate amount of applause afterward, and the concert proceeded. Blue uniforms and brass buttons disappeared.

Stravinsky was not available for comment. But his press representative, Frances Cuniff, said:

"He never intended to hurt any one's feelings by his rendition of the 'Star-Spangled Banner.' Not every one can sing the anthem as it is written now because of the numerous high notes. Only an expert singer can carry it through to completion."

Police at the hall were equipped with a copy of Chapter 264, Section 9, Paragraph 4, of the Massachusetts statutes, which says:

"Whoever plays, sings or renders the 'Star-Spangled Banner' in any public place . . . other than as a whole and separate composition or number without embellishment or addition . . . is punishable to a $100 fine."

BUFFALO NY
COURIER EXPRES

JAN 1 6 1944

Radio, Records Enhance Fame Of Orchestra

Threefold Appeal In Symphony's Concert

When Dr. Frank Black conducts the Cleveland Orchestra at Kleinhans Music Hall next February 18th, the concert will have a threefold appeal. Radio fans will delight in this personal appearance of Dr, Black, who, in a recent poll of editors, critics and listeners, was voted next to Toscanini in popular esteem and ahead of such conductors as Leopold Stokowski and Serge Koussevitzky.

Fireside listeners are familiar not only with the radio broadcasts of Dr. Black and of the Cleveland Orchestra, but also with the recordings of these leaders in the music world. Under the baton of Artur Rodzinski, the Cleveland Orchestra, recognized as one of the few top flight orchestras, perpetuated its interpretations of musical masterpieces on numerous fine records. Dr. Black, is equally prominent in the fields of film and records.

Influence on Music Great

Concertgoers esteem Dr. Black for his pioneering of the best in music. No one has influenced more the startling rate of improvement and present high standard of radio music than this fine American conductor. Many successful appearances as guest conductor of major orchestras of the country have contributed to his present status among the elite of symphony leaders.

Mail orders are being filled in the order of receipt when sent (with check or money order and self-addressed envelope) to: The Cleveland Orchestra Concert, Kleinhans Music Hall box office. Tickets are: Balcony, $1.10, $1.65, $2.20; main floor, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
JOURNAL
CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
TOLEDO, OHIO
~~BLADE~~
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

JAN 1 6 1944

Stravinsky's Anthem Illegal

BOSTON, Jan. 15—(AP)—Composer Igor Stravinsky tonight was informed he had run afoul of Massachusetts law when he conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star Spangled Banner."

The Russian born musician startled a huge Symphony hall audience yesterday by his unusual arrangement. Tonight police informed him he was liable to a $100 fine under Massachusetts law which forbids re-arrangement of the National Anthem in whole or in part.

Stravinsky said that he was unaware that he was in contravention with Massachusetts law and that hereafter he would be more than glad to play the anthem in its original form.

One capable employe will be worth the cost of a thousand Help Wanted ads. Phone DAly 3900.

POLICE CRITICS VISIT SYMPHONY

Boston Post Jan 16 44

Wait for Stravinsky Version of Star Spangled Banner, But Hear Only Straight Rendition

AUTOGRAPH SEEKERS WITH STRAVINSKY

Two autograph seekers are shown presenting their programme to Igor Stravinsky at Symphony Hall last night. Left to right: Joan Braverman, Gene Epstein and Stravinsky.

Members of the police radical squad, headed by Captain Thomas Harvey, served as music critics last night at Igor Stravinsky's swank concert at Symphony Hall. They were ready to make a complaint to the court if the noted Russian conductor gave his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner" in a repeat performance of his Friday night concert.

POLICE CRITICS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Continued From First Page

Stravinsky, however, changed his mind at the last minute and there was wide disappointment among those who thronged the vast hall, waiting for the excitement of hearing the unorthodox version of the national anthem. The conductor played "The Star-Spangled Banner" in the approved patriotic fashion. His music critics, numbering the six detectives in plain clothes, stalked out indifferently. They refused the invitation of the management to remain for a programme of the conductor's own modern compositions, sometimes called splendid dissonant harmonies, which included his "Symphony in C major," "Four Norwegian Moods," "Circus Polka" and "Jeu de Cartes" (card game, ballet in three deals).

The music critics of the police radical squad were satisfied that Chapter 264, Section 9 of the General Laws had not been violated as they alleged it had been the night before, when the conductor astonished some members of the audience with his new version. Captain Harvey stated that, in any event, even if Stravinsky had persisted, he and the squad would not have interrupted the concert. Stravinsky would have been allowed to finish his own rendition. The squad members would have acted as musical witnesses and signed their names to the complaint, which would be turned into the court. The court would have issued a summons and Mr. Stravinsky, if found guilty, would have paid a fine of $100. And that would have been the complete penalty.

Disturbed Over Situation

Mr. Stravinsky was greatly agitated and disturbed over the commotion his version of the national anthem, which he considered innocent and helpful, had created. He said through a spokesman that he had not the slightest intention of violating the sacred and patriotic "Star-Spangled Banner." He believed his version was merely an improvement; eliminating the difficult high notes which cause the average voice to crack in the rendition. His version was written in a lower key and is easily sung. He had played the new version in other parts of the country, where it has always been well received and has not aroused adverse publicity.

The music critics of the radical squad contended that the law must be upheld in Boston and "whoever plays, sings or renders the 'Star-Spangled Banner' in any public place other than as a whole and separate composition, without embellishments or addition in any way of national or other melodies, or whoever plays, sings or renders the 'Star-Spangled Banner' as dance music or an exit march or part melody, is punishable by a fine of $100."

No Violation Intended

Stavinsky, in an interview after the performance last night, said he had not intended any violation of the law when he played his version of the national anthem, and added he had no intention of asking Congress to enact any law that would permit his version to be played and sung.

"I have played my version before in both Los Angeles and San Francisco, and it was received very kindly.

"My idea in arranging my own version was to make it simple for all the people to sing. The standardized version is difficult for all but experts, and everyone should be able to sing it with facility.

"It was not until about a half hour before I was to begin my performance tonight that I received a telephone call, and was asked not to play the music in any other way than the official version."

GRAND FORKS, N. D.
EVENING HERALD

JAN 17 1944

In Trouble for Anthem Arrangement

BOSTON—(AP)—Composer Igor Stravinsky was Saturday that he had run afoul of Massachusetts law when he conducted the Boston symphony orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star Spangled Banner." The Russian born musician startled a huge symphony hall audience by his unusual arrangement. Police informed him that he was liable to a $100 fine under Massachusetts law which forbids rearrangement of the national anthem in whole or in part.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES

JAN 17 1944

Stravinsky Opus Considered Legal

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—(UP)—After a week-end of research, officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra con~~tended to-day that a~~ Russian composer's unusual version of the "Star-Spangled Banner" which upset local music followers was well within the law.

Police had threatened prosecution after Igor Stravinsky directed the orchestra in the playing of his version of the national anthem that critics said sounded more like a church hymn. They had threatened prosecution on a charge that he violated the "sacred and patriotic song."

In a statement denying the violation, symphony officials said that although Congress adopted the "Star-Spangled Bannet" as the national anthem in 1931 it failed to include a prescribed version of the music in the enactment.

STRAVINSKY FOILS ARREST BY PLAYING ANTHEM O. K.

Fails to Repeat Own Version of 'Star-Spangled Banner' as Police Wait at Symphony

Boston Jan 16

By DONALD MacPHAIL

Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer, who shocked a Symphony Hall audience by playing a strange and weird version of the "Star-Spangled Banner," Friday afternoon, took the podium last night and led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the approved, orthodox version before a packed assembly.

Whereupon a squad of 12 police, including a captain, sergeant and members of the radical squad, nodded to each other that "everything is O. K.," and departed.

POLICE STAND READY

They had been all set, Police Capt. Thomas Harvey of Station 16 disclosed, to arrest the guest-director of the orchestra, who is substituting for vacationing Serge Koussevitsky, had he repeated his Friday rendition which had baffled the audience and some of the critics.

Just before the concert got under way, Capt. Harvey remarked: "Let him change it just once, and we'll grab him."

With Harvey were Sergt. William J. Condon, four other officers, and six plainclothes men from the B. C. I. including members of the radical squad.

Whether they were under specific orders or were "covering" as a matter of routine after the outcry from the first rendition, was not made clear.

Police at the hall were equipped with a copy of Chapter 264, Section 9, Paragraph 4 of the Massachusetts Statutes, which say:

"Whoever plays, sings or renders the 'Star-Spangled Banner' in any public place... other than as a whole composition or number without embelishment or addition ... is punishable to a $100 fine."

The audience received the "straight" playing with no demonstration.

TENSION FADES

Stravinsky appeared on the platform at exactly 8:30, and strode with dignity, unsmiling, to the podium.

He bowed to the right, to the left and then turned for the first number.

There was a complete silence throughout the hall. Would he repeat the much-criticized improvisation of the night before?

Then the strains of the true "Star - Spangled Banner" burst forth. The audience went to its feet, and some joined in with the words. The tenseness was gone.

There was a moderate amount of applause afterward, and the concert proceeded.

Hasty, last-minute explanations developed from two sources, covering both the matter of the Friday special arrangement, and the reason for changing back to the customary version, which was broadcast over a nation-wide radio network.

Charles W. Spaulding, assistant manager of Symphony Hall, said Stravinsky, unavailable in person to interviewers, authorized this statement:

"I did not know I was in contravention of Massachusetts law. Now that I have been creditably informed that there can't be any rearrangement, I will readily conform to Massachusetts laws and render the Star-Spangled Banner in the way it was written."

AGENT EXPLAINS

In addition to the Spaulding-transmitted explanation that the noted musician "didn't know it was loaded," there was a further statement by Stravinsky's press representative, Francis Cuniff, who, indicating the composer had some idea of making the anthem more suitable for singing, said:

"He never intended to hurt anyone's feelings by his rendition of the 'Star-Spangled Banner.' Not everyone can sing the 'Star-Spangled Banner' as it is written ow because of the numerous high notes. Only an expert singer can carry it through to completion."

Cunniff also asserted that Stravinsky's arrangement, easily mistaken for the real national anthem in the opening bars had been played elsewhere without creating any stir, but he did not say where this had occurred.

"He never expected to have it received with the clamor it got here," Cunniff said. "He trusts there'll be no misunderstanding."

At least one person outside the audience — a radio announcer—knew which version was to be played. Although it had been publicized that the conductor would repeat his version last night, an announcer for the station carrying the concert went on the air with the statement that the customary version of the "Star-Spangled Banner" would be played.

BUFFALO, N.Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

JAN 17 1944

FOR INSTRUMENTS ONLY

Anyone who has ever heard the music of Igor Stravinsky, noted modern composer, can imagine what he apparently has done to the Star-Spangled Banner in his own arrangement of the anthem.

The other night he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Stravinsky arrangement. The audience started to sing with the orchestra, but the weird Stravinsky chords and dissonances soon forced it to quit.

The Star-Spangled Banner is difficult enough to sing as it is. Stravinsky has added nothing to his stature as a composer by making it virtually impossible.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

BERWICK, PA.
ENTERPRISE

JAN [illegible] 1944

Change Of National Anthem Within Law

Boston, Jan. 18. (UP) — After a weekend of research, officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contended ~~today that a Russian~~ composer's unusual version of the "Star Spangled Banner" which upset local music followers was well within the law.

Police had threatened prosecution after Igor Stravinsky directed the orchestra in the playing of his version of the national anthem that critics said sounded more like a church hymn. They had threatened prosecution on a charge that he violated the "sacred and patriotic song."

In a statement denying the violation, symphony officials said that although Congress adopted the "Star Spangled Banner" as the national anthem in 1931 it failed to include a prescribed version of the music in the enactment.

They contended there are several versions of the anthem including one for military bands, another for vocal solo with piano, and one prepared in 1918 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Further, they contended, there is no law on the subject of the prescribed orchestration of the national anthem.

[113]

Jan. '15

Symphonic Patriotism

To find police officers attending a Boston Symphony Concert as if it were a burlesque show or a radical mass-meeting is startling, but there they were Saturday night. No one quite knows what they would have done if Igor Stravinsky had again directed the orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star Spangled Banner" as he did Friday afternoon, to the dismay of at least one patriotic society. But the composer was informed afterward of the Massachusetts statute concerning the anthem, and he obeyed its spirit as well as its letter.

An exact reading of the law might have furnished Stravinsky and the Symphony management with a loophole, but they had no desire to offend anyone on the matter by making an issue. The act reads:

Whoever plays, sings or renders the "Star Spangled Banner" in any public place, theater, motion picture hall, restaurant or cafe, or at any public entertainment other than as a whole and separate composition or number, without embellishment or addition in the way of national or other melodies, or whoever plays, sings or renders the "Star Spangled Banner" or any part thereof as dance music, as an exit march, or as a part of a medley of any kind, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100.

Although Stravinsky's arrangement was certainly "embellishment," it was not embellishment "in the way of national or other melodies." This makes a nice exercise in juridical exegesis, but the problem that confronted the Symphony management was ultimately not one of law but of the far less definite canons of propriety.

There is, to be sure, no "official" version of the National Anthem, yet Stravinsky's arrangement, however reverently it was intended, can be nothing but unofficial. To many its playing on Friday afternoon was nevertheless an expression of patriotism; to others it was not. These are matters on which one cannot be dogmatic.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

JAN 1 8 1944

"Arranging" the Anthem

Igor Stravinsky, the noted composer, seems to have run at least technically afoul of the law when he recently conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner." Although the police authorities have indicated that they are planning no action in the case, they nevertheless call attention to a Massachusetts law which forbids rearrangements of our national anthem in whole or in part.

The failure to prosecute is quite understandable, since it may be taken as certain that the distinguished composer meant no harm. In times like these, when the national anthem is receiving far more public attention than it usually gets, it is perhaps only natural that an enthusiastic innovator like Mr. Stravinsky should be inspired to try his skill at "interpreting" it. And while we can well imagine that some so-called arrangements of "The Star-Spangled Banner" might be objectionable, we can also believe that plenty of music-lovers who have nothing but the highest respect for their anthem would be more than eager to hear Mr. Stravinsky's symphonic transcription thereof.

Incidentally, it may be wondered just how far this Massachusetts law really goes in forbidding rearrangements of our national anthem. Does it block the efforts of those earnest reformers who are forever wanting to "simplify" the anthem on the theory that it is now "too hard to sing"—despite the fact that millions of Americans have been managing somehow to sing it for lo these many years? And just how does the law apply in the case of those ambitious singers who seem to take delight in climbing all the way to the top of the octave when they reach that part about "the land of the free"?

'Mr. Paganini,' And We Ain't Kiddin

Variety - Jan 19 '44

In the first place, let's get it down fast that these fingers know little or nothing about music, and less than that when it comes to the system with which Igor Stravinsky knocks himself out. What we can understand, however, is when a critic tries to say something is terrif with one hand while apologizing for about everything except the piccolo player with the other. We savvy that, brother, because we've written those kind of reviews ourselves.

The occasion we're talking about is the Stravinsky conducted concert by the Boston Symphony, in Boston, last Friday afternoon (14) and the review of the event, that appeared the next day in the New York "Herald Tribune" under the by-line of Paul Bowles. The latter sent us to the Alka-Seltzer fountain in the office.

May we nudge you with a quote from Mr. Bowles' remarks? As follows:

"It is twentieth century music which relies almost completely on the psychological overtones of sonorities and harmonies which came into being in the nineteenth century and which could mean nothing to an audience not conversant with romantic music." Unquote.

That's us he's talking about. That, right there. The romantic music we know of is wrapped up in Ray Noble's recording of "Melancholy Baby." Chase that disc and you'll find something, mister. Does that make us "conversant?"

Still, it's Stravinsky on the main title this time, so Mr. Bowles, in his review, adds, "And like the (his) other recent works it is classical only in the sense that the music is climaxless."

Now what kind of music is that, "climaxless," to a pair of ears that grew up in the faith that Julius Lenzberg was king of all he surveyed from the pit at the Colonial, especially when Hedges Brothers and Jacobson played the house

"Incidentally," Bowles' review later continues, "the word 'mood' here does not denote what one might think, but is used in a generic sense which Webster defines as 'distinction of form in a verb to express the manner in which the action of the state it denotes is conceived'."

This, to us, is the convincer positive that Red Nichols and His Five Pennies were one hell of a band.

So Mr. Bowles concludes by three time threeing Mr. Stravinsky with, "And it is this reviewer's contention that the music remains as stimulating as ever."

No doubt Mr. Bowles is an astute music critic, but it all means only one thing to us. We've got to get near a radio Saturday night (15) because this Stravinsky is due, on the Blue yet, and we've got to find out can this guy make the "Hall of Fame."

We listen and what gives out? Can he do to "Valencia" what Whiteman did? Has he got an Al Goodman kettle-drum glissando which, of course, is a trick, but our lowly ear loves tricks. Instrumental tricks. Yeah, we listen, but we lose interest fast because it comes back to us that we have heard some of this Stravinsky's music before. We also remember that to us some of it sounded not unlike a Pratt & Whitney doing an outside loop (forward somersault to you) at 20,000 feet.

Hence, with your permission, we'll keep right on slumming with Tchaikovsky. For some reason his "Romeo and Juliet" doesn't seem to need explaining. We like the way Rapee plays it, too.

The Associated Press also sent out a story on Stravinsky's afternoon concert in Boston, saying: "Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of 'The Star Spangled Banner,' startling a huge symphony hall audience into what amounted to a stunned silence." The A. P. further went on to state, "Earlier Mr. Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of 'The Star Spangled Banner' two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style."

Friends, this final quote from the master is the one that blitzed us no end. In one fell swoop you could say. For at no time has anyone ever tossed that "contrapuntal" at even one so well versed as Jimmy Durante. And a good thing, too, or James might not be with us today. It made us think we might like to attend a Stravinsky concert with Jim—and a good deck of cards. That "contrapuntal" also shows what can go on around you if you don't pay attention. They will simply have to go on hitting us with that one 'till we get used to it.

Then, to top off everything, don't you know that a news announcement breaks on the air Saturday night relating that Stravinsky has been threatened by the Boston police with a fine of $100 for playing his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner?" Maybe the boys simply didn't care to hear the old "Banner" take a pushing around.

What bothers us, though, is why they only picked on Stravinsky. Don't those cops read the reviews? Sid.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 1 8 1944

That "New Version."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER.

The news of what happened in Boston, perpetrated by Igor Stravinsky and aided and abetted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a great shock to me.

Why was this ever allowed to happen? What sort of thinking or lack of thinking made it possible? What kind of Americans are we to allow liberties to be taken with our National Anthem?

Our Flag and our National Anthem mean the best to us in a very reverent sense. They symbolize what we are fighting for. We salute the Flag and stand respectfully while our National Anthem is played or sung. We are taking no instructions from Igor Stravinsky or anyone else, as to how it is to be played or sung. Or are we?

Every loyal American must feel just as outraged as I do at the liberty which has been taken and expect something to be done about this insult to our national integrity.

I am asking you to give this matter publicity. If you deem it necessary to do so, you may quote me.—HELENA T. RATTERMAN, M. D., Cincinnati, Ohio. January 16.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
BELLEFONTAINE, OHIO
EXAMINER
KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

JAN 1 7 1944

Singers Give Up When Stravinsky Plays U. S. Anthem

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP).—The noted modernist composer Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner today, startling a huge Symphony Hall audience into what amounted to stunned silence.

The Russian-born musician's version of the National Anthem overshadowed everything else on the program.

At the start the audience began to sing with the orchestra in customary manner, but soon the odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old composer's arrangement became evident. Eyebrows lifted, voices faltered, and before the close practically everyone gave up trying to accompany the score.

Earlier Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of the "Star-Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style.

The composer described the orchestral sound as full, rich, more like a church hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song, as the anthem was originally. But Bostonians found little religious feeling. Their reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 1 7 1944

Boston Cops Turn Music Critics Now

By the United Press.

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—Igor Stravinsky won't have another chance to try out his version of The Star Spangled Banner here if the Police Department has its way.

A scheduled performance of the national anthem in the Stravinsky manner, eliminating the difficult high notes, was canceled Saturday when six members of the Police Department's radical squad appeared in the Symphony Hall audience.

Police said they were prepared to sign a court complaint charging Mr. Stravinsky with violating the "sacred and patriotic song," according to Chapter 264, Section 9, of the Massachusetts laws.

Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contend the Stravinsky version of the anthem is well within the law, pointing out that although Congress adopted the Star Spangled Banner as the national anthem in 1931 it failed to include a prescribed version of the music.

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

JAN 1 7 1944

WILL REVISE ARRANGEMENT

Stravinsky's Setting of "Star-Spangled Banner" Got Poor Response.

By Tom Chase.

Boston, Jan. 17 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky, noted Russian-born composer, planned to conduct his own arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner" with the Boston Symphony orchestra again tonight despite the fact that Friday's performance was received with something less than enthusiasm by a large Symphony hall audience.

The odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old musician's arrangement of the national anthem proved virtually unsingable yesterday.

Stravinsky explained he wrote his harmonization in early American spirit, intending the score to sound more like a hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song. But Bostonians did not agree, and gave up trying to sing his version before the piece came to a close.

Warren Storey Smith, the Boston Post music critic, termed the Stravinsky work "curiously uncouth" and said it sounded "a little as though the Squeedunk town band were trying to harmonize the tune by ear and not making avery good job of it."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 1 8 1944

Mr. Stravinsky's Adventure

Igor Fedorovich Stravinsky is a noted musician and composer, born in Russia. One of his compositions is "Fireworks." He set off some fireworks in Boston the other day, when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Perhaps fireworks is not quite the right word, however. The audience generally, it seems, was cold to Mr. Stravinsky's version. But somebody was not only frigidly angry, in the true Boston manner, but also hot under the collar. For representatives of the law eventually appeared and figuratively tapped Mr. Stravinsky on the shoulder. They told him that there was a state law against tampering with the national anthem.

There is also, of course, the Federal law which designates "The Star-Spangled Banner," including both words and music, as the "national anthem of the United States." That law was passed in 1931 after nation-wide agitation, in order to forestall revisions, rearrangements and substitutions. The people like the song as it is.

No further insubordination is expected from the adventurous Mr. Stravinsky. He is a reasonable man. He once studied law himself. But no law can make our present national anthem easily singable. Vocal chords cannot be changed by statute.

Jan

Symphonic Patriotism

To find police officers attending a Boston Symphony Concert as if it were a burlesque show or a radical mass-meeting is startling, but there they were Saturday night. No one quite knows what they would have done if Igor Stravinsky had again directed the orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star Spangled Banner" as he did Friday afternoon, to the dismay of at least one patriotic society. But the composer was informed afterward of the Massachusetts statute concerning the anthem, and he obeyed its spirit as well as its letter.

An exact reading of the law might have furnished Stravinsky and the Symphony management with a loophole, but they had no desire to offend anyone on the matter by making an issue. The act reads:

> Whoever plays, sings or renders the "Star Spangled Banner" in any public place, theater, motion picture hall, restaurant or cafe, or at any public entertainment other than as a whole and separate composition or number, without embellishment or addition in the way of national or other melodies, or whoever plays, sings or renders the "Star Spangled Banner" or any part thereof as dance music, as an exit march, or as a part of a medley of any kind, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100.

Although Stravinsky's arrangement was certainly "embellishment," it was not embellishment "in the way of national or other melodies." This makes a nice exercise in juridical exegesis, but the problem that confronted the Symphony management was ultimately not one of law but of the far less definite canons of propriety.

There is, to be sure, no "official" version of the National Anthem, yet Stravinsky's arrangement, however reverently it was intended, can be nothing but unofficial. To many its playing on Friday afternoon was nevertheless an expression of patriotism; to others it was not. These are matters on which one cannot be dogmatic.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

JAN 18 1944

"Arranging" the Anthem

Igor Stravinsky, the noted composer, seems to have run at least technically afoul of the law when he recently conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner." Although the police authorities have indicated that they are planning no action in the case, they nevertheless call attention to a Massachusetts law which forbids rearrangements of our national anthem in whole or in part.

The failure to prosecute is quite understandable, since it may be taken as certain that the distinguished composer meant no harm. In times like these, when the national anthem is receiving far more public attention than it usually gets, it is perhaps only natural that an enthusiastic innovator like Mr. Stravinsky should be inspired to try his skill at "interpreting" it. And while we can well imagine that some so-called arrangements of "The Star-Spangled Banner" might be objectionable, we can also believe that plenty of music-lovers who have nothing but the highest respect for their anthem would be more than eager to hear Mr. Stravinsky's symphonic transcription thereof.

Incidentally, it may be wondered just how far this Massachusetts law really goes in forbidding rearrangements of our national anthem. Does it block the efforts of those earnest reformers who are forever wanting to "simplify" the anthem on the theory that it is now "too hard to sing"—despite the fact that millions of Americans have been managing somehow to sing it for lo these many years? And just how does the law apply in the case of those ambitious singers who seem to take delight in climbing all the way to the top of the octave when they reach that part about "the land of the free"?

'Mr. Paganini,' And We Ain't Kiddin

Variety Jan 14 '44

In the first place, let's get it down fast that these fingers know little or nothing about music, and less than that when it comes to the system with which Igor Stravinsky knocks himself out. What we can understand, however, is when a critic tries to say something is terrif with one hand while apologizing for about everything except the piccolo player with the other. We savvy that, brother, because we've written those kind of reviews ourselves.

The occasion we're talking about is the Stravinsky conducted concert by the Boston Symphony, in Boston, last Friday afternoon (14) and the review of the event, that appeared the next day in the New York "Herald Tribune" under the by-line of Paul Bowles. The latter sent us to the Alka-Seltzer fountain in the office.

May we nudge you with a quote from Mr. Bowles' remarks? As follows:

"It is twentieth century music which relies almost completely on the psychological overtones of sonorities and harmonies which came into being in the nineteenth century and which could mean nothing to an audience not conversant with romantic music." Unquote.

That's us he's talking about. That, right there. The romantic music we know of is wrapped up in Ray Noble's recording of "Melancholy Baby." Chase that disc and you'll find something, mister. Does that make us "conversant?"

Still, it's Stravinsky on the main title this time, so Mr. Bowles, in his review, adds, "And like the (his) other recent works it is classical only in the sense that the music is climaxless."

Now what kind of music is that, "climaxless," to a pair of ears that grew up in the faith that Julius Lenzberg was king of all he surveyed from the pit at the Colonial, especially when Hedges Brothers and Jacobson played the house

"Incidentally," Bowles' review later continues, "the word 'mood' here does not denote what one might think, but is used in a generic sense which Webster defines as 'distinction of form in a verb to express the manner in which the action of the state it denotes is conceived'."

This, to us, is the convincer positive that Red Nichols and His Five Pennies were one hell of a band.

So Mr. Bowles concludes by three time threeing Mr. Stravinsky with, "And it is this reviewer's contention that the music remains as stimulating as ever."

No doubt Mr. Bowles is an astute music critic, but it all means only one thing to us. We've got to get near a radio Saturday night (15) because this Stravinsky is due, on the Blue yet, and we've got to find out can this guy make the "Hall of Fame."

We listen and what gives out? Can he do to "Valencia" what Whiteman did? Has he got an Al Goodman kettle-drum glissando which, of course, is a trick, but our lowly ear loves tricks. Instrumental tricks. Yeah, we listen, but we lose interest fast because it comes back to us that we have heard some of this Stravinsky's music before. We also remember that to us some of it sounded not unlike a Pratt & Whitney doing an outside loop (forward somersault to you) at 20,000 feet.

Hence, with your permission, we'll keep right on slumming with Tchaikovsky. For some reason his "Romeo and Juliet" doesn't seem to need explaining. We like the way Rapee plays it, too.

The Associated Press also sent out a story on Stravinsky's afternoon concert in Boston, saying: "Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of 'The Star Spangled Banner,' startling a huge symphony hall audience into what amounted to a stunned silence." The A. P. further went on to state, "Earlier Mr. Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of 'The Star Spangled Banner' two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style."

Friends, this final quote from the master is the one that blitzed us no end. In one fell swoop you could say. For at no time has anyone ever tossed that "contrapuntal" at even one so well versed as Jimmy Durante. And a good thing, too, or James might not be with us today. It made us think we might like to attend a Stravinsky concert with Jim—and a good deck of cards. That "contrapuntal" also shows what can go on around you if you don't pay attention. They will simply have to go on hitting us with that one 'till we get used to it.

Then, to top off everything, don't you know that a news announcement breaks on the air Saturday night relating that Stravinsky has been threatened by the Boston police with a fine of $100 for playing his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner?" Maybe the boys simply didn't care to hear the old "Banner" take a pushing around.

What bothers us, though, is why they only picked on Stravinsky. Don't those cops read the reviews? Sid.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 18 1944

That "New Version."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER.

The news of what happened in Boston, perpetrated by Igor Stravinsky and aided and abetted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a great shock to me.

Why was this ever allowed to happen? What sort of thinking or lack of thinking made it possible? What kind of Americans are we to allow liberties to be taken with our National Anthem?

Our Flag and our National Anthem mean the best to us in a very reverent sense. They symbolize what we are fighting for. We salute the Flag and stand respectfully while our National Anthem is played or sung. We are taking no instructions from Igor Stravinsky or anyone else, as to how it is to be played or sung. Or are we?

Every loyal American must feel just as outraged as I do at the liberty which has been taken and expect something to be done about this insult to our national integrity.

I am asking you to give this matter publicity. If you deem it necessary to do so, you may quote me.—HELENA T. RATTERMAN, M. D., Cincinnati, Ohio.

January 16.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
BELLEFONTAINE, OHIO
EXAMINER
KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

JAN 17 1944

Singers Give Up When Stravinsky Plays U. S. Anthem

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP).—The noted modernist composer Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner today, startling a huge Symphony Hall audience into what amounted to stunned silence.

The Russian-born musician's version of the National Anthem overshadowed everything else on the program.

At the start the audience began to sing with the orchestra in customary manner, but soon the odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old composer's arrangement became evident. Eyebrows lifted, voices faltered, and before the close practically everyone gave up trying to accompany the score.

Earlier Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of the "Star-Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style.

The composer described the orchestral sound as full, rich, more like a church hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song, as the anthem was originally. But Bostonians found little religious feeling. Their reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 17 1944

Boston Cops Turn Music Critics Now

By the United Press.

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—Igor Stravinsky won't have another chance to try out his version of The Star Spangled Banner here if the Police Department has its way.

A scheduled performance of the national anthem in the Stravinsky manner, eliminating the difficult high notes, was canceled Saturday when six members of the Police Department's radical squad appeared in the Symphony Hall audience.

Police said they were prepared to sign a court complaint charging Mr. Stravinsky with violating the "sacred and patriotic song," according to Chapter 264, Section 9, of the Massachusetts laws.

Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contend the Stravinsky version of the anthem is well within the law, pointing out that although Congress adopted the Star Spangled Banner as the national anthem in 1931 it failed to include a prescribed version of the music.

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

JAN 17 1944

WILL REVISE ARRANGEMENT

Stravinsky's Setting of "Star-Spangled Banner" Got Poor Response.

By Tom Chase.

Boston, Jan. 17 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky, noted Russian-born composer, planned to conduct his own arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner" with the Boston Symphony orchestra again tonight despite the fact that Friday's performance was received with something less than enthusiasm by a large Symphony hall audience.

The odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old musician's arrangement of the national anthem proved virtually unsingable yesterday.

Stravinsky explained he wrote his harmonization in early American spirit, intending the score to sound more like a hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song. But Bostonians did not agree, and gave up trying to sing his version before the piece came to a close.

Warren Storey Smith, the Boston Post music critic, termed the Stravinsky work "curiously uncouth" and said it sounded "a little as though the Squeedunk town band were trying to harmonize the tune by ear and not making avery good job of it."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 18 1944

Mr. Stravinsky's Adventure

Igor Fedorovich Stravinsky is a noted musician and composer, born in Russia. One of his compositions is "Fireworks." He set off some fireworks in Boston the other day, when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Perhaps fireworks is not quite the right word, however. The audience generally, it seems, was cold to Mr. Stravinsky's version. But somebody was not only frigidly angry, in the true Boston manner, but also hot under the collar. For representatives of the law eventually appeared and figuratively tapped Mr. Stravinsky on the shoulder. They told him that there was a state law against tampering with the national anthem.

There is also, of course, the Federal law which designates "The Star-Spangled Banner," including both words and music, as the "national anthem of the United States." That law was passed in 1931 after nation-wide agitation, in order to forestall revisions, rearrangements and substitutions. The people like the song as it is.

No further insubordination is expected from the adventurous Mr. Stravinsky. He is a reasonable man. He once studied law himself. But no law can make our present national anthem easily singable. Vocal chords cannot be changed by statute.

PASTE OVER

mphonic Patriotism

o find police officers attending a Bos- Symphony Concert as if it were a esque show or a radical mass-meeting artling, but there they were Saturday nt. No one quite knows what they would e done if Igor Stravinsky had again cted the orchestra in his own arrange- nt of the "Star Spangled Banner" as he Friday afternoon, to the dismay of at t one patriotic society. But the com- er was informed afterward of the ssachusetts statute concerning the nthem, and he obeyed its spirit as well its letter.

An exact reading of the law might have nished Stravinsky and the Symphony nagement with a loophole, but they had desire to offend anyone on the matter making an issue. The act reads:

Whoever plays, sings or renders the Star Spangled Banner" in any public place, theater, motion picture hall, restaurant or cafe, or at any public en- tertainment other than as a whole and eparate composition or number, with- out embellishment or addition in the way of national or other melodies, or whoever plays, sings or renders the an exit

y of any

---

doktor arranging his lyrics so t any slight setback in the Russ advance will look like a major tory for the master race?

In view of the peculiar quirks the Nazi mentality, the first po bility cannot be ruled out entir News from the Eastern front, on other hand, bolsters the second pothesis. The situation there is for Germany and if the gloom w put on in heavy layers, any li rift would look like a brilliant su rise by comparison.

Thus far the Russian Winter fensive has shown no signs of sla ening. Severance of the Rov Minsk railway has driven a we between the Nazi forces in East Poland. The Russian move tow the Odessa-Lwow-Warsaw railro threatens to cut off the only path escape open to the German arm in the Ukraine.

The picture as a whole suggests not too distant disaster for Germa on the Eastern Front. Fortunate Goebbels' vocal efforts are har likely to affect the result of R sian activity. And as to their eff

---

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

JAN 18 1944

"Arranging" the Anthem

Igor Stravinsky, the noted composer, seems to have run at least technically afoul of the law when he recently conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner." Although the police authorities have indicated that they are planning no action in the case, they nevertheless call attention to a Massachusetts law which forbids rearrangements of our national anthem in whole or in part.

The failure to prosecute is quite understandable, since it may be taken as certain that the distinguished composer meant no harm. In times like these, when the national anthem is receiving far more public attention than it usually gets, it is perhaps only natural that an enthusiastic innovator like Mr. Stravinsky should be inspired to try his skill at "interpreting" it. And while we can well imagine that some so-called arrangements of "The Star-Spangled Banner" might be objectionable, we can also believe that plenty of music-lovers who have nothing but the highest respect for their anthem would be more than eager to hear Mr. Stravinsky's symphonic transcription thereof.

Incidentally, it may be wondered just how far this Massachusetts law really goes in forbidding rearrangements of our national anthem. Does it block the efforts of those earnest reformers who are forever wanting to "simplify" the anthem on the theory that it is now "too hard to sing"—despite the fact that millions of Americans have been managing somehow to sing it for lo these many years? And just how does the law apply in the case of those ambitious singers who seem to take delight in climbing all the way to the top of the octave when they reach that part about "the land of the free"?

'Mr. Paganini,' And We Ain't Kiddin

Variety - Jan 19 '44

In the first place, let's get it down fast that these fingers know little or nothing about music, and less than that when it comes to the system with which Igor Stravinsky knocks himself out. What we can understand, however, is when a critic tries to say something is terrif with one hand while apologizing for about everything except the piccolo player with the other. We savvy that, brother, because we've written those kind of reviews ourselves.

The occasion we're talking about is the Stravinsky conducted concert by the Boston Symphony, in Boston, last Friday afternoon (14) and the review of the event, that appeared the next day in the New York "Herald Tribune" under the by-line of Paul Bowles. The latter sent us to the Alka-Seltzer fountain in the office.

May we nudge you with a quote from Mr. Bowles' remarks? As follows:

"It is twentieth century music which relies almost completely on the psychological overtones of sonorities and harmonies which came into being in the nineteenth century and which could mean nothing to an audience not conversant with romantic music." Unquote.

That's us he's talking about. That, right there. The romantic music we know of is wrapped up in Ray Noble's recording of "Melancholy Baby." Chase that disc and you'll find something, mister. Does that make us "conversant?"

Still, it's Stravinsky on the main title this time, so Mr. Bowles, in his review, adds, "And like the (his) other recent works it is classical only in the sense that the music is climaxless."

Now what kind of music is that, "climaxless," to a pair of ears that grew up in the faith that Julius Lenzberg was king of all he surveyed from the pit at the Colonial, especially when Hedges Brothers and Jacobson played the house

"Incidentally," Bowles' review later continues, "the word 'mood' here does not denote what one might think, but is used in a generic sense which Webster defines as 'distinction of form in a verb to express the manner in which the action of the state it denotes is conceived'."

This, to us, is the convincer positive that Red Nichols and His Five Pennies were one hell of a band.

So Mr. Bowles concludes by three time threeing Mr. Stravinsky with, "And it is this reviewer's contention that the music remains as stimulating as ever."

No doubt Mr. Bowles is an astute music critic, but it all means only one thing to us. We've got to get near a radio Saturday night (15) because this Stravinsky is due, on the Blue yet, and we've got to find out can this guy make the "Hall of Fame."

We listen and what gives out? Can he do to "Valencia" what Whiteman did? Has he got an Al Goodman kettle-drum glissando which, of course, is a trick, but our lowly ear loves tricks. Instrumental tricks. Yeah, we listen, but we lose interest fast because it comes back to us that we have heard some of this Stravinsky's music before. We also remember that to us some of it sounded not unlike a Pratt & Whitney doing an outside loop (forward somersault to you) at 20,000 feet.

Hence, with your permission, we'll keep right on slumming with Tchaikovsky. For some reason his "Romeo and Juliet" doesn't seem to need explaining. We like the way Rapee plays it, too.

The Associated Press also sent out a story on Stravinsky's afternoon concert in Boston, saying: "Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of 'The Star Spangled Banner,' startling a huge symphony hall audience into what amounted to a stunned silence." The A. P. further went on to state, "Earlier Mr. Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of 'The Star Spangled Banner' two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style."

Friends, this final quote from the master is the one that blitzed us no end. In one fell swoop you could say. For at no time has anyone ever tossed that "contrapuntal" at even one so well versed as Jimmy Durante. And a good thing, too, or James might not be with us today. It made us think we might like to attend a Stravinsky concert with Jim—and a good deck of cards. That "contrapuntal" also shows what can go on around you if you don't pay attention. They will simply have to go on hitting us with that one 'till we get used to it.

Then, to top off everything, don't you know that a news announcement breaks on the air Saturday night relating that Stravinsky has been threatened by the Boston police with a fine of $100 for playing his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner?" Maybe the boys simply didn't care to hear the old "Banner" take a pushing around.

What bothers us, though, is why they only picked on Stravinsky. Don't those cops read the reviews? Sid.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 18 1944

hat "New Version."

EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER.

e news of what happened in ton, perpetrated by Igor Stra- sky and aided and abetted by Boston Symphony Orchestra s a great shock to me.

Why was this ever allowed to ppen? What sort of thinking or ck of thinking made it possible? What kind of Americans are we to allow liberties to be taken with our National Anthem?

Our Flag and our National Anthem mean the best to us in a very reverent sense. They symbolize what we are fighting for. We salute the Flag and stand respectfully while our National Anthem is played or sung. We are taking no instructions from Igor Stravinsky or anyone else, as to how it is to be played or sung. Or are we?

Every loyal American must feel just as outraged as I do at the liberty which has been taken and expect something to be done about this insult to our national integrity.

I am asking you to give this matter publicity. If you deem it necessary to do so, you may quote me.—HELENA T. RATTERMAN, M. D., Cincinnati, Ohio.

January 16.

---

version of the national anthem overshadowed everything else on the program.

At the start the audience began to sing with the orchestra in customary manner, but soon the odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old composer's arrangement became evident. Eyebrows lifted, voices faltered, and before the close practically everyone gave up even trying to accompany the score.

Earlier Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of the "Star-Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style.

The composer described the orchestral sound as full, rich, more like a church hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song, as the anthem was originally. But Bostonians found little religious feeling. Their reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version.

Warren Storey Smith, the Boston Post music critic, termed the Stravinsky work "curiously uncouth" and said it sounded "a little as though the Squeedunk town band were trying to harmonize the tune by ear and not making a very good job of it."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 17 1944

Boston Cops Turn Music Critics Now

By the United Press.

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—Igor Stravinsky won't have another chance to try out his version of The Star Spangled Banner here if the Police Department has its way.

A scheduled performance of the national anthem in the Stravinsky manner, eliminating the difficult high notes, was canceled Saturday when six members of the Police Department's radical squad appeared in the Symphony Hall audience.

Police said they were prepared to sign a court complaint charging Mr. Stravinsky with violating the "sacred and patriotic song," according to Chapter 264, Section 9, of the Massachusetts laws.

Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contend the Stravinsky version of the anthem is well within the law, pointing out that although Congress adopted the Star Spangled Banner as the national anthem in 1931 it failed to include a prescribed version of the music.

[114]

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

JAN 17 1944

WILL REVISE ARRANGEMENT

Stravinsky's Setting of "Star-Spangled Banner" Got Poor Response.

By Tom Chase.

Boston, Jan. 17 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky, noted Russian-born composer, planned to conduct his own arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner" with the Boston Symphony orchestra again tonight despite the fact that Friday's performance was received with something less than enthusiasm by a large Symphony hall audience.

The odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old musician's arrangement of the national anthem proved virtually unsingable yesterday.

Stravinsky explained he wrote his harmonization in early American spirit, intending the score to sound more like a hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song. But Bostonians did not agree, and gave up trying to sing his version before the piece came to a close.

Warren Storey Smith, the Boston Post music critic, termed the Stravinsky work "curiously uncouth" and said it sounded "a little as though the Squeedunk town band were trying to harmonize the tune by ear and not making avery good job of it."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 18 1944

Mr. Stravinsky's Adventure

Igor Fedorovich Stravinsky is a noted musician and composer, born in Russia. One of his compositions is "Fireworks." He set off some fireworks in Boston the other day, when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Perhaps fireworks is not quite the right word, however. The audience generally, it seems, was cold to Mr. Stravinsky's version. But somebody was not only frigidly angry, in the true Boston manner, but also hot under the collar. For representatives of the law eventually appeared and figuratively tapped Mr. Stravinsky on the shoulder. They told him that there was a state law against tampering with the national anthem.

There is also, of course, the Federal law which designates "The Star-Spangled Banner," including both words and music, as the "national anthem of the United States." That law was passed in 1931 after nation-wide agitation, in order to forestall revisions, rearrangements and substitutions. The people like the song as it is.

No further insubordination is expected from the adventurous Mr. Stravinsky. He is a reasonable man. He once studied law himself. But no law can make our present national anthem easily singable. Vocal chords cannot be changed by statute.

PASTE OVER

Symphonic Patriotism

T[illegible] police officers attending a Bos- [illegible] Concert as if it were a [illegible] or a radical mass-meeting [illegible] but there they were Saturday [illegible] quite knows what they would [illegible] if Igor Stravinsky had again [illegible] orchestra in his own arrange- [illegible] the "Star Spangled Banner" as he [illegible] Friday afternoon, to the dismay of at [illegible] one patriotic society. But the com- [illegible] was informed afterward of the Massachusetts statute concerning the [illegible] and he obeyed its spirit as well [illegible]

An [illegible] reading of the law might have [illegible] Stravinsky and the Symphony [illegible] with a loophole, but they had [illegible] desire to offend anyone on the matter making an issue. The act reads:

Whoever plays, sings or renders the "Star Spangled Banner" in any public place, theater, motion picture hall, restaurant or cafe, or at any public entertainment other than as a whole and separate composition or number, without embellishment or addition in the way of national or other melodies, or whoever plays, sings or renders the "Star Spangled Banner" or any part thereof as dance music, as an exit march, or as a part of a medley of any kind, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100.

Although Stravinsky's arrangement was [illegible] embellishment," it was not embellish[illegible] in the way of national or other melodies." This makes a nice exercise in juridical exegesis, but the problem that confronted the Symphony management was ultimately not one of law but of the far less definite canons of propriety.

There is, to be sure, no "official" version of the National Anthem, yet Stravinsky's arrangement, however reverently it was intended, can be nothing but unofficial. To many its playing on Friday afternoon was nevertheless an expression of patriotism; to others it was not. These are matters on which one cannot be dogmatic.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

JAN 18 1944

"Arranging" the Anthem

Igor Stravinsky, the noted composer, seems to have run at least technically afoul of the law when he recently conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner." Although the police authorities have indicated that they are planning no action in the case, they nevertheless call attention to a Massachusetts law which forbids rearrangements of our national anthem in whole or in part.

The failure to prosecute is quite understandable, since it may be taken as certain that the distinguished composer meant no harm. In times like these, when the national anthem is receiving far more public attention than it usually gets, it is perhaps only natural that an enthusiastic innovator like Mr. Stravinsky should be inspired to try his skill at "interpreting" it. And while we can well imagine that some so-called arrangements of "The Star-Spangled Banner" might be objectionable, we can also believe that plenty of music-lovers who have nothing but the highest respect for their anthem would be more than eager to hear Mr. Stravinsky's symphonic transcription thereof.

Incidentally, it may be wondered just how far this Massachusetts law really goes in forbidding rearrangements of our national anthem. Does it block the efforts of those earnest reformers who are forever wanting to "simplify" the anthem on the theory that it is now "too hard to sing"—despite the fact that millions of Americans have been managing somehow to sing it for lo these many years? And just how does the law apply in the case of those ambitious singers who seem to take delight in climbing all the way to the top of the octave when they reach that part about "the land of the free"?

'Mr. Paganini,' And We Ain't Kiddin

Variety Jan 19 '44

In the first place, let's get it down fast that these fingers know little or nothing about music, and less than that when it comes to the system with which Igor Stravinsky knocks himself out. What we can understand, however, is when a critic tries to say something is terrif with one hand while apologizing for about everything except the piccolo player with the other. We savvy that, brother, because we've written those kind of reviews ourselves.

The occasion we're talking about is the Stravinsky conducted concert by the Boston Symphony, in Boston, last Friday afternoon (14) and the review of the event, that appeared the next day in the New York "Herald Tribune" under the by-line of Paul Bowles. The latter sent us to the Alka-Seltzer fountain in the office.

May we nudge you with a quote from Mr. Bowles' remarks? As follows:

"It is twentieth century music which relies almost completely on the psychological overtones of sonorities and harmonies which came into being in the nineteenth century and which could mean nothing to an audience not conversant with romantic music." Unquote.

That's us he's talking about. That, right there. The romantic music we know of is wrapped up in Ray Noble's recording of "Melancholy Baby." Chase that disc and you'll find something, mister. Does that make us "conversant?"

Still, it's Stravinsky on the main title this time, so Mr. Bowles, in his review, adds, "And like the (his) other recent works it is classical only in the sense that the music is climaxless."

Now what kind of music is that, "climaxless," to a pair of ears that grew up in the faith that Julius Lenzberg was king of all he surveyed from the pit at the Colonial, especially when Hedges Brothers and Jacobson played the house

"Incidentally," Bowles' review later continues, "the word 'mood' here does not denote what one might think, but is used in a generic sense which Webster defines as 'distinction of form in a verb to express the manner in which the action of the state it denotes is conceived'."

This, to us, is the convincer positive that Red Nichols and His Five Pennies were one hell of a band.

So Mr. Bowles concludes by three time threeing Mr. Stravinsky with, "And it is this reviewer's contention that the music remains as stimulating as ever."

No doubt Mr. Bowles is an astute music critic, but it all means only one thing to us. We've got to get near a radio Saturday night (15) because this Stravinsky is due, on the Blue yet, and we've got to find out can this guy make the "Hall of Fame."

We listen and what gives out? Can he do to "Valencia" what Whiteman did? Has he got an Al Goodman kettle-drum glissando which, of course, is a trick, but our lowly ear loves tricks. Instrumental tricks. Yeah, we listen, but we lose interest fast because it comes back to us that we have heard some of this Stravinsky's music before. We also remember that to us some of it sounded not unlike a Pratt & Whitney doing an outside loop (forward somersault to you) at 20,000 feet.

Hence, with your permission, we'll keep right on slumming with Tchaikovsky. For some reason his "Romeo and Juliet" doesn't seem to need explaining. We like the way Rapee plays it, too.

The Associated Press also sent out a story on Stravinsky's afternoon concert in Boston, saying: "Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of 'The Star Spangled Banner,' startling a huge symphony hall audience into what amounted to a stunned silence." The A. P. further went on to state, "Earlier Mr. Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of 'The Star Spangled Banner' two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style."

Friends, this final quote from the master is the one that blitzed us no end. In one fell swoop you could say. For at no time has anyone ever tossed that "contrapuntal" at even one so well versed as Jimmy Durante. And a good thing, too, or James might not be with us today. It made us think we might like to attend a Stravinsky concert with Jim—and a good deck of cards. That "contrapuntal" also shows what can go on around you if you don't pay attention. They will simply have to go on hitting us with that one 'till we get used to it.

Then, to top off everything, don't you know that a news announcement breaks on the air Saturday night relating that Stravinsky has been threatened by the Boston police with a fine of $100 for playing his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner?" Maybe the boys simply didn't care to hear the old "Banner" take a pushing around.

What bothers us, though, is why they only picked on Stravinsky. Don't those cops read the reviews?

Sid.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 18 1944

That "New Version."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER.

The news of what happened in Boston, perpetrated by Igor Stravinsky and aided and abetted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a great shock to me.

Why was this ever allowed to happen? What sort of thinking or lack of thinking made it possible? What kind of Americans are we to allow liberties to be taken with our National Anthem?

Our Flag and our National Anthem mean the best to us in a very reverent sense. They symbolize what we are fighting for. We salute the Flag and stand respectfully while our National Anthem is played or sung. We are taking no instructions from Igor Stravinsky or anyone else, as to how it is to be played or sung. Or are we?

Every loyal American must feel just as outraged as I do at the liberty which has been taken and expect something to be done about this insult to our national integrity.

I am asking you to give this matter publicity. If you deem it necessary to do so, you may quote me.—HELENA T. RATTERMAN, M. D., Cincinnati, Ohio.

January 16.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
BELLEFONTAINE, OHIO
EXAMINER
KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

JAN 17 1944

Singers Give Up When Stravinsky Plays U. S. Anthem

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (AP).—The noted modernist composer Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner today, startling a huge Symphony Hall audience into what amounted to stunned silence.

The Russian-born musician's version of the National Anthem overshadowed everything else on the program.

At the start the audience began to sing with the orchestra in customary manner, but soon the odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old composer's arrangement became evident. Eyebrows lifted, voices faltered, and before the close practically everyone gave up trying to accompany the score.

Earlier Stravinsky explained that he completed his harmonization of the "Star-Spangled Banner" two years ago on the Fourth of July. He said he retained the melody but introduced different harmonies, suggesting Puritan times with chords in the old contrapuntal style.

The composer described the orchestral sound as full, rich, more like a church hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song, as the anthem was originally. But Bostonians found little religious feeling. Their reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 17 1944

Boston Cops Turn Music Critics Now

By the United Press.

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—Igor Stravinsky won't have another chance to try out his version of The Star Spangled Banner here if the Police Department has its way.

A scheduled performance of the national anthem in the Stravinsky manner, eliminating the difficult high notes, was canceled Saturday when six members of the Police Department's radical squad appeared in the Symphony Hall audience.

Police said they were prepared to sign a court complaint charging Mr. Stravinsky with violating the "sacred and patriotic song," according to Chapter 264, Section 9, of the Massachusetts laws.

Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contend the Stravinsky version of the anthem is well within the law, pointing out that although Congress adopted the Star Spangled Banner as the national anthem in 1931 it failed to include a prescribed version of the music.

[114]

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

[illegible] 1944

WILL REVISE ARRANGEMENT

Stravinsky's Setting of "Star-Spangled Banner" Got Poor Response.

By Tom Chase.

Boston, Jan. 17 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky, noted Russian-born composer, planned to conduct his own arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner" with the Boston Symphony orchestra again tonight despite the fact that Friday's performance was received with something less than enthusiasm by a large Symphony hall audience.

The odd, somewhat dissonant harmonies of the 61-year-old musician's arrangement of the national anthem proved virtually unsingable yesterday.

Stravinsky explained he wrote his harmonization in early American spirit, intending the score to sound more like a hymn than a soldier's marching song or a club song. But Bostonians did not agree, and gave up trying to sing his version before the piece came to a close.

Warren Storey Smith, the Boston Post music critic, termed the Stravinsky work "curiously uncouth" and said it sounded "a little as though the Squeedunk town band were trying to harmonize the tune by ear and not making avery good job of it."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 18 1944

Mr. Stravinsky's Adventure

Igor Fedorovich Stravinsky is a noted musician and composer, born in Russia. One of his compositions is "Fireworks." He set off some fireworks in Boston the other day, when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Perhaps fireworks is not quite the right word, however. The audience generally, it seems, was cold to Mr. Stravinsky's version. But somebody was not only frigidly angry, in the true Boston manner, but also hot under the collar. For representatives of the law eventually appeared and figuratively tapped Mr. Stravinsky on the shoulder. They told him that there was a state law against tampering with the national anthem.

There is also, of course, the Federal law which designates "The Star-Spangled Banner," including both words and music, as the "national anthem of the United States." That law was passed in 1931 after nation-wide agitation, in order to forestall revisions, rearrangements and substitutions. The people like the song as it is.

No further insubordination is expected from the adventurous Mr. Stravinsky. He is a reasonable man. He once studied law himself. But no law can make our present national anthem easily singable. Vocal chords cannot be changed by statute.

Official National Anthem Of U. S. Is Anybody's Guess

Traveler By HAROLD BENNISON Jan. 20, '44

It's all very well to say "The Star Spangled Banner" is our national anthem, but just what does that mean?

There is no official orchestration, arrangement or score, so any one can orchestrate it and play it. Hence the mix-up recently when, at Symphony Hall, a version was played which amazed many of those present. The state has a law on the subject, but no music to back it up.

The bill which officially made the composition our national anthem was passed in March, 1931—and not until then. The adopting order was short. It merely states:

"Be it enacted by the United States of America that the composition consisting of the words and music known as 'The Star Spangled Banner' is designated as the national anthem of the United States of America."

No words were attached to the order. No music was attached to the order. So what happens when a brass band plays it, or a small orchestra, or a big one.

Diligent search failed to find any legal version of the anthem even in

Traveler Jan. 20

Tune

(Continued from First Page)

the crowded archives of the Congressional Library. There is nothing in the State House to help anybody.

Of course, no two musicians will orchestrate the anthem in the same way. One will prefer a heavier, more emphatic bass, the other a lighter. One will emphasize strings, the other the brass. And so on.

In World War I a service version was put out in the Army and Navy song and band books. But a brass band and a small orchestra certainly do not have the same instruments and hence must use different arrangements. That service version, incidentally, was put in the key of B-flat, too high for most people to reach. Inasmuch as the version was published merely for the services, there is nothing official, legal or obligatory about it.

Two years ago another version was put out, a whole tone lower, but there is nothing legal or binding to that version, either.

Joseph Muller in 1935 published a bibliography of the "Star Spangled Banner" which contained all the sheet music versions. The book contains 225 pages—all different versions of the anthem.

So if you conduct an orchestra, there is nothing to stop you from arranging the score to suit your own taste. The only state law on the matter says that the anthem must be played only as a whole and "without embellishment or addition in the way of other melodies" and forbids its use "as an exit march . . . or in a medley." But what is an embellishment?

Igor Stravinsky's version as played in Symphony Hall caused a lot of policemen to be assembled when he played again. He played it the second time in an orthodox style which seemingly satisfied the artistic souls of the police. But no one today could swear as to what version was played.

Stravinsky's version admittedly retained the melody but he introduced different harmonies with chords in the old contrapuntal style and the audience was aghast. But whether an arrangement, or orchestration such as that would be an "embellishment" under the state law (particularly in the absence of any official orchestration) is something it would take an expert body of musicians and lawyers to determine—and they would surely disagree.

CONFUSED PICTURE

Igor Stravinsky's version was written by him as a gift to the American public. It can be used by any one at any time without the permission of the author and without any fee or red tape attached. It requires some expert playing, however.

Meantime other versions have been adopted by various symphonies and the whole picture is one in which most people will have an opinion, but no one will have any legal right to say what is what, and why!

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

JAN 20 1944

omen's Club oncert Feb. 6 In Bronxville

The Bronxville Women's Club will hold a concert Feb. 6, at 5 P. M. at the Bronxville Theater, presenting the young mezzo-soprano, Miss Jennie Tourel, and the harpist, Salvatore Mario de Stefano.

Miss Tourel came to America after having been the star of the Paris Opera Comique for seven years. She appeared first in this country with the New York Philharmonic under Toscanini. Acclaim by critics and musicians alike was immediate and she was chosen by Koussevitsky and Stowkowski as soloist with their orchestras. On Nov. 13 Miss Tourel gave her first concert recital in New York. At that time Virgil Thomson, music critic, declared that she was "without parallel since Kirsten Flagstad's debut at the Metropolitan Opera * * *" He went on to say that she "is mistress of a wider range of coloration in all ranges and all volumes than any other singer I have ever heard * * * an artist of vocal skill, sound musicianship and stylistic flexibility."

Mr. de Stefano, is considered one of the great harpists of all time. Widely sought after for concerts and for radio appearances, he was first heard at the Bronxville Women's Club in October, 1942, and was selected as the artist for the Christmas Twilight Concert of that same year.

The committee sponsoring this concert is composed of the officers, board of directors, and departmental and committee chairmen of the Bronxville Women's Club, under general chairmanship of Mrs. James G. Schaefer.

BELLINGHAM, WASH.
HERALD

JAN 20 1944

ANTHEM STANDS

MILLIONS of patriots who have been stalled in the upper reaches of "The Star-Spangled Banner" have wondered why something was not done about it, and many of them have said so emphatically.

Criticism has been made also on the ground that so noble a piece as a national anthem should be based on a ribald English drinking song — "To Anacreon in Heaven."

Recently Igor Stravinsky, Russian born stormy petrel, revealed that he had done something about it. He wrote his own harmonization in the early American "puritanic" spirit, intending to give it "the character of a real church song," rather than that of "a soldier's marching song or a club song."

But when he batonned the Boston Symphony orchestra in his new arrangement, Bostonians, in the words of one critic, decided that it sounded "a little as though a Squeedunk town band were trying to harmonize the tune by ear and not making a very good job of it." Moreover, the bean epicures gave up trying to sing the Stravinsky version.

When the 61-year-old composer said he would give a repeat performance, someone ferreted out a Massachusetts statute forbidding the tampering with the national anthem, on pain of a $100 fine — and he desisted.

So the nation will go on singing Francis Scott Key's masterpiece, to the best — or the worst — of its ability. The glorious anthem may not meet all the singing needs of the common man, but it does more — it meets his spiritual needs.

NEW CANAAN. CONN
ADVERTISER
1/20/44

Our National Anthem

IGOR Stravinsky was not thrown into Boston Harbor with the tea last Friday afternoon when he attempted his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner" but he did have two cops in his audience on Saturday to see that he did not try it again. By playing an unorthodox arrangement he laid himself open to a one hundred dollar fine and the cops were ready to take him in had he essayed a second playing of his idea of the national anthem and they probably would have been cheered.

Stravinsky has been appearing with the Boston Symphony as guest conductor while Serge Koussevitsky is having a bout with the grip and not content with the familiar arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner" conducted the orchestra, one of the finest in the world, in a modern mode. The cops were not the only ones who did not approve. Here is what one Boston critic, L. A. Sloper of The Christian Science Monitor had to say about the rendition in the Saturday editions of that newspaper, "The Stravinsky arrangement of the national anthem sounds rather like a performance of the customary version by an orchestra which either cannot read or cannot play music. The harmonies have been acidulated, the note values altered, and even the melodic line reshaped. The popular success of this verson is doubtful."

Even though many of us have yet to learn the words to our national anthem the majority know the melody and can make believe sing in an assembly, but nevertheless we do not want a Russian, even though he may be an ally, or anyone else tinkering with the original. Which reminds us that no one has yet written music for the gallant words of the late Mary Perry King, whose "Hymn of Freedom" is one of the most virile poems that yet have been written. "The Star Spangled Banner" officially is our national anthem but it falls far short of perfection and does not embrace the wide field that is essential to a country as large as ours. For years "America" vied with it but the Congress decided not too long ago that "The Star Spangled Banner" anthem should be the official anthem and there it waves o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave. It is rather ironical that our anthem should be based on an incident which occurred during a little disagreement with a nation that came to be one of our best friends.

We sing it at the opening of programs, as we should, but we canot see why another song, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," "America" or Mrs. King's song, the latter set to good music, should not also be sung. We warrant that either one of the three would be rendered with greater enthusiasm than that which usually is noticeable when "The Star Spangled Banner" is sung. If this be treason make the most of it!

ERIE, PA.
TIMES

COMPOSER CLEARED ON ANTHEM CHARGE

Boston, Jan. 20.—(U.P.)—After a weekend of research, officials of the Boston symphony orchestra contended today that a Russian composer's unusual version of the "Star Spangled Banner" which upset local music followers was well within the law.

Police had threatened prosecution after Igor Stravinsky directed the orchestra in the playing of his version of the national anthem that critics said sounded more like a church hymn. They had threatened prosecution on a charge that he violated the "sacred and patriotic song."

In a statement denying the violation, symphony officials said that although congress adopted the "Star Spangled Banner" as the national anthem in 1931 it failed to include a prescribed version of the music in the enactment.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

JAN 1 8 1944

No Tamp ng With the them

BOSTON, Mass., Jan. 17 (AP).—Composer Igor Stravinsky was informed that he had run afoul of Massachusetts law when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of the Star-Spangled Banner.

The Russian-born musician startled a huge symphony hall audience by his arrangement. The next night police informed him that he was liable to a $100 fine under Massachusetts law which forbids rearrangement of the national anthem in whole or in part.

Stravinsky said that he was unaware that he was in contravention with Massachusetts law. Hereafter he would play the anthem in its original form—whatever that is. Police Commissioner T. F. Sullivan said that there would be no action.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

JAN 18 1944

Six members of the Boston Police Dept.'s radical squad, disguised as music lovers, sat through at least part of last Saturday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ready to pounce on Igor Stravinsky, Russian-born composer and guest conductor. Like Stravinsky's Friday afternoon audience. The Police Dept. didn't react kindly to Stravinsky's own version of the National Anthem, presented without warning at the opening of an all-Stravinsky program. Chapter 264, Section 9, of the Massachusetts laws which provides a $100 fine for violating the "sacred and patriotic song" was dusted off and the radical squad was directed to act if Stravinsky offended again at the repeat concert. But a chastened Stravinsky played the Star-Spangled Banner straight, high notes and all, and everybody went away happy.

WAPAKONETA, OHIO
DAILY NEWS

JAN 1 8 1944

Must Not Butcher Song Star Spangled Banner in Boston

Boston, Jan. 19—Igor Stravinsky won't have another chance to try out his version of "The Star Spangled Banner" here if the police department has its way.

A scheduled performance of the national anthem in the approved Stravinsky manner, eliminating the difficult high notes, was cancelled Saturday night when six members of the police dpartment's radical squad appeared in the Symphony Hall audience.

Police said they were prepared to sign a court complaint charging Stravinsky with violating the "sacred and patriotic song," according to chapter 264, section 9 of the Massachusetts laws. Maximum penalty for conviction would have been a $100 fine.

The Rusian-born composer had given an impromptu presentation of his version of the national anthem when he directed the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday. He said his work had been well-received elsewhere.

STRAVINSKY VERSION OF "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" ASSAYED

PERHAPS THERE SHOULD BE STANDARD VERSION

Jan. 23 '44

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE case of Igor Stravinsky, "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the police brings up an interesting point: Would or would it not be desirable to have an official version, not only melodic but harmonic, of the national anthem? Surely it would put an end to all the ad-libbing by theatre orchestras: it would keep pianists and accompanists from harmonizing it according to their lights and it would outlaw the altering of the melody with a view to lessening its troublesome range. An official pitch is out of the question, unless recitalists who could not make that particular grade were to be barred from singing it in public. A basso could not negotiate the key of B-flat, commonly heard in our concert halls, or a tenor the key of A-flat, to which lower-pitched voices occasionally resort and that, incidentally, is the key used by army bands.

But we have learned that it is difficult to legislate in matters of art. A rival pianist could make a complaint against Poundowsky, if the latter's memory failed him and he played the wrong chords in the resultant faking. Indeed, all manner of possibilities and unlimited complications immediately present themselves.

Had the Stravinsky arrangement been repeated at the Saturday evening concert and legal proceedings instituted, it is difficult to see how any court could have convicted him—except on purely esthetic grounds—since, save for the substitution of an even rhythm for a dotted one in one measure, he did not in any way alter the melody. Nor did he harmonize it in an extravagant, highly colored fashion, with a lavish use of inappropriate chromatics. Harmonically, in fact the Stravinsky version is the essense of sobriety. On the composer's own authority his aim was to suggest the rather primitive harmonies employed by the Puritans in their psalm tunes. There are fewer chromatics in his version than in the one commonly encountered. What makes the normal, sensitive ear recoil is the crudity of the version, the awkward doublings, the peculiar leading of the bass, the arbitrary dissonances.

Stravinsky's Explanations

Stravinsky is always giving us nuts to crack, both in his music itself and in the explanations of it that he is forever making; few composers have so consistently stated their own case. For example, how does he figure that his suddenly notorious version of the anthem is easier to sing? He keeps to the conventional key of B-flat, with its high F, and until you got used to them the chords that sound so definitely wrong might easily throw you off. That may be what happened at the Symphony concert of a week ago last Friday, when the new version had its local try-out. Only a few kept singing to the end. It is altogether possible, however, that many of the others, were so intrigued with the strange sounds coming from the stage that curiosity got the better of them and they desisted from singing, the better to hear.

Harmony, of course, is always a thing of fashion. The earlier versions of the tune (that first saw the light of day as an accompaniment to the stanzas entitled "To Anacreon in Heaven") were simpler, less chromatic than that to which we have grown accustomed. Stravinsky might call those chromatic chords "corny," if he has learned the word, mere 19th century cliches. Possibly, too, his harmony sounds logical to other modernists, who think in general as he does. Perhaps some day the whole country will come to prefer it. Who knows? Just now he is entitled to a feeling of injured innocence. He did what he did according to his lights and in good faith, on the eve of becoming an American citizen, as a sort of tribute and thank offering to his adopted country. Had the true facts of the case been more generally understood the uproar would never had been started. It will soon die away.

About the Programme

Shortage of space and an over-supply of picturesque incident prevented a full account of that eventful all-Stravinsky programme from appearing in these columns. To compete the record let it now be said that a second hearing of the Symphony confirmed the original impression that the first two movements, the one Haydnesque, the other more Handelian, have something and that the other two are arid, manufactured, cerebral. In the Pulcinella suite, adapted from Pergolesi, the 18th century melodic idiom is the real thing, but for the most part its 20th century dress hardly becomes it. The music of "Card Game" makes an enjoyable tonal background for the ballet, but in the concert hall its pale suggestions of Rossini, Offenbach and the Strauss family leave the listener unsatisfied.

Speaking of early Americans this department has recently received copies of three vocal compositions by that self-taught genius, Boston's own William Billings (1746-1800), edited by Oliver Daniel and published by C. C. Birchard and Co. They are for unaccompanied chorus and faithfully follow the originals with their unorthodox parallel octaves and fifths, although Mr. Daniel has seen fit to transfer the principal melody from the tenor to the soprano when it appears in the former voice. Choral societies performing this "Bethlehem," "The Bird" and "The Shepherd's Carol" will find that their interest is not merely that of a curiosity.

The Concert Tomorrow

At the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon Vladimir Golschmann will repeat Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, introduce here a Pastorale and Tarantelle by Paul Creston, repeat the Satie-Debussy "Gymnopedies" and revive Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he will offer Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and "Jupiter" Symphony, Milhaud's "Suite Provencale," Debussy's "Iberia" and the aforesaid "Francesca."

LAS VEGAS, NEV.
REVIEW-JOURNAL

JAN 22 1944

Freedom of Song?

Is "freedom of song" any less a right than "freedom of speech?"

The question is raised by the Massachusetts law under which Igor Stravinsky, famous composer and conductor, was barred from playing his rearranged version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" at a Boston Symphony concert.

We yield to none in our admiration for "The Star-Spangled Banner," on musical as well as patriotic grounds. Yet it is difficult if not impossible for most people to sing. Stravinsky rearranged the anthem in another key, changed a few intervals to make it easier for ordinary voices.

Then he played it once—and the cops arrived.

Massachusetts can hardly be proud of this statute. We doubt that it is constitutional. Under such a law it could be a crime to transpose the anthem for sopranos, tenors or basses, or reorchestrate it for a special combination of instruments.

So long as the anthem is not burlesqued or ridiculed—we think a composer or conductor is doing the country a service in trying to help the rest of us reach those high notes.

Maybe the legislator who introduced this bill was a coloratura soprano—trying to keep down competition.

No Official Version Exists of 'The Star Spangled Banner'

Globe Jan. 23

In the aftermath of the row kicked up by Igor Stravinsky's orchestral arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner," someone observed that there is no official—and thereby legal—version of our National Anthem. The composer-conductor's version, which he performed at concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is harmonically dissonant and it produced an amount of dissonant opinion involving the police. It is interesting to speculate on what might have been the outcome of a test case of the statute involved.

"The Star Spangled Banner" had no legal standing as the national anthem of the United States until it was so designated by act of Congress in 1931. No prescribed version of the music was included in that enactment and none has been specified by Congress since then.

During World War I, a committee of 12, including representatives of the War Department Commission of Training Activities, prepared a "service version" of the anthem, in the form of vocal solo with piano accompaniment, and a military band version "for the Army and Navy song and band books, and for school and community singing." Even these versions were not a matter of law, since Congress did not specify "The Star Spangled Banner" as the national anthem until years later, in 1931.

Due to the lack of an effective and dignified set of parts to enable a symphony orchestra to make suitable use of its tonal resources in performing the anthem, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1918 commissioned the noted New England composer, the late Frederick Shepherd Converse, to compose an orchestral accompaniment for the singing of the anthem. This was first performed by the orchestra and sung by its audiences on Dec. 30 and 31, 1918, at a program "celebrating the close of the year of victory."

Other symphony orchestras throughout the United States use this version. However, it may be used only by permission of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose property it is.

The version of the Committee of Twelve is in B-flat, favoring high voices. Converse adopted the same key.

In April, 1942, a version aimed at avoiding notes too high for the average voice, dropped a tone lower to key of A-flat, was produced by collaboration between Dr. George S. Howard, associate professor of music in Pennsylvania State College extension services department, and Maj. Howard Broson, musical officer of the Special Services Branch of the United States Army. There is no legal enactment enforcing use of this version. The accompaniment is for piano or band.

There is no law on the subject of prescribed orchestrations of the National Anthem.

A state or municipality might possibly restrict all performances within its boundaries to the version for voice and piano or voice and band, prepared by the Committee of Twelve. But those versions have no standing as far as Act of Congress is concerned.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

JAN 24 1944

The Night's Gag

PORTLAND HOFFA—"Did you see where a Boston symphony conductor rewrote 'The Star-Spangled Banner'?"

FRED ALLEN—"What happened to the new national anthem?"

PORTLAND HOFFA—"People wouldn't stand for it."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
PATHFINDER

An amazed audience at Boston Symphony Hall heard and watched ultra-modern composer Igor Stravinsky conduct his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner." Staid Bostonites' reception of it was decidedly chilly. Next night's concert was attended by Boston Police Commissioner Thomas F. Sullivan, who told Stravinsky he faced a $100 fine under a Massachusetts law forbidding any rearrangement of the National Anthem. Stravinsky apologized, promised he wouldn't do it in Boston. He didn't.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~DISPATCH~~ Record

JAN 23 1944

"'Star-Spangled Banner' Needs No Rearranging"

To the Editor:

Read in your paper where a guy named Stravinsky got into a jam. He was barred from playing "his own rearranged version of the 'Star-Spangled Banner' at a Boston Symphony concert."

Will you tell these "marvelous maestros" that we Americans are satisfied with our national anthem as it is? The "Star-Spangled Banner" is a sacred composition to us Americans and should not be confused with the compositions of Tchaikovsky, Herbert or Al Dexter.

VICTOR SANTORO,
Guadalcanal Vet.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

JAN 26 1944

Symphonic Patriotism

From the Boston Herald.

To find police officers attending a Boston Symphony Concert as if it were a burlesque show or a radical mass-meeting is startling, but there they were Saturday night. No one quite knows what they would have done if Igor Stravinsky had again directed the orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star Spangled Banner" as he did Friday afternoon, to the dismay of at least one patriotic society. But the composer was informed afterward of the Massachusetts statute concerning the anthem, and he obeyed its spirit as well as its letter.

An exact reading of the law might have furnished Stravinsky and the symphony management with a loophole, but they had no desire to offend anyone on the matter by making an issue. The act reads:

"Whoever plays, sings or renders the Star Spangled Banner in any public place, theater, motion picture hall, restaurant or cafe, or at any public entertainment other than as a whole and separate composition or number, without embellishment or addition in the way of national or other melodies or whoever plays, sings or renders the Star Spangled Banner or any part thereof as dance music, as an exit march, or as a part of a medley of any kind, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100."

Although Stravinsky's arrangement was certainly "embellishment," it was not embellishment "in the way of national or other melodies." This makes a nice exercise in juridical exegesis, but the problem that confronted the Symphony management was ultimately not one of law, but of the far less definite canons of propriety.

There is, to be sure, no "official" version of the National Anthem, yet Stravinsky's arrangement, however reverently it was intended, can be nothing but unofficial. To many its playing on Friday afternoon was nevertheless an expression of patriotism; to others it was not. These are matters on which one cannot be dogmatic.

[116]

STRAVINSKY VERSION OF "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" ASSAYED

PERHAPS THERE SHOULD BE STANDARD VERSION

Jan. 23 '44

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE case of Igor Stravinsky, "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the police brings up an interesting point: Would or would it not be desirable to have an official version, not only melodic but harmonic, of the national anthem? Surely it would put an end to all the ad-libbing by theatre orchestras; it would keep pianists and accompanists from harmonizing it according to their lights and it would outlaw the altering of the melody with a view to lessening its troublesome range. An official pitch is out of the question, unless recitalists who could not make that particular grade were to be barred from singing it in public. A basso could not negotiate the key of B-flat, commonly heard in our concert halls, or a tenor the key of A-flat, to which lower-pitched voices occasionally resort and that, incidentally, is the key used by army bands.

But we have learned that it is difficult to legislate in matters of art. A rival pianist could make a complaint against Poundowsky, if the latter's memory failed him and he played the wrong chords in the resultant faking. Indeed, all manner of possibilities and unlimited complications immediately present themselves.

Had the Stravinsky arrangement been repeated at the Saturday evening concert and legal proceedings instituted, it is difficult to see how any court could have convicted him—except on purely esthetic grounds—since, save for the substitution of an even rhythm for a dotted one in one measure, he did not in any way alter the melody. Nor did he harmonize it in an extravagant, highly colored fashion, with a lavish use of inappropriate chromatics. Harmonically, in fact the Stravinsky version is the essense of sobriety. On the composer's own authority his aim was to suggest the rather primitive harmonies employed by the Puritans in their psalm tunes. There are fewer chromatics in his version than in the one commonly encountered. What makes the normal, sensitive ear recoil is the crudity of the version, the awkward doublings, the peculiar leading of the bass, the arbitrary dissonances.

Stravinsky's Explanations

Stravinsky is always giving us nuts to crack, both in his music itself and in the explanations of it that he is forever making; few composers have so consistently stated their own case. For example, how does he figure that his suddenly notorious version of the anthem is easier to sing? He keeps to the conventional key of B-flat, with its high F, and until you got used to them the chords that sound so definitely wrong might easily throw you off. That may be what happened at the Symphony concert of a week ago last Friday, when the new version had its local try-out. Only a few kept singing to the end. It is altogether possible, however, that many of the others, were so intrigued with the strange sounds coming from the stage that curiosity got the better of them and they desisted from singing, the better to hear.

Harmony, of course, is always a thing of fashion. The earlier versions of the tune (that first saw the light of day as an accompaniment to the stanzas entitled "To Anacreon in Heaven") were simpler, less chromatic than that to which we have grown accustomed. Stravinsky might call those chromatic chords "corny," if he has learned the word, mere 19th century cliches. Possibly, too, his harmony sounds logical to other modernists, who think in general as he does. Perhaps some day the whole country will come to prefer it. Who knows? Just now he is entitled to a feeling of injured innocence. He did what he did according to his lights and in good faith, on the eve of becoming an American citizen, as a sort of tribute and thank offering to his adopted country. Had the true facts of the case been more generally understood the uproar would never had been started. It will soon die away.

About the Programme

Shortage of space and an over-supply of picturesque incident prevented a full account of that eventful all-Stravinsky programme from appearing in these columns. To compete the record let it now be said that a second hearing of the Symphony confirmed the original impression that the first two movements, the one Haydnesque, the other more Handelian, have something and that the other two are arid, manufactured, cerebral. In the Pulcinella suite, adapted from Pergolesi, the 18th century melodic idiom is the real thing, but for the most part its 20th century dress hardly becomes it. The music of "Card Game" makes an enjoyable tonal background for the ballet, but in the concert hall its pale suggestions of Rossini, Offenbach and the Strauss family leave the listener unsatisfied.

Speaking of early Americans this department has recently received copies of three vocal compositions by that self-taught genius, Boston's own William Billings (1746-1800), edited by Oliver Daniel and published by C. C. Birchard and Co. They are for unaccompanied chorus and faithfully follow the originals with their unorthodox parallel octaves and fifths, although Mr. Daniel has seen fit to transfer the principal melody from the tenor to the soprano when it appears in the former voice. Choral societies performing this "Bethlehem," "The Bird" and "The Shepherd's Carol" will find that their interest is not merely that of a curiosity.

The Concert Tomorrow

At the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon Vladimir Golschmann will repeat Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, introduce here a Pastorale and Tarantelle by Paul Creston, repeat the Satie-Debussy "Gymnopedies" and revive Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he will offer Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and "Jupiter" Symphony, Milhaud's "Sui Provencale," Debussy's "Iberia" and the aforesaid "Francesca."

LAS VEGAS, NEV.
REVIEW-JOURNAL

JAN 22 1944

Freedom of Song?

Is "freedom of song" any less a right than "freedom of speech?"

The question is raised by the Massachusetts law under which Igor Stravinsky, famous composer and conductor, was barred from playing his rearranged version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" at a Boston Symphony concert.

We yield to none in our admiration for "The Star-Spangled Banner," on musical as well as patriotic grounds. Yet it is difficult if not impossible for most people to sing. Stravinsky rearranged the anthem in another key, changed a few intervals to make it easier for ordinary voices.

Then he played it once—and the cops arrived.

Massachusetts can hardly be proud of this statute. We doubt that it is constitutional. Under such a law it could be a crime to transpose the anthem for sopranos, tenors or basses, or reorchestrate it for a special combination of instruments.

So long as the anthem is not burlesqued or ridiculed—we think a composer or conductor is doing the country a service in trying to help the rest of us reach those high notes.

Maybe the legislator who introduced this bill was a coloratura soprano—trying to keep down competition.

No Official Version Exists of 'The Star Spangled Banner'

Globe Jan 28

In the aftermath of the row kicked up by Igor Stravinsky's orchestral arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner," someone observed that there is no official—and thereby legal—version of our National Anthem. The composer-conductor's version, which he performed at concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is harmonically dissonant and it produced an amount of dissonant opinion involving the police. It is interesting to speculate on what might have been the outcome of a test case of the statute involved.

"The Star Spangled Banner" had no legal standing as the national anthem of the United States until it was so designated by act of Congress in 1931. No prescribed version of the music was included in that enactment and none has been specified by Congress since then.

During World War I, a committee of 12, including representatives of the War Department Commission of Training Activities, prepared a "service version" of the anthem, in the form of vocal solo with piano accompaniment, and a military band version "for the Army and Navy song and band books, and for school and community singing." Even these versions were not a matter of law, since Congress did not specify "The Star Spangled Banner" as the national anthem until years later, in 1931.

Due to the lack of an effective and dignified set of parts to enable a symphony orchestra to make suitable use of its tonal resources in performing the anthem, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1918 commissioned the noted New England composer, the late Frederick Shepherd Converse, to compose an orchestral accompaniment for the singing of the anthem. This was first performed by the orchestra and sung by its audiences on Dec. 30 and 31, 1918, at a program "celebrating the close of the year of victory."

Other symphony orchestras throughout the United States use this version. However, it may be used only by permission of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose property it is.

The version of the Committee of Twelve is in B-flat, favoring high voices. Converse adopted the same key.

In April, 1942, a version aimed at avoiding notes too high for the average voice, dropped a tone lower to key of A-flat, was produced by collaboration between Dr. George S. Howard, associate professor of music in Pennsylvania State College extension services department, and Maj. Howard Broson, musical officer of the Special Services Branch of the United States Army. There is no legal enactment enforcing use of this version. The accompaniment is for piano or band.

There is no law on the subject of prescribed orchestrations of the National Anthem.

A state or municipality might possibly restrict all performances within its boundaries to the version for voice and piano or voice and band, prepared by the Committee of Twelve. But those versions have no standing as far as Act of Congress is concerned.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

JAN 24 1944

The Night's Gag

PORTLAND HOFFA—"Did you see where a Boston symphony conductor rewrote 'The Star-Spangled Banner'?"

FRED ALLEN—"What happened to the new national anthem?"

PORTLAND HOFFA—"People wouldn't stand for it."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
PATHFINDER

JAN 31 1944

An amazed audience at Boston Symphony Hall heard and watched ultra-modern composer Igor Stravinsky conduct his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner." Staid Bostonites' reception of it was decidedly chilly. Next night's concert was attended by Boston Police Commissioner Thomas F. Sullivan, who told Stravinsky, he faced a $100 fine under a Massachusetts law forbidding any rearrangement of the National Anthem. Stravinsky apologized, promised he wouldn't do it again in Boston. He didn't.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
~~DISPATCH~~
Record
JAN 23 1944

"'Star-Spangled Banner' Needs No Rearranging"

To the Editor:

Read in your paper where a guy named Stravinsky got into a jam. He was barred from playing "his own rearranged version of the 'Star-Spangled Banner' at a Boston Symphony concert."

Will you tell these "marvelous maestros" that we Americans are satisfied with our national anthem as it is? The "Star-Spangled Banner" is a sacred composition to us Americans and should not be confused with the compositions of Tchaikovsky, Herbert or Al Dexter.

VICTOR SANTORO,
Guadalcanal Vet.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
JAN 26 1944

Symphonic Patriotism

From the Boston Herald.

To find police officers attending a Boston Symphony Concert as if it were a burlesque show or a radical mass-meeting is startling, but there they were Saturday night. No one quite knows what they would have done if Igor Stravinsky had again directed the orchestra in his own arrangement of the "Star Spangled Banner" as he did Friday afternoon, to the dismay of at least one patriotic society. But the composer was informed afterward of the Massachusetts statute concerning the anthem, and he obeyed its spirit as well as its letter.

An exact reading of the law might have furnished Stravinsky and the symphony management with a loophole, but they had no desire to offend anyone on the matter by making an issue. The act reads:

"Whoever plays, sings or renders the Star Spangled Banner in any public place, theater, motion picture hall, restaurant or cafe, or at any public entertainment other than as a whole and separa composition or number, witho embellishment or addition in t way of national or other melodies or whoever plays, sings or render the Star Spangled Banner or an part thereof as dance music, as a exit march, or as a part of a med ley of any kind, shall be punishe by a fine of not more than $100."

Although Stravinsky's arrange ment was certainly "embellish ment," it was not embellishmen "in the way of national or othe melodies." This makes a nice ex ercise in juridical exegesis, but th problem that confronted the Sym phony management was ultimatel not one of law, but of the far les definite canons of propriety.

There is, to be sure, no "official version of the National Anthem yet Stravinsky's arrangement, how ever reverently it was intended can be nothing but unofficial. T many its playing on Friday after noon was nevertheless an expres sion of patriotism; to others it wa not. These are matters on which one cannot be dogmatic.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

24 44

Musicians

Sir Thomas Beecham suggested to modern composers that they become "more socially stupid" and "intellectually puerile." Lecturing in Manhattan, he feared that the "creative current . . . in music is running dry. . . . Let's please pray that our creative artists . . . be outrageous, impractical, impossible . . . but . . . recover their pride in their craft."

Igor Stravinsky conducted his own dissonant version of The Star-Spangled Banner at a highly successful Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Of the anthem, the Associated Press discreetly noted that the audience's "reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version." But Boston Police Commissioner Thomas F. Sullivan said that the composer would not be fined the statutory $100 for breaking the Massachusetts law forbidding any & all tinkering with the Banner.

Acme

FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW
. . . got out.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 21 1944

VIEWS OF READERS

Only letters including name and address of the writer will be carried in this column. However, signatures will be withheld upon specific request. Letters preferably should be brief.

Applauds Stravinsky.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER.

I would like to argue a point in contrast to that of Tuesday's reader who is in the opinion that we should be "outraged" at Igor Stravinsky taking the liberty to change our national anthem.

Some people have still failed to realize that this is a free nation we are living in and new ideas should be accepted accordingly.

Mr. Stravinsky is a very noted conductor. He knows his music thoroughly otherwise he would not have made an attempt to change our anthem. Many people are of the opinion that Mr. Stravinsky did a wonderful job of arranging the composition for a chorus and orchestra.

For years now, hoarse winded sopranos have been screaming the anthem from second balconies in theaters, and 'teen age boys whistling and stomping on the floors. If these "super" patriots really honored their flag they would realize that it is very rude to either whistle or clap when the flag is on the screen. The occasion should be observed with quiet dignity. If the inspiration is felt to sing, there is no law against it, though a few voices could be done without during the refrain. If Francis Scott Key could see the way some citizens treat his song, I don't think he'd object to strenuously to hearing Igor Stravinsky with a mixed chorus, who are trained in the art of singing and the Boston Symphony Orchestra play his music.

And for that matter, how many "name" bands have tampered with the classics? Freddy Martin had Tschaikowsky's "Concerto in B flat" on every juke box in town and just recently one band had the gall to arrange "Onward, Christian Soldiers" into a jazz classic.

It stands to reason that Stravinsky, with his musical knowledge and background knew what he was doing and merely took an interest in our anthem and interpreted it for better understanding.

Domination ruins inspiration. If we are to wipe out inspiration, then why not become Germanic? This way we could listen only to what Dr. Gobbels chose for us to listen. But this is America. And one of the things we are fighting for today is freedom. And freedom of interpretation is included.

D. A. PICKETT, 6143 Argus Road, Cincinnati.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
HERALD OF WESTCHESTER

1944

Beethoven Cycle To Be Presented

The New Friends of Music will present three concerts of Beethoven piano sonatas by Arthur Schnabel at Carnegie Hall, according to I. A. Hirschmann. They will be held on the evenings of March 20, March 27 and April 3, and will supplement the Beethoven Cycle being presented during the season at Town Hall.

Mr. Schnabel will present in the three concerts 10 Beethoven piano sonatas, representing practically every period of the composer's creative activity.

* * *

The Busch Quartet returned to the New Friends series at Sunday's concert and presented two Beethoven quartets, as well as the Septet for Strings and Wind Instruments, Opus 20. Assisting artists were Victor Polatschek, clarinet; William Valkenier, French horn; Raymond Allard, bassoon, all three of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Anselme Fortier, first double bass player of the N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Members of the Brooklyn Oratorio Society will participate with orchestra and noted soloists in an Easter performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion. The performance will be held on Sunday afternoon, March 26, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music and will be sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

* * *

The celebrated Viennese artist, Ella Flesch, whose engagement for the balance of the Diamond Jubilee Season at the Metropolitan Opera House has been announced by Edward Johnson, had a conspicuous operatic debut. Mme. Flesch made it in "Aida" at the Vienna State Opera under Bernardo Molinari, singing the title role on 36-hours notice without a rehearsal. It was a brilliant success and the following morning she signed a contract which made her officially a member of the Vienna State Opera.

Later, Mme. Flesch became associated with the Munich Opera, where she sang Strauss and Wagner operas as well as the Italian repertoire. She has also appeared in opera in London and Paris.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK

JAN 24 1944

Oh Say! Guest-conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, IGOR STRAVINSKY, the modern Russian composer, put on his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner"—minus the hard high notes and with odd harmonies which he considers Puritanic and hymnlike. The second performance was cancelled when six members of the police radical squad filed into Symphony Hall, prepared to charge Stravinsky with violating the "sacred and patriotic song" under Chapter 264, Section 9 of the Bay State statutes. Conviction of this carries a $100 fine.

Pleasure from Boston Symphony in Pacific

Jan 2

To the Editor of The Herald:

I never enjoyed the symphony concerts so much when I was home as I have since coming to the Pacific. Station KGU in Honolulu broadcasts a whole hour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 11 A. M. The other day I heard Beethoven's Seventh, or Pastoral Symphony, broadcast, and while it was a little exotic in these circumstances, it sounded better than ever before. This type of broadcast is e our U. S. foreign prog the BBC has sever pleasant to have a Pacific theater.

D, N.J.

SHOUL
"TINKE

Editor, the Hera
Dear Sir:

The daily pres cle to the effect the modern co sky conducted t Orchestra, he rangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner." The audience was stunned into silence and rightfully so.

"The Star-Spangled Banner" was written by an inspired American; it is our national anthem and it is symbol and represents all the things for which we stand and which we think are right. You know it was inspired by just reading the various verses

Mr. Stravinsky was so condesending. He explained that he had retained the melody but introduced different harmonies. We like our national anthem just as it is. It is American, so Mr. Stravinsky and any others with the same ideas better not be tinkering with it. This is not just apiece of music to be bandied around; it is a part of us.

R. L. HEWITT

Mr. Hewitt may not be aware of the fact that while the words of "The Star-Spangled Banner" were written by "an inspired American," the tune was not, but was borrowed from an old English drinking song, 'Hymn to Anacreon."

However, it has been adopted as the music of our national anthem, with but little alteration of the original harmony, and in the past thirty years has taken on associations that have given it deeper meaning and inspirational power. We have become accustomed to its accepted harmonic structure, as well as its stirring melody, and these should not be changed. As Mr. Hewitt says, this music "is a part of us."—Ed.

Herald

Stravinsky's Version Of National Anthem

To the Editor of The Herald:

The varied reactions of Boston to the Stravinsky version of the Star Spangled Banner are interesting to note. A majority of musicians were impressed by the rich and dignified harmonic fabric with which the anthem is enhanced. The layman heard something a bit unfamiliar and objected.

I believe a close scrutiny of the music will reveal that the outline as a whole remains true. In any one of our large music stores one may find at least a half dozen versions of the piece, some of them even altering the melody in order to make it more "singable."

Why condemn Stravinsky for what has been done before, and not half so well? MARGARET C. MASON.
Boston.

OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN

FEB 5

Arranging an Anthem

When Igor Stravinsky recently made a new orchestral arrangement of our national anthem and that arrangement was presented at one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was talk of setting the law on Mr. Stravinsky on the grounds of dissonance. The Boston Globe, investigating the subject dispassionately, has discovered that there is no such thing as an official arrangement for the "Star-Spangled Banner," and that, accordingly, Stravinsky violated no law, except of harmony. All that Congress did in 1931 was to make it the national anthem; it went no further. It is odd, in a way, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been the means of presenting Stravinsky's unorthodox notes, for one of the most widely used orchestral accompaniments for the "Star-Spangled Banner" was composed by the late Frederick Shepherd Converse under commission by the Boston orchestra and is its property. Another version, composed to answer the complaint that the notes of the anthem go too high, was introduced less than two years ago. The Stravinsky arrangement, introduced for one night, is likely to remain only a musical curiosity.—New York Sun.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 31 1944

Arranging an Anthem.

When IGOR STRAVINSKY recently made a new orchestral arrangement of our national anthem and that arrangement was presented at one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was talk of setting the law on Mr. STRAVINSKY on the grounds of dissonance. The Boston Globe, investigating the subject dispassionately, has discovered that there is no such thing as an official arrangement for the "Star-Spangled Banner," and that, accordingly, STRAVINSKY violated no law, except of harmony. All that Congress did in 1931 was to make it the national anthem; it went no further. It is odd, in a way, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been the means of presenting STRAVINSKY'S unorthodox notes, for one of the most widely used orchestral accompaniments for the "Star-Spangled Banner" was composed by the late FREDERICK SHEPHERD CONVERSE under commission by the Boston orchestra and is its property. Another version, composed to answer the complaint that the notes of the anthem go too high, was introduced less than two years ago. The Stravinsky arrangement, introduced for one night, is likely to remain only a musical curiosity.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 20 1944

Star Spangled Stravinsky

The Stravinsky version of "The Star Spangled Banner" at Boston's Symphony Hall last Friday was offensive to ~~some~~ ears which detected in it an insult to the national anthem. At least one patriotic society protested the version, and someone thought of a Massachusetts law which would make the Stravinsky rendition, along with other variations, illegal. Mr. Stravinsky avoided further trouble by dropping the anthem from his program the next day.

The Boston Herald believes that the conductor might have got around the law, which reads that the anthem must be played "without embellishment or addition in the way of national or other melodies." Stravinsky did not introduce national or other melodies; he simply did what he did with the material at hand all indigenous to the melody of the anthem itself.

Perhaps the Symphony management did wel by not taking advantage of loopholes, since th Stravinsky arrangement did step on a goo many toes, even though they may have bee oversensitive about a tune that is rarely sung twice in the same manner by voices of th most impeccable patriotism and solicitous nationalism. There is no getting around the fac that "The Star Spangled Banner" is a difficul tune to sing—to the average set of vocal chords anyway. Why crowd Ossa on Pelion by making the instrumental version as complex and in articulate as the garden-variety choral version

Mr. Stravinsky could do us a favor that woul wipe out any stigma that may have attached t his offering of last week. He might invent new key in which the anthem can be sung b all and sundry who wish to pay tribute t their country by singing it.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

JAN 24 1944

Musicians

Sir Thomas Beecham suggested to modern composers that they become "more socially stupid" and "intellectually puerile." Lecturing in Manhattan, he feared that the "creative current . . . in music is running dry. . . . Let's please pray that our creative artists . . . be outrageous, impractical, impossible . . . but . . . recover their pride in their craft."

Igor Stravinsky conducted his own dissonant version of The Star-Spangled Banner at a highly successful Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Of the anthem, the Associated Press discreetly noted that the audience's "reaction indicated clearly that the Stravinsky arrangement never would take the place of the more familiar version." But Boston Police Commissioner Thomas F. Sullivan said that the composer would not be fined the statutory $100 for breaking the Massachusetts law forbidding any & all tinkering with the Banner.

Acme

FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW
. . . got out.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
HERALD OF WESTCHESTER

JAN 21 1944

Beethoven Cycle To Be Presented

The New Friends of Music will present three concerts of Beethoven piano sonatas by Arthur Schnabel at Carnegie Hall, according to I. A. Hirschmann. They will be held on the evenings of March 20, March 27 and April 3, and will supplement the Beethoven Cycle being presented during the season at Town Hall.

Mr. Schnabel will present in the three concerts 10 Beethoven piano sonatas, representing practically every period of the composer's creative activity.

* * *

The Busch Quartet returned to the New Friends series at Sunday's concert and presented two Beethoven quartets, as well as the Septet for Strings and Wind Instruments, Opus 20. Assisting artists were Victor Polatschek, clarinet; William Valkenier, French horn; Raymond Allard, bassoon, all three of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Anselme Fortier, first double bass player of the N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Members of the Brooklyn Oratorio Society will participate with orchestra and noted soloists in an Easter performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion. The performance will be held on Sunday afternoon, March 26, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music and will be sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

* * *

The celebrated Viennese artist, Ella Flesch, whose engagement for the balance of the Diamond Jubilee Season at the Metropolitan Opera House has been announced by Edward Johnson, had a conspicuous operatic debut. Mme. Flesch made it in "Aida" at the Vienna State Opera under Bernardo Molinari, singing the title role on 36-hours notice without a rehearsal. It was a brilliant success and the following morning she signed a contract which made her officially a member of the Vienna State Opera.

Later, Mme. Flesch became associated with the Munich Opera, where she sang Strauss and Wagner operas as well as the Italian repertoire. She has also appeared in opera in London and Paris.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK

JAN 24 1944

Oh Say! Guest-conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, IGOR STRAVINSKY, the modern Russian composer, put on his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner"—minus the hard high notes and with odd harmonies which he considers Puritanic and hymnlike. The second performance was cancelled when six members of the police radical squad filed into Symphony Hall, prepared to charge Stravinsky with violating the "sacred and patriotic song" under Chapter 264, Section 9 of the Bay State statutes. Conviction of this carries a $100 fine.

Pleasure from Boston Symphony in Pacific

Jan 2

To the Editor of The Herald:

I never enjoyed the symphony concerts so much when I was home as I have since coming to the Pacific. Station KGU in Honolulu broadcasts a whole hour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 11 A. M. The other day I heard Beethoven's Seventh, or Pastoral Symphony, broadcast, and while it was a little exotic in these circumstances, it sounded better than ever before. This type of broadcast is extr our U. S. foreign pro the BBC has several pleasant to have a litt

Pacific theater.

---

harmonic fabric with which the anthem is enhanced. The layman heard something a bit unfamiliar, and objected.

I believe a

'You'll bring home a card for Mother next you? Do it to please ."

Spanish So
Frank Man at 11:15 thi in her series
tures at the Headed by livan, the po
Fairclough,
Rooney. Usl old Rust, M and Mrs. Cl

RIDGEWOOD, N.J.
HERALD
1/20/44

SHOULD NOT BE "TINKERED WITH"

Editor, the Herald-News,
Dear Sir:

The daily press contained an article to the effect that last week when the modern composer Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he played his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner." The audience was stunned into silence and rightfully so.

"The Star-Spangled Banner" was written by an inspired American; it is our national anthem and it is symbol and represents all the things for which we stand and which we think are right. You know it was inspired by just reading the various verses

Mr. Stravinsky was so condesending. He explained that he had retained the melody but introduced different harmonies. We like our national anthem just as it is. It is American, so Mr. Stravinsky and any others with the same ideas better not be tinkering with it. This is not just apiece of music to be bandied around; it is a part of us.

R. L. HEWITT

Mr. Hewitt may not be aware of the fact that while the words of "The Star-Spangled Banner" were written by "an inspired American," the tune was not, but was borrowed from an old English drinking song, 'Hymn to Anacreon."

However, it has been adopted as the music of our national anthem, with but little alteration of the original harmony, and in the past thirty years has taken on associations that have given it deeper meaning and inspirational power. We have become accustomed to its accepted harmonic structure, as well as its stirring melody, and these should not be changed. As Mr. Hewitt says, this music "is a part of us."—Ed.

OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN

FEB 5 - 1944

Arranging an Anthem

When Igor Stravinsky recently made a new orchestral arrangement of our national anthem and that arrangement was presented at one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was talk of setting the law on Mr. Stravinsky on the grounds of dissonance. The Boston Globe, investigating the subject dispassionately, has discovered that there is no such thing as an official arrangement for the "Star-Spangled Banner," and that, accordingly, Stravinsky violated no law, except of harmony. All that Congress did in 1931 was to make it the national anthem; it went no further. It is odd, in a way, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been the means of presenting Stravinsky's unorthodox notes, for one of the most widely used orchestral accompaniments for the "Star-Spangled Banner" was composed by the late Frederick Shepherd Converse under commission by the Boston orchestra and is its property. Another version, composed to answer the complaint that the notes of the anthem go too high, was introduced less than two years ago. The Stravinsky arrangement, introduced for one night, is likely to remain only a musical curiosity.—New York Sun.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 21 1944

VIEWS OF READERS

Only letters including name and address of the writer will be carried in this column. However, signatures will be withheld upon specific request. Letters preferably should be brief.

Applauds Stravinsky.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER.

I would like to argue a point in contrast to that of Tuesday's reader who is in the opinion that we should be "outraged" at Igor Stravinsky taking the liberty to change our national anthem.

Some people have still failed to realize that this is a free nation we are living in and new ideas should be accepted accordingly.

Mr. Stravinsky is a very noted conductor. He knows his music thoroughly otherwise he would not have made an attempt to change our anthem. Many people are of the opinion that Mr. Stravinsky did a wonderful job of arranging the composition for a chorus and orchestra.

For years now, hoarse winded sopranos have been screaming the anthem from second balconies in theaters, and 'teen age boys whistling and stomping on the floors. If these "super" patriots really honored their flag they would realize that it is very rude to either whistle or clap when the flag is on the screen. The occasion should be observed with quiet dignity. If the inspiration is felt to sing, there is no law against it, though a few voices could be done without during the refrain. If Francis Scott Key could see the way some citizens treat his song, I don't think he'd object to strenuously to hearing Igor Stravinsky with a mixed chorus, who are trained in the art of singing and the Boston Symphony Orchestra play his music.

And for that matter, how many "name" bands have tampered with the classics? Freddy Martin had Tschaikowsky's "Concerto in B flat" on every juke box in town and just recently one band had the gall to arrange "Onward, Christian Soldiers" into a jazz classic.

It stands to reason that Stravinsky, with his musical knowledge and background knew what he was doing and merely took an interest in our anthem and interpreted it for better understanding.

Domination ruins inspiration. If we are to wipe out inspiration, then why not become Germanic? This way we could listen only to what Dr. Gobbels chose for us to listen. But this is America. And one of the things we are fighting for today is freedom. And freedom of interpretation is included.

D. A. PICKETT, 6143 Argus Road, Cincinnati.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 31 1944

Arranging an Anthem.

When IGOR STRAVINSKY recently made a new orchestral arrangement of our national anthem and that arrangement was presented at one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was talk of setting the law on Mr. STRAVINSKY on the grounds of dissonance. The Boston Globe, investigating the subject dispassionately, has discovered that there is no such thing as an official arrangement for the "Star-Spangled Banner," and that, accordingly, STRAVINSKY violated no law, except of harmony. All that Congress did in 1931 was to make it the national anthem; it went no further. It is odd, in a way, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been the means of presenting STRAVINSKY'S unorthodox notes, for one of the most widely used orchestral accompaniments for the "Star-Spangled Banner" was composed by the late FREDERICK SHEPHERD CONVERSE under commission by the Boston orchestra and is its property. Another version, composed to answer the complaint that the notes of the anthem go too high, was introduced less than two years ago. The Stravinsky arrangement, introduced for one night, is likely to remain only a musical curiosity.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 20 1944

Star Spangled Stravinsky

The Stravinsky version of "The Star Spangled Banner" at Boston's Symphony Hall last Friday was offensive ~~to some~~ ears which detected in it an insult to the national anthem. At least one patriotic society protested the version, and someone thought of a Massachusetts law which would make the Stravinsky rendition, along with other variations, illegal. Mr. Stravinsky avoided further trouble by dropping the anthem from his program the next day.

The Boston Herald believes that the conductor might have got around the law, which reads that the anthem must be played "without embellishment or addition in the way of national or other melodies." Stravinsky did not introduce national or other melodies; he simply did what he did with the material at hand all indigenous to the melody of the anthem itself.

Perhaps the Symphony management did well by not taking advantage of loopholes, since the Stravinsky arrangement did step on a good many toes, even though they may have been oversensitive about a tune that is rarely sung twice in the same manner by voices of the most impeccable patriotism and solicitous nationalism. There is no getting around the fact that "The Star Spangled Banner" is a difficult tune to sing—to the average set of vocal chords anyway. Why crowd Ossa on Pelion by making the instrumental version as complex and inarticulate as the garden-variety choral version.

Mr. Stravinsky could do us a favor that would wipe out any stigma that may have attached to his offering of last week. He might invent a new key in which the anthem can be sung by all and sundry who wish to pay tribute to their country by singing it.

BEAVER FALLS, PA.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

FEB 9 - 1944

ARRANGING AN ANTHEM

When Igor Stravinsky recently made a new orchestral arrangement of our national anthem and that arrangement was presented at one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there was talk of setting the law on Mr. Stravinsky on the grounds of dissonance. The Boston "Globe," investigating the subject dispassionately, has discovered that there is no such thing as an official arrangement for the "Star-Spangled Banner," and that, accordingly, Stravinsky violated no law, except of harmony. All that Congress did in 1931 was to make it the national anthem; it went no further. It is odd, in a way, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been the means of presenting Stravinsky's unorthodox notes, for one of the most widely used orchestral accompaniments for the "Star-Spangled Banner" was composed by the late Frederick Shepherd Converse under commission by the Boston orchestra and is its property. Another version, composed to answer the complaint that the notes of the anthem go too high, was introduced less than two years ago. The Stravinsky arrangement, introduced for one night, is likely to remain only a musical curiosity.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

FEB 2 1944

Taming of a Rebel

Our Mr. Borowski, in a column musing on the subject of Igor Stravinsky, concluded that Mr. Stravinsky is no longer the "radical" composer, bursting with surging dissonances and clashing tonalities, that he used to be. Anyone who has heard Stravinsky's recent Third Symphony, and tried to find in it the creative impulse which marked Patrouchka and the Firebird Suite, will be inclined to agree. Now we have more evidence on the taming of Stravinsky.

A couple of weeks ago Mr. Stravinsky, as guest conductor of the Boston orchestra, scheduled for two performances his own arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner"—an arrangement supposed to smooth out the unsingable high notes by employing "traditional" Puritan harmonics. But after the first performance the Boston authorities (who frequently obey such quaint impulses) solemnly dispatched a detail of gendarmes from the radical squad, ready to seize the villain who dared profane our national anthem. And Stravinsky—the former rebel—surrendered. He quit cold, and canceled the second performance of his "Star-Spangled Banner"—which just goes to show what happens to radicals in their autumnal years.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 74

BSO
Pops
Tanglewood

1944 - 1945

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

NATIONAL Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER
Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
1032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
1033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
1034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
1036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅝
1038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅝
1039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
→ 1041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
1042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

REDUCTION RATIO
19x

2.5 mm

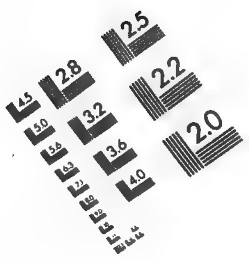
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

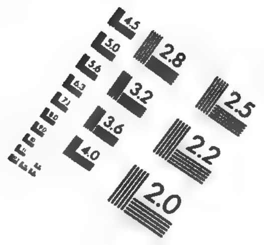
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

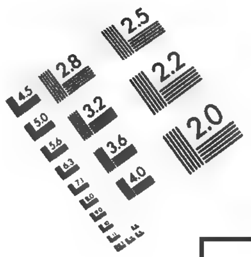


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

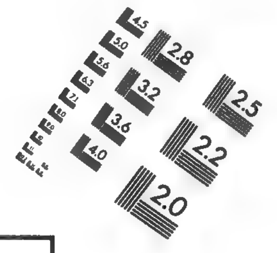


2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
2.0
4.0
4.5
5.0

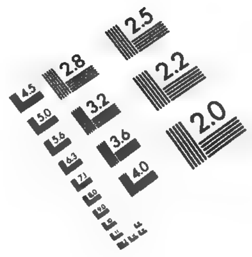
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



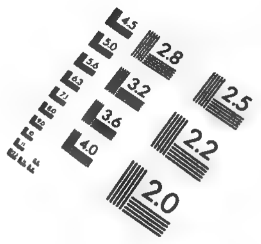
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0



2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
2.0
4.0
4.5
5.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

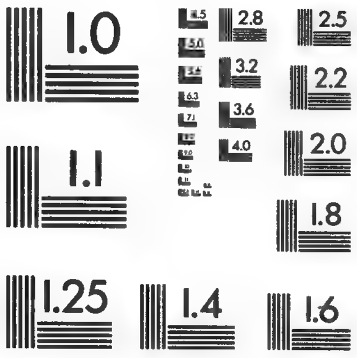


2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
2.0
4.0
4.5
5.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

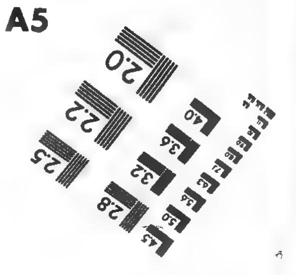
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

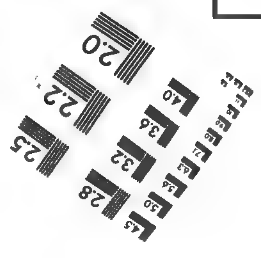


2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
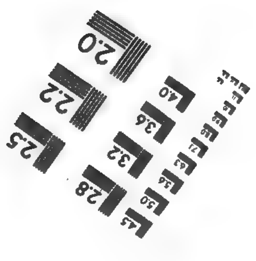
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

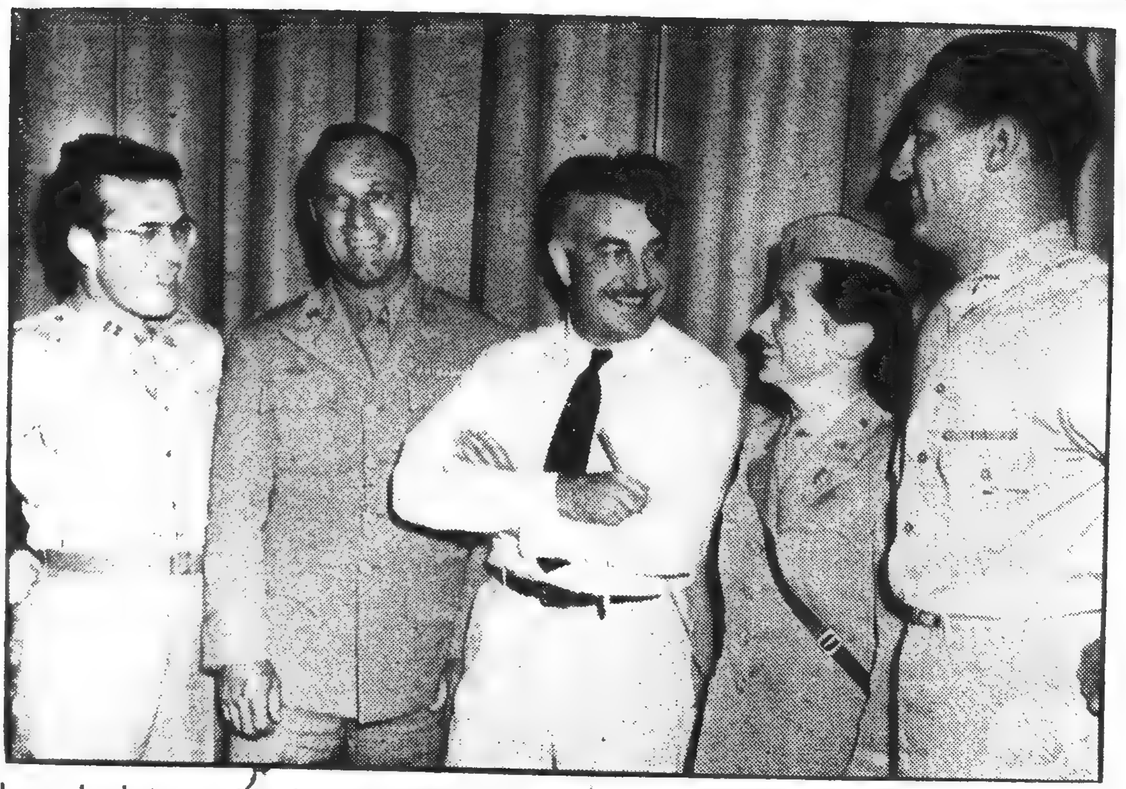
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

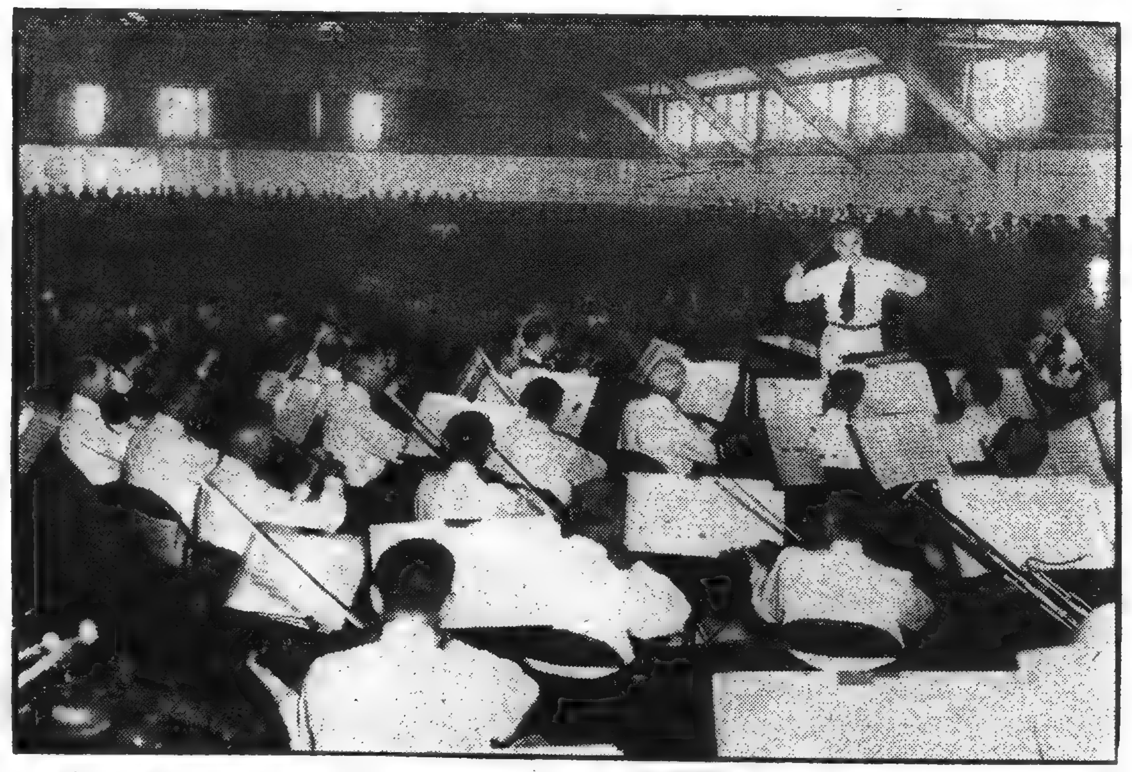
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ARTHUR FIEDLER BRINGS BOSTON POPS CONCERT TO CAMP EDWARDS



Shown backstage with Arthur Fiedler, left to right, Captain Garland Shell, Entertainment Officer, First Service Command; Colonel Holland Williamson, Commanding Officer, Convalescent Hospital; Mr. Fiedler, Lt. Rima Gurvitz, and Captain Donel J. Lynch, both of the Special Services Section, Convalescent Hospital.



Arthur Fielder, world famous conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts opening number of the one hour and fifteen minute concert for four thousand convalescent patients jammed in the camp arena.

EIDA'S BUS SERVICE

Commercial buses were chartered by Special Services, Convalescent Hospital, to transport members of orchestra to Camp Edwards. Miss Ruth Evans, Entertainment Coordinator for Red Cross, helps check passengers.

It was a great day of music at Camp Edwards last week when Arthur Fiedler and his entire Boston Pops Orchestra staged a Field Day for patients of the General and Convalescent Hospitals.

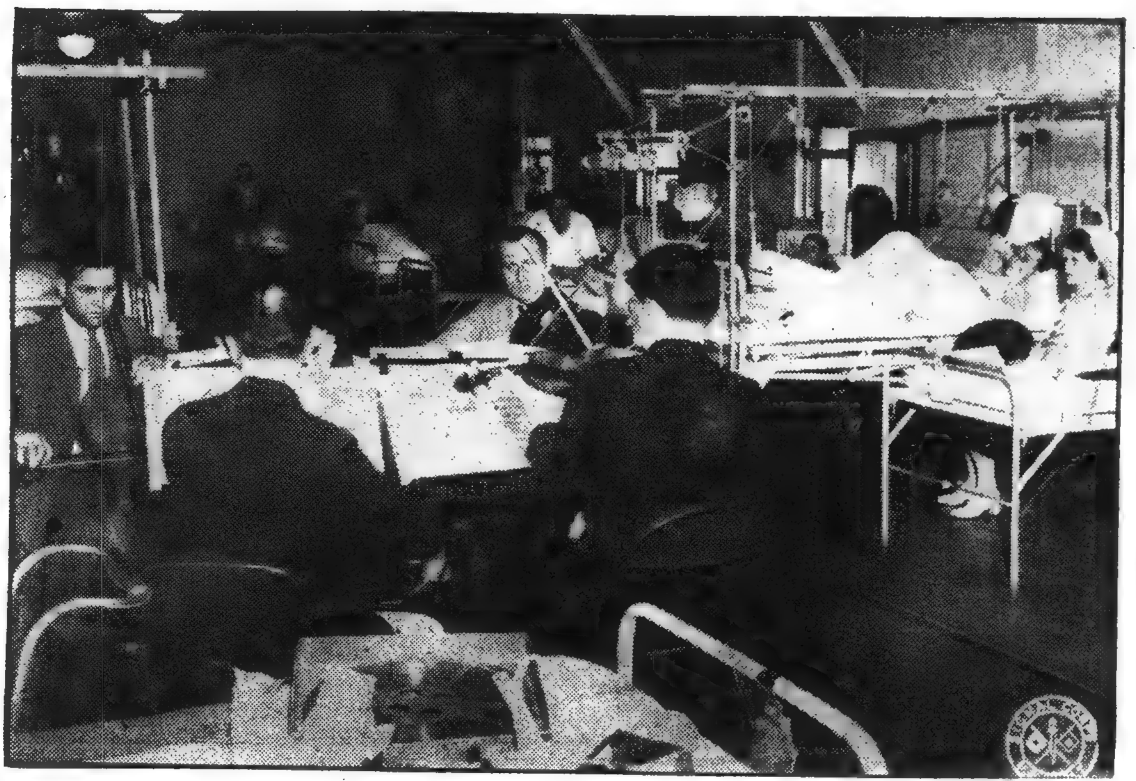
First the orchestra was divided into 12 concert groups which went from ward to ward in the General Hospital entertaining men unable to attend the big concert in the Camp Arena.

At 3.00 P. M. Arthur Fiedler lifted his baton to begin another of the internationally famous Boston Pops Concerts, which normally are heard from Boston's cultural Symphony Hall. This time, however, the performance was in the spacious Sports Arena, Camp Edwards, where 4,000 battle wounded gathered to hear "Rhapsody in Blue," tunes from "Oklahoma" and other G. I. favorites played in the incomparable style of the Boston Pops.

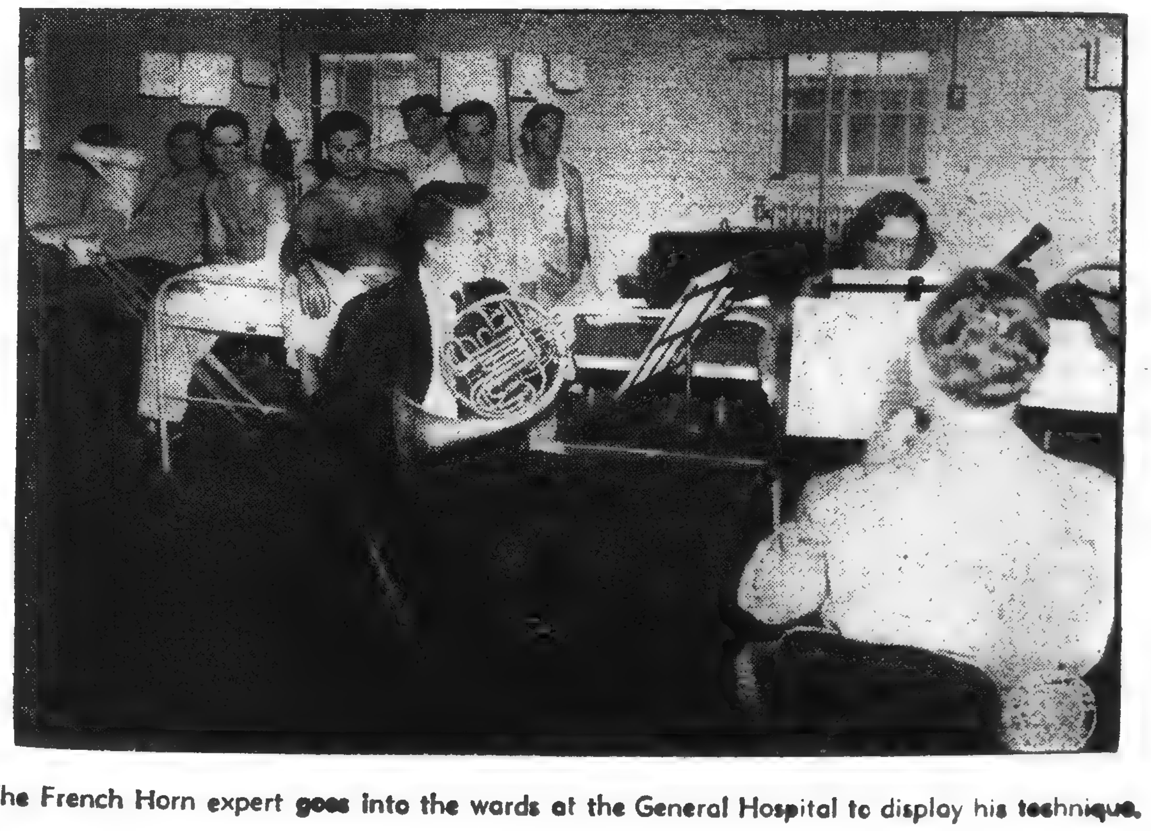
Mr. Fiedler was generous with encores which were virtually demanded by thunderous applause interspersed with whistles and cheers. Supper for the members of the orchestra was provided in camp and a police escort led them back to Boston Symphony Hall for their regular evening performance.

A graphic story is told in the adjoining pictures.

When one of the commercial buses broke down en route, the First Service Command shuttle bus was hailed and boarded by members of the orchestra and Mr. Rosario Mazzeo, Personnel Manager, who so efficiently planned the details of the trip.



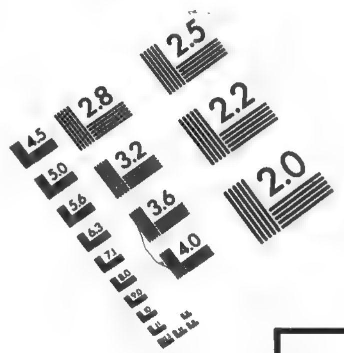
Small groups of musicians went into the wards at the General Hospital to play for patients unable to attend the big concert in arena.



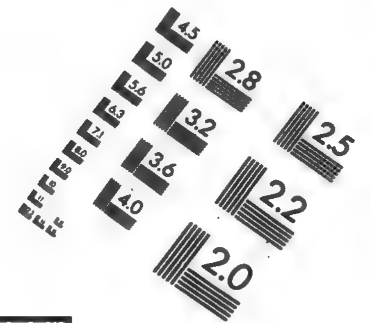
The French Horn expert goes into the wards at the General Hospital to display his technique.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

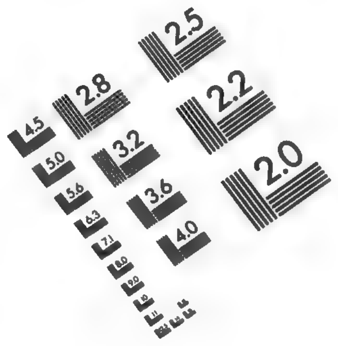
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



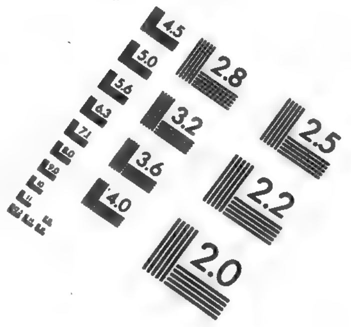
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0



4.5
5.0
5.6
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0



4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0

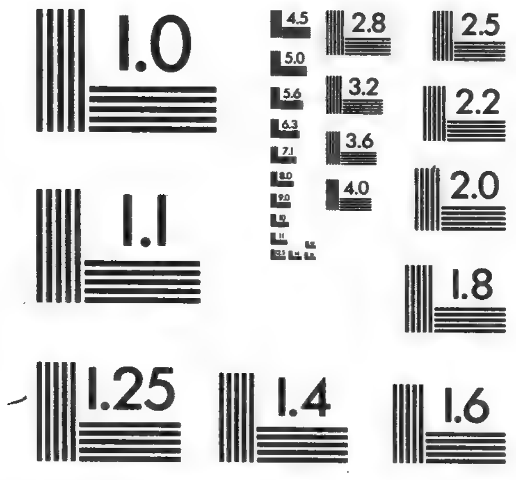


4.5
5.0
5.6
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

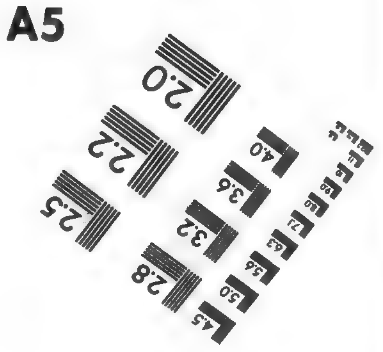
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

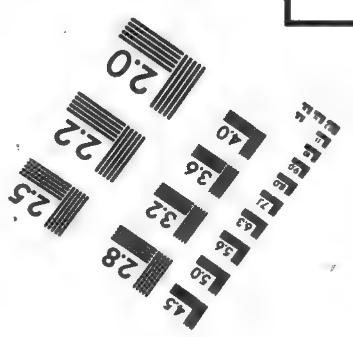


2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

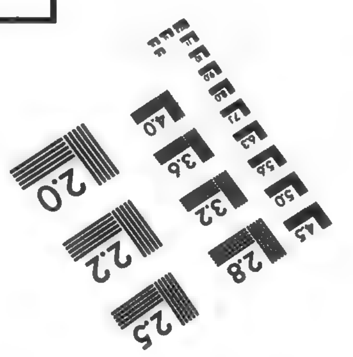
A4

A3



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

dup.

ARTHUR FIEDLER BRINGS BOSTON POPS CONCERT TO CAMP EDWARDS

It was a great day of music at Camp Edwards last week when Arthur Fiedler and his entire Boston Pops Orchestra staged a Field Day for patients of the General and Convalescent Hospitals.

First the orchestra was divided into 12 concert groups which went from ward to ward in the General Hospital entertaining men unable to attend the big concert in the Camp Arena.

....At 3.00 P. M. Arthur Fiedler lifted his baton to begin another of the internationally famous Boston Pops Concerts, which normally are heard from Boston's cultural Symphony Hall. This time, however, the performance was in the spacious Sports Arena, Camp Edwards, where 4,000 battle wounded gathered to hear "Rhapsody in Blue," tunes from "Oklahoma" and other G. I. favorites played in the incomparable style of the Boston Pops.

Mr. Fiedler was generous with encores which were virtually demanded by thunderous applause interspersed with whistles and cheers. Supper for the members of the orchestra was provided in camp and a police escort led them back to Boston Symphony Hall for their regular evening performance.

A graphic story is told in the adjoining pictures.

Shown backstage with Arthur Fiedler, left to right, Captain Garland Shell, Entertainment Officer, First Service Command; Colonel Holland Williamson, Commanding Officer, Convalescent Hospital; Mr. Fiedler, Lt. Rima Gurvitz, and Captain Donel J. Lynch, both of the Special Services Section, Convalescent Hospital.

Arthur Fielder, world famous conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts opening number of the one hour and fifteen minute concert for four thousand convalescent patients jammed in the camp arena.

EIDA'S BUS SERVICE

Commercial buses were chartered by Special Services, Convalescent Hospital, to transport members of orchestra to Camp Edwards. Miss Ruth Evans, Entertainment Coordinator for Red Cross, helps check passengers.

ARTHUR FIEDLER BRINGS BOSTON POPS CONCERT TO CAMP EDWARDS

It was a great day of music at Camp Edwards last week when Arthur Fiedler and his entire Boston Pops Orchestra staged a Field Day for patients of the General and Convalescent Hospitals.

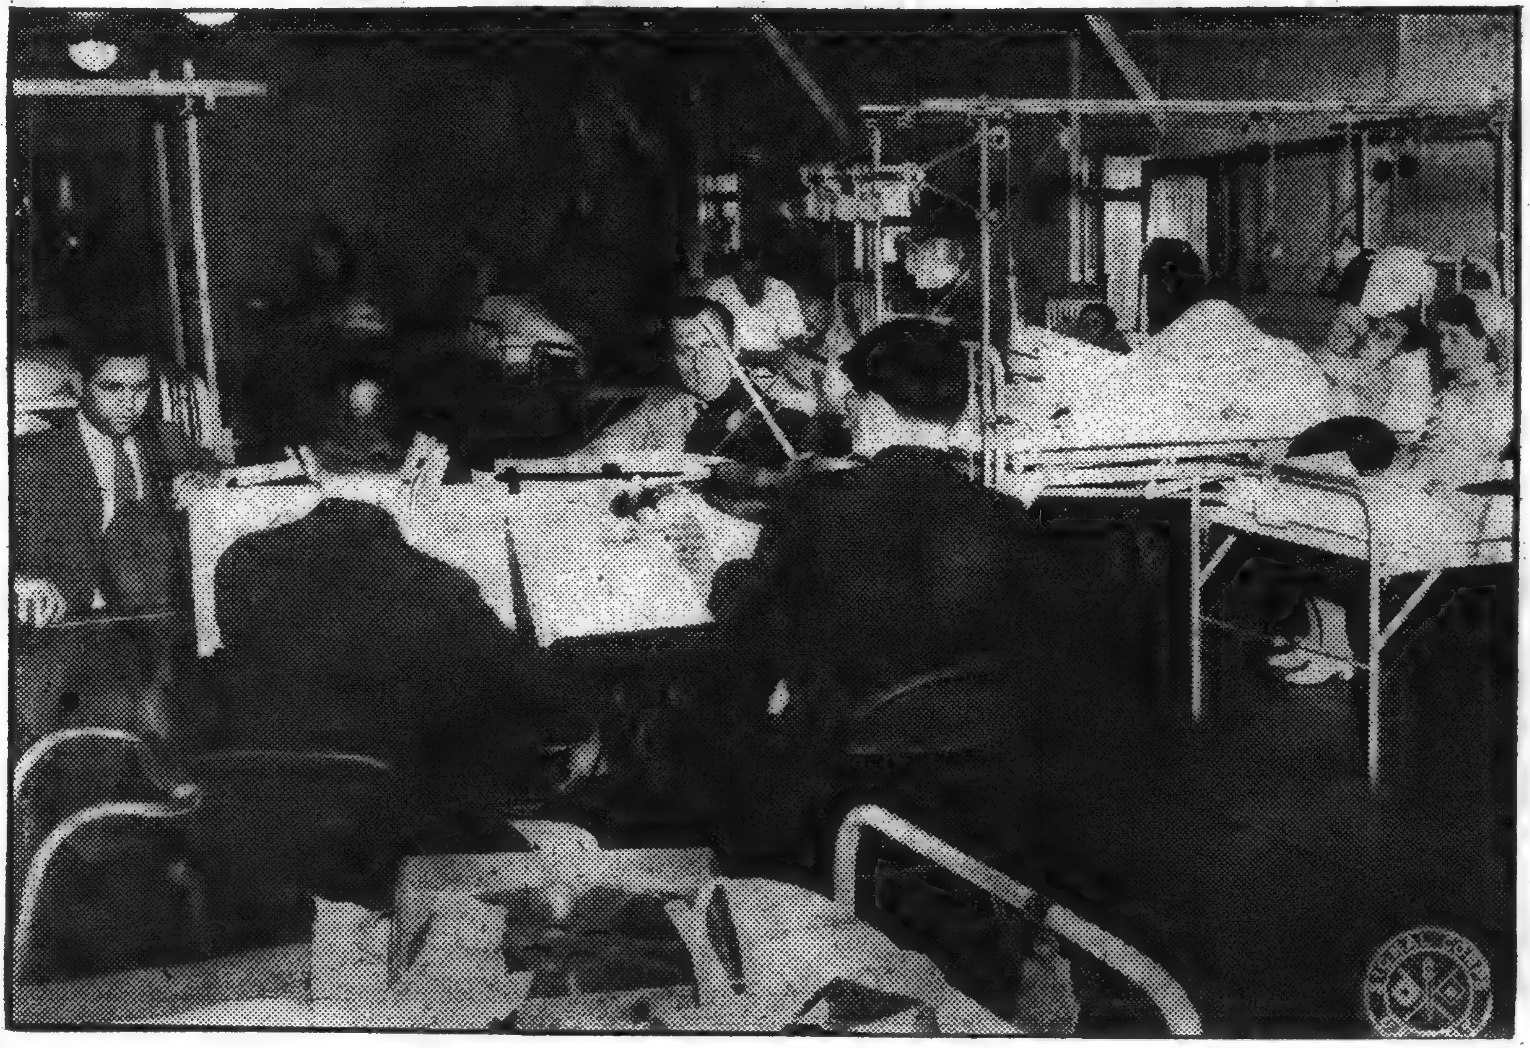
First the orchestra was divided into 12 concert groups which went from ward to ward in the General Hospital entertaining men unable to attend the big concert in the Camp Arena.

At 3.00 P. M. Arthur Fiedler lifted his baton to begin another of the internationally famous Boston Pops Concerts, which normally are heard from Boston's cultural Symphony Hall. This time, however, the performance was in the spacious Sports Arena, Camp Edwards, where 4,000 battle wounded gathered to hear "Rhapsody in Blue," tunes from "Oklahoma" and other G. I. favorites played in the incomparable style of the Boston Pops.

Mr. Fiedler was generous with encores which were virtually demanded by thunderous applause interspersed with whistles and cheers. Supper for the members of the orchestra was provided in camp and a police escort led them back to Boston Symphony Hall for their regular evening performance.

A graphic story is told in the adjoining pictures.

When one of the commercial buses broke down en route, the First Service Command shuttle bus was hailed and boarded by members of the orchestra and Mr. Rosario Mazzeo, Personnel Manager, who so efficiently planned the details of the trip.

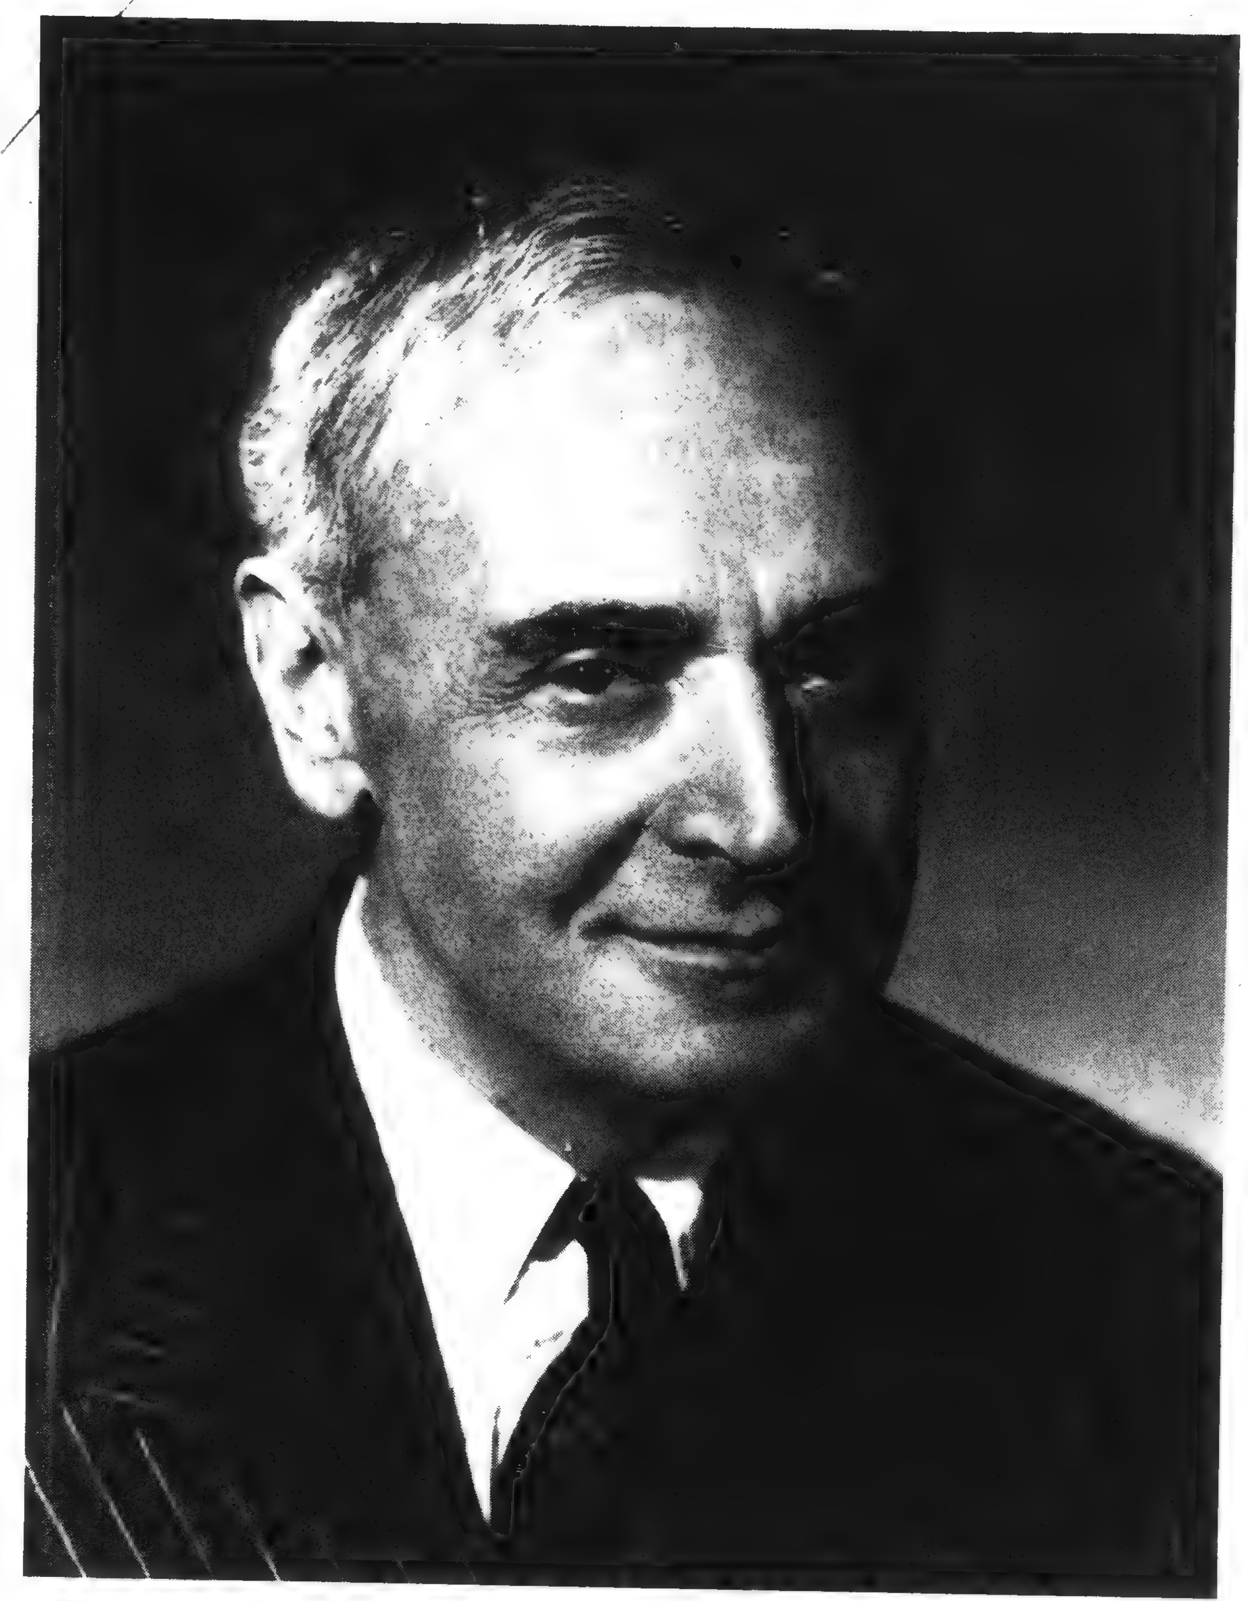


Small groups of musicians went into the wards at the General Hospital to play for patients unable to attend the big concert in arena.

The French Horn expert goes into the wards at the General Hospital to display his technique.

BLANK PAGE

CHORAL UNION CONCERTS



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Sixty-Sixth Annual Series, 1944-45

HILL AUDITORIUM, ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN

Post
Sept. 10 '44

ABOUT MUSIC

Post
Sept

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE 63rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just concluded, was in one respect unique: Its regular activities, or some portion of them, fell in every month of the year. Last, latest, and also least of these, the chamber orchestra concerts by the "principals and others," the "seersucker symphonies," as an inspired commentator dubbed them at their inception on a hot Sunday in July, rounded out their second and possibly their final season last Monday evening. Called into being by the cessation of activities at Tanglewood, in the Berkshires, they were what Wall Street would call a war baby. Next year, for aught we know, the Berkshire Festival may be again in full force and along with it the symphony's summer school. A tentative re-beginning was made this season with Koussevitzky's four Mozart concerts in the small auditorium.

The abandonment of Sanders Theatre as the locale of the Sunday "seersucker" was both a loss and a gain. The Harvard auditorium was unbearably warm at most of these matinees but it offered two compensations: its cloistral atmosphere, so well suited to the performance of intimate music, and its extraordinarily sensitive acoustics.

Certain works in these surroundings took on a quality and a flavor that made the hearing of them a choice and a memorable experience. Modern, air-conditioned New England Mutual, where both the Sunday (evening) and Monday evening concerts took place this summer, is an excellent hall for small affairs; that and nothing more. Anyway, it was cool.

Of the four programmes, I was able to hear only the first and last. What promised to be the outstanding event of the former, the first performance under Boston Symphony auspices of Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder," resulted only in disappointment, because the singer, whose name in this particular connection is best forgotten, was not suited vocally or temperamentally to her particular task. There was, however, the stimulating experience of the concert's actual novelty, Martinu's Tre Ricercari for chamber orchestra and two pianos. The Czech composer, now courts euphony instead of acidity, without forsaking the already indispensable note of tartness, and some of his pleasing sonorities, as in his highly agreeable symphony of two seasons ago, have a very personal sound. The Ricercari were a feather in Bernard Zighera's cap, and Mahler's touching songs "on the death of children" should by rights have been another.

* * *

More important than Martinu's tiny triptych was the novelty of the last pair of concerts, conducted by Richard Burgin, Hindemith's Theme and Variations "According to the Four Temperaments," for strings with piano, in this case a first performance anywhere. The German modernist, who, for no sufficient reason, incurred the Nazis' displeasure, is now, and we hope for keeps, an important figure in American musical life (he heads the music department at Yale). He is also a composer to whom the present generation can point with pride and satisfaction. Complicated counterpoint wells from him as freely and copiously, almost, as it did from Bach himself. Sometimes, as with the elder master, there is more evidence of ingenuity than of inspiration. These musical essays in the "melancholic," "sanguine," "phlegmatic" and "choleric"—save for the rather indefinite first one—are ingenious and a good deal more besides. They have musical substance and wit, and they reveal a considerable knack for characterization.

MUSIC

N. E. MUTUAL HALL
Symphony Chamber Concert

By JOHN WILLIAM RILEY

Those unfortunates who stayed away from the Boston Symphony's chamber orchestra concert in New England Mutual Hall last evening have one more chance to hear the best of the four programs of this Summer series. This excellent program will be repeated tonight and, unless you don't care whether you miss the most exciting piece of new music of the season, you had better hie yourself over there before all the tickets are gone.

The inspiration for this enthusiasm is Paul Hindemith and his new Theme with Variations, According to the Four Temperaments, for Strings and Piano. A long title, to be sure, but one indicative both of Hindemith's Jovian humor and sprightly inventiveness. The expression of mood is music's most facile function and Mr. Hindemith has done mighty well by those melancholic, sanguine, phlegmatic and choleric.

This is spunky music with lots of get up and go. It has everything of musical interest you could ask for, including an intense artistic unity. Hindemith has stoutly marshaled all his technical resources and deployed them in free and brilliant style.

The work is alive with rhythmic drive and witty tunes, salted (but not soured) with Hindemith's personal brand of harmony and counterpoint. Richard Burgin conducted a string orchestra of 25 players with boundless wit and energy. He made the piece his own and then transmitted it with unmistakable ardor to his audience. Not a little of the total effect was due to the vigor and finesse with which Lukas Foss, the Boston Symphony's new staff pianist, essayed the piano's role.

By contrast Shostakovitch's Two Preludes for String Orchestra (Op. 11) sounded sour indeed. The effect on the ear was similar to that of witch hazel on the face after shaving; definitely sharp. But here again Mr. Burgin's performance meant everything. Further contrast was offered in Tchaikovsky's Serenade Op. 48, a sometimes lugubrious work that is not without its own sentimental charm. The evening began with Dmitri Mitropoulos' excellent arrangement for strings of the Suite from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas." It is richly rewarding music whose spirit Mr. Burgin very neatly captured.

Novelties for Symphony

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, entertaining representatives of the press at luncheon at the Harvard Club the other day, added a detail or two in the way of announcement of arrangements for the coming season. Works to have their first performance at the regular subscription concerts are the following:

Concerto for orchestra, by Béla Bartók; Second Symphony, by David Diamond; Overture, "From the American Folklore," by Boris Koutzen; Suite, "The Feast During the Plague," by Arthur Lourié; Orchestral Variations, by Arnold Schönberg, and Third Symphony, by Bohuslav Martinû.

Coming in for first-time Boston Symphony presentation are "Prayer in Time of War," by William Schuman; Spirituals for string choir and orchestra, by Morton Gould, and Concerto for two pianos, by Martinû.

Mr. Judd mentioned a change in touring arrangements which sets the New York concerts of the orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evenings instead of on Thursdays as hitherto. The Saturday night programs over the radio, duration of an hour, continue. The Youth Concerts, six in number, will be given as usual in Symphony Hall under the direction of Wheeler Beckett. For another touring matter, the orchestra is dated to give a program at West Point for the Military Academy community on the afternoon of Nov. 19.

for the occasion being Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the performance dedicated "To the Heroes of the United Nations."

Her. Sept 4

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Chamber Concert

The principal and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the final program of their summer series in Ne wEngland Mutual Hall last night, Richard Burgin conducting. The guest artist was Lukas Foss. The program:

Aria and Finale from "Dido and Aeneas" .... Purcell
(Transcription for string orchestra by Dmitri Mitropoulos)
Prelude from Partita No. 3 (for violin unaccompanied) .... Bach
Arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli
Theme with Variations. According to the Four Temperments, for Strings with Piano .... Hindemith
Two Preludes for string orchestra, Op. 11 .... Shostakovitch
Serenade for Strings, Op. 48 .. Tchaikovsky

Taken from every viewpoint, last night's summer symphony (which, when repeated tonight brings the series to a close) was the most interesting of all four, and easily one of the notable musical events of the year. And the reason is this: Hindemith's Theme and Variations, which had its first performance anywhere at this concert, is more than likely to prove to be one of the lasting musical compositions of recent years.

Certainly the best and most distinguished thing he has done since "Mathis der Maler," the Variations reveal the composer at the very peak of his great creative powers But more than that, they find him striking out in a new and bolder field, a field still closely allied to his basic feeling for neo-classical expression, but more expansive, possibly more romantic, and certainly more outspokenly attractive. Yet all the while he has retained, in the Variations, his great strength and individuality, and sense of humor. Indeed, the variation with the piano and solo strings is the wittiest thing since the Scherzo of Shostakovitch's Quintet and far more distinguished. While the composition is long, so intense is the composer's inspiration it really hasn't a bar to spare, as I think those who found it difficult will discover on a second or third hearing—and it's worth all of that!

It was played with great verve by the string band under Richard Burgin with Lukas Foss, at the piano, again proving himself one of the younger pianists to watch—as witness his extraordinary rhythmical feeling in the third variation. Leading up to the Hindemith (about which more later) was a glowing performance of the "When I Am Laid in Earth" aria from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" (with a ravishing performance by Jean Bedetti of the recitative) and a lively performance of the Prelude from Bach's 3d Partita for unaccompanied violin. The Shostakovitch Preludes were as always bright and amusing tours de force, and the Tchaikovsky Serenade, strongly and wholesomely conceived by Richard Burgin, whose conducting throughout was athletic but very musical, proved exceptionally good to hear after its many years in the files, at least so far as Boston is concerned.

New Music by Symphony

Among the new works to be performed by Serge Koussevitzky during the 64th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, the Second Symphony by David Diamond, Boris Koutzen's Overture "From the American Folklore," the Suite "The Feast During the Plague" by Arthur Lourie, a new set of Orchestral Variations by Arnold Schoenberg and Bohuslav Martinu's Third Symphony.

New to these concerts will be Hindemith's Variations "According to the Four Temperaments," "Prayer in Time of War" by William Schuman, Spirituals for String Choir and Orchestra by Morton Gould, and Martinu's Concerto for Two Pianos.

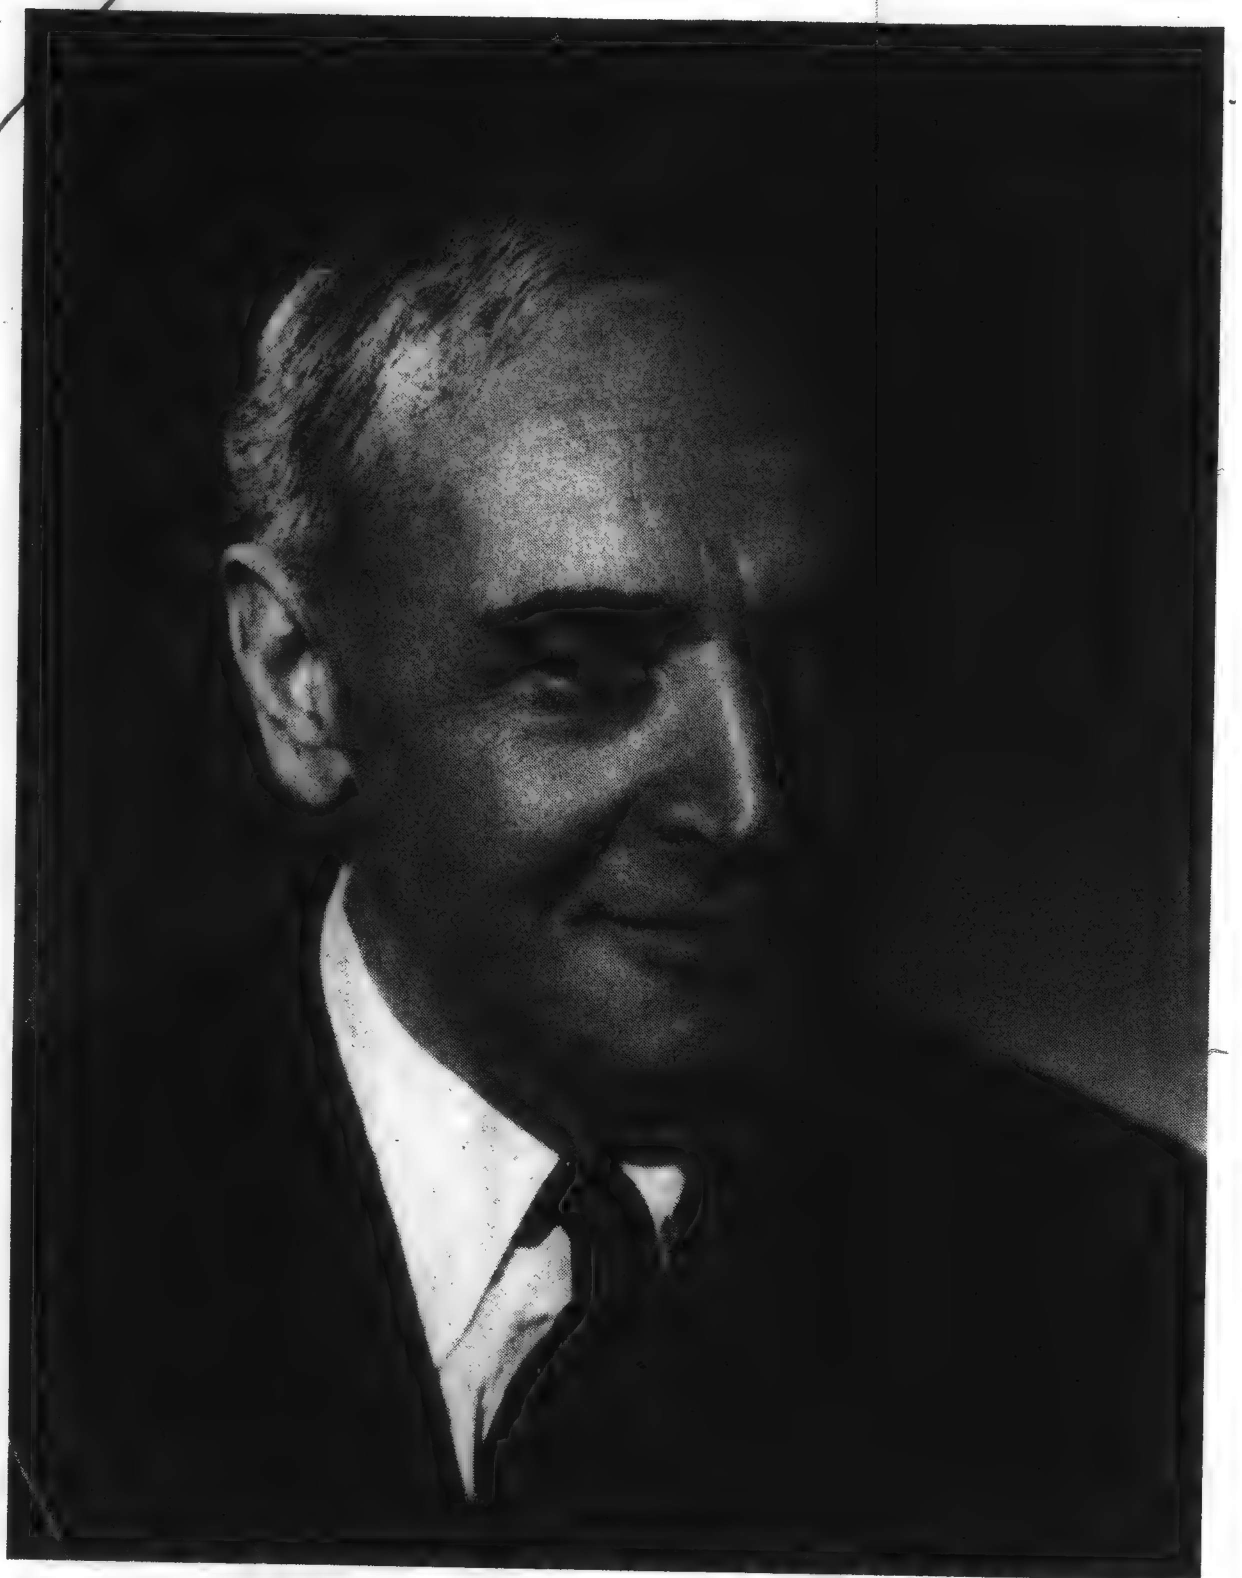
Mr. Koussevitzky will open the season at Symphony Hall Oct. 6 and 7, dedicating performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony to "the heroes of the United Nations."

Items from the standard repertory will include Paganini's Violin Concerto with Zino Francescatti as soloist; the "Harold in Italy" Symphony of Berlioz; Bloch's Viola Concerto (William Primrose, soloist). Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and the D minor Piano Concerto of Brahms with Jesus Maria Sanroma at the keyboard.

Conductor and orchestra will give their services for a special program at West Point Nov. 19. There will be six concerts for children at Symphony Hall conducted by Wheeler Beckett.

[3]

CHORAL UNION CONCERTS



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Sixty-Sixth Annual Series, 1944-45

ILL AUDITORIUM, ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN

Post Sept. 10 '44

ABOUT MUSIC

Post Sept

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE 63rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just concluded, was in one respect unique: Its regular activities, or some portion of them, fell in every month of the year. Last, latest, and also least of these, the chamber orchestra concerts by the "principals and others," the "seersucker symphonies," as an inspired commentator dubbed them at their inception on a hot Sunday in July, rounded out their second and possibly their final season last Monday evening. Called into being by the cessation of activities at Tanglewood, in the Berkshires, they were what Wall Street would call a war baby. Next year, for aught we know, the Berkshire Festival may be again in full force and along with it the symphony's summer school. A tentative re-beginning was made this season with Koussevitzky's four Mozart concerts in the small auditorium.

The abandonment of Sanders Theatre as the locale of the Sunday "seersucker" was both a loss and a gain. The Harvard auditorium was unbearably warm at most of these matinees but it offered two compensations: its cloistral atmosphere, so well suited to the performance of intimate music, and its extraordinarily sensitive acoustics.

Certain works in these surroundings took on a quality and a flavor that made the hearing of them a choice and a memorable experience. Modern, air-conditioned New England Mutual, where both the Sunday (evening) and Monday evening concerts took place this summer, is an excellent hall for small affairs; that and nothing more. Anyway, it was cool.

Of the four programmes, I was able to hear only the first and last. What promised to be the outstanding event of the former, the first performance under Boston Symphony auspices of Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder," resulted only in disappointment, because the singer, whose name in this particular connection is best forgotten, was not suited vocally or temperamentally to her particular task. There was, however, the stimulating experience of the concert's actual novelty, Martinu's Tre Ricercari for chamber orchestra and two pianos. The Czech composer, now courts euphony instead of acidity, without forsaking the already indispensable note of tartness, and some of his pleasing sonorities, as in his highly agreeable symphony of two seasons ago, have a very personal sound. The Ricercari were a feather in Bernard Zighera's cap, and Mahler's touching songs "on the death of children" should by rights have been another.

* * *

More important than Martinu's tiny triptych was the novelty of the last pair of concerts, conducted by Richard Burgin, Hindemith's Theme and Variations "According to the Four Temperaments," for strings with piano, in this case a first performance anywhere. The German modernist, who, for no sufficient reason, incurred the Nazis' displeasure, is now, and we hope for keeps, an important figure in American musical life (he heads the music department at Yale). He is also a composer to whom the present generation can point with pride and satisfaction. Complicated counterpoint wells from him as freely and copiously, almost, as it did from Bach himself. Sometimes, as with the elder master, there is more evidence of ingenuity than of inspiration. These musical essays in the "melancholic," "sanguine," "phlegmatic" and "choleric"—save for the rather indefinite first one—are ingenious and a good deal more besides. They have musical substance and wit, and they reveal a considerable knack for characterization.

Globe Sept 7

MUSIC

N. E. MUTUAL HALL

Symphony Chamber Concert

By JOHN WILLIAM RILEY

Those unfortunates who stayed away from the Boston Symphony's chamber orchestra concert in New England Mutual Hall last evening have one more chance to hear the best of the four programs of this Summer series. This excellent program will be repeated tonight and, unless you don't care whether you miss the most exciting piece of new music of the season, you had better hie yourself over there before all the tickets are gone.

The inspiration for this enthusiasm is Paul Hindemith and his new Theme with Variations, According to the Four Temperaments, for Strings and Piano. A long title, to be sure, but one indicative both of Hindemith's Jovian humor and sprightly inventiveness. The expression of mood is music's most facile function and Mr. Hindemith has done mighty well by those melancholic, sanguine, phlegmatic and choleric.

This is spunky music with lots of get up and go. It has everything of musical interest you could ask for, including an intense artistic unity. Hindemith has stoutly marshaled all his technical resources and deployed them in free and brilliant style.

The work is alive with rhythmic drive and witty tunes, salted (but not soured) with Hindemith's personal brand of harmony and counterpoint. Richard Burgin conducted a string orchestra of 25 players with boundless wit and energy. He made the piece his own and then transmitted it with unmistakable ardor to his audience. Not a little of the total effect was due to the vigor and finesse with which Lukas Foss, the Boston Symphony's new staff pianist, essayed the piano's role.

By contrast Shostakovitch's Two Preludes for String Orchestra (Op. 11) sounded sour indeed. The effect on the ear was similar to that of witch hazel on the face after shaving; definitely sharp. But here again Mr. Burgin's performance meant everything. Further contrast was offered in Tchaikovsky's Serenade Op. 48, a sometimes lugubrious work that is not without its own sentimental charm. The evening began with Dmitri Mitropoulos' excellent arrangement for strings of the Suite from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas." It is richly rewarding music whose spirit Mr. Burgin very neatly captured.

[3]

Novelties for Symphony

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, entertaining representatives of the press at luncheon at the Harvard Club the other day, added a detail or two in the way of announcement of arrangements for the coming season. Works to have their first performance at the regular subscription concerts are the following:

Concerto for orchestra, by Béla Bartók; Second Symphony, by David Diamond; Overture, "From the American Folklore," by Boris Koutzen; Suite, "The Feast During the Plague," by Arthur Lourié; Orchestral Variations, by Arnold Schönberg, and Third Symphony, by Bohuslav Martinů.

Coming in for first-time Boston Symphony presentation are "Prayer in Time of War," by William Schuman; Spirituals for string choir and orchestra, by Morton Gould, and Concerto for two pianos, by Martinů.

Mr. Judd mentioned a change in touring arrangements which sets the New York concerts of the orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evenings instead of on Thursdays as hitherto. The Saturday night programs over the radio, duration of an hour, continue. The Youth Concerts, six in number, will be given as usual in Symphony Hall under the direction of Wheeler Beckett. For another touring matter, the orchestra is dated to give a program at West Point for the Military Academy community on the afternoon of Nov. 19.

for the occasion being Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the performance dedicated "To the Heroes of the United Nations."

Her. Sept. 7

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Chamber Concert

The principal and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the final program of their summer series in New England Mutual Hall last night, Richard Burgin conducting. The guest artist was Lukas Foss. The program:

Aria and Finale from "Dido and Aeneas" .... Purcell
(Transcription for string orchestra by Dmitri Mitropoulos)
Prelude from Partita No. 3 (for violin unaccompanied) .... Bach
Arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli
Theme with Variations, According to the Four Temperments, for Strings with Piano .... Hindemith
Two Preludes for string orchestra, Op. 11 .... Shostakovitch
Serenade for Strings, Op. 48 .. Tchaikovsky

Taken from every viewpoint, last night's summer symphony (which, when repeated tonight brings the series to a close) was the most interesting of all four, and easily one of the notable musical events of the year. And the reason is this: Hindemith's Theme and Variations, which had its first performance anywhere at this concert, is more than likely to prove to be one of the lasting musical compositions of recent years.

Certainly the best and most distinguished thing he has done since "Mathis der Maler," the Variations reveal the composer at the very peak of his great creative powers. But more than that, they find him striking out in a new and bolder field, a field still closely allied to his basic feeling for neo-classical expression, but more expansive, possibly more romantic, and certainly more outspokenly attractive. Yet all the while he has retained, in the Variations, his great strength and individuality, and sense of humor. Indeed, the variation with the piano and solo strings is the wittiest thing since the Scherzo of Shostakovitch's Quintet and far more distinguished. While the composition is long, so intense is the composer's inspiration it really hasn't a bar to spare, as I think those who found it difficult will discover on a second or third hearing—and it's worth all of that!

It was played with great verve by the string band under Richard Burgin with Lukas Foss, at the piano, again proving himself one of the younger pianists to watch—as witness his extraordinary rhythmical feeling in the third variation. Leading up to the Hindemith (about which more later) was a glowing performance of the "When I Am Laid in Earth" aria from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" (with a ravishing performance by Jean Bedetti of the recitative) and a lively performance of the Prelude from Bach's 3d Partita for unaccompanied violin. The Shostakovitch Preludes were as always bright and amusing tours de force, and the Tchaikovsky Serenade, strongly and wholesomely conceived by Richard Burgin, whose conducting throughout was athletic but very musical, proved exceptionally good to hear after its many years in the files, at least so far as Boston is concerned.

New Music by Symphony

Among the new works to be performed by Serge Koussevitzky during the 64th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, the Second Symphony by David Diamond, Boris Koutzen's Overture "From the American Folklore," the Suite "The Feast During the Plague" by Arthur Lourie, a new set of Orchestral Variations by Arnold Schoenberg and Bohuslav Martinu's Third Symphony.

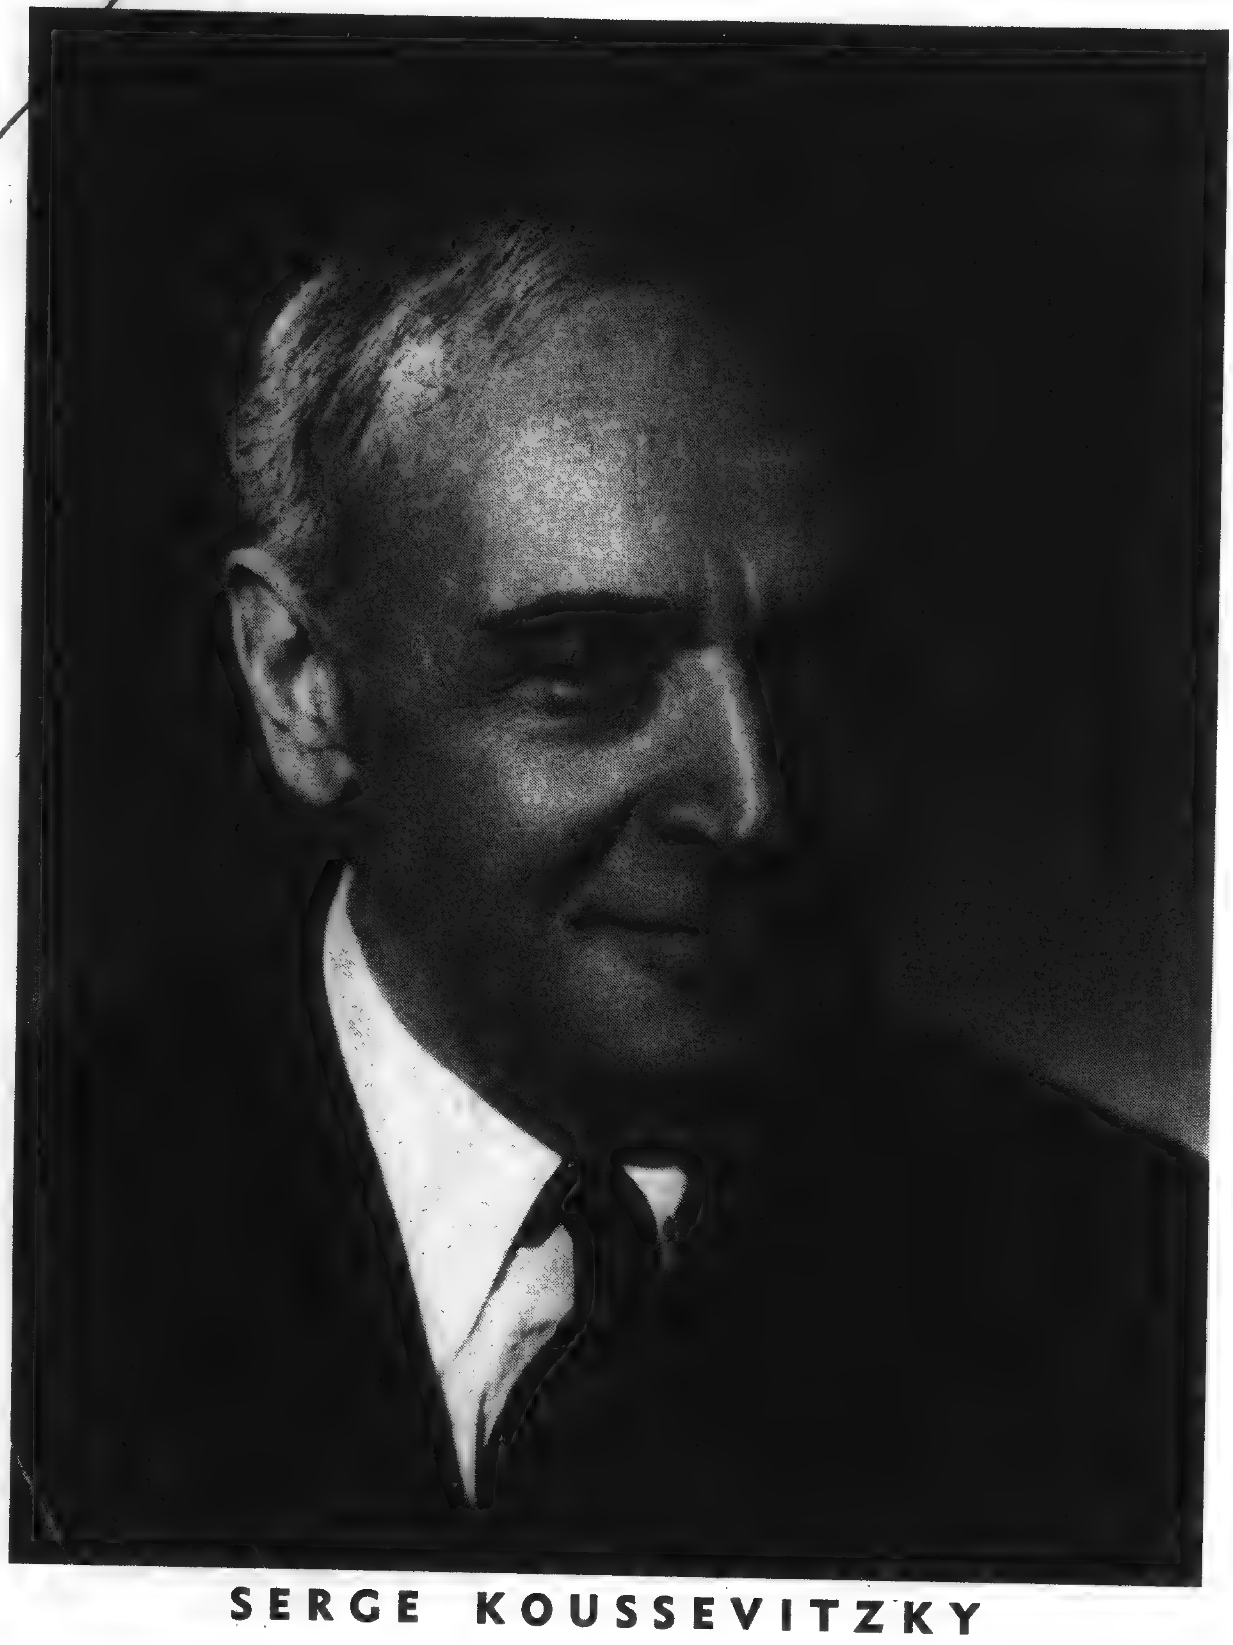
New to these concerts will be Hindemith's Variations "According to the Four Temperaments," "Prayer in Time of War" by William Schuman, Spirituals for String Choir and Orchestra by Morton Gould, and Martinu's Concerto for Two Pianos.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the season at Symphony Hall Oct. 6 and 7, dedicating performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony to "the heroes of the United Nations."

Items from the standard repertory will include Paganini's Violin Concerto with Zino Francescatti as soloist; the "Harold in Italy" Symphony of Berlioz; Bloch's Viola Concerto (William Primrose, soloist), Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and the D minor Piano Concerto of Brahms with Jesus Maria Sanroma at the keyboard.

Conductor and orchestra will give their services for a special program at West Point Nov. 19. There will be six concerts for children at Symphony Hall conducted by Wheeler Beckett.

CHORAL UNION CONCERTS



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Sixty-Sixth Annual Series, 1944-45

HILL AUDITORIUM, ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN

Post Sept. 10 '44

ABOUT MUSIC

Post Sept

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE 63rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just concluded, was in one respect unique. Its regular activities, or some portion of them, fell in every month of the year. Last, latest, and also least of these, the chamber orchestra concerts by the "principals and others," the "seersucker symphonies," as an inspired commentator dubbed them at their inception on a hot Sunday in July, rounded out their second and possibly their final season last Monday evening. Called into being by the cessation of activities at Tanglewood, in the Berkshires, they were what Wall Street would call a war baby. Next year, for aught we know, the Berkshire Festival may be again in full force and along with it the symphony's summer school. A tentative re-beginning was made this season with Koussevitzky's four Mozart concerts in the small auditorium.

The abandonment of Sanders Theatre as the locale of the Sunday "seersucker" was both a loss and a gain. The Harvard auditorium was unbearably warm at most of these matinees but it offered two compensations: its cloistral atmosphere, so well suited to the performance of intimate music, and its extraordinarily sensitive acoustics.

Certain works in these surroundings took on a quality and a flavor that made the hearing of them a choice and a memorable experience. Modern, air-conditioned New England Mutual, where both the Sunday (evening) and Monday evening concerts took place this summer, is an excellent hall for small affairs; that and nothing more. Anyway, it was cool.

Of the four programmes, I was able to hear only the first and last. What promised to be the outstanding event of the former, the first performance under Boston Symphony auspices of Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder," resulted only in disappointment, because the singer, whose name in this particular connection is best forgotten, was not suited vocally or temperamentally to her particular task. There was, however, the stimulating experience of the concert's actual novelty, Martinu's Tre Ricercari for chamber orchestra and two pianos. The Czech composer, now courts euphony instead of acidity, without forsaking the already indispensable note of tartness, and some of his pleasing sonorities, as in his highly agreeable symphony of two seasons ago, have a very personal sound. The Ricercari were a feather in Bernard Zighera's cap, and Mahler's touching songs "on the death of children" should by rights have been another.

* * *

More important than Martinu's tiny triptych was the novelty of the last pair of concerts, conducted by Richard Burgin, Hindemith's Theme and Variations "According to the Four Temperaments," for strings with piano, in this case a first performance anywhere. The German modernist, who, for no sufficient reason, incurred the Nazis' displeasure, is now, and we hope for keeps, an important figure in American musical life (he heads the music department at Yale). He is also a composer to whom the present generation can point with pride and satisfaction. Complicated counterpoint wells from him as freely and copiously, almost, as it did from Bach himself. Sometimes, as with the elder master, there is more evidence of ingenuity than of inspiration. These musical essays in the "melancholic," "sanguine," "phlegmatic" and "choleric"—save for the rather indefinite first one—are ingenious and a good deal more besides. They have musical substance and wit, and they reveal a considerable knack for characterization.

Glob Sept 7

MUSIC

N. E. MUTUAL HALL
Symphony Chamber Concert

By JOHN WILLIAM RILEY

Those unfortunates who stayed away from the Boston Symphony's chamber orchestra concert in New England Mutual Hall last evening have one more chance to hear the best of the four programs of this Summer series. This excellent program will be repeated tonight and, unless you don't care whether you miss the most exciting piece of new music of the season, you had better hie yourself over there before all the tickets are gone.

The inspiration for this enthusiasm is Paul Hindemith and his new Theme with Variations, According to the Four Temperaments, for Strings and Piano. A long title, to be sure, but one indicative both of Hindemith's Jovian humor and sprightly inventiveness. The expression of mood is music's most facile function and Mr. Hindemith has done mighty well by those melancholic, sanguine, phlegmatic and choleric.

This is spunky music with lots of get up and go. It has everything of musical interest you could ask for, including an intense artistic unity. Hindemith has stoutly marshaled all his technical resources and deployed them in free and brilliant style.

The work is alive with rhythmic drive and witty tunes, salted (but not soured) with Hindemith's personal brand of harmony and counterpoint. Richard Burgin conducted a string orchestra of 25 players with boundless wit and energy. He made the piece his own and then transmitted it with unmistakable ardor to his audience. Not a little of the total effect was due to the vigor and finesse with which Lukas Foss, the Boston Symphony's new staff pianist, essayed the piano's role.

By contrast Shostakovitch's Two Preludes for String Orchestra (Op. 11) sounded sour indeed. The effect on the ear was similar to that of witch hazel on the face after shaving; definitely sharp. But here again Mr. Burgin's performance meant everything. Further contrast was offered in Tchaikovsky's Serenade Op. 48, a sometimes lugubrious work that is not without its own sentimental charm. The evening began with Dmitri Mitropoulos' excellent arrangement for strings of the Suite from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas." It is richly rewarding music whose spirit Mr. Burgin very neatly captured.

[3]

Novelties for Symphony

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, entertaining representatives of the press at luncheon at the Harvard Club the other day, added a detail or two in the way of announcement of arrangements for the coming season. Works to have their first performance at the regular subscription concerts are the following:

Concerto for orchestra, by Béla Bartók; Second Symphony, by David Diamond; Overture, "From the American Folklore," by Boris Koutzen; Suite, "The Feast During the Plague," by Arthur Lourié; Orchestral Variations, by Arnold Schönberg, and Third Symphony, by Bohuslav Martinů.

Coming in for first-time Boston Symphony presentation are "Prayer in Time of War," by William Schuman; Spirituals for string choir and orchestra, by Morton Gould, and Concerto for two pianos, by Martinů.

Mr. Judd mentioned a change in touring arrangements which sets the New York concerts of the orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evenings instead of on Thursdays as hitherto. The Saturday night programs over the radio, duration of an hour, continue. The Youth Concerts, six in number, will be given as usual in Symphony Hall under the direction of Wheeler Beckett. For another touring matter, the orchestra is dated to give a program at West Point for the Military Academy community on the afternoon of Nov. 19.

for the occasion being Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the performance dedicated "To the Heroes of the United Nations."

New Music by Symphony

Among the new works to be performed by Serge Koussevitzky during the 64th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, the Second Symphony by David Diamond, Boris Koutzen's Overture "From the American Folklore," the Suite "The Feast During the Plague" by Arthur Lourie, a new set of Orchestral Variations by Arnold Schoenberg and Bohuslav Martinu's Third Symphony.

New to these concerts will be Hindemith's Variations "According to the Four Temperaments," "Prayer in Time of War" by William Schuman, Spirituals for String Choir and Orchestra by Morton Gould, and Martinu's Concerto for Two Pianos.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the season at Symphony Hall Oct. 6 and 7, dedicating performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony to "the heroes of the United Nations."

Items from the standard repertory will include Paganini's Violin Concerto with Zino Francescatti as soloist; the "Harold in Italy" Symphony of Berlioz; Bloch's Viola Concerto (William Primrose, soloist), Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and the D minor Piano Concerto of Brahms with Jesus Maria Sanroma at the keyboard.

Conductor and orchestra will give their services for a special program at West Point Nov. 19. There will be six concerts for children at Symphony Hall conducted by Wheeler Beckett.

Her. Sept. 7

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Chamber Concert

The principal and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the final program of their summer series in New England Mutual Hall last night, Richard Burgin conducting. The guest artist was Lukas Foss. The program:

Aria and Finale from "Dido and Aeneas" .... Purcell
(Transcription for string orchestra by Dmitri Mitropoulos)
Prelude from Partita No. 3 (for violin unaccompanied) .... Bach
Arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli
Theme with Variations, According to the Four Temperments, for Strings with Piano .... Hindemith
Two Preludes for string orchestra, Op. 11 .... Shostakovitch
Serenade for Strings, Op. 48 .. Tchaikovsky

Taken from every viewpoint, last night's summer symphony (which, when repeated tonight brings the series to a close) was the most interesting of all four, and easily one of the notable musical events of the year. And the reason is this: Hindemith's Theme and Variations, which had its first performance anywhere at this concert, is more than likely to prove to be one of the lasting musical compositions of recent years.

Certainly the best and most distinguished thing he has done since "Mathis der Maler," the Variations reveal the composer at the very peak of his great creative powers. But more than that, they find him striking out in a new and bolder field, a field still closely allied to his basic feeling for neo-classical expression, but more expansive, possibly more romantic, and certainly more outspokenly attractive. Yet all the while he has retained, in the Variations, his great strength and individuality, and sense of humor. Indeed, the variation with the piano and solo strings is the wittiest thing since the Scherzo of Shostakovitch's Quintet and far more distinguished. While the composition is long, so intense is the composer's inspiration it really hasn't a bar to spare, as I think those who found it difficult will discover on a second or third hearing—and it's worth all of that!

It was played with great verve by the string band under Richard Burgin with Lukas Foss, at the piano, again proving himself one of the younger pianists to watch—as witness his extraordinary rhythmical feeling in the third variation. Leading up to the Hindemith (about which more later) was a glowing performance of the "When I Am Laid in Earth" aria from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" (with a ravishing performance by Jean Bedetti of the recitative) and a lively performance of the Prelude from Bach's 3d Partita for unaccompanied violin. The Shostakovitch Preludes were as always bright and amusing tours de force, and the Tchaikovsky Serenade, strongly and wholesomely conceived by Richard Burgin, whose conducting throughout was athletic but very musical, proved exceptionally good to hear after its many years in the files, at least so far as Boston is concerned.

STAGE–SCREEN

Post September 17, 1944

FIEDLER AS SYMPHONY LEADER

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In view of his tremendous following, it is a bit surprising that Arthur Fiedler has had to wait so long for a chance to conduct the Boston Symphony Concerts proper. However, that opportunity has finally come. Symphony Hall's prospectus for the orchestra's 64th season adds Mr. Fiedler's name to those of Dimitri Mitropoulos, George Szell and Leonard Bernstein, all of which were announced last spring. With Dr. Koussevitzky enjoying his 21st season as regular conductor and with Richard Burgin again as his associate, there will be plenty of variety on the conducting end.

Mr. Fiedler, by the way, has conducted at one Symphony concert. Several years ago at a Tuesday matinee, when both Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin were indisposed, he took over at the eleventh hour and turned in a first-class job.

Some of the soloists were announced in March, some were not. Anyway, here is the list as it stands to date. For pianists we will have Robert Casadesus; Witold Malcuzynski, the puissant Pole who thundered through a Jordan Hall recital last winter; our old friend, Jesus Maria Sanroma; and the team of Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff. These last will introduce to Boston the Concerto of Martinu and offer a Mozart two-piano concerto, besides. The violinists will be Zino Francescatti, Jascha Heifetz and Ruth Posselt. The Viola Concerto of Bloch will bring that eminent violist, William Primrose; and the name of Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, completes the roster of assisting artists. There is nothing said about singers. As a rule, the Boston Symphony does not go in for vocalists. Their principal function is to provide the solo parts in choral works, and none of the latter have been specified as yet.

* * *

Arnold Schoenberg, co-parent with Igor Stravinsky or musical modernism, is a composer more heard about than heard, at least in these parts. From time to time new works have come from his pen and Boston has missed them. Now that particular silence is to be broken by the world premiere of a new set of Orchestral Variations. Other works to be heard for the first time anywhere are a Concerto for orchestra by the Hungarian Bela Bartok (his music, too, has been scarce around here), the Second Symphony of the young American, David Diamond, whose name will be new to Symphony Hall; an Overture, "From the American Folklore," by Boris Koutzen; a Suite by Arthur Lourie bearing the curious title, "The Feast During the Plague," and Martinu's Third Symphony.

Hindemith's Variations, "According to the Four Temperaments," discussed here last Sunday in connection with their recent performance by a group of Symphony men at New England Mutual Hall, will now be heard from the full body of strings, plus the piano, for which the score also calls. The reviewers unanimously voted it a piece both attractive and important. Other local novelties will be William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," and Morton Gould's Spirituals for String Choir and Orchestra.

At the opening pair of concerts, those of Friday afternoon, Oct. 6, and Saturday evening, Oct. 7, Dr. Kouseevitzky will perform Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in a performance dedicated "to the heroes of the United Nations." Beethoven's Seventh is also listed for early performance, along with the "Egmont" Overture. A Mozart novelty will be the "Little" G minor Symphony, and we will get his Divertimento for horns and strings. The Concertos of Paganini are seldom heard with orchestra. Mr. Francescatti will play the D major. A promised revival that will be a revival indeed is that of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Sym-

---

Last Chamber Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Sept. 4 "44"

The current series of chamber orchestra concerts by the Symphony "principals and ohers" comes to an end this evening. The programme, as heard at New England Mutual Hall last night, provided an interesting survey of music for strings, as old as Bach and as new as Hindemith in first performance. Richard Burgin conducted.

In point of fact the elder music on this well diversified list was not the simon-pure article. The Bach item was the Prelude from the Third Partita for the violin alone as arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli and many times heard at Symphony Hall and the other would-be ancient number was Dimitri Mitropoulos' transcription of the familiar Lament of Dido form Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," which the Greek conductor once set forth for us here in Boston.

The centre of interest and occupying middle place on the programme, the Hindemith novelty furnished something new in the matter of descriptive music, being a Theme and Variations "According to the Four Temperaments," for strings and piano. The pianist was Lucas Foss. Whether Mr. Hindemith's own temperament is predominantly melancholic, sanguine, phlegmatic, choleric, or a combination of all four, may have nothing to do with the case. Plenty of composers can write objectively. But as it seemed last evening, he hit off all the others much better than he did the first. The Russian Shostakovitch, whose Two Preludes for string orchestra, Opus 11, came directly afterwards, sounded in the first of these a melancholy note which made Hindemith's attempt hilarious by comparison. The other three characterizations, however, besides being musically engrossing, are not without a touch of sly humor. Neither very old nor yet up to date, the final number on the programme was Tchaikovsky's Serenade for strings, one of the most grateful of all compositions designed for that particular medium.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

SEP 25 1944

Orchestration Safe Symphony Reports

Sibelius' 'Origin Of Fire' Is Sent Here By Radio Photo

BOSTON (UP)—The only known copy of the orchestration of Jean Sibelius' "Origin of Fire" still in existence is safe in the United States, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials disclosed today, thanks to a unique transatlantic transmission of the musical composition by radio photo.

Recently the venerable Finnish composer reported that the original orchestral manuscript of his early masterpiece, which had not been published, was destroyed during the Allied bombing of Leipzig, Germany, where his publishing firm was situated. He believed that the orchestration therefore was lost forever.

Today, however, Boston Symphony officials Sent Sibelius a reassuring cablegram, explaining that they have a copy of the original and recalling the unusual circumstances involved.

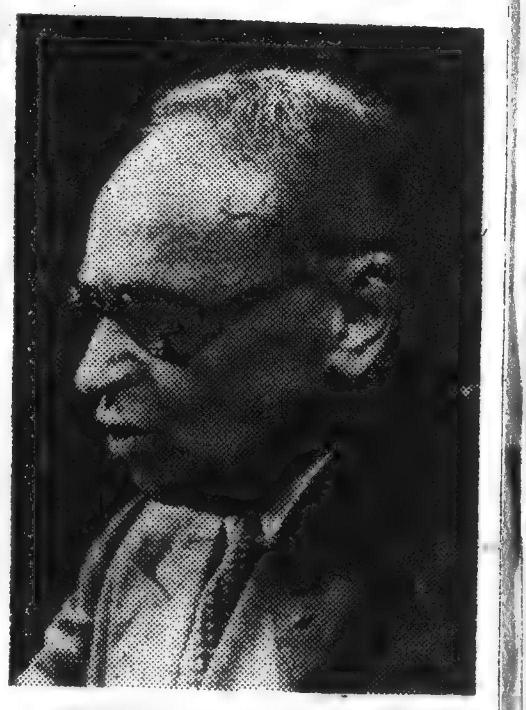
It seems that the Boston orchestra was to give the American premiere of "Origin of Fire" on New Year's eve in 1937 with the Helsinki University male chorus, but the orchestration which arrived here was incomplete.

Undaunted, symphony officials arranged with the publisher in Germany to send photographs of the missing parts by telephone from Leipzig to London via Berlin and thence by radio to Boston via New York. Toiling a day and a night with magnifying glasses, two expert copyists made legible versions of the micro photos and the concert went on as scheduled.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

SEP 23 1944

FDR Raised Cultural Level



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

From speech by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

One can well say that the twelve years under President Roosevelt have been marked by an extraordinary expansion and flowering of the arts in America.

This is significant: when art becomes an indispensable part of life it is a sign that the nation has reached a new age; the people have attained a deeper consciousness, a fuller confidence in their own power.

This we owe to the courage and wisdom of our President, who has saved the country at at time of distress, given it stability, raised the cultural standard and lifted the spirit of our people.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

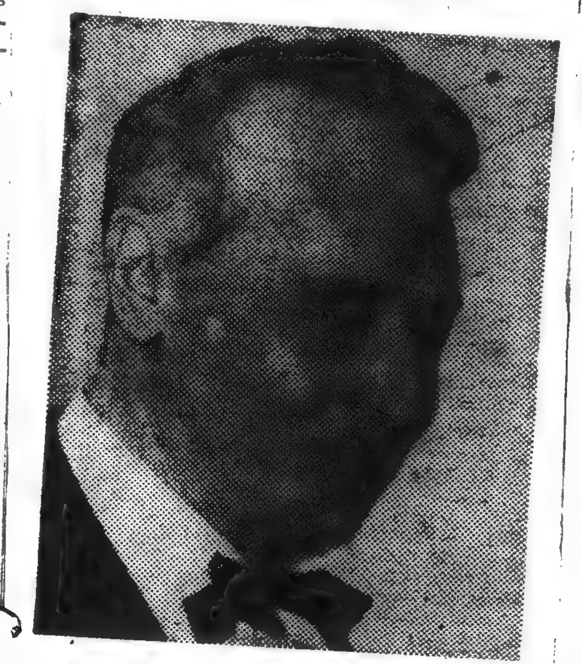
SEP 16 1944

Bostonians Schedule Novelties.

The Boston Symphony will open its season in its home city on October 6, under the direction of its regular conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The novelties scheduled for their premieres in Boston during the current season include David Diamond's Second Symphony, scheduled for the orchestra's second week; Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra; Boris Koutzen's Overture, "From the American Folklore"; new Orchestral Variations by Schoenberg, and Martinu's Third Symphony.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

SEP 18 1944



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony, will be one of the speakers—Bette Davis is another—Thursday night at Madison Sq. Garden, when Vice President Wallace opens his campaign in behalf of FDR's re-election. The rally is sponsored by the Independent Voters' Committee of the Arts and Sciences for Roosevelt.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

SEP 11 1944

Bette Davis, screen star, and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will join Vice President Wallace in Madison Square Garden Sept. 21 at the Rally for Roosevelt. Miss Davis, who will fly in from Hollywood, will address the meeting as spokesman for the motion-picture and theatrical persons on the Independent Voters Committee of the Arts and Sciences for Roosevelt. Koussevitsky will represent committee members in the field of music.

ADVERTISING AGE
CHICAGO, ILL.

SEP 18 1944

Sponsors Symphony Again

Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Company, Milwaukee, for the second successive year will sponsor Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and five guest conductors. Starting Oct. 7, the series of 30 concerts will be heard on the Blue Network 8:30-9:30 p. m., EWT, with the season extending through April 28, 1945. Agency is Compton Advertising, New York.

2

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

SEP 24 1944

ORCHESTRA TO OPEN SEASON

Boston Symphony Has 30 Concerts on Schedule

The "Boston Symphony Orchestra," premiere symphonic ensemble of the country, with its eminent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opens another season for WSLS and BLUE Network listeners on Saturday, October 7.

Thirty concerts comprise the schedule which the BLUE Network will present on Saturday nights from 8:30 to 9:30. Of these 24 will originate in Boston, five in New York and one in Milwaukee. The season extends through April 28, 1945.

To Have Five Guests

In addition to Dr. Koussevitzky, permanent director of the orchestra, five guest conductors are to be heard during the season. George Szell, Metropolitan Opera conductor, will occupy the podium for two programs and a similar number will be under the baton of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis symphony. Others who will appear include Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston symphony; Leonard Bernstein, young protege of Dr. Koussevitzky who served last season as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony society and Arthur Fiedler, popular leader of the annual "Pops" and Esplanade series of the Boston symphony. Each of these noted conductors will be in charge for one concert.

The list of soloists selected by Dr. Koussevitzky includes some of the best known musicians now before concert audiences. Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, outstanding duo-pianists will be heard on the third broadcast, and Zeno Francescatti, French violinist, will play the virtuosic Paganini Concerto in D Major at the fourth concert. Others to be heard with the orchestra during the 30-week season are William Primrose, violinist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist of the orchestra.

An outstanding advocate of the contemporary composer during his tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky will present several new works this season. Among them are symphonies by David Diamond and Aaron Copland, American composers; Bohuslav Martinu, Bohemian, and Darius Milhaud, eminent composer of France. Dr. Koussevitzky. also plans to offer an orchestral concerto by Bela Bartok. William Schuman's "Prayer" will be played probably on the first program.

Sixty-Fourth Season

The season will be the sixty-fourth for the Boston ensemble and the twenty-first for Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor. He was invited to head the orchestra after a distinguished career abroad, his podium debut having been made in Berlin in 1906. Although Dr. Koussevitzky recently observed his 70th birthday, he is still as energetic as when he took over the Boston Symphony in 1924. Born in Russia, he became a French citizen and is now a citizen of this country.

Approach of the Allied Armies to Bonn, near Cologne, is being watched carefully by Dr. Koussevitzky. When he launches the series this year, he has elected to present "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. If Bonn falls to the Allies before that date, as is now anticipated, the event will become a memorialization of the birth of Beethoven for it was in that city on December 16, 1770, that the great advocate of the freedom of mankind was born.

The symphony itself was performed privately for the first time in 1804 in Vienna, so this will be the 140th anniversary of its premiere. The public premiere occurred one year later at the Theatre and der Wien. It remained Beethoven's favorite among his symphonies, and although the composer originally dedicated it to Bonaparte, he later changed this.

Dr. Koussevitzky has dedicated the concert to the "heroes of the United Nations."

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor; Dr. Harlow Shapley, Harvard University astronomer; Jo Davidson sculptor; Dr. Channing H. Tobias Negro leader, and Helen Keller, as well as Bette Davis and Fredric March, line players.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

SEP 22 1944

Wallace Gives 'Liberal' Views

Says FDR's Experience Needed to Write Peace

NEW YORK, Sept. 22 (AP)—Vice-President Henry A. Wallace's first speech of the campaign today gave the nation a "liberal's" blueprint of the postwar future, predicated on the re-election of President Roosevelt as the man "who can better provide for permanent peace and full employment."

Speaking before 20,000 persons at Madison Square Garden Thursday night, Mr. Wallace declared the campaign issue was not that of indispensability, but which of two men—Franklin D. Roosevelt or Governor Thomas E. Dewey, the Republican presidential nominee—could:

Harding Betrayed Peace Ideals

"1. Better co-operate with Churchill, Stalin and the Generalissimo in writing a lasting, liberal, democratic peace which will best preserve American interests without being unfair to any nation, big or small?

"2. Best make sure that there are jobs for everybody and, therefore, good incomes for farmers, white collar workers, business and professional men?"

Asserting that Roosevelt has "the precious asset of long acquaintance" and "continuous, almost daily contact" with Churchill and Stalin, Mr. Wallace declared "even a reactionary will not lightly vote to throw such knowledge into the discard."

"Moreover," he went on, "all middle-aged Republicans in favor of peace will remember how President Harding betrayed their peace ideals in 1920 and 1921. In spite of everything Governor Dewey has said, the isolationists are still going to vote Republican in 1944.

"Just as Mr. Harding placated the isolationists in 1921 so Governor Dewey would be under the necessity of placating the isolationists in 1945. The Republican party in spite of the millions of its members who think clearly about international affairs, has been and will be the channel through which the isolationists, the cartelists and the international freebooters work best."

Looking ahead to the domestic postwar scene, Mr. Wallace said:

"The American people are grown up. They will not be frightened by those who say their government would abuse them. They

Mr. Wallace called for achievement of "the maximum ideal" of "jobs for all" and proposed that the best brains in the country be drafted by the President to "help the common man in his pursuit of the richer life."

"If a wartime President may draft men to fight," he asserted, "certainly a peacetime President may draft the brains of this country to work full time in the most exciting battle of modern time—the battle against depression, against panic, against defeatism; the battle for full employment, do not believe absurd charges that their government would keep one man at war for one minute longer than it is necessary to win a total, victory.

Draft Brains in Peacetime

"And they know that every right thinking American believes that his government will meet the terrific postwar employment problem in the spirit of fairness. Those who say otherwise are self-seeking. Those who say otherwise do not know the American people. You can not scare America this way."

In his blueprint for the future national health and a permanent peace."

Mr. Wallace urged the re-election of Senator Robert F. Wagner (D., N. Y.), father of the national labor relations act, whom he termed as one of the nation's great liberals.

He made no reference to Senator Harry S. Truman (D., Mo.), vice-presidential nominee.

Mr. Wallace was introduced by Orson Welles, of the radio and motion pictures. Other speakers included Sinclair Lewis, novelist,

[4]

STAGE SCREEN

Post September 17, 1944

FIEDLER AS SYMPHONY LEADER

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In view of his tremendous following, it is a bit surprising that Arthur Fiedler has had to wait so long for a chance to conduct the Boston Symphony Concerts proper. However, that opportunity has finally come. Symphony Hall's prospectus for the orchestra's 64th season adds Mr. Fiedler's name to those of Dimitri Mitropoulos, George Szell and Leonard Bernstein, all of which were announced last spring. With Dr. Koussevitzky enjoying his 21st season as regular conductor and with Richard Burgin again as his associate, there will be plenty of variety on the conducting end.

Mr. Fiedler, by the way, has conducted at one Symphony concert. Several years ago at a Tuesday matinee, when both Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin were indisposed, he took over at the eleventh hour and turned in a first-class job.

Some of the soloists were announced in March, some were not. Anyway, here is the list as it stands to date. For pianists we will have Robert Casadesus; Witold Malcuzynski, the puissant Pole who thundered through a Jordan Hall recital last winter; our old friend, Jesus Maria Sanroma; and the team of Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff. These last will introduce to Boston the Concerto of Martinu and offer a Mozart two-piano concerto, besides. The violinists will be Zino Francescatti, Jascha Heifetz and Ruth Posselt. The Viola Concerto of Bloch will bring that eminent violist, William Primrose; and the name of Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, completes the roster of assisting artists. There is nothing said about singers. As a rule, the Boston Symphony does not go in for vocalists. Their principal function is to provide the solo parts in choral works, and none of the latter have been specified as yet.

* * *

Arnold Schoenberg, co-parent with Igor Stravinsky or musical modernism, is a composer more heard about than heard, at least in these parts. From time to time new works have come from his pen and Boston has missed them. Now that particular silence is to be broken by the world premiere of a new set of Orchestral Variations. Other works to be heard for the first time anywhere are a Concerto for orchestra by the Hungarian Bela Bartok (his music, too, has been scarce around here), the Second Symphony of the young American, David Diamond, whose name will be new to Symphony Hall; an Overture, "From the American Folklore," by Boris Koutzen; a Suite by Arthur Lourie bearing the curious title, "The Feast During the Plague," and Martinu's Third Symphony.

Hindemith's Variations, "According to the Four Temperaments," discussed here last Sunday in connection with their recent performance by a group of Symphony men at New England Mutual Hall, will now be heard from the full body of strings, plus the piano, for which the score also calls. The reviewers unanimously voted it a piece both attractive and important. Other local novelties will be William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," and Morton Gould's Spirituals for String Choir and Orchestra.

At the opening pair of concerts, those of Friday afternoon, Oct. 6, and Saturday evening, Oct. 7, Dr. Kouseevitzky will perform Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in a performance dedicated "to the heroes of the United Nations." Beethoven's Seventh is also listed for early performance, along with the "Egmont" Overture. A Mozart novelty will be the "Little" G minor Symphony, and we will get his Divertimento for horns and strings. The Concertos of Paganini are seldom heard with orchestra. Mr. Francescatti will play the D major. A promised revival that will be a revival indeed is that of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Sym-

---

Last Chamber Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Sept. 4 "44"

The current series of chamber orchestra concerts by the Symphony "principals and ohers" comes to an end this evening. The programme, as heard at New England Mutual Hall last night, provided an interesting survey of music for strings, as old as Bach and as new as Hindemith in first performance. Richard Burgin conducted.

In point of fact the elder music on this well diversified list was not the simon-pure article. The Bach item was the Prelude from the Third Partita for the violin alone as arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli and many times heard at Symphony Hall and the other would-be ancient number was Dimitri Mitropoulos' transcription of the familiar Lament of Dido form Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," which the Greek conductor once set forth for us here in Boston.

The centre of interest and occupying middle place on the programme, the Hindemith novelty furnished something new in the matter of descriptive music, being a Theme and Variations "According to the Four Temperaments," for strings and piano. The pianist was Lucas Foss. Whether Mr. Hindemith's own temperament is predominantly melancholic, sanguine, phlegmatic, choleric, or a combination of all four, may have nothing to do with the case. Plenty of composers can write objectively. But as it seemed last evening, he hit off all the others much better than he did the first. The Russian Shostakovitch, whose Two Preludes for string orchestra, Opus 11, came directly afterwards, sounded in the first of these a melancholy note which made Hindemith's attempt hilarious by comparison. The other three characterizations, however, besides being musically engrossing, are not without a touch of sly humor. Neither very old nor yet up to date, the final number on the programme was Tchaikovsky's Serenade for strings, one of the most grateful of all compositions designed for that particular medium.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

SEP 2[illegible]

Orchestration Safe Symphony Reports

Sibelius' 'Origin Of Fire' Is Sent Here By Radio Photo

BOSTON (UP)—The only known copy of the orchestration of Jean Sibelius' "Origin of Fire" still in existence is safe in the United States, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials [illegible] a unique transatlantic transmission of the musical composition by radio photo.

Recently the venerable Finnish composer reported that the original orchestral manuscript of his early masterpiece, which had not been published, was destroyed during the Allied bombing of Leipzig, Germany, where his publishing firm was situated. He believed that the orchestration therefore was lost forever.

Today, however, Boston Symphony officials Sent Sibelius a reassuring cablegram, explaining that they have a copy of the original and recalling the unusual circumstances involved.

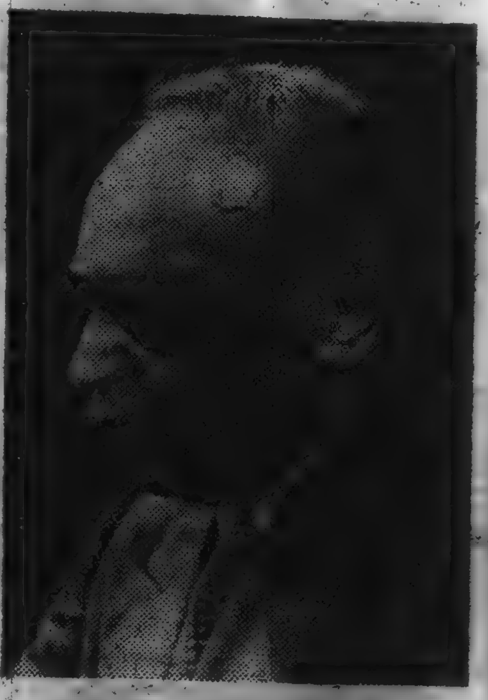
It seems that the Boston orchestra was to give the American premiere of "Origin of Fire" on New Year's eve in 1937 with the Helsinki University male chorus, but the orchestration which arrived here was incomplete.

Undaunted, symphony officials arranged with the publisher in Germany to send photographs of the missing parts by telephone from Leipzig to London via Berlin and thence by radio to Boston via New York. Toiling a day and a night with magnifying glasses, two expert copyists made legible versions of the micro photos and the concert went on as scheduled.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

SEP 23 1944

FDR Raised Cultural Level



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

From speech by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

One can well say that the twelve years under President Roosevelt have been marked by an extraordinary expansion and flowering of the arts in America.

This is significant: when art becomes an indispensable part of life it is a sign that the nation has reached a new age; the people have attained a deeper consciousness, a fuller confidence in their own power.

This we owe to the courage and wisdom of our President, who has saved the country at at time of distress, given it stability, raised the cultural standard and lifted the spirit of our people.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

SEP 16 1944

Bostonians Schedule Novelties.

The Boston Symphony will open its season in its home city on October 6, under the direction of its regular conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The novelties scheduled for their premieres in Boston during the current season include David Diamond's Second Symphony, scheduled for the orchestra's second week; Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra; Boris Koutzen's Overture, "From the American Folklore"; new Orchestral Variations by Schoenberg and Martinu's Third Symphony.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

SEP 18 1944

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony, will be one of the speakers—Bette Davis is another—Thursday night at Madison Sq. Garden, when Vice President Wallace opens his campaign in behalf of FDR's re-election. The rally is sponsored by the Independent Voters' Committee of the Arts and Sciences for Roosevelt.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

SEP 11 1944

Bette Davis, screen star, and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will join Vice President Wallace in Madison Square Garden Sept. 21 at the Rally for Roosevelt. Miss Davis, who will fly in from Hollywood, will address the meeting as spokesman for the motion-picture and theatrical persons on the Independent Voters Committee of the Arts and Sciences for Roosevelt. Koussevitsky will represent committee members in the field of music.

ADVERTISING AGE
CHICAGO, ILL.

SEP 18 1944

Sponsors Symphony Again

Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Company, Milwaukee, for the second successive year will sponsor Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and five guest conductors. Starting Oct. 7, the series of 30 concerts will be heard on the Blue Network 8:30-9:30 p. m., EWT, with the season extending through April 28, 1945. Agency is Compton Advertising, New York.

12

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

SEP 24 1944

ORCHESTRA TO OPEN SEASON

Boston Symphony Has 30 Concerts on Schedule

The "Boston Symphony Orchestra," premiere symphonic ensemble of the country, with its eminent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opens another season for WSLS and BLUE Network listeners on Saturday, October 7.

Thirty concerts comprise the schedule which the BLUE Network will present on Saturday nights from 8:30 to 9:30. Of these 24 will originate in Boston, five in New York and one in Milwaukee. The season extends through April 28, 1945.

To Have Five Guests

In addition to Dr. Koussevitzky, permanent director of the orchestra, five guest conductors are to be heard during the season. George Szell, Metropolitan Opera conductor, will occupy the podium for two programs and a similar number will be under the baton of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis symphony. Others who will appear include Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston symphony; Leonard Bernstein, young protege of Dr. Koussevitzky who served last season as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony society and Arthur Fiedler, popular leader of the annual "Pops" and Esplanade series of the Boston symphony. Each of these noted conductors will be in charge for one concert.

The list of soloists selected by Dr. Koussevitzky includes some of the best known musicians now before concert audiences. Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, outstanding duo-pianists will be heard on the third broadcast, and Zeno Francescatti, French violinist, will play the virtuosic Paganini Concerto in D Major at the fourth concert. Others to be heard with the orchestra during the 30-week season are William Primrose, violinist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist of the orchestra.

An outstanding advocate of the contemporary composer during his tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky will present several new works this season. Among them are symphonies by David Diamond and Aaron Copland, American composers; Bohuslav Martinu, Bohemian, and Darius Milhaud, eminent composer of France. Dr. Koussevitzky. also plans to offer an orchestral concerto by Bela Bartok. William Schuman's "Prayer" will be played probably on the first program.

Sixty-Fourth Season

The season will be the sixty-fourth for the Boston ensemble and the twenty-first for Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor. He was invited to head the orchestra after a distinguished career abroad, his podium debut having been made in Berlin in 1906. Although Dr. Koussevitzky recently observed his 70th birthday, he is still as energetic as when he took over the Boston Symphony in 1924. Born in Russia, he became a French citizen and is now a citizen of this country.

Approach of the Allied Armies to Bonn, near Cologne, is being watched carefully by Dr. Kousevitsky. When he launches the series this year, he has elected to present "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. If Bonn falls to the Allies before that date, as is now anticipated, the event will become a memorialization of the birth of Beethoven for it was in that city on December 16, 1770, that the great advocate of the freedom of mankind was born.

The symphony itself was performed privately for the first time in 1804 in Vienna, so this will be the 140th anniversary of its premiere. The public premiere occurred one year later at the Theatre and der Wien. It remained Beethoven's favorite among his symphonies, and although the composer originally dedicated it to Bonaparte, he later changed this.

Dr. Koussevitzky has dedicated the concert to the "heroes of the United Nations."

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor; Dr. Harlow Shapley, Harvard University astronomer; Jo Davidson, sculptor; Dr. Channing H. Tobias, Negro leader, and Helen Keller, as well as Bette Davis and Fredric March, film players.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

SEP 22 1944

Wallace Gives 'Liberal' Views

Says FDR's Experience Needed to Write Peace

NEW YORK, Sept. 22 (AP)—Vice-President Henry A. Wallace's first speech of the campaign today gave the nation a "liberal's" blueprint of the postwar future, predicated on the re-election of President Roosevelt as the man "who can better provide for permanent peace and full employment."

Speaking before 20,000 persons at Madison Square Garden Thursday night, Mr. Wallace declared the campaign issue was not that of indispensability, but which of two men—Franklin D. Roosevelt or Governor Thomas E. Dewey, the Republican presidential nominee—could:

Harding Betrayed Peace Ideals

"1. Better co-operate with Churchill, Stalin and the Generalissimo in writing a lasting, liberal, democratic peace which will best preserve American interests without being unfair to any nation, big or small?

"2. Best make sure that there are jobs for everybody and, therefore, good incomes for farmers, white collar workers, business and professional men?"

Asserting that Roosevelt has "the precious asset of long acquaintance" and "continuous, almost daily contact" with Churchill and Stalin, Mr. Wallace declared "even a reactionary will not lightly vote to throw such knowledge into the discard."

"Moreover," he went on, "all middle-aged Republicans in favor of peace will remember how President Harding betrayed their peace ideals in 1920 and 1921. In spite of everything Governor Dewey has said, the isolationists are still going to vote Republican in 1944.

"Just as Mr. Harding placated the isolationists in 1921 so Governor Dewey would be under the necessity of placating the isolationists in 1945. The Republican party in spite of the millions of its members who think clearly about international affairs, has been and will be the channel through which the isolationists, the cartelists and the international freebooters work best."

Looking ahead to the domestic postwar scene, Mr. Wallace said:

"The American people are grown up. They will not be frightened by those who say their government would abuse them. They

Mr. Wallace called for achievement of "the maximum ideal" of "jobs for all" and proposed that the best brains in the country be drafted by the President to "help the common man in his pursuit of the richer life."

"If a wartime President may draft men to fight," he asserted, "certainly a peacetime President may draft the brains of this country to work full time in the most exciting battle of modern time—the battle against depression, against panic, against defeatism; the battle for full employment, do not believe absurd charges that their government would keep one man at war for one minute longer than it is necessary to win a total victory.

Draft Brains in Peacetime

"And they know that every right thinking American believes that his government will meet the terrific postwar employment problem in the spirit of fairness. Those who say otherwise are self-seeking. Those who say otherwise do not know the American people. You can not scare America this way."

In his blueprint for the future national health and a permanent peace."

Mr. Wallace urged the re-election of Senator Robert F. Wagner (D., N. Y.), father of the national labor relations act, whom he termed as one of the nation's great liberals.

He made no reference to Senator Harry S. Truman (D., Mo.), vice-presidential nominee.

Mr. Wallace was introduced by Orson Welles, of the radio and motion pictures. Other speakers included Sinclair Lewis, novelist

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 24 1944

FINANCES AND THE COMPOSER

By MARK A. SCHUBART

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY remarked during a recent interview that one of the most serious problems facing young composers today is what he bluntly termed "money." Dr. Koussevitzky did not go into details on the subject, but, as an intensely practical musician and one who has watched the growth of so many young artists, he knows whereof he speaks. For financial problems are not only worrisome and inconvenient; they are a very serious obstacle to the creative growth of the artist.

Thus far meager financial returns have not stopped the production of new works for our concert halls, but they have brought into being a new species of artist—a man who cannot, no matter how brilliant, live by his art, but must turn to allied fields for his livelihood. Almost every composer in this country today is a part-time composer who teaches, writes criticism, does more or less hack work for movie studios and radio stations or spends much more time than he cares pursuing a career as an instrumentalist or conductor. In these latter endeavors he is, if competent, rewarded with a relatively lavish hand. But his creative output, his most important work, is regarded as a commercially worthless commodity.

Meet Mr. X

This is not a new problem; it has been in the making for a century or more. Nor is it an unfamiliar one to those who have concerned themselves with this country's artistic growth. But it is one which demands careful consideration. It should be examined and discussed, not in vague, grand-sounding generalities, but in concrete, explicit terms.

Let us, therefore, introduce ourselves to Mr. X, a gifted young American composer, who has just completed his first symphony after a year or more of incessant labor. Mr. X is naturally eager to show his score to the conductors of our major orchestras, but in order to do so he must first have several presentable copies of the work available. This means that unless he is willing and able to spend long weeks copying the score in ink on transparent paper, he must engage a professional copyist to do the work. Mr. X's symphony is 200 pages long, his copyist's fee is a modest $2 per page.

After the work is copied it must be blueprinted, which will run Mr. X about 9 cents per page or $18 per copy, plus $2 for binding. Since conductors often keep a score for as much as a year while pondering its merits, Mr. X must have at least six copies made.

His copyist's bill is $400, his blueprinting bill is $120—a total of $520 expended, before the work has so much as reached the conductor's hands and before he has any sort of assurance that it will be performed.

Mr. X's symphony, let us say, is a good one, and one of the conductors to whom he submits it accepts it for performance. Mr. X must then provide parts for each of the members of the orchestra and again he sends the score off to the copyist to have these parts extracted. This time his bill is $500, plus another $70 to have some of the parts, of which several copies are needed, blueprinted.

Total Cost

Adding another $20 to Mr. X's expenses for phone calls, mailing costs and transportation to the scene of the performance, Mr. X has thus spent $1,110 to bring his work to the concert stage. And these figures make no allowance for the composer's own time and skill.

What is his reward? Pleasant reviews, a small amount of réclame and perhaps $50 in cash. Of course he receives as much as $50 for the world première only. Subsequent performances will bring him only $25. This means that it will take a staggering total of forty-four performances before his immediate expenditures are repaid. How many works, even by relatively established musicians, ever reach their forty-fourth performance during the lifetime of the composer? It is also interesting at this point to note that if Mr. X had written, let us say, a piano concerto instead of a symphony, the soloist who played the work would probably receive $500 for his or her services. Yet the composer, who may have spent as much as two years creating the work, receives approximately one-tenth of that amount.

So much for the sad story of Mr. X.

The relatively successful composer, though he stands a better chance of earning a living, is in almost the same boat when it comes to works for the concert halls. There is probably not a single composer in the United States today who gets more than a few hundred dollars per year in royalties from these works, despite the fact that they represent the labors of a lifetime. Well-known composers are paid generously for successful ballets and motion-picture scores, but never for concert works—which usually include their most important and lasting efforts.

Royalties Are Divided

When a composer reaches a certain degree of prominence and when his works meet with success, he can very often find a publisher who relieves him of the financial burden of preparing his works for performance. Publisher and composer usually divide royalties evenly and though this delivers the composer from the crushing initial expense, he still cannot hope to earn more than a few dollars from his concert music.

The position of the publisher with respect to new works, however, is almost as precarious as that of the composer. A representative of one of our largest publishing firms told this writer that no music publisher in the country expects to as much as break even in publishing new concert works. One or two works will more than repay their publishing costs after long periods of time, but the contemporary music department as a whole is almost always in the red despite the fact that publishers have the equipment to advertise and promote a work. He cited the example of one symphony by a well-known American composer which had a spectacular success, won prizes and was widely publicized. Yet it was over two years before the work received enough performances to repay the publishers for the cost of preparing the work.

Dispute Over Fee

The publisher is thus forced to regard the publishing of new music as window dressing, or as a luxury to be indulged in for prestige and educational purposes, instead of as one of the most important functions his firm can perform.

Examples of injustices resulting from this situation are numerous, and many of them have their ludicrous aspects. One may be found in the case of one of the most distinguished composers in the country. A new, major orchestral work by this composer was to receive its world première on a commercially sponsored broadcast performance, and, in view of the importance of the occasion, his publisher asked a fee of $250 for the performance. Despite the fact that the concert had a budget which called for many thousands of dollars, and boasted the services of some of our most highly paid artists, the sponsors would not agree to the performance until the royalty was reduced from $250 to $200.

Finding a remedy for this situation is no easy task. Certainly the first step is to find some means of augmenting sympathy for, understanding of and interest in contemporary composers and their work, and thus create a genuine demand for their music. For it is only fair to assume that under ideal conditions a fine new work should earn for its creator as great a material reward as a fine performance earns for an outstanding interpreter. Meanwhile, it is an all too common cry these days that our country has not produced as many excellent new works as it should. Is it not, rather, a minor miracle that our composers have found time and energy, among their problems of earning a living, to produce any at all?

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS

Sept. 29, 1944

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Sept. 29, (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra suffered a sprained right leg yesterday when the automobile in which he was riding skidded and struck a pole. He declined treatment and continued to his Brookline, Mass., home. The driver of the car, Victor Sakharoff, 49, was unhurt, police said.

DEN, N. J.
COURIER

SEP 29 1944

KOUSSEVITZKY DISCS OFFERED BY VICTOR

Works of Boston Symphony Include Compositions of Famous Artists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its sixty-third season on Oct. 7, an event of more than passing interest to music lovers outside the Hub city familiar with the orchestra through its records and, more lately, its radio performances.

For Serge Koussevitzky it will be a double anniversary, as it marks his seventieth year and his twentieth as maestro of the orchestra. Under his regime, the Boston Symphony has been acclaimed one of the three top orchestras of the nation.

The maestro's friends pointed with pride to the fact that he has performed more than 150 works by American composers, 61 of them first performances. And for Victor, Dr. Koussevitzky has recorded much of the music for which he has pioneered in finding audiences.

Prokofieff's popular "Peter and the Wolf," and his "Lieutenant Kije" Suite, Ravel's "Bolero," Copland's "El Salon Mexico," Richard Strauss' "Thus Spoke Zarathrustra" and Roy Harris' Third Symphony, can be heard as Koussevitzky plays them on Red Seal discs.

The Boston archestra and its maestro have not ignored the symphonic staples. The majestic and much-admired Brahms Fourth, the popular Schubert Eighth ("Unfinished"), the best-selling Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet" with the Tchaikovsky Fourth and Sixth symphonies are in the Victor catalogue. So are the Beethoven Second, Fifth and Sixth symphonies, Mozart's Twenty-ninth, Thirty-fourth and Fortieth, a sonorous rendition of Mendelssohn's No. 4 ("Italian") and a sparkling Schuman First ("Spring") with shorter works on 12-inch records.

Before he took over the baton of the Boston in 1924, Koussevitsky commissioned Maurice Ravel to orchestrate Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," a performance of which is available in a Victor album.

He has pioneered in playing before European audiences for the first time new works by Falla, Honegger, Prokofieff, Scriabin, Stravinsky and Rachminoff. In this country, the long list of Americans whose work he has performed for the first time includes Roger Sessions, Frederick Converse, John Alden Carpenter, Edward Burlingame Hill, Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris, Louis Gruanberg, the serious George Gershwin ("Rhapsody No. 2"), Howard Hanson, Vladimir Dukelsky, William Schuman and David Diamond.

The Boston Symphony's first session with Victor, in 1917, was an historic occasion, since for the first time an orchestra of 100 pieces—conducted by the late Dr. Karl Muck—was transferred to records in performances of the Finale from the Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and the Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin." Up to this time, the maximum size of a recording orchestra had been 40 players.

Dr. Koussevitzky's first recordings with the orchestra, in 1928, made disc history, since to him fell the honor of making some of the first "orthophonic" records. These versions of the Johann Strauss "Vienna Blood" and "Voices of Spring" waltzes marked the beginning of a new era in high-fidelity recording.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Koussevitzky Hurt in Crash In Springfield

SPRINGFIELD — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 70, of Brookline, Boston Symphony Orchestra conuctor and summer resident of enox, suffered a sprained right g yesterday afternoon when the utomobile in which he was riding kidded on State Street hitting an ectric light pole.

Dr. Koussevitzky was able to ntinue his journey, however.

According to police, the car, riven by Victor Sakharoff, also Brookline, was going east on tate Street when it skidded on et pavement. The machine ck an electric light pole snapng the pole off at the ground. he heavy sedan was slightly damaged.

SO. NORWALK,
SENTINEL

SEP 26 1944

"ORIGIN OF FIRE" MUSIC SCORE, SAFE

Boston, Sept. 26. (UP) — The only known copy of the orchestration of Jean Sibelius' "Origin of Fire" still in existence is safe in the United States, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials disclosed today, thanks to a unique transatlantic transmission of the musical composition by radio photo.

Recently the venerable Finnish composer reported that the original orchestral manuscript of his early masterpiece, which had not been published, was destroyed during the Allied bombing of Leipzig, Germany, where his publishing firm was situated. He believed that the orchestration therefore was lost forever.

Today, however, Boston Symphony officials sent Sibelius a reassuring cablegram, explaining that they have a copy of the original and recalling the unusual circumstances involved.

It seems that the Boston Orchestra was to give the American premiere of "Origin of Fire" on New Year's Eve in 1937 with the Helsinki University Male Chorus, but the orchestration which arrived here was incomplete.

Undaunted, symphony officials arranged with the publisher in Germany to send photographs of the missing parts by telephone from Leipzig to London via Berlin and thence by radio to Boston via New York. Toiling a day and a night with magnifying glasses, two expert copyists made legible versions of the micro photos and the concert went on as scheduled.

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY SAFE

Only Known Copy of Composer's "Origin of Fire" Is in Boston

Boston, Sept. 25.—(UP)—The only known copy of the orchestration of Jean Sibelius's "Origin of Fire" still in existence is safe in the United States, Boston Symphony Orchestra officials disclosed today, thanks to a unique transatlantic transmission of the musical composition by radio photo.

Recently the venerable Finnish composer reported that the original orchestral manuscript of his early masterpiece, which had not been published, was destroyed during the Allied bombing of Leipzig, Germany, where his publishing firm was situated. He believed that the orchestration, therefore, was lost forever.

Today, however, Boston Symphony officials sent Sibelius a reassuring cablegram, explaining that they have a copy of the original.

Symphony Tickets Now in the Mail

Subscribers' tickets for the balance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday afternoon - Saturday evening series of concerts are now in the mail.

At the beginning of the season, tickets were sent out only for the first six concerts, for the reason that it was uncertain at that time whether the concerts would be held on the dates originally planned.

Now, presumably, that question has been decided, and the concerts will be given according to schedule.

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
UNION

OCT - 1 1944

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has programmed Beethoven's Eroica Symphony for the first broadcast of the fall series next Saturday at 5:30 P. M. over KFBK.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

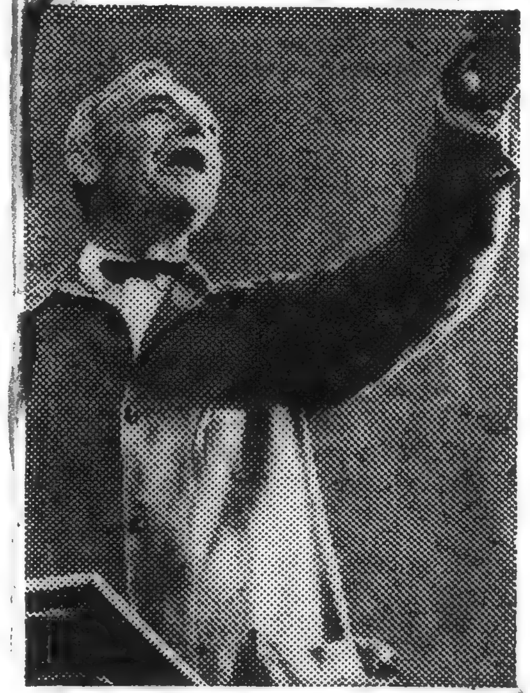
Would that more Symphony Concerts were as entertaining as that of yesterday afternoon. There was plenty of variety, nothing was stale, and two pieces were new, Schoenberg's Theme and Variations for Orchestra and Martinu's Concerto for two Pianos. In its own way each piece contributed its full quota of listening pleasure. The other numbers on this week's exemplary list are the Corelli-Pinelli Suite for strings; Mozart's E-flat major Concerto for two pianos, played, like the Martinu, by Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff; and the colorful Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan," which contains the popular "Flight of the Bumble-Bee" and much else besides.

Arnold Schoenberg, who reached his 70th birthday in his California home last month, has recanted by word and deed. Yesterday's Variations, performed for the first time anywhere, are not of the Schoenberg that few have understood and still fewer have really enjoyed. Here is relatively old-fashioned music, in a definite key and full of familiar sound-patterns, given fresh currency by the skill with which they are used. In the matter of style the listener is chiefly reminded of the later Strauss, after he had passed his period of storm and stress. There are faint suggestions of Mahler. This is new Schoenberg but it is the sort of thing he wrote at the beginning of his career, before he tried to revolutionize music with the 12-tone technique which he now appears to have forsaken

Even Martinu has turned his face toward the past to the extent of suggesting Debussy, chiefly in the middle movement and in some degree in the finale, of his exceedingly well-wrought and altogether grateful Concerto, expecially composed for the pair which yesterday brought it to such delightful performance, with the substantial help of Dr. Koussevitzky and an orchestra that was on its best behavior throughout the afternoon. Seldom, in recent years, has a new piece made so striking and satisfying a first impression.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT

OCT 1 1944



Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra returning Saturday, 8:30 p. m., Blue-WGH. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony is the program.

9-10

Koussetitzky on Conservatory Board

Following a meeting late last week of the trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music, Philip R. Allen, president of the board, issued the following statement:

"It is with great satisfaction that the New England Conservatory of Music announces Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's acceptance of its invitation to become a member of its board of trustees. We welcome to the board the distinguished conductor who has long demonstrated his vital interest in musical education, as evinced not only by his practical encouragement of the young composer, but also by the establishment of the Berkshire Music Center to which he has been so wholeheartedly devoted.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 1 - 1944

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony For 21st Year

BOSTON (UP) — Like thousands of musicians all over the United States, the 110 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are resining their bows and polishing their brasswork in anticipation of a new season.

For the Boston orchestra, second oldest in the nation, this will be the 64th year. For energetic, 70-year-old maestro, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, it will be the 21st.

On opening night Oct. 6, Boston's Back Bay patricians—and a generous complement of plebeians from a half-dozen ivy-covered campuses nearby—will flock to venerable Symphony Hall as they have every year since 1881 when the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson put money behind his idea that the city should have a good symphony orchestra.

Fame Is World-Wide

The fame of Maj. Higginson's $1,000,000 idea has not been limited to Boston, or even to the United States. Several years before the now-famous Philadelphia orchestra had gained a place in the symphonic sun, critics hailed the Boston Symphony as the finest organization of its kind in the world, and it has retained its high place by consistently brilliant performance for more than half a century.

To direct the reorganization after World War I, Maj. Higginsons board of Directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

To direct the reorganization, Maj. Higginson's board of Directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

Rehearses Men Hard

Today, the graying, fastidious conductor is at the zenith of his career. The resignations of Leopold Stokowski from conductorship of the Philadelphia orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanini from the New York Philharmonic - Symphony have long since left him without a serious rival among the regular symphony directors.

The secret of his success, Koussevitzky concedes, is his insistence on painstaking rehearsals. While fiddlers fidget and trombonists tremble, the tyrannical conductor shouts, sings, scolds and occasionally praises their work in loud but battered English. Clad in baggy trousers, soft white shirt and sleeveless sweater, he is complete master of every situation. No mistake is allowed to pass.

To the wartime Bostonian, who can take his music or leave it alone, Koussevitzky is nothing more than a tongue-twister. But to music lovers, he is without doubt America's number one symphony conductor.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

[illegible] Oct. 28, 1944

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert was both a string-player's holiday and an organist's horror. Not that this fourth programme, conducted by Richard Burgin, contained any organ music, as such, only Bach's great Toccata in C major, as orchestrated by Leo Weiner. In the case of these organ transcriptions, other listeners can respond to the majesty and power, the beauty of the music, enjoying the while the effectiveness of the orchestral presentation, that is, if it does not carry irreverence too far. Organists hear them all in a cold sweat; the music sounds wrong, and the whole procedure smacks of sacrilege.

As for the string-players, it was their special privilege to revel in the tone of the solo violinist, Zino Francescatti, making his first appearance in Symphony Hall, and to gape at his astounding technique, without being distressed over the slimsy character of his vehicle, Paganinni's D major Concerto. Heard often enough with piano accompaniment, this Concerto had been played piecemeal at the Symphony concerts, but this was the only occasion on which all the movements had been heard together. In their quasi-operatic fashion the tunes are pleasant enough, and if the structure of the work is shaky, its contents thin, it is still a show-piece among she show-pieces.

Mr. Francescatti, whose father and teacher was a pupil of Paganinni's pupil, Sivori, rose sensationally to the Concerto's every opportunity. In the matter of applause, the orchestra vied with the audience.

Mr. Burgin can generally be depended upon for an interesting programme, and this was no exception. It began with the Boston Symphony's first performance of Mozart's engaging little Overture to "The Impressario," it contained the first Symphony Hall performance of Hindemith's Theme and Variations according to the Four Temperaments, for strings with piano (the pianist was Lucas Foss, as in the case of the piece's premiere at Mutual Hall last summer) and concluded with Ravel's brilliant if rather hollow "Alborado del Gracioso." There is much that is pleasing and genuinely satisfying in Hindemith's music. It is not without characterizing power and even a sense of humor. But Hindemith's dissonant counterpoint comes too easily to him and his piece, superbly played by the Symphony strings and Mr. Foss, could stand a bit of cutting.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

An Hour for Lunch

Keeping up with the musical realm is a favorite topic among San Antonio "lunchers," and uppermost item this week is the opening of the new symphony season in Boston, under the baton of Maestro Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

Second oldest in the nation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with 110 members will tune up for the FIRST CONCERT Oct. 6 at the old Symphony Hall. This is the 64th year for the group, and it is Dr. Koussevitsky's 21st season. The orchestra is hailed all over the nation as one of the finest of its kind in the world, retaining its high place by CONSISTENTLY BRILLIANT performance for more than half a century. The resignation of STOKOWSKI from directorship of the Philadelphia Orchestra and of TOSCANINI from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have long since left the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony without a serious rival among the regular conductors.

Do you like to indulge in hobby-talk over your Blue Plate Special? Got a hobby in that extra room at home? Have a yen for linoleum blocks? Are you a "somewhat master" at leather tooling? Or is it ceramics, or woodwork, printing or metal work, sketching or drawing, airplane or clay modeling?

Well, what are you doing with that aptitude? If you could use a tip or two, and you have an hour or two, the ARTS AND SKILLS CORPS of the local Red Cross Chapter can use a talent or two! And the convalescent SERVICE MEN at Brooke General Hospital will benefit from the whole scheme between you and the Red Cross!

MRS. P. H. SWEARINGEN, corps chairman, and CAPT. EARL R. HAIGHT, who is in charge of occupational therapy at Brooke General, are searching for professional or non-professional artisans who can give their time for instruction in these skills. The purpose of this Red Cross unit is to provide for sick and disabled service men constructive and creative occupations during their recuperation period in military and naval hospitals, thus supplementing the existing Red Cross program designed to aid in their recovery.

The Red Cross FURNISHES ALL SUPPLIES and the convalescent keeps the finished articles. There are several different shops at the Fort Sam Hospital and instructors are GREATLY NEEDED to assist the men in the production of these articles. The recuperating service man has everything in the line of equipment and incentive—all YOU need to do is help the Red Cross to furnish VOLUNTEER instructors!

SUNDAY SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Tuesday afternoon Symphonies have gone and the Sunday Symphonies, the first of which occurred yesterday, have come to take their place. Since the former series, allied in the matter of programme to the Monday evening concerts, had not drawn too well of late, and since Symphony Hall was full yesterday, the change appears to have been for the better. In fact, one wonders that it was not made before.

These six Sunday matinees have plainly been planned with a view to wooing that section of the public which may have held aloof from Symphony concerts, but has been gradually conditioned for them by the Pops, the Esplanade series, the radio, the phonograph and the ubiquitous courses in music appreciation. The programmes, in other words, will favor the popular classics.

At least, that of yesterday was cut along those lines. It began with French music, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2, and it ended with the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. There are plenty of people who can remember when the Debussy and Ravel numbers were considered music for tonal epicures. However, time works many changes. The pleasure they provided yesterday's audience was patent.

Beyond any doubt Dr. Koussevitzky enjoys extending his field of influence. Yesterday, in spite of his recent indisposition, he was in fine fettle and the orchestra gave him valiant support. Once in a while sonorities were overdriven, but under the circumstances such exuberance could easily be excused. Debussy's "Faun," of course, was all shimmering beauty and when you consider what he does to the "Eroica," the conductor's Fifth was almost classic in conception—that is if we disregard a slight dragging of the Andante and the addition of extra wind instruments. Without these last the finale could hardly have been, as indeed it was, the climax of the afternoon.

---

6 "His Master's Voice" Record Review October, 1942

MASTERS OF THE ORCHESTRA

KOUSSEVITSKY AND STOKOWSKI

By F. Bonavia

KOUSSEVITSKY

PIANISTS AND VIOLINISTS who take to conducting are numerous. Violoncellists are somewhat rarer, though distinguished, counting in their ranks Toscanini and Barbirolli.

Conductors who began their musical experience as double-bass players are rarer still. We know only three of them —Bottesini, Hans Richter (who played the double-bass before the horn in the Conservatorium of Vienna) and Serge Koussevitsky. There is, however, no record of a double-bass player who, on taking up the baton, failed to make a success of it. That heavy, unwieldy instrument does seem to train the eye, hand and mind most efficiently for a conductor's duties. It has no use for the easy melodies that sweeten the labours of the aspiring pianist or violinist, as its chief purpose in the orchestra is to mark rhythm, which it does rather unwillingly, for it answers slowly to the performer's touch. It has no use whatever for frills and flourishes; it is only concerned with the essential elements of music. To achieve distinction as a soloist on the double-bass you need a deeper faith, firmer determination and greater vision than are necessary to the virtuosos of other instruments. Koussevitsky, before making his mark as a conductor, was famous as the only double-bass player whose performances rivalled the sensational successes of Bottesini in an earlier age.

Before he took up conducting Serge Koussevitsky was a double-bass player of great distinction. He is the poet of music, forever striving for perfection. He was born in the U.S.S.R. in 1874

Vision—the ability to form an ideal conception of a score—is as characteristic of his work as conductor as it was of his performances as soloist. He not only hears music with that inner ear nature has given to the true-born musician, but believes in it, in its power to move others as it moves him, to compel approval, a power to which we must respond as we respond to the call of friendship or affection. He is the poet of music, and like the poet he may realise that perfection is unattainable but that we must yet strive for it; that if it is impossible to exhaust all the riches of a musical masterpiece the attempt mus still be made, and that the labour wi be rewarded, even though we fall sho of finality.

October, 1942 "His Master's Voice" Record Review 7

Masters of the Orchestra—continued

where woodwind can be warm and exquisitely lyrical, and brass grave and mellow as it is when heard under the arches of a cathedral, an orchestra where imperfect intonation is unknown and discipline an instinct—an orchestra such as is not to be found on this planet. No wonder he is said to be something of a martinet at rehearsal. It is right for the artist to hitch his wagon to a star, but it must be a herculean labour to persuade others that the star is not beyond their reach.

Of the Koussevitsky performances we heard in London a few years ago one stands out particularly in my memory. The work in question was the Venusberg music in Wagner's Tannhäuser, a page every self-respecting musician knows by heart. It is capable of producing a certain effect even in an indifferent interpretation. That picture of a bacchanalian orgy goes to one's head to such an extent that cool criticism on the part of the uninitiated public is out of the question. It is also first rate in the use of orchestral colour and resource—a magnificent piece of writing perhaps a shade less brilliant but more determined and more skilfully planned than the pictures of similar themes by that specialist in fiery, glamorous effects, Hector Berlioz. Those familiar with the interpretation of this well-worn masterpiece by such expert Wagnerians as Hans Richter and Arthur Nikisch might have well thought that every facet of the work had been explored long ago and that no new beauties could be revealed. The Koussevitsky interpretation proved once more that the possibilities latent in great music are inexhaustible. Every note was fresh, every phrase had a new eloquence. So well-timed and so well balanced was every part that instruments lost their identity and became merged in the whole. One thought no longer of trumpets and violins or woodwind but of a homogeneous mass bent to one will and for one purpose. The climax was reached by stages so meticulously measured that the progress was not only natural but inevitable. The impression it produced could not be other than overwhelming.

Koussevitsky is said to be a romantic above all things. If the epithet means a thorough understanding of the romantic spirit it is rightly applied to him. If it implies imperfect grasp of classicism the description is unfair and untrue. Not only the classics but the neoclassics have found in Koussevitsky a most intelligent and thoughtful exponent. It was rank ingratitude on the part of Stravinsky to accuse Koussevitsky of having given a romantic turn to a composition of his that needed very different treatment, for Koussevitsky's readings of Stravinsky's music have been at least as lucid and intelligent as those of any other conductor. Fortunately Koussevitsky was able to retort by pointing out that as the parts of the work in question had only been at hand very shortly before the performance he and his associates could do no more than attend to the literal rendering of the notes.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

OCT 1 - 1944

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra each Saturday over WTJS from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m.

CHEMICAL METALLURGICAL ENGINEERING
NEW YORK, N. Y.

PROGRAM COMPLETED FOR CHICAGO CHEMICAL SHOW

WITH every foot of floor space available for commercial exhibits already engaged and with the program for the conference completed, the stage is set for the third biennial National Chemical Exposition and National Industrial Conference which will open at the Coliseum in Chicago on Nov. 15 and will continue through Nov. 19. The "Chemical Show" as it is more popularly called is sponsored by the Chicago Section of the American Chemical Society and will open on Nov. 15 with a joint luncheon at the Palmer House which will be attended by members of the Chicago Section and of the Chicago Association of Commerce. This will be featured by a discussion of "New Research Developments in Industry" with the speakers including Roy C. Newton, Swift & Co.; J. K. Roberts, Standard Oil Co. of Indiana; and Ernest H. Volwiler, Abbott Laboratories.

The Exposition is expected to draw attendance from a large cross-section of interests, including chemists, chemical engineers, bankers, educators, manufacturers whose process in some way involves chemistry, and men holding technical and management positions. Many members of the American Institute of Chemical Engineers plan to stop in Chicago while enroute to their own meeting which will open in St. Louis on Nov. 19.

As an added feature, those present in the Coliseum on the evening of Nov. 18 will have an opportunity of hearing a special broadcast sponsored by Allis-Chalmers of Milwaukee. It will consist of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and a dramatized salute to the chemical industry for the splendid job it has done in the war effort. The broadcast will be on the air from 8:30 to 9:30 Eastern War Time and will be carried throughout the nation by 189 stations of the Blue network.

The first session of the conference will be held on the evening of Nov. 15 when the speakers as previously announced will discuss metals. The sessions on Nov. 16 have been enlarged by the addition to the program of John F. Norton, The Upjohn Co., who will talk on "Research in the Production of Penicillin and Other Antibodies"; D. L. Tabern, Abbott Laboratories, whose subject will be "The Chemist Looks at Anesthesia"; and J. Collyer, president of B. F. Goodrich Co., who will discuss "The Chemical Engineer in the Synthetic Rubber Industry."

On the evening of Nov. 17, the November dinner meeting of the Chicago Section of ACS will be held and the principal speaker will be C. F. Kettering of the General Motors Corp.

[6]

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 1 - 1944

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony For 21st Year

BOSTON (UP)—Like thousands of musicians all over the United States, the 110 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are resining their bows and polishing their brasswork in anticipation of a new season.

For the Boston orchestra, second oldest in the nation, this will be the 64th year. For energetic, 70-year-old maestro, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, it will be the 21st.

On opening night Oct. 6, Boston's Back Bay patricians—and a generous complement of plebeians from a half-dozen ivy-covered campuses nearby—will flock to venerable Symphony Hall as they have every year since 1881 when the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson put money behind his idea that the city should have a good symphony orchestra.

Fame Is World-Wide

The fame of Maj. Higginson's $1,000,000 idea has not been limited to Boston, or even to the United States. Several years before the now-famous Philadelphia orchestra had gained a place in the symphonic sun, critics hailed the Boston Symphony as the finest organization of its kind in the world, and it has retained its high place by consistently brilliant performance for more than half a century.

To direct the reorganization after World War I, Maj. Higginsons board of Directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

To direct the reorganization, Maj. Higginson's board of Directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

Rehearses Men Hard

Today, the graying, fastidious conductor is at the zenith of his career. The resignations of Leopold Stokowski from conductorship of the Philadelphia orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanini from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have long since left him without a serious rival among the regular symphony directors.

The secret of his success, Koussevitzky concedes, is his insistence on painstaking rehearsals. While fiddlers fidget and trombonists tremble, the tyrannical conductor shouts, sings, scolds and occasionally praises their work in loud but battered English. Clad in baggy trousers, soft white shirt and sleeveless sweater, he is complete master of every situation. No mistake is allowed to pass.

To the wartime Bostonian, who can take his music or leave it alone, Koussevitzky is nothing more than a tongue-twister. But to music lovers, he is without doubt America's number one symphony conductor.

Post Oct 28 1944

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert was both a string-player's holiday and an organist's horror. Not that this fourth programme, conducted by Richard Burgin, contained any organ music, as such, only Bach's great Toccata in C major, as orchestrated by Leo Weiner. In the case of these organ transcriptions, other listeners can respond to the majesty and power, the beauty of the music, enjoying the while the effectiveness of the orchestral presentation, that is, if it does not carry irreverence too far. Organists hear them all in a cold sweat; the music sounds wrong, and the whole procedure smacks of sacrilege.

As for the string-players, it was their special privilege to revel in the tone of the solo violinist, Zino Francescatti, making his first appearance in Symphony Hall, and to gape at his astounding technique, without being distressed over the slimsy character of his vehicle, Paganinni's D major Concerto. Heard often enough with piano accompaniment, this Concerto had been played piecemeal at the Symphony concerts, but this was the only occasion on which all the movements had been heard together. In their quasi-operatic fashion the tunes are pleasant enough, and if the structure of the work is shaky, its contents thin, it is still a show-piece among she show-pieces.

Mr. Francescatti, whose father and teacher was a pupil of Paganinni's pupil, Sivori, rose sensationally to the Concerto's every opportunity. In the matter of applause, the orchestra vied with the audience.

Mr. Burgin can generally be depended upon for an interesting programme, and this was no exception. It began with the Boston Symphony's first performance of Mozart's engaging little Overture to "The Impressario," it contained the first Symphony Hall performance of Hindemith's Theme and Variations according to the Four Temperaments, for strings with piano (the pianist was Lucas Foss, as in the case of the piece's premiere at Mutual Hall last summer) and concluded with Ravel's brilliant if rather hollow "Alborado del Gracioso." There is much that is pleasing and genuinely satisfying in Hindemith's music. It is not without characterising power and even a sense of humor. But Hindemith's dissonant counterpoint comes too easily to him and his piece, superbly played by the Symphony strings and Mr. Foss, could stand a bit of cutting.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

OCT 1 1944

An Hour for Lunch

Keeping up with the musical realm is a favorite topic among San Antonio "lunchers," and uppermost item this week is the opening of the new symphony season in Boston, under the baton of Maestro Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

Second oldest in the nation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with 110 members will tune up for the FIRST CONCERT Oct. 6 at the old Symphony Hall. This is the 64th year for the group, and it is Dr. Koussevitsky's 21st season. The orchestra is hailed all over the nation as one of the finest of its kind in the world, retaining its high place by CONSISTENTLY BRILLIANT performance for more than half a century. The resignation of STOKOWSKI from directorship of the Philadelphia Orchestra and of TOSCANINI from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have long since left the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony without a serious rival among the regular conductors.

Do you like to indulge in hobby-talk over your Blue Plate Special? Got a hobby in that extra room at home? Have a yen for linoleum blocks? Are you a "somewhat master" at leather tooling? Or is it ceramics, or woodwork, printing or metal work, sketching or drawing, airplane or clay modeling?

Well, what are you doing with that aptitude? If you could use a tip or two, and you have an hour or two, the ARTS AND SKILLS CORPS of the local Red Cross Chapter can use a talent or two! And the convalescent SERVICE MEN at Brooke General Hospital will benefit from the whole scheme between you and the Red Cross!

MRS. P. H. SWEARINGEN, corps chairman, and CAPT. EARL R. HAIGHT, who is in charge of occupational therapy at Brooke General, are searching for professional or non-professional artisans who can give their time for instruction in these skills. The purpose of this Red Cross unit is to provide for sick and disabled service men constructive and creative occupations during their recuperation period in military and naval hospitals, thus supplementing the existing Red Cross program designed to aid in their recovery.

The Red Cross FURNISHES ALL SUPPLIES and the convalescent keeps the finished articles. There are several different shops at the Fort Sam Hospital and instructors are GREATLY NEEDED to assist the men in the production of these articles. The recuperating service man has everything in the line of equipment and incentive—all YOU need to do is help the Red Cross to furnish VOLUNTEER instructors!

SUNDAY SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Tuesday afternoon Symphonies have gone and the Sunday Symphonies, the first of which occurred yesterday, have come to take their place. Since the former series, allied in the matter of programme to the Monday evening concerts, had not drawn too well of late, and since Symphony Hall was full yesterday, the change appears to have been for the better. In fact, one wonders that it was not made before.

These six Sunday matinees have plainly been planned with a view to wooing that section of the public which may have held aloof from Symphony concerts, but has been gradually conditioned for them by the Pops, the Esplanade series, the radio, the phonograph and the ubiquitous courses in music appreciation. The programmes, in other words, will favor the popular classics.

At least, that of yesterday was cut along those lines. It began with French music, Berlios' "Roman Carnival" Overture; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2, and it ended with the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. There are [illegible] who can remember when the Debussy and Ravel numbers were considered music for tonal epicures. However, time works many changes. The pleasure they provided yesterday's audience was patent.

Beyond any doubt Dr. Koussevitzky enjoys extending his field of influence. Yesterday, in spite of his recent indisposition, he was in fine fettle and the orchestra gave him valiant support. Once in a while sonorities were overdriven, but under the circumstances such exuberance could easily be excused. Debussy's "Faun," of course, was all shimmering beauty and when you consider what he does to the "Eroica," the conductor's Fifth was almost classic in conception—that is if we disregard a slight dragging of the Andante and the addition of extra wind instruments. Without these last the finale could hardly have been, as indeed it was, the climax of the afternoon.

---

6 "His Master's Voice" Record Review October, 1942

MASTERS OF THE ORCHESTRA

KOUSSEVITSKY AND STOKOWSKI

By F. Bonavia

KOUSSEVITSKY

PIANISTS AND VIOLINISTS who take to conducting are numerous. Violoncellists are somewhat rarer, though distinguished, counting in their ranks Toscanini and Barbirolli.

Conductors who began their musical experience as double-bass players are rarer still. We know only three of them—Bottesini, Hans Richter (who played the double-bass before the horn in the Conservatorium of Vienna) and Serge Koussevitsky. There is, however, no record of a double-bass player who, on taking up the baton, failed to make a success of it. That heavy, unwieldy instrument does seem to train the eye, hand and mind most efficiently for a conductor's duties. It has no use for the easy melodies that sweeten the labours of the aspiring pianist or violinist, as its chief purpose in the orchestra is to mark rhythm, which it does rather unwillingly, for it answers slowly to the performer's touch. It has no use whatever for frills and flourishes; it is only concerned with the essential elements of music. To achieve distinction as a soloist on the double-bass you need a deeper faith, firmer determination and greater vision than are necessary to the virtuosos of other instruments. Koussevitsky, before making his mark as a conductor, was famous as the only double-bass player whose performances rivalled the sensational successes of Bottesini in an earlier age.

Before he took up conducting Serge Koussevitsky was a double-bass player of great distinction. He is the poet of music, forever striving for perfection. He was born in the U.S.S.R. in 1874

Vision—the ability to form an ideal conception of a score—is as characteristic of his work as conductor as it was of his performances as soloist. He not only hears music with that inner ear nature has given to the true-born musician, but believes in it, in its power to move others as it moves him, to compel approval, a power to which we must respond as we respond to the call of friendship or affection. He is the poet of music, and like the poet he may realise that perfection is unattainable but that we must yet strive for it; that if it is impossible to exhaust all the riches of a musical masterpiece the attempt mus still be made, and that the labour wi be rewarded, even though we fall shc of finality.

October, 1942 "His Master's Voice" Record Review 7

Masters of the Orchestra—continued

where woodwind can be warm and exquisitely lyrical, and brass grave and mellow as it is when heard under the arches of a cathedral, an orchestra where imperfect intonation is unknown and discipline an instinct—an orchestra such as is not to be found on this planet. No wonder he is said to be something of a martinet at rehearsal. It is right for the artist to hitch his wagon to a star, but it must be a herculean labour to persuade others that the star is not beyond their reach.

Of the Koussevitsky performances we heard in London a few years ago one stands out particularly in my memory. The work in question was the Venusberg music in Wagner's Tannhäuser, a page every self-respecting musician knows by heart. It is capable of producing a certain effect even in an indifferent interpretation. That picture of a bacchanalian orgy goes to one's head to such an extent that cool criticism on the part of the uninitiated public is out of the question. It is also first rate in the use of orchestral colour and resource—a magnificent piece of writing perhaps a shade less brilliant but more determined and more skilfully planned than the pictures of similar themes by that specialist in fiery, glamorous effects, Hector Berlioz. Those familiar with the interpretation of this well-worn masterpiece by such expert Wagnerians as Hans Richter and Arthur Nikisch might have well thought that every facet of the work had been explored long ago and that no new beauties could be revealed. The Koussevitsky interpretation proved once more that the possibilities latent in great music are inexhaustible. Every note was fresh, every phrase had a new eloquence. So well-timed and so well balanced was every part that instruments lost their identity and became merged in the whole. One thought no longer of trumpets and violins or woodwind but of a homogeneous mass bent to one will and for one purpose. The climax was reached by stages so meticulously measured that the progress was not only natural but inevitable. The impression it produced could not be other than overwhelming.

Koussevitsky is said to be a romantic above all things. If the epithet means a thorough understanding of the romantic spirit it is rightly applied to him. If it implies imperfect grasp of classicism the description is unfair and untrue. Not only the classics but the neo-classics have found in Koussevitsky a most intelligent and thoughtful exponent. It was rank ingratitude on the part of Stravinsky to accuse Koussevitsky of having given a romantic turn to a composition of his that needed very different treatment, for Koussevitsky's readings of Stravinsky's music have been at least as lucid and intelligent as those of any other conductor. Fortunately Koussevitsky was able to retort by pointing out that as the parts of the work in question had only been at hand very shortly before the performance he and his associates could do no more than attend to the literal rendering of the notes.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

OCT 1 - 1944

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra each Saturday over WTJS from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m.

CHEMICAL METALLURGICAL ENGINEERING
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT - - 1944

PROGRAM COMPLETED FOR CHICAGO CHEMICAL SHOW

WITH every foot of floor space available for commercial exhibits already engaged and with the program for the conference completed, the stage is set for the third biennial National Chemical Exposition and National Industrial Conference which will open at the Coliseum in Chicago on Nov. 15 and will continue through Nov. 19. The "Chemical Show" as it is more popularly called is sponsored by the Chicago Section of the American Chemical Society and will open on Nov. 15 with a joint luncheon at the Palmer House which will be attended by members of the Chicago Section and of the Chicago Association of Commerce. This will be featured by a discussion of "New Research Developments in Industry" with the speakers including Roy C. Newton, Swift & Co.; J. K. Roberts, Standard Oil Co. of Indiana; and Ernest H. Volwiler, Abbott Laboratories.

The Exposition is expected to draw attendance from a large cross-section of interests, including chemists, chemical engineers, bankers, educators, manufacturers whose process in some way involves chemistry, and men holding technical and management positions. Many members of the American Institute of Chemical Engineers plan to stop in Chicago while enroute to their own meeting which will open in St. Louis on Nov. 19.

As an added feature, those present in the Coliseum on the evening of Nov. 18 will have an opportunity of hearing a special broadcast sponsored by Allis-Chalmers of Milwaukee. It will consist of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and a dramatized salute to the chemical industry for the splendid job it has done in the war effort. The broadcast will be on the air from 8:30 to 9:30 Eastern War Time and will be carried throughout the nation by 189 stations of the Blue network.

The first session of the conference will be held on the evening of Nov. 15 when the speakers as previously announced will discuss metals. The sessions on Nov. 16 have been enlarged by the addition to the program of John F. Norton, The Upjohn Co., who will talk on "Research in the Production of Penicillin and Other Antibodies"; D. L. Tabern, Abbott Laboratories, whose subject will be "The Chemist Looks at Anesthesia"; and J. Collyer, president of B. F. Goodrich Co., who will discuss "The Chemical Engineer in the Synthetic Rubber Industry."

On the evening of Nov. 17, the November dinner meeting of the Chicago Section of ACS will be held and the principal speaker will be C. F. Kettering of the General Motors Corp.

22X

[6]

CLIPPING FROM
ADVERTISER, CINCINNATI, O.

OCT - - 1944

Boston Symphony over WBZ . . . Detroit Symphony over CKLW & Mutual

Top Sponsors for Boston, Detroit Symphonies

HERE are two groups representing "big business." Both have signed up as sponsors of fine musical programs which will enrich the lives of America's millions and even extend beyond our geographic borders. On Oct. 8th, the First Nat'l Bank of Boston presented over WBZ (and WBZA), Boston, the first of its scheduled 39 "Sunday at 4:30" half-hour concerts by a 45-piece orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler, noted as the conductor of Boston's famous "Pops" and Esplanade concerts. Above (L. to R.): Conductor Fiedler, Cy. S. Young, Gen'l Mgr. of WBZ-WBZA, Chas. E. Spencer, Jr., Pres. First National Bank, Boston, and Frank Hatch, V. P., BBD&O, the agency handling the account.

Harry D. Goodwin, Prom. Mgr. of WBZ-WBZA informs The ADVERTISER that broadcasts emanate from the Boston Opera House, before an audience of more than 3,000. Initial half hour of the program is broadcast over WBZ and WBZA; an additional half hour's entertainment is enjoyed by the audience, and broadcast via a WBZ-FM hookup.

Above, (L. to R.) Ray Hall, Sec'y of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Henry H. Reichhold, Chairman of the Board, Reichhold Chemicals, Inc., Detroit, and President of the Detroit Symphony, and P. Wesley Combs, V. P. of Grant Advertising, Inc., New York City, newly-appointed agency to handle the Reichhold Chemicals advertising program.

Agency Chief Combs informs The ADVERTISER that the presentation of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra with eminent American-born Karl Krueger conducting, over a coast-to-coast hookup of the Mutual Broadcasting System will be the "first step" in the Reichhold advertising program. Beginning with half-hour programs 8:30 to 9:00 Saturdays (premier concert Oct. 21st) originating from popular CKLW, Detroit, future plans anticipate full hour programs over the full Mutual Network. Also, through the Latin-American offices of Grant Advertising, arrangements are being made to extend broadcasting of the programs into Mexico, Central America and South America.

The initial broadcast will be picked up by Mutual's affiliated Mexican Network, Radio Mil; which will go on the air five minutes in advance of the concert, to announce the program and speak of the two great and friendly nations, both lovers of good music, about to enjoy it together. Meantime, in Detroit, the Mexican Ambassador, His Excellency General Francisco Castillo Najera, who is also a noted doctor, will be a colorful figure among the 5000 who will hear the broadcast in the Detroit concert hall, many having paid up to $25 for their seat.

Commercially striking is the fact that for the entire half hour programs, the commercial message will comprise just these 8 words, "Presented through the courtesy of Reichhold Chemicals, Incorporated."

ABOUT MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

IN the midst of the robombs another war was in progress in London, a musical war over the relative merits of Elgar and Delius. This latest flareup of an ancient controversy was precipitated by Sir Thomas Beecham. In his provocative volume of reminiscences, "A Mingled Chime," the conductor, who is a passionate Delian and no more than a lukewarm Elgarian, made some slighting remarks about the latter composer which were sharply resented by the Sunday Times' Ernest Newman, who exactly reverses Beecham's stand in the matter. Newman's counterattack on Delius brought protesting letters that in turn elicited from the eminent critic a well-documented defense of his position.

You might assume that this sort of thing could go on in any country with a solid musical past, but it couldn't very well happen here, and for two reasons. Our imported conductors have made a laudable effort to assist the native muse. They have, however, virtually confined these efforts to the works of living men.

We should remember in this connection that dead composers can't ring doorbells. Unfortunately, also, this present generation and certain of its sponsors have pretty well sold the public on the idea that the older composers weren't of much account anyway, the principal charge being that they were mere copiers of European models, something that in certain cases is demonstrably untrue.

This department has harped on this string before and its excuse for another strumming is the singular one that Dr. Koussevitzky, who is really more broad-minded than he sometimes makes himself appear, lately gave it a taste of what it has been asking for, in the shape of Arthur Foote's E major Suite for strings. Though there's signs of polite condescension in some quarters, it was quite evident that this skillful, genial music was greatly enjoyed.

Foote was what you would call a minor master; he was also the musical voice of New England conservatism. Nevertheless, he had fancy, impeccable taste, a well-integrated style, and he knew his business. He once confessed his regret that influence of Wagner had been denied him in his formative years. Clearly his musical gods were the three B's. In any case, his Suite, beautifully performed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony strings, sounds so fresh after nearly 40 years that it might well be expected to double its present life span.

It is possible that we lay too much stress on originality as such. The great polyphonists of the 16th century were certainly not "original." They submitted to rigid contrapuntal rules that are now observed only in the classroom. And yet their music, when we are privileged to hear it, is still very much alive.

Maybe the elder Americans will come back into the picture. Here is what Alfred Frankenstein, able critic of the San Francisco Chronicle, has to say in the current Musical Courier: "It may also be that some of the older generation of Americans were not so bad as they were painted! Not long ago, Pierre Monteux revived Henry F. Gilbert's 'Dance in Place Congo,' which holds up extremely well, and at the moment of writing, Victor releases a highly respectable Suite for Strings, composed by Arthur Foote in 1907. Some music of Charles T. Griffes also retains freshness. Prophesy is not the business of the present article, but it is, nevertheless, predicted in this place that one discovery of the future will be that the United States has had a much more creative musical past than is commonly admitted at the present time. Perhaps we shall see new beauties in the work of the pioneers and esteem them as period pieces at least." A few of them, it might be added, are a good deal more than that.

* * *

Next Sunday evening, the San Carlo Company opens an eight-day engagement at the Opera House with Verdi's "Aida." In the afternoon at Jordan Hall, Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin will play three of Beethoven's Sonatas for violin and piano: the "Kreutzer," Opus 30 and Opus 96.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

OCT 1 1944

THE ARTS IN POLITICS

Music was represented by Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who takes a bow after his speech. Sponsor of the rally was the Independent Voters Committee of Arts and Sciences for Roosevelt.

(Max Peter Haas Photo)

Herald Oct 6.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Youth Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Wheeler Beckett conducting, gave the first program of its seventh season of Youth Concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Leo Litwin, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to Die Meistersinger	Wagner
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 in A major	Enesco
Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun	Debussy
The Open Road	Beckett
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in A minor	Schumann

My nephew Fezzy tells me that yesterday's first Youth Concert of the season was okay. Not enough noise and banging around on the timpani to make it really sensational, he said, but okay. Everybody played together, and Mr. Beckett explained everything and seemed to be making the right motions at the right time, he added, and it was okay.

"Okay," I said. "Tell me more."

"Well, that's all there was to it," he said.

"How did you like the first one?" I asked.

"Good stuff," he said. "Bright and lively."

"How about the 'Afternoon of a Faun?' "

"That I don't get," he said, "but I guess it's okay."

"How about the soloist?"

"Well, it took the music a long time to get going," he said, "but everybody had to work hard at the end, and I liked it fine."

"Did the others?"

"Wow," he said, "I'll say they did. They hollered and clapped and got autographs and trompled all over everybody. It was great, and there were paper airpl———"

"Okay," I said. I know, but space is hard to get these days, and—"

"All right," he said. "Just tell them it was okay."

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

OCT 1 - 1944

Koussevitzky, 70, at Top of Career For Boston Symphony's New Season

Boston—(UP)—Like thousands of musicians all over the United States, the 110 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are resining ~~their bows~~ and polishing their brasswork in anticipation of a new season.

For the Boston Orchestra, second oldest in the nation, this will be the 64th year. For energetic, 70-year-old maestro, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, it will be the 21st.

On opening night Oct. 6, Boston's Back Bay patricians—and a generous complement of plebeians from a half-dozen ivy-covered campuses nearby—will flock to venerable Symphony Hall as they have every year since 1881 when the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson put money behind his idea that the city should have a good symphony orchestra.

The fame of Maj. Higginson's one-million-dollar idea has not been limited to Boston, or even to the United States. Several years before the now-famous Philadelphia orchestra had gained a place in the symphonic sun, critics hailed the Boston Symphony as the finest organization of its kind in the world, and it has retained its high place by consistently brilliant performance for more than half a century.

Only once in the orchestra's distinguished history was it forced to relinquish its position among the leaders, and that was when its German-born conductor, Karl Muck, was charged unjustly with espionage and ousted during World War I.

During the war, too, many of the orchestra's most competent performers were deported as "enemy aliens," and shortly afterward a strike so depleted the ranks that top-to-bottom reorganization was seen as the only remedy.

To direct the reorganization, Maj. Higginson's board of directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

Today, the graying, fastidious conductor is at the zenith of his career. The resignations of Leopold Stokowski from conductorship of the Philadelphia orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanini from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have long since left him without a serious rival among the regular symphony directors.

The secret of his success, Koussevitzky concedes, is his insistence on painstaking rehearsals. While fiddlers fidget and trombonists tremble, the tyrannical conductor shouts, sings, scolds and occasionally praises their work in loud but battered English. Clad in baggy trousers, soft white shirt and sleeveless sweater, he is complete master of every situation. No mistake is allowed to pass.

"No, no, no," he shouts. "It is da, da, dadada, da! Dat's it you must zing! You must blay the nuts! Vonderful, vanderful!"

To the wartime Bostonian, who can take his music or leave it alone, Koussevitzky is nothing more than a tongue-twister. But to music lovers, he is without doubt America's number one symphony conductor

CLIPPING FROM
ADVERTISER, CINCINNATI, O.
OCT - - 1944

Boston Symphony over WBZ . . . Detroit Symphony over CKLW & Mutual

Top Sponsors for Boston, Detroit Symphonies

HERE are two groups representing "big business." Both have signed up as sponsors of fine musical programs which will enrich the lives of America's millions and even extend beyond our geographic borders. On Oct. 8th, the First Nat'l Bank of Boston presented over WBZ (and WBZA), Boston, the first of its scheduled 39 "Sunday at 4:30" half-hour concerts by a 45-piece orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler, noted as the conductor of Boston's famous "Pops" and Esplanade concerts. Above (L. to R.): Conductor Fiedler, Cy. S. Young, Gen'l Mgr. of WBZ-WBZA, Chas. E. Spencer, Jr., Pres. First National Bank, Boston, and Frank Hatch, V. P., BBD&O, the agency handling the account.

Harry D. Goodwin, Prom. Mgr. of WBZ-WBZA informs The ADVERTISER that broadcasts emanate from the Boston Opera House, before an audience of more than 3,000. Initial half hour of the program is broadcast over WBZ and WBZA; an additional half hour's entertainment is enjoyed by the audience, and broadcast via a WBZ-FM hookup.

Above, (L. to R.) Ray Hall, Sec'y of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Henry H. Reichhold, Chairman of the Board, Reichhold Chemicals, Inc., Detroit, and President of the Detroit Symphony, and P. Wesley Combs, V. P. of Grant Advertising, Inc., New York City, newly-appointed agency to handle the Reichhold Chemicals advertising program.

Agency Chief Combs informs The ADVERTISER that the presentation of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra with eminent American-born Karl Krueger conducting, over a coast-to-coast hookup of the Mutual Broadcasting System will be the "first step" in the Reichhold advertising program. Beginning with half-hour programs 8:30 to 9:00 Saturdays (premier concert Oct. 21st) originating from popular CKLW, Detroit, future plans anticipate full hour programs over the full Mutual Network. Also, through the Latin-American offices of Grant Advertising, arrangements are being made to extend broadcasting of the programs into Mexico, Central America and South America.

The initial broadcast will be picked up by Mutual's affiliated Mexican Network, Radio Mil; which will go on the air five minutes in advance of the concert, to announce the program and speak of the two great and friendly nations, both lovers of good music, about to enjoy it together. Meantime, in Detroit, the Mexican Ambassador, His Excellency General Francisco Castillo Najera, who is also a noted doctor, will be a colorful figure among the 5000 who will hear the broadcast in the Detroit concert hall, many having paid up to $25 for their seat.

Commercially striking is the fact that for the entire half hour programs, the commercial message will comprise just these 8 words, "Presented through the courtesy of Reichhold Chemicals, Incorporated."

ABOUT MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

IN the midst of the robombs another war was in progress in London, a musical war over the relative merits of Elgar and Delius. This latest flareup of an ancient controversy was precipitated by Sir Thomas Beecham. In his provocative volume of reminiscences, "A Mingled Chime," the conductor, who is a passionate Delian and no more than a lukewarm Elgarian, made some slighting remarks about the latter composer which were sharply resented by the Sunday Times' Ernest Newman, who exactly reverses Beecham's stand in the matter. Newman's counterattack on Delius brought protesting letters that in turn elicited from the eminent critic a well-documented defense of his position.

You might assume that this sort of thing could go on in any country with a solid musical past, but it couldn't very well happen here, and for two reasons. Our imported conductors have made a laudable effort to assist the native muse. They have, however, virtually confined these efforts to the works of living men.

We should remember in this connection that dead composers can't ring doorbells. Unfortunately, also, this present generation and certain of its sponsors have pretty well sold the public on the idea that the older composers weren't of much account anyway, the principal charge being that they were mere copiers of European models, something that in certain cases is demonstrably untrue.

This department has harped on this string before and its excuse for another strumming is the singular one that Dr. Koussevitzky, who is really more broad-minded than he sometimes makes himself appear, lately gave it a taste of what it has been asking for, in the shape of Arthur Foote's E major Suite for strings. Though there's signs of polite condescension in some quarters, it was quite evident that this skillful, genial music was greatly enjoyed.

Foote was what you would call a minor master; he was also the musical voice of New England conservatism. Nevertheless, he had fancy, impeccable taste, a well-integrated style, and he knew his business. He once confessed his regret that influence of Wagner had been denied him in his formative years. Clearly his musical gods were the three B's. In any case, his Suite, beautifully performed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony strings, sounds so fresh after nearly 40 years that it might well be expected to double its present life span.

It is possible that we lay too much stress on originality as such. The great polyphonists of the 16th century were certainly not "original." They submitted to rigid contrapuntal rules that are now observed only in the classroom. And yet their music, when we are privileged to hear it, is still very much alive.

Maybe the elder Americans will come back into the picture. Here is what Alfred Frankenstein, able critic of the San Francisco Chronicle, has to say in the current Musical Courier: "It may also be that some of the older generation of Americans were not so bad as they were painted! Not long ago, Pierre Monteux revived Henry F. Gilbert's 'Dance in Place Congo,' which holds up extremely well, and at the moment of writing, Victor releases a highly respectable Suite for Strings, composed by Arthur Foote in 1907. Some music of Charles T. Griffes also retains freshness. Prophesy is not the business of the present article, but it is, nevertheless, predicted in this place that one discovery of the future will be that the United States has had a much more creative musical past than is commonly admitted at the present time. Perhaps we shall see new beauties in the work of the pioneers and esteem them as period pieces at least." A few of them, it might be added, are a good deal more than that.

* * *

Next Sunday evening, the San Carlo Company opens an eight-day engagement at the Opera House with Verdi's "Aida." In the afternoon at Jordan Hall, Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin will play three of Beethoven's Sonatas for violin and piano: the "Kreutzer," Opus 30 and Opus 96.

THE ARTS IN POLITICS

Music was represented by Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who takes a bow after his speech. Sponsor of the rally was the Independent Voters Committee of Arts and Sciences for Roosevelt.
(Max Peter Haas Photo)

---

7 Herald

MUSIC

Oct 6.

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Youth Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Wheeler Beckett conducting, gave the first program of its seventh season of Youth Concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Leo Litwin, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to Die Meistersinger	Wagner
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 in A major	Enesco
Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun	Debussy
The Open Road	Beckett
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in A minor	Schumann

My nephew Fezzy tells me that yesterday's first Youth Concert of the season was okay. Not enough noise and banging around on the timpani to make it really sensational, he said, but okay. Everybody played together, and Mr. Beckett explained everything and seemed to be making the right motions at the right time, he added, and it was okay.

"Okay," I said. "Tell me more."

"Well, that's all there was to it," he said.

"How did you like the first one?" I asked.

"Good stuff," he said. "Bright and lively."

"How about the 'Afternoon of a Faun?'"

"That I don't get," he said, "but I guess it's okay."

"How about the soloist?"

"Well, it took the music a long time to get going," he said, "but everybody had to work hard at the end, and I liked it fine."

"Did the others?"

"Wow," he said, "I'll say they did. They hollered and clapped and got autographs and trompled all over everybody. It was great, and there were paper airpl——"

"Okay," I said. I know, but space is hard to get these days, and—"

"All right," he said. "Just tell them it was okay."

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM
OCT 1 - 1944

Koussevitzky, 70, at Top of Career For Boston Symphony's New Season

Boston—(UP)—Like thousands of musicians all over the United States, the 110 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are resining ~~their bows~~ and polishing their brasswork in anticipation of a new season.

For the Boston Orchestra, second oldest in the nation, this will be the 64th year. For energetic, 70-year-old maestro, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, it will be the 21st.

On opening night Oct. 6, Boston's Back Bay patricians—and a generous complement of plebeians from a half-dozen ivy-covered campuses nearby—will flock to venerable Symphony Hall as they have every year since 1881 when the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson put money behind his idea that the city should have a good symphony orchestra.

The fame of Maj. Higginson's one-million-dollar idea has not been limited to Boston, or even to the United States. Several years before the now-famous Philadelphia orchestra had gained a place in the symphonic sun, critics hailed the Boston Symphony as the finest organization of its kind in the world, and it has retained its high place by consistently brilliant performance for more than half a century.

Only once in the orchestra's distinguished history was it forced to relinquish its position among the leaders, and that was when its [illegible] Karl Muck, was charged unjustly with espionage and ousted during World War I.

During the war, too, many of the orchestra's most competent performers were deported as "enemy aliens," and shortly afterward a strike so depleted the ranks that top-to-bottom reorganization was seen as the only remedy.

To direct the reorganization, Maj. Higginson's board of directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

Today, the graying, fastidious conductor is at the zenith of his career. The resignations of Leopold Stokowski from conductorship of the Philadelphia orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanini from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have long since left him without a serious rival among the regular symphony directors.

The secret of his success, Koussevitzky concedes, is his insistence on painstaking rehearsals. While fiddlers fidget and trombonists tremble, the tyrannical conductor shouts, sings, scolds and occasionally praises their work in loud but battered English. Clad in baggy trousers, soft white shirt and sleeveless sweater, he is com[illegible] master of every situation. No mistake is allowed to pass.

"No, no, no," he shouts. "It is da, da, dadada, da! Dat's it you must zing! You must blay the nuts! Vonderful, vanderful!"

To the wartime Bostonian, who can take his music or leave it alone, Koussevitzky is nothing more than a tongue-twister. But to music lovers, he is without doubt America's number one symphony conductor.

SATURDAY

on the Famous
Boston Symphony Program

On the air every Saturday night—the world's finest orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky

ALLIS-CHALMERS

Salutes the ELECTRIC

LIGHT AND POWER

INDUSTRY

...Hear this Tribute to the Men and Women who've helped to make

BOSTON

one of America's Great War Production Centers

EVERY LOCAL CITIZEN shares in this salute. For this city is one of the greatest producers and users of power in the U. S. A. An unfailing supply of electricity has helped make possible this area's outstanding war production achievements. Listen and be proud as Allis-Chalmers salutes your friends and neighbors in this vital industry.

This program is one of a series of Saturday night Boston Symphony Concerts sponsored by Allis-Chalmers and dedicated to the men and women of U. S. Science and Industry. We believe "the world's finest music played by the world's finest orchestra" is a fitting choice for a program dedicated to those who have contributed so much to American Good Living . . . are doing so much to protect it!

WHDH – 8:30 P.M.

ALLIS-CHALMERS

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 2 1944

Music

A Growing Public For Symphonic Music

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

AT A RECENT gathering of music critics the extraordinary growth of popular interest in symphonic music was the subject of remark. The absorption of the masses in solid orchestral programs was unlike anything that had happened before in the history of the arts. In seeking causes one ventured that radio had been a dominant factor, and another was of the opinion that the spread of phonograph records was an important contributing cause.

"How about the rise of the glamorized conductor?"

"Yes," said the Bostonian, "that, of course, began in Philadelphia."

"With Stokowski? I'm not so sure it didn't start in Boston —"

"Meaning Nikisch, of course."

Somebody wanted to go as far back as Jullien, the French conductor who cut a swathe across the American scene back in the 1850's. He usually conducted wearing gloves of pink kid, flourished a jewelled baton with such ardor that a crimson and gilt chair had to be placed behind him at every concert for his relaxation between numbers.

* * *

THERE is no doubt, though, that in our day Leopold Stokowski is responsible for much of the reclamé, not to say charlatanism, that has attached to the symphonic podium. But it must be conceded immediately that no man has made finer music, and there certainly never was a greater builder of orchestras.

Arthur Bronson, writing in the current American Mercury, says of Stokowski that "The last decade alone reveals the restless energy of the man and the artist — his startling break with the Philadelphia Orchestra after twenty-nine years, during which he built it from a second-rank ensemble into one of the world's greatest musical organizations; the remarkable creation of two superb All-American Youth Orchestras, and their tours of North and South America; his participation in the provocative music-film Fantasia, and his co-conductorship with Arturo Toscanini of the NBC Symphony Orchestra. And on the more personal side, his sensational, sentimental journey through Europe with Greta Garbo, and his own debut as an actor in the movies. Stokowski is still bustling about with boyish energy. His present concern, undertaken in a burst of philanthropy, is the building (without compensation) of a precedent-making civic orchestra for New York City."

* * *

STOKOWSKI is credited by Mr. Bronson with having done much for the American composer, but by and large he has done more for the modern European composer. He has found it more controversial, hence better box office to exploit a Wozzeck by Alban Berg or a new concerto by Schoenberg, works of Shostakovich, Chavez or Scriabin rather than the strictly home-grown product.

With respect to the American composer, Serge Koussevitzky has left all his colleagues far behind. Aaron Copland, himself a beneficiary of Koussevitzky's interest in native composition, pays tribute to the Boston leader in The Musical Quarterly, pointing out that during the twenty years from 1924 to 1944 he "has given a first hearing to sixty-six American compositions." The list includes Gershwin, Piston, Josten, Jacobi, Gruenberg, Griffes, Sowerby, Berezowsky, Whithorne, Harris, Dukelsy, Barber and ever so many others.

"Unlike certain of his colleagues, Dr. Koussevitzky does not lose all interest in the American composer once he has stepped out of the concert hall," writes Mr. Copeland. "Composers are his daily preoccupation. In recent years he has devoted more and more time to consideration of their economic set-up. He has been profoundly disturbed at the realization that the great majority of our composers devote the major part of their time, not to writing music,

---

Monitor "6"

New Series Opened By Symphony

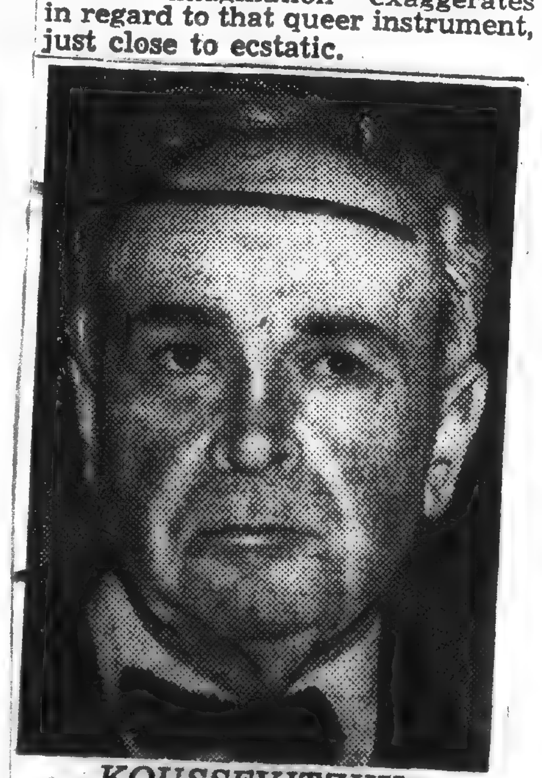
By Winthrop P. Tryon

To goad the subscribers of the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, to greater efforts of listening and appreciation, along comes a Sunday matinee public taking delight in the stock numbers of the repertory and doing things after the manner of the Fridays and Saturdays of only a few seasons ago. The main-season veterans have got to set themselves high tasks in hearing and evaluating new music and perchance in reviewing neglected old music, in order to keep out of the way of the oncoming recruits. Yesterday afternoon the new Sunday series of six opened most auspiciously with a houseful of zealots for the orchestral cause and with the complete Boston Symphony personnel on the platform keen to do its best.

Time was, and not so long ago either, when the program presented would have been top-gauge Bostonian; and even by the advanced standards of today it would by no means be ranked as either "light" or "popular." It consisted of items that the players are perfectly familiar with and that the conductor could pick up and interpret in an easy, improvisational way. Nevertheless, right down at the truth of the matter they were the kind of pieces that require in performance and direction all the powers any artists tackling them possess.

The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" Overture, op. 9, started the occasion off; and if Berlioz is no Schönberg at varying a theme, is he not, we may ask ourselves, the man who started the modern orchestra going on its career of rich and varied tone color and of contrasted sonorities? There followed Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" Prelude, which has served as model for the day-dreaming musings of every composer of the past 25 years. Then the Ravel "Daphnis et Chloé" Ballet Suite, itself a Debussyan echo, though not an outright imitation.

To end with, befell the Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor, which can never be so well rendered but that the ideal study of it always still lies ahead. Some little thing, all the while, can be recalled from one presentation or another which seems to belong to the then and there of it, and which never seems to return, no matter how ardently longed for. This time, perhaps, it was the resonant, vibrant plucking of the strings of the basses in the accompaniment, if that word should be proper, of the long, singing melody of the slow movement in its latter returns; or it may have been the quality of sound of the bassoons whenever they became prominent in that movement. The day seemed good for the bassoon; or else Dr. Koussevitzky, by particular encouragement of his baton or his expressive left hand, called forth something especially lyrical, and unless imagination exaggerates in regard to that queer instrument, just close to ecstatic.



KOUSSEVITZKY

TONIGHT—BLU, 8:30, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky program in salute to United Nations; MBS, 10, Results Inc., detective drama with Lloyd Nolan and Claire Trevor

[8]

"MY PEOPLE TO MY HEART"

Globe Oct 6 -

In a time of ordeal we set ourselves a mark. One point or another must perhaps be yielded, but so long as we hold to the mark which we ourselves have set we are unbeaten, in fact not even budged. Stalingrad was such a mark in this war, as great a moral victory for the Russians as it was a military. Marks like these may be publicly proclaimed or they may be personally felt. In either case, not to have yielded them is a constant renewal of inner strength.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is such a bastion. In these five years of ordeal by battle its pre-eminence instead of having been impaired has been enhanced: a threatened disaster has become a brilliant victory, "the flag is still there." Not a jot has been abated in the distinction of its programs, in the splendor of its tone, in the virtuosity of its individual players, or in the grandeur of its performances. For every inch it was forced to yield of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals at Tanglewood (which, in any case, a way was found this past Summer to resume by the artistically effective Mozart Festival in the smaller hall), it regained the ground by prodigally generous concerts for the armed forces, both in their own camps and in Symphony Hall itself, as well as by the huge attendance at the Esplanade Concerts in Boston during July and August, which, though free to the people, paid for themselves this Summer, mainly by voluntary contributions in small sums. "I, who have stood in the streets," says Major Barbara, "and taken my people to my heart, and talked of the holiest and greatest things with them. . . ." The Boston Symphony Orchestra has done just that, and its openness of heart is returned by the people.

On the last page of a Boston newspaper within the past week appeared an odd portent. It was an advertisement printed in color and filled quite a large space. The reader is placed in the position of looking over the right shoulder of a man in evening dress who flourishes a stick in his left hand. Beyond him in concentric semicircles are men with violins clutched between chin and collarbone and more men with violoncellos gripped between their knees. In front of the conductor on his desk one sees the open pages of a full orchestral score, its black dots strewn thickly on a dozen staves, and the orchestra is playing full blast. Guess what esoteric, what highbrow product this picture was advertising? Ale and beer.

There would be no point in telling people that your product is as good as a symphony concert unless the orchestral symphony had already been accepted in this country as a great popular art. It also happens that the orchestral symphony is the highest artistic achievement of modern times, as the cathedral was in the Middle Ages. Historically-minded listeners at Symphony Hall are often visited by the analogy of Athenian audiences in the Theatre of Dionysos toward the close of the Fifth Century, B. C., the darkest period of the Second Peloponnesian War, holding nevertheless firm to their cultural mark by a first performance (posthumous) of the "Oedipus Coloneus" of Sophocles in the year 402—when the black night of Hellas was illumined by the mellow glory of the Attic stage, by the singer of sweet Colonus and its child.

Russians in our lifetimes have earned a great name for holding to their mark. In its sixty-fourth year the Boston Symphony Orchestra is led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and in the twenty-first year of his conductorship, which is the fifth of a world war, he, too, holds this mighty instrument to its highest mark.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
JOURNAL
OCT 1 - 1944

Koussevitzky Again to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra

By JOSEPH NOLAN
United Press Staff Correspondent

Boston (UP).—Like thousands of musicians all over the United States, the 110 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra are resining their bows and polishing their brasswork in anticipation of a new season.

For the Boston orchestra, second oldest in the nation, this will be the 64th year. For energetic, 70-year-old maestro, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, it will be the 21st.

On opening night Oct. 6, Boston's Back Bay patricians—and a generous complement of plebeians from a half-dozen ivy-covered campuses nearby—will flock to venerable Symphony Hall as they have every year since 1881 when the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson put money behind his idea that the city should have a good symphony orchestra.

Fame Is World-Wide

The fame of Maj. Higginson's $1,000,000 idea has not been limited to Boston, or even to the United States. Several years before the now-famous Philadelphia orchestra had gained a place in the symphonic sun, critics hailed the Boston Symphony as the finest organization of its kind in the world, and it has retained its high place by consistently brilliant performance for more than half a century.

Only once in the orchestra's distinguished history was it forced to relinquish its position among the leaders, and that was when its German-born conductor, Karl Muck, was charged unjustly with espionage and ousted during World War I.

During the war, too, many of the orchestra's most competent performers were deported as "enemy aliens," and shortly afterward a strike so depleted the ranks that top-to-bottom reorganization was seen as the only remedy.

To direct the reorganization, Maj. Higginson's board of directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated behement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

Rehearses Men Hard

Today, the graying, fastidious conductor is at the zenith of his career. The resignations of Leopold Stokowski from conductorship of the Philadelphia orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanini from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have long since left him without a serious rival among the regular symphony directors.

The secret of his success, Koussevitzky concedes, is his insistence on painstaking rehearsals. While fiddlers fidget and trombonists tremble, the tyrannical conductor shouts, sings, scolds and occasionally praises their work in loud but battered English. Clad in baggy trousers, soft white shirt and sleeveless sweater, he is complete master of every situation. No mistake is allowed to pass.

"No, no, no," he shouts. "It is da, da, dadada, da! Dat's it you must zing! You must blay the nuts! Vonderful, vonderful!"

To the wartime Bostonian, who can take his music or leave it alone, Koussevitzky is nothing more than a tongue-twister. But to music lovers, he is without doubt America's number one symphony conductor.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 1 - 1944

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony For 21st Year

BOSTON (UP)—Like thousands of musicians all over the United States, the 110 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are resining their bows and polishing their brasswork in anticipation of a new season.

For the Boston orchestra, second oldest in the nation, this will be the 64th year. For energetic, 70-year-old maestro, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, it will be the 21st.

On opening night Oct. 6, Boston's Back Bay patricians—and a generous complement of plebeians from a half-dozen ivy-covered campuses nearby—will flock to venerable Symphony Hall as they have every year since 1881 when the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson put money behind his idea that the city should have a good symphony orchestra.

Fame Is World-Wide

The fame of Maj. Higginson's $1,000,000 idea has not been limited to Boston, or even to the United States. Several years before the now-famous Philadelphia orchestra had gained a place in the symphonic sun, critics hailed the Boston Symphony as the finest organization of its kind in the world, and it has retained its high place by consistently brilliant performance for more than half a century.

To direct the reorganization after World War I, Maj. Higginsons board of Directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

To direct the reorganization, Maj. Higginson's board of Directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924, and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

Rehearses Men Hard

Today, the graying, fastidious conductor is at the zenith of his career. The resignations of Leopold Stokowski from conductorship of the Philadelphia orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanini from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have long since left him without a serious rival among the regular symphony directors.

The secret of his success, Koussevitzky concedes, is his insistence on painstaking rehearsals. While fiddlers fidget and trombonists tremble, the tyrannical conductor shouts, sings, scolds and occasionally praises their work in loud but battered English. Clad in baggy trousers, soft white shirt and sleeveless sweater, he is complete master of every situation. No mistake is allowed to pass.

To the wartime Bostonian, who can take his music or leave it alone, Koussevitzky is nothing more than a tongue-twister. But to music lovers, he is without doubt America's number one symphony conductor.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Opens Season in Providence at the Metropolitan

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Bostor Symphony Orchestra played last night in Metropolitan Theater, opening its Providence season of five concerts. The audience was large and willing.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who was expected to conduct, did not, which disappointed many. A program insert explained that he was ill and that Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, would substitute. Mr. Burgin is a very able man and he gave a satisfying performance. It lacked something of polish and fine detail, as is inevitable in such circumstances, but it was hearty, it moved, it sounded.

The third symphony of Beethoven, the "Eroica," led the list. Mr. Burgin attacked it with characteristic energy. and the orchestra followed his guidance with enthusiasm. The quality and quantity of tone in themselves were something to hear, and the familiar themes sounded fresh and compelling. Even the funeral march, which many a listener finds somewhat longer than necessary, bore up. The scherzo and the finale exhilirated the audience with speed and rhythm. Mr. Burgin was applauded insistently.

A new American composition, "Prayer in Time of War," by William Schuman, was played. It induced, at times, a solemn and contemplative mood; at other times the bitter warring of neighboring notes was more than my ears could conveniently swallow, to mix a midnight metaphor. I tried to like it. I tried to find in it the value that great musicians claim for it. I couldn't. But I am glad it was played, and I hope the orchestra will play much more music by serious contemporaries, whether people like it or not.

This better dose was followed by a big piece of candy, the suite from "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan." The strings were not up to snuff in pizzicato, but they and the woodwinds made exquisite work of the bumblebee, and the whole orchestra ended in one of those hurricanes of tone that send the customers away feeling that they are certainly glad they were there.

Globe MUSIC 10/21

SYMPHONY HALL /44

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, the gifted concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is at the helm of the concerts in Symphony Hall this week. His program is highly diversified and of exceptional interest since it contains only music that is unhackneyed.

As conductor Mr. Burgin has become extraordinarily able. His readings now possess an assurance and personal flavor which once were lacking. As the Boston Symphony musicians responded sensitively to his bidding, Mozart's "The Impresario" Overture emerged sparkling and delicate, and Ravel's Alborada del Gracioso, though its performance might not be compared with that of the super-Ravellian, Mr. Koussevitzky, was colorful and flowing and rhythmically intoxicating.

Leo Weiner's powerful, brilliant orchestration of the Bach Organ Toccata in C major had not turned up on a Symphony list since Mr. Burgin introduced it in 1936. How good it was to hear again the unusual combination of pure though massive scoring and the synthetic tints when the winds imitate the organ! The continuity of a forceful performance unfortunately was broken at the cadence between introduction and adagio when the audience, ignoring Mr. Burgin's raised hands, broke in with applause, and the doors were opened to admit latecomers.

For some inexplicable reason Zino Francescatti had not been soloist with the Boston Symphony until yesterday, when he gave the first performance of the whole of Paganini's D major Violin Concerto, No. 1, Op. 6, in the orchestra's history. He ought to have appeared long since, because he is a violinist of clean technic, a suave tone and Latin grace. In its original instrumental accompaniment (for which Mr. Burgin reduced the orchestra) the Concerto is a tinkly affair, brimming with melodies that suggest minor Italian opera. But when it is so well played, its melodies so beautifully phrased, the score is quite persuasive. Mr. Francescatti received one of the warmest receptions I can remember at a Friday concert.

Hindemith's Theme and Variations according to the Four Temperaments (Melancholic, Sanguine, Phlegmatic and Choleric) had first been conducted here by Mr. Burgin at one of the chamber concerts last Summer. While far, far too long, this is really excellent music, highly skilled in the restless motion and controlled dissonance of its counterpoint. The colors Hindemith can get from a piano (ably played by Lukas Foss) and strings are astonishing, and the sharp differentiation between the four moods is also quite remarkable.

PUEBLO, COLO.
CHIEFTAIN

OCT 6 - 1944

Koussevitzky at Top of Career Leads Boston Symphony Again

By JOSEPH NOLAN
United Press Staff Correspondent

BOSTON, Oct. 5.—(UP)—Like thousands of musicians all over the United States, the 110 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are resining their bows and polishing their brasswork in anticipation of a new season.

For the Boston orchestra, second oldest in the nation, this will be the 64th year. For energetic, 70-year-old maestro, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, it will be the 21st.

On opening night Oct. 6, Boston's Back Bay patricians—and a generous complement of Jselebians from a half-dozen ivy-covered campuses nearby—will flock to venerable Symphony Hall as they have every year since 1881 when the late Maj. Henry Lee Higginson put money behind his idea that the city should have a good symphony orchestra.

Fame Is World Wide

The fame of Maj. Higginson's $1,000,000 idea has not been limited to Boston, or even to the United States. Several years before the now-famous Philadelphia orchestra had gained a place in the symphonic sun, critics hailed the Boston Symphony as the finest organization of its kind in the world, and it has retained its high place by consistently brilliant performance for more than half a century.

Only once in the orchestra's distinguished history was it forced to relinguish its position among the leaders, and that was when its German-born conductor, Karl Muck, was charged unjustly with espionage and ousted during World War I.

During the war, too, many of the orchestra's most competent performers were deported as "enemy aliens," and shortly afterward a strike so depleted the ranks that top-to-bottom reorganization was seen as the only remedy.

To direct the reorganization, Maj. Higginson's board of directors chose Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky whose antics abroad had precipitated vehement blasts from the concert halls of London and Paris. That was in 1924 and Koussevitzky was to be given a year's tryout.

Rehearses Men Hard

Today, the graying fastidious conductor is at the zenith of his career. The resignations of Leopold Stakawski from conductorship of the Philadelphia orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanini from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have long since left him without a serious rival among the regular symphony directors.

The secret of his success, Koussevitzky concedes, is his insistance on painstaking rehearsals. While fiddlers fidget and trombonists tremble, the tyrannical conductor shouts, sings scolds and occasionally praises their work in loud but battered English. Clad in baggy trousers, soft white shirt and sleeveless sweater, he is complete master of every situation. No mistake is allowed to pass.

"No, no, no," he shouts. "It is da, da, dadada, da! Dat's it you must zing! You must blay the nuts! Vonderful, vonderful!"

To the wartime Bostonian, who can take his music or leave it alone, Koussevitzky is nothing more than a tongue twister. But to music lovers, he is without doubt America's number one symphony conductor.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 8 - 1944

Season's First Symphony Thrills Boston Devotees

By BETSY WARREN

The welcome return of another season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts with its famous conductor Serge Koussevitzky brought forth a capacity audience at Symphony Hall, Boston, this Friday afternoon.

The programme had its references to current events—Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War"—as well as an eye for showmanship—Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe". The technical ability of the Boston Symphony and its conductor being a foregone conclusion, it is perhaps only necessary to remark that "Daphnis et Chloe" for me gives the impression at first of taking a shower-bath and leaves me surging on a surf-board. Whether or not there was a similar sensation in other people I do not know. I can only report that at the conclusion of the piece there were several unrestrained YA HOOs from the younger members of the audience.

William Schuman was present for the first performance in Boston of his "Prayer in Time of War". This is a sincere and appealing short one-movement work that creeps in and creeps out. (Creeps in almost too slowly for one to wait for the rest of the piece.) But for all its honesty of intention it has two defects. It produces effects which seem just that; lacking a "raison d'etre" from the preceding measures of music. (Notice the little drum rolls. Although it finally establishes itself as a legitimate motive, when first heard, it is decidedly a let down.) It proceeds like a stream of consciousness which is all right for a first draft, but certainly the finished thought could be tightened up here and there.

During the performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony (while one also noticed the perfect execution of the horns in the Scherzo and the more probable tempo of the Marcia funebre—this time, "adagio 'assai'") the wisdom of Beethoven presented itself and offered dampening contrast to the cleverness so highly prized by many modern composers.

The program for next week includes: Foote, Suite in E major for String Orchestra; Diamond, Symphony No. 2 (first performance); Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 5.

HANNIBAL, MO.
COURIER-POST & JOURNAL

OCT 7 - 1944

Blue Network

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, premier symphonic ensemble of the country, with its imminent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opens another season for KHMO - Blue listeners tonight. For the second consecutive year the series will be sponsored by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., producer of the world's largest line of industrial equipment. Thirty concerts comprise the schedule which KHMO - Blue will present on Saturday nights from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m. Of these, 24 will originate in Boston, five in New York and one in Milwaukee. The season extends through April 28, 1945. In addition to Dr. Koussevitzky, permanent director of the orchestra, five guest conductors are to be heard during the season, their names to be announced later. Dedicated to the "Heroes of the United Nations," the first program of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA tonight, will feature Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E. Flat, Op. 55, better known as the "Eroica."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Oct 7, 1944

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's recipe for an opening or a closing concert is familiar music in glamorous performance. The accent, in other words, is largely on the occasion itself.

Yesterday, beginning his own 21st season and the Boston Symphony's 64th, he offered a well-loved classic, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and an especially favored modern piece, the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Dapnis and Chloe."

Between them came a local novelty, William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," played with the composer in attendance and to an appreciative audience.

The "Eroica" had been heard at Symphony Hall no later than last January. The pretext for so speedy a repetition was that Dr. Koussevitzky elected to dedicate the performance "to the heroes of the United Nations." This and Mr. Schuman's piece gave the programme a timely appropriateness.

The performances of the Beethoven and the Ravel were as familiar as the music itself. You may not agree with everything the conductor does to Beethoven's masterpiece, though much of his reading is undeniably effective, but you must admit that in the "Daphnis" music conductor and orchestra are in a class by themselves. Even Ravel acknowledged that.

Mr. Shuman's "Prayer" begins with long-sustained, dissonant chords that seemed to be thought of more in terms of sound than of harmonic logic. Somewhat later, and somewhat surprisingly, considering the steely Mr. Schuman's general bent, there are moments of poignant beauty. After a most unprayerful section, probably necessary for musical contrast, that reminds you of Roy Harris on the rampage, the opening mood returns. The audience's warm response to music and composer has been noted.

Speaking of the audience, it filled the hall and was consistently enthusiastic. The orchestra is the same unapproachable body, but in the matter of dimensions it is feeling the effects of the war. Once it boasted 108 men, now there are 101, the chief sufferer being the French horn section. Unless extra brass can be brought in from the outside, we may have to forego certain Teutonic pieces. And after all, would that not be poetic justice?

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 8 - 1944

Lukas Foss, young composer and pianist whose choral work, "The Prairie," will be performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony this season, has been appointed pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He succeeds Jesús María Sanromá, who will devote all his time to his concert career.

[9]

Herald

MUSIC

Oct. 7, '44.

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first program of the 64th season in Symphony Hall, as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 ("Eroica") .... Beethoven
Prayer in Time of War .... Schuman
Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" .... Ravel

Practically nothing happened yesterday at the first concert of the 64th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra except music. There was no opening observance, no speech, no special marking of anything; even the conversation in the corridors at the interval was so sober as the fashions (although I may have missed something in that department). In short, as a news event, the first concert of the season was distinctly a cold roast Boston affair. But that, I think, was all right with everyone: the music was beyond belief.

There was, at that, an item of considerable interest but it could not have been noticed from the audience. And that was that Dr. Koussevitzky, to begin his 21st year with us, arose from a sick bed and conducted the difficult and strenuous concert with as miserable a cold as any man ever had to contend with...and Dr. Koussevitzky is, after all, a man of 70. He shouldn't have taken the risk, that we all know, but it is not to be denied that his presence yesterday, as it always does, galvanized the orchestra into producing such music as could not be believed if not heard.

The Beethoven, for example. We have all heard it a thousand times, but I wonder if it ever found realization quite so astonishingly as it did yesterday. It was evident from the outset the conductor had an end in view; not the prim intention of recreating a formal, strictly classical pattern with its blacks and whites and textbook severity. His end was purely emotional and the effect he sought to convey was carefully (but not too carefully) prepared through the conception of arcs and phrases of the melodies, and the building, step by step, of the musical climaxes. The result was a magnificent chiarroscuro of light and shade without violence. It may be possible to say this is not the way everybody does Beethoven, but the point is, Koussevitzky is not everybody, for his overwhelming emotional qualities make him what he is. And I, for one, would not challenge his judgment in matters like these.

In the Ravel, possibly yes. I think there is no question but what he whips it up a little more than is artistically sound considering the special qualities of the score. But again there is no denying the extraordinary effect he achieves with this work which is now much more of his own than Ravel's. It may be said, however, that barring the intense pressure of the climaxes (the final one would certainly have unhorsed Sir Gawaine himself), no one quite animates the traceries of the figurations as he does—and certainly no body of musicians is capable of realizing his wishes as is this orchestra.

William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War" seemed to me a fine and interesting piece. Its harmonies are especially rich, sombre and expressive, its atmosphere is tense and high-strung, and cites melodic conception often noble and moving. Its form is less impressive; the alternating moments of quiet starkness followed by massive fortes employing the fullest power of the brasses, somewhat diminishes the total effect, or, rather, brings up the thought that Mr. Schuman might have planned these things a little too deliberately. Nonetheless its power is not to be denied, and it is well worth the hearing. The composer, by the way, was on hand to receive a modest reception.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
Circ. D. 251,373 — S. 277,953

OCT 8 1944

The Bostons Are Back

THE Boston symphony orchestra is back on the air again under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. It is to be heard playing the world's finest music, in just about the world's finest style, every Saturday night from 7:30 to 8:30 o'clock, on the Blue network (WEMP) and on The Journal's frequency modulation station, WMFM. The concerts are sponsored for the second year by a large, sprawling manufacturing establishment that shares part of the name of the town West Allis, where its home plants are situated. (Mysterious, aren't we?)

It looks like a good season for the symphony. In addition to Dr. Koussevitzky, permanent director of the orchestra, five guest conductors are to be heard during the season. George Szell, Metropolitan opera conductor, will occupy the podium for two broadcasts, and a similar number will be under the baton of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis symphony.

"Solid," says Serge Koussevitzky to his Boston symphony

Others who will appear include Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston symphony; Leonard Bernstein, young protege of Dr. Koussevitzky who served last season as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony society, and Arthur Fiedler, popular leader of the annual "Pops" and Esplanade series of the Boston symphony. Each of these noted conductors will be in charge for one concert.

The list of soloists selected by Dr. Koussevitzky includes some of the best known musicians now before concert audiences. Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, outstanding duo pianists, will be heard on the third broadcast, and Zino Francescatti, French violinist, will play the exacting Paganini "Concerto in D Major" at the fourth concert. Others to be heard with the orchestra during the 30 week season are William Primrose, violist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist of the orchestra.

The season will be the sixty-fourth for the Boston ensemble and the twenty-first for Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor. He was invited to head the orchestra after a distinguished career abroad, his debut having been made in Berlin in 1906. Although Dr. Koussevitzky recently observed his seventieth birthday, he is still as energetic as when he took over the Boston symphony in 1924. Born in Russia, he became a French citizen and later a citizen of this country.

Globe

MUSIC

Oct. 7, '44

SYMPHONY HALL

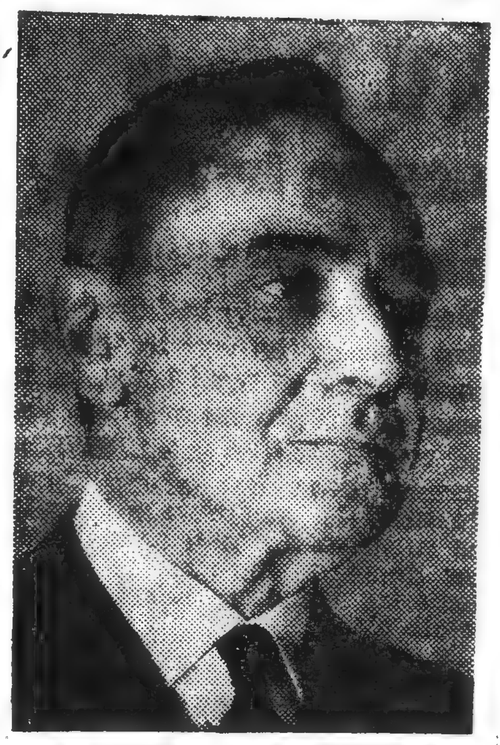
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The 64th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, entering his 21st year as conductor, once again was accorded that especial mixture of respect and affection extended only to him among musicians in this town, when he first appeared on the stage. Both orchestra and audience rose in greeting and so remained until the cordial applause gave way to "The Star Spangled Banner."

The whole program could be taken as a deeply sincere exhibition of feeling toward the cause of the United Nations. Only the opening number, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was explicitly so honored by dedication of its performance to ". . . the heroes of the United Nations." But William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War" and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," the work of an American and a Frenchman, may surely be construed to have had a share in the dedicatory feeling.

It may as well be said, in the sure conviction of truth: there is no other conductor who can play "Daphnis and Chloe" so well as Serge Koussevitzky. And there is no other orchestra which can play this resplendent and evocative score with such gorgeous tone and uncanny precision. Mr. Koussevitzky has done it many times before and will again. Yet never does he make Ravel's ballet music less than a tapestry of magnificent colors and delineative brilliance.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony never played more richly or expressively than during yesterday's marvelous recreation of one of the most imaginative and scintillating scores in all music. It was a long crescendo through "Daybreak" and "Pantomime" to the orgiastic energies of the "Danse Generale."

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the "Eroica" possessed a masterful sweep entirely in keeping with his dedication. You could find some technical loose ends usually absent from Boston Symphony performances, but they were nothing in view of the cumulative power of the whole. Long ago it was accurately said that Mr. Koussevitzky is moved and inspired by special circumstances. Again it was evident that Beethoven's glorious work and the circumstances of this performance fired him to extraordinary achievement. This was beyond doubt an heroic performance.

"Prayer in Time of War" was a "first time in Boston." The title suggests deep sincerity and purpose. But what connection exists between music and purpose must remain for future hearings to uncover. On first acquaintance Mr. Schuman's contrast of slow and fast sections, with solos over pedal points, seems contrived rather than spontaneous, studied rather than felt with unmistakable poignancy. Mr. Schuman writes better for orchestra than he used to do; this work shows greater ease, freedom and variety. The idiom is dissonant but logical. Yet it did not move me at all.

Let it be emphasized, however, that this is merely a first impression. No work of art can be completely discerned without considerable familiarity. The composer bowed from the stage.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

9

Music in the Air

Two Beethoven Symphonies for Week End

By John Rosenfield.

RESUMPTION of the Boston Symphony broadcasts brought only one number, but what a number! It was Beethoven's Eroica in the interpretative depth of a very great conductor and in the lambent hues of the world's greatest symphonic ensemble. Even Toscanini is disposed to play the finale as something of a romp. But not Koussevitzky—at least not this time. ~~He drew from~~ it the Promethean fires; he gave to it an impressiveness that made it belong with the incomparable Allegro con Brio and Funeral March.

It is hardly possible for the Eroica to produce new sensations at this date. Its capacity to re-voke the old remains a miracle. The Eroica struck the Europe of 1804 as Shostakovitch's Fourth impacted our troubled days. It was the cry of the republican revolution and the plebian emancipation. In retrospect, though, the figure of Beethoven looms like a mammoth among mice. What he did in the Eroica had never been done before. There couldn't be space—no matter what the print paper situation—to detail the technical innovations. It suffices to say that these were unconscious means to the end. With the Eroica music was made to say all that mankind could feel.

(Blue network through KGKO, 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. Saturday.)

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE SUN

OCT 13 1944

On the air every Saturday night—the world's finest orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky

---

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 8 1944

Season's First Symphony Thrills Boston Devotees

By BETSY WARREN

The welcome return of another season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts ~~with its famous conductor~~ Serge Koussevitzky brought forth a capacity audience at Symphony Hall, Boston, this Friday afternoon.

The programme had its references to current events—Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War"—as well as an eye for showmanship — Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe". The technical ability of the Boston Symphony and its conductor being a foregone conclusion, it is perhaps only necessary to remark that "Daphnis et Chloe" for me gives the impression at first of taking a shower-bath and leaves me surging on a surf-board. Whether or not there was a similar sensation in other people I do not know. I can only report that at the conclusion of the piece there were several unrestrained YA HOOs from the younger members of the audience.

William Schuman was present for the first performance in Boston of his "Prayer in Time of War". This is a sincere and appealing short one-movement work that creeps in and creeps out. (Creeps in almost too slowly for one to wait for the rest of the piece.) But for all its honesty of intention it has two defects. It produces effects which seem just that; lacking a "raison d'etre" from the preceding measures of music. (Notice the little drum rolls. Although it finally establishes itself as a legitimate motive, when first heard, it is decidedly a let down.) It proceeds like a stream of consciousness which is all right for a first draft, but certainly the finished thought could be tightened up here and there.

During the performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony (while one also noticed the perfect execution of the horns in the Scherzo and the more probable tempo of the Marcia funebre—this time, "adagio 'assai' ") the wisdom of Beethoven presented itself and offered dampening contrast to the cleverness so highly prized by many modern composers.

The program for next week includes: Foote, Suite in E major for String Orchestra; Diamond, Symphony No. 2 (first performance); Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 5.

Globe

MUSIC

Oct 14

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Though his recent cold is said to be persisting, Serge Koussevitzky conducted the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday, topping off the afternoon with a whooping performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony that brought down the house. The program began with Arthur Foote's E major Suite for strings, and included the first performance of the Second Symphony by David Diamond.

Going on the theory that we should hear all contemporary music deemed by a great conductor worthy to be played, we may thank Mr. Koussevitzky for setting before us the aggressive if dull work of Mr. Diamond. This composer has been little heard in Boston, though he has been acclaimed in New York and elsewhere.

The virtues of his Second Symphony are competent orchestration and a sense of motion. One of its drawbacks is an excessively dissonant idiom derived from Shostakovich and from Roy Harris of that composer's Third Symphony. Mr. Diamond also writes too long, witness the initially engaging adagio funebre which would be better if halved. In this movement there is more than once the suspicion of a tune.

Mr. Diamond makes his brass shriek and snort in the bouncy scherzo and has woven a contrapuntal fabric for his rapid finale. As more than one listener maintained, the third movement might be eliminated altogether: it is slow and thereby challenges the interest of the adagio, and says little. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.

It is always pleasant to hear Mr. Foote's gracious if old-fashioned and skillfully wrought if unoriginal Suite. Here you have first-rate string writing. Yesterday there was further enjoyment in the amazingly rich and powerful sonorities that Mr. Koussevitzky drew from the Boston Symphony strings.

Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony replaced the originally planned revival of that stodgy bore, Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," which was all to the good. Mr. Koussevitzky's personal, hyperemotional and sometimes orgiastic way with Tchaikovsky is familiar—and effective. Yesterday he gave us, in addition, one of the clearest performances of the work I have ever heard, wherein the "inner voices" were emphasized just enough.

ABOUT MUSIC

(Post)

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Oct 14, 1944

THERE is plenty going on at the Symphony concerts this week. Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, duo-pianists, will make their first local appearance with the orchestra, offering Mozart's Concerto in E-flat and a new Concerto by Bonuslav Martinu. Of more moment, however, is the marking of the 70th birthday of Arnold Schoenberg, which befell on Sept. 13, by the world premiere of his Theme and Variations for orchestra, Opus 43 B.

You would get a very imperfect idea of Schoenberg's importance by scanning the programmes of the Boston Symphony. To be sure, his orchestral works are not particularly numerous. Most of his more significant writing has been for smaller groups, but we have by no means kept up with his orchestral output, such as it is. In 1914 Dr. Muck set musical Boston by the ears with the first "modernist" music it had heard, Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra. They were never repeated. One of them, "The Changing Chord," seemed even then to be possessed of a certain strange beauty. The others, some felt, were mercifully brief. Muck confided to me years later that he had failed to make head or tail of the music and that five minutes after the performance he couldn't have written a measure of it from memory.

In '21 and '22 Monteux played for us the early and very different string sextet, "Verklaerte Nacht" (in its arrangement for string orchestra) and Mr. Burgin repeated it last season, after having given it most successfully at a pair of the summer chamber orchestra concerts in Cambridge and Boston. The latest performance here, and not a very good one, took place during the Ballet Theatre's recent visit to the Opera House ("Pillar of Fire.")

* * *

And to get back to Schoenberg and the B.S.O., in January, 1934, the composer himself conducted "Verklaerte Nacht" and the tone poem, "Pelleas and Melisande" at a Cambridge concert and two months later repeated the tone poem in Symphony Hall. Composed shortly after the turn of the century, "Pelleas and Melisande" proved to be a tiresome, inflated example of post-Romanticism, largely derivative in character. Wagner, Mahler, Brahms, and to some extent Strauss, were Schoenberg's early models. There were no regrets in some quarters, anyway, when Dr. Koussevitzky failed to bring to pass a projected revival of the music two or three years ago.

Lawrence Gilman's analysis of Schoenberg's development was something like this: Possessed of a remarkable musical facility and great powers of assimilation, he produced the "Gurre-Lieder", a stupendous score that Boston never heard, and other works in this same post-Romantic idiom. Save for a lack of true originality, they are persuasive enough, but to their self-critical creator they plainly revealed that he was saying nothing that was really new. He therefore decided that original he would be, at whatever cost, and as a purely, or at least largely, intellectual effort, evolved his atonal style and later his 12-tone system, enthusiastically adopted by such of his pupils and disciples as Alban Berg and Ernst Krenek. Oposed to this is the following statement, taken from Abraham Veinus' "The Concerto": "Despite the coolness and precision with which the intricacies move on paper, Schoenberg's music is an extreme form of romantic hysteria. Schoenberg himself discounts the so-called mathematics of his music and insists upon a credo which is singularly conventional and romantic. 'If a composer,' he declares, 'does not write from the heart, he simply cannot produce good music. I have never had a theory in my life . . . I write what I feel in my heart — and what finally comes on paper is what first coursed through every fiber of my body.'"

* * *

The public has accepted Stravinsky. Schoenberg, in his more characteristic voice, remains almost icily remote from the common musical understanding. And if the 12-tone system, with its thematic basis of a dozen different notes, to be inverted, reverted (or both together) and transformed in every conceivable way, is not a "theory", then what in music is? Anyway, for the encouragement of those who will hear the new Variations in the hall, or over the air, the piece is as good as tonal. It bears the key-signature of G minor and it begins with a common chord. Too bad Muck didn't live to see that one.

Herald

MUSIC

Oct. 14, '44

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the second concert of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Foote . . . . Suite for Strings, Op. 63
David Diamond . . . . Symphony No. 2
Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64

The first important musical premiere of the season occupied the lion's share of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's attention yesterday afternoon in David Diamond's Second Symphony, and, all things considered, it well deserved the attention it got. (The Foote Suite for String orchestra, not heard here since 1936, and the Tchaikovsky Fifth, which has hardly missed a year since 1906, were by no means slighted, you understand; it's just that the Diamond work was the novelty to set people a-gaping.)

Mr. Diamond's Symphony, it seems to me, is an interesting composition rather than a really good one; a work of promise rather than of fulfillment. The symphony is either in full and tumultuous cry or it is progressing solemnly, and there is little contrast between the two slow movements and the two fast ones. Each, indeed, seems like a revised version of the other—and in many ways they are, as the musical material derives largely from that contained in the first movement.

Moreover, as a composition for orchestra the scoring often seems rough, thick and awkward. It seldom, in the fast and loud sections, seems comfortable, and you get the impression from time to time that the composer has discovered that a modern orchestra can just do any old thing nowadays, and that it would be sport to put one through its paces. Thus the most complicated entrances and figures and rhythms are introduced—and often they seem contrived out of pure deviltry rather than out of an impulse or compulsion to say anything.

All these things aside, however, when the symphony does leap into the clear, it reveals truly fine aspects, and it does supply some beautiful melodic passages. I refer especially to the opening bars of the first movement (the whole movement is outstanding, in fact); to the fine canon for woodwind quintet in the slow movement and to the following section given to the strings. Then there are some very effective touches throughout, as for instance the final chord of the scherzo, and the final bars of the last movement (not to mention the jaunty theme of the finale itself). In short, there are many fine things about Mr. Diamond's music, but it is not the sort of music which can be accepted wholeheartedly despite its excellent qualities.

In contrast to the Diamond Symphony, Arthur Foote's Suite sounded like something from a past incredibly far away. It is lovely, sentimental music, and it contains what has been aptly called the finest fugue ever written in America. Regrettably enough, it brings Tchaikovsky constantly to mind, but there are worse fates than that, come to think of it.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 18 1944

RECITAL IS GIVEN BY RUTH POSSELT

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

What sound musicianship, vigor and decision can do for a violin recital they did for Ruth Posselt's playing in Town Hall last night. Miss Posselt, who appeared here as concert artist years ago and has since come back rather regularly with the Boston Symphony, played the notes correctly last night, and she played them with enthusiasm. She essayed styles differing as widely as those of Handel and Hindemith, Bach and Shostakovich, Bartok and Bennett, and made them all come off, each in its place. Her technic was clean, her intonation generally true. But her tone was not conspicuous for its beauty.

The Handel Sonata in D major began the evening. When the listener had heard that, he knew fairly well what the remainder was to be like. Confident bowing and fingering were there. Phrasing was orderly and the meaning was kept clear. Some minor blemishes were noted in the course of the four movements, but they were of small moment. What did matter was a certain stringiness in the quality, which, when the tone was forced, became mildly unpleasant. The Hindemith Sonata in E (composed nine years back) was played with complete grasp of its material and very adroitly. Lukas Foss, who was Miss Posselt's accompanist, was a considerable factor in its success, as he was in that of other compositions of the program.

Thereafter, a third sonata, this time the A major of Bach, was presented, and there was again reason to praise Miss Posselt's technic, without going into raptures over her tone. Two Preludes of Shostakovich, Prokofieff's "Melodie," Milhaud's "Ipanema," Bartok's Romanian Folk Dances, Bosmans's "Concertstueck," Bennett's "Hexapoda," Foss's "Composer's Holiday" and Arboss 'Tango Espagnole' continued the recital. A fair-sized audience attended and applauded very cordially.

Diamond's Symphony At First Hearing

Monitor Oct 14 '44

By L. A. Sloper

David Diamond's Symphony No. 2 had its first performance yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. It was the central item of the second program of the Boston Symphony season. The concert began with Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for string orchestra. The other number listed was Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Mr. Diamond is a newcomer to these concerts, although at the age of 29 he can point to a considerable output of symphonic and chamber music, much of which has been performed. Like his contemporaries, he is as careful to disclaim any programmatic intention as the modern novelist is to insist that all his characters are purely imaginary and have been created without thought of any actual persons.

Usually it is difficult to credit these assertions by composers or authors, because the content of their works so often seems to deny them. In the case of this symphony, however, it is easy to believe Mr. Diamond, because he seems to be expressing emotion through a well-developed technique, rather than employing technique to tell a story or paint a picture.

* * *

The structure of his Second Symphony is unusual in that his first movement is marked Adagio funebre. But as he points out in the program notes, it "may be considered as a sonata-allegro movement in slow tempo." Thus, apparently, he is not transposing the order of the parts of his symphony merely for novel effect, but has adopted the slower pace in his first movement because he feels it more expressive of his mood.

His Scherzo comes second, and is followed by an Andante espressivo, quasi adagio. The Finale is a lively Rondo.

What makes the scheme remarkable is that Mr. Diamond has deliberately chosen to write two long slow movements into a symphony, at a period when most modern composers are unable or unwilling to write even one; presumably they are either incapable of feeling, or ashamed to display it.

* * *

Mr. Diamond is free of such inhibition. Having looked at a wartime world, he says frankly, "This is how I feel about it." His emotion has every evidence of being deep and sincere, and certainly he has the means of conveying it. His themes are not sentimental, but they lend themselves to a development whose richness is most expressive.

The Scherzo and the Finale are less distinctive, perhaps because the composer, finding it difficult to be gay in these times, leans more heavily on his technical learning. Nevertheless, he leaves an impression of freedom and spontaneity within the framework that has often been filled by similar matter in the past.

The symphony had a moderate success, and the composer bowed twice from the platform.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Oct. 14, '44

It is with a touch of local pride that the opinion is here set down that the choicest experience of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was the rehearing after eight years of Arthur Foote's E major Suite for string orchestra.

The middle movement, composed as an afterthought, seems a bit self-conscious, with its sharply contrasted sections for plucked strings and bowed strings muted, but the first and third movements are as fresh as when they were set on paper 37 years ago. Since Foote was content to write just music rather than follow some current fashion, this work does not date; it has a timeless quality.

So much is said about the present-day school of American composers that we might easily be led into forgetting the worth of their predecessors. This Suite of Foote's is the only American classic to which Dr. Koussevitzky is still faithful. However, if he neglects the old, he is assiduous with the new. This second pair of concerts brings the first performance of the Second Symphony of David Diamond, who with it makes his bow to Symphony Hall, in both a literal and a figurative sense. Although not strikingly original in matter or manner, this Symphony on the whole is decidedly agreeable. You are reminded of Shostakovitch, not only by certain idiosyncrasies of melody and orchestration, but by the fact that the work begins with a slow movement. That in itself is all right, yet it does make the third movement somewhat superfluous, as far as the total effect is concerned. Moreover, the finale, marked with certain exuberant Americanisms, is over-long for what it contains.

Dr. Koussevitzky had planned for this week a revival of the "Reformation" Symphony of Mendelssohn. Probably because he had been indisposed and shrank from the extra burden, he substituted for it the fifth of Tchaikovsky, heard here less than a year ago.

HOMESTEAD, PA.
MESSENGER

OCT 24 1944

On her coming trip to the East, Gracie Allen has been invited by Serge Koussovitsky to give a performance of her "Concerto for Index Finger" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

OCT 15 1944

Gala Winter Season Scheduled For The Boston Sympony

The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, premier symphonic ensemble of the country, with its eminent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opened another season for Station WTJS and BLUE listeners on Sat., Oct. 7. For the second consecutive year the series will be sponsored by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company, of Milwaukee, producer of the world's largest line of industrial equipment.

Thirty concerts comprise the schedule which Station WTJS and the Blue Network will present on Saturday nights from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. Of these 24 will originate in Boston, five in New York and one in Milwaukee. The season extends through April 28, 1945.

In addition to Dr. Koussevitzky, permanent director of the orchestra, five guest conductors are to be heard during the season. George Szell, Metropolitan Opera conductor, will occupy the podium for two programs and a similar number will be under the baton of Dimitri Mitropoulos, conducter of the Minneapolis Symphony. Others who will appear include Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony; Leonard Bernstein, young protege of Dr. Koussevitzky who served last season as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society and Arthur Fiedler, popular leader of the annual "Pops" and Esplanade series of the Boston Symphony. Each of these noted conductors will be in charge for one concert.

The list of soloists selected by Dr. Koussevitzky includes some of the best known musicians now before concert audiences. Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, outstanding duo-pianists, will be heard on the third broadcast, and Zeno Francescatti, French violinist, will play the virtuosic Paganini Concerto in D Major at the fourth concert. Others to be heard with the orchestra during the 30-week season are William Primrose, violist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist of the orchestra.

An outstanding advocate of the contemporary composer during his tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky will present several new works this season. Among them are symphonies by David Diamond and Aaron Copland, American composers; Bohuslav Martinu, Bohemian, and Darius Milhaud, eminent composer of France. Dr. Koussevitzky also plans to offer an orchestra concerto by Bela Bartok. William Schuman's "Prayer" will be played probably on the first program.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 25 1944

Gracie Allen's 1-Finger Concerto With Hub Symph As Spur to War Chest

On behalf of the Boston War Chest drive, Gracie Allen will play her One Finger Concerto as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Concert, to be held in the Hub's Symphony Hall, will take place the night of Nov. 15 and will mark the first of three War Bond and War Chest shows that Burns & Allen will put on when they head east soon. Others are skedded in N. Y. and Phila.

Pair'll be off the air Nov. 7 because of election and on Nov. 14 they'll do their show from Boston. On Nov. 21 the B & A show'll originate from N. Y. with Alan Ladd as guest. They'll also help kick off New York City's Sixth War Loan drive and are set for a number of Treasury promotions including an open-air rally in Times square. Nov. 28 show will originate from Erlanger theatre, Philly, broadcast also being tied up with bond drive.

Bill Goodwin, announcer on show, and Felix Mills, orch leader, are among those making the trip east.

---

the Boston ensemble and the 21st for Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor. He was invited to head the orchestra after a distinguished career abroad, his podium debut having been made in Berlin in 1906. Although Dr. Koussevitzky recently observed his 70th birthday, he is still as energetic as when he took over the Boston Symphony in 1924. Born in Russia, he became a French citizen and is now a citizen of this country.

Among his plans for the season is a commemorative program when V-Day arrives.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 9 1944

Koussevitsky Declares Great Music L

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

The words were spoken in tones of deep conviction by Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he will appear in one of the events of the Bushnell Symphony Series.

"Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes a life full is the experience of tragedy in some form, and rising to its challenge. The great composers all have had their trials by tragedy. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite the opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express wihin the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians, and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

The reporter reflected that in this statement Koussevitzky unintentionally was giving an insight into his own genius. His extraordinary powers of sympathetic and inspired interpretation in his conducting were forcefully hinted by the mental grasp and emotional sensibility which he revealed as he talked.

Other orchestras scheduled in the Bushnell course are: National Symphony (Hans Kindler) Rochester Philharmonic (Sir Thomas

[11]

DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

OCT 15 1944

Philharmonic Takes Top Music World Spot

By C. J. LUTEN

Last week America's oldest and most beloved symphonic organiza- ion, the New York Philharmonic, egan its 102nd season.

Now the world's oldest orchestr (the London Philharmonic has di banned during the war, and th Vienna Philharmonic was destroye by the Nazis in 1938) the Philha monic Symphony of New York vi tually signifies the importance the United States in the musi world.

The 104 musicians on the orche tra's roster, Artur Rodzinski, pe manent conductor, Carnegie Hal concerts three times a week, an a subscription series sell-out, whic the Philharmonic has today, are far cry indeed from Dec. 7, 184 when the New York Philharmoni Orchestra gave its first concei at the Apollo Rooms on Lowe Broadway. At the first concert th subscribers were largely friend and pupils of the musicians, an they were escorted to the benche or pews by members of the orchestra.

◆ ◆ ◆

First Program.

The first program, which begai promptly at 8 that evening, contained the Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, conducted by Ureli Correlli Hill, who was a Connecticut Yankee in spite of his name, and the moving spirit and first president of the Philharmonic. Mme. Otto and Mr. C. E. Horn sang arias from Weber's "Oberon," Rossini's "Armida," Mozart's "Belmont and Constance" and Beethoven's "Fidelio." A quintet for piano and strings by Hummel, who was regarded a great composer in those days, was played. Two overtures by Weber and Kalliwoda were conducted by Messrs. Etienne and Timm.

The orchestra was a co-operative organization, with the members sharing the receipts of the concerts. For the first 50 years of the orchestra's existence they gave four or five concerts each season. During the last 51 years the seasons have consisted of three or four concerts weekly.

The society had many conductors during its first 50 years, among whom were Hill, Timm, Etienne, Alpers, Boucher, Loder, Wiegers, Eisfeld, and Bergmann, the first permanent conductor.

◆ ◆ ◆

Bergmann and Thomas.

Apart from the pioneer work of the earlier men, the two who did most to shape the musical destinies of the Philharmonic Society were Carl Bergmann and Theodore Thomas.

According to James Huneker: "Theodore Thomas did more for orchestra music in America than any previous conductor. His influence was profound and far-reaching. His was a household name wherever a love of good music was to be found." Thomas led the orchestra from 1877 to 1892, when he was succeeded by the great Anton Seidl.

Seidl had a brief and meteoric career in New York. No conductor before Toscanini aroused the public so much. Like Toscanini, Beethoven and Wagner were his gods. Until his sudden death in the spring of 1898, he introduced many new works. Emil Sauer led the orchestra from 1898 to 1902, proving himself to be most at home in the music of the romantics. During the 1903 season the orchestra was led by Walter Damrosch, the son of Leopold.

◆ ◆ ◆

Guest Conductors.

Then came a veritable roll call of conductors, all visitors from abroad except Victor Herbert. From 1903 to 1906 the subscribers were treated with the diverse personalities of such world-famous musicians at Edouard Colonne, Gustav Kogel, Henry J. Wood, Victor Herbert, Felix Weingartner, Wassilv Safonoff, Richard Strauss, Willem Mengelberg and Max Fiedler.

The guest conductor system does not work for the best interests of an orchestra. The musicians seeing a new leader every two weeks become confused and no longer play as a unit.

In 1906, Safanoff, a Russian conductor of daring methods, was engaged. In 1909, Gustav Mahler, the brilliant genius who created the Vienna Golden Age and who was one of the great composers of the post-Brahms age, became the leader. He held this position until his death in 1911. From that year to 1921, Josef Stransky was chief of the Philharmonic. He was a musician of catholic tastes and many novelties found their way into the programs of the society during his tenure.

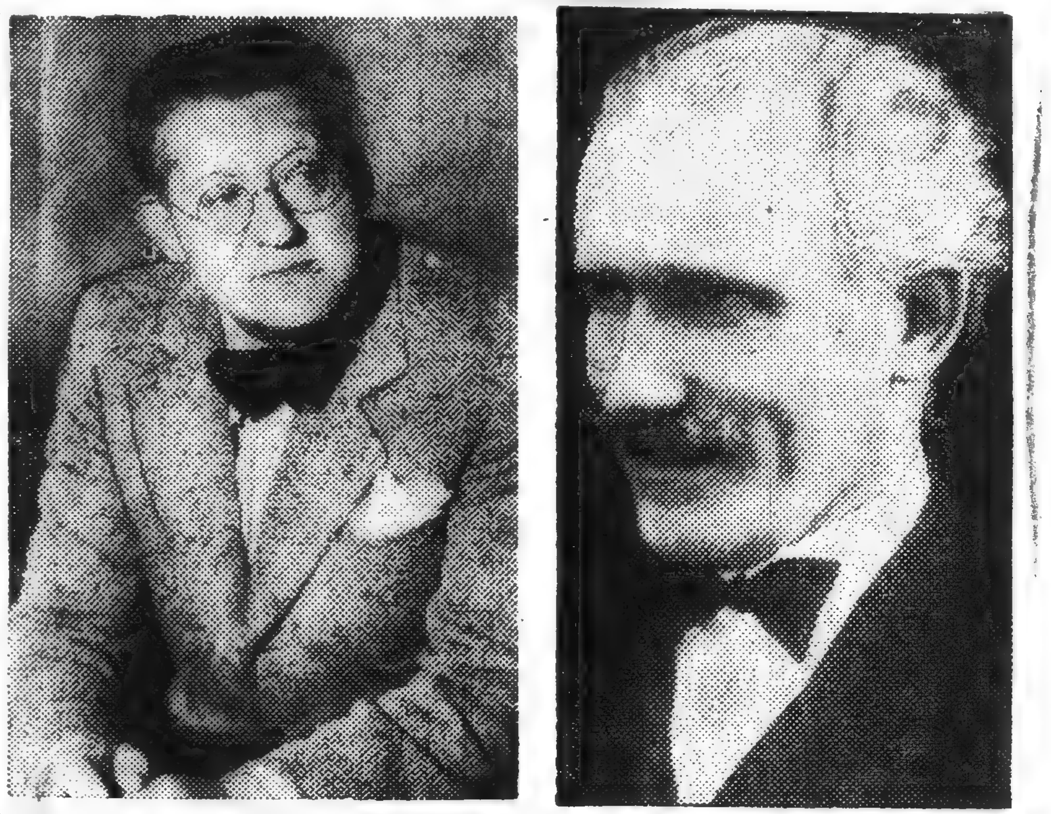
The Dutch master, Willem Mengelberg, took over the reins from 1922 to 1928, improving the quality of the orchestra that had suffered under the easy-going Stransky.

Arturo Toscanini, the great maestro that made the Philharmonic the toast of the world, came to New York to conduct in 1928, following the merger of the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony. The Toscanini period ending in 1936 was the finest in the history of the organization.

Following in the steps of Toscanini was an impossibility as quasi-brilliant John Barbirolli soon dis-discovered. Under his leadership the orchestra slipped back to its pre-Mengelberg status. In the 1941-42 season the orchestra engaged nine guest conductors—Leopold Stokowski, John Barbirolli, Bruno Walter, Artur Rodzinski, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Serge Koussevitzky, Fritz Busch, Eugene Goosens and Walter Damrosch.

Artur Rodzinski was appointed permanent conductor in January, 1943 and under his leadership the orchestra has advanced once again to regain its place in America's musical sun.

A constant source of inspiration, the history of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra is the history of music in America.



TWO PHILHARMONIC MAESTROS—Right is Arturo Toscanini, who made the Philharmonic the world's finest symphony orchestra from 1928 to 1936. Left is present conductor, Arthur Rodzinski, who begins his second season this fall.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

OCT 15 1944

BURGIN ACCEPTS HONORARY POST

Boston Symphony Concertmaster Will Serve in Advisory Capacity With Springfield Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has accepted the post of honorary musical adviser of the Springfield Symphony orchestra. Mr Burgin, who conducted the second concert of the Springfield Symphony last spring because of the illness of the permanent conductor, Alexander Leslie, has been enthusiastic about the work of the new Springfield Symphony.

He has been concertmaster of the Boston Symphony since 1920 and made his first public appearance at the age of 11 as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic society in 1903. Before coming to this country he appeared as soloist with the symphony orchestras of Leningrad, Helsinki, Oslo and Stockholm, and had served as concertmaster of orchestras under such conductors as Nikisch, Richard Strauss, Schreevoigt and Sibelius. He was a pupil of Joachim in Berlin, and of Leopold Auer in Leningrad and for some time served as assistant teacher to Auer.

Mr Burgin recently accepted a post as consultant, supervisor and guest teacher on the faculty of the Julius Hartt School of Music at Hartford, Ct.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

OCT 15 1944

Music World

By CARROLL DULANEY

Fifty years or so ago it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra which formally opened what was called our "Lyric season."

Then the Boston organization passed out of the local picture and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra took its place.

Since that time the Quaker City musicians have preserved the tradition.

This year the Philadelphians give the first major symphony concert of the season at the Lyric next Wednesday evening.

With Eugene Ormandy wielding the baton, the orchestra will open its program with the Handel-Harty Suite from the "Music of the Royal Fireworks."

There will be two symphonies—the No. 8 in B minor, or "Unfinished," of Schubert, and the so-called Classical Symphony in D major of Prokofieff.

Also on the program are "The White Peacock" of Griffes, Mendelssohn's Scherze in G minor and the Strauss tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Franks."

The Philadelphia Orchestra will present six regular Wednesday evening concerts and a special all-Wagnerian concert this season.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY
(Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor)
With Staats Cotsworth
60 Mins.; Sat., 8:30 p. m.
ALLIS-CHALMERS
WJZ-Blue, N. Y.
(Compton)

Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening its second season on the Blue network on Oct. 7, under Allis-Chalmers sponsorship, showed itself again the premiere symphonic ensemble of the country, and produced a program unlikely to be matched anywhere. Detroit Symphony, coming on later this month on Mutual in same slot (8:30-9:30 p. m.), will be in another, minor league. Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, devoted its hour to Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony in a truly heroic reading of the masterwork, with the organization displaying fine balance of tone and its choirs showing in top mid-season form at the very start.

There was a perceptible break between first and second movements of the symphony, doubtless caused by Symphony Hall audience being admitted at that time. But what was more noticeable, and a little trying, was the opening commercial by Staats Cotsworth, which though geared on a high plane, was much too long for a dial audience waiting to hear the music. Stressing role of industrial America geared for victory, Cotsworth brought in other voices in various testimonials to A-C products, dragging out the plug deplorably. Shorter commercial at close was more acceptable, especially since symphony was over. Choice of "Eroica" was singularly appropriate for opening program, Koussevitzky dedicating symphony "to the heroes of the United Nations."

Bron.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 15 1944

THE PROGRAM NOTE

By VIRGIL THOMSON

VIRTUALLY unknown to the Continent of Europe, the program note is an Anglo-American observance. Expressing, as it does here, our national cult of information along with our respect for the educational process, it is intended to give to our orchestral concerts at least the air and, hopefully, the prestige of public instruction.

Not that there is much real instruction involved. Our symphonic entertainments represent rather a ceremonial devotion to the orchestra as an instrument than any systematic or comprehensive exposition of its repertory. And the program note itself, as its usage becomes more widespread in all kinds of concert-giving, tends to contain less and less of information about anything. It is considered necessary to print but unnecessary to read. The habit at Carnegie Hall and elsewhere of keeping the house lights, even during intermissions, at lower than reading level shows that the management does not think much of the reading matter in the programs.

* * *

Intellectual Standards Are in Decline

JUST as the notes that Donald Tovey used to write for his own concerts in Edinburgh mark a unique achievement in musical analysis for lay comprehension, so the highest perfection of the program note as a form of belles-lettres occurred in America in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when these were written by Philip Hale. Edwardian traditions of scholarship and of prose style survive still in the notes of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, written by Alfred Frankenstein, and somewhat in those of Felix Borowsky, written for Chicago. Boston has gone off in both respects, and so has Philadelphia. The Philharmonic notes, once so gracefully penned, like those for Philadelphia, by Lawrence Gilman, have declined so far in simple accuracy that one hesitates nowadays to accept any statement printed there, even when one can decipher, which is far from always, its syntax.

The New York City Symphony offered last week copious notes by Macklin Marrow that were clearly enough expressed but that contained less information about the works discussed than I have ever before encountered in similar writings, save only at the Hollywood Bowl. They read like a publisher's blurb or like a radio announcement. Those of Emanuel Winternitz in the programs of the Members' Concerts that have been given in the last two years at the Metropolitan Museum of Art are, on the other hand, both genuinely informative and gracefully composed. They are the work of a scholar, worth reading and worth keeping.

* * *

The Ritual Nature of Orchestral Concerts

THE purpose of this article is not to plead for better program notes, though a rise above present standards would be most welcome. It is rather to call attention to the fact in this domain, as I did last Sunday with regard to repertory, to the contrast between the facade of our orchestral concerts and their real content. Camouflaged as instruction, which, to be serious, must be, however broadly schematic, both progressive and comprehensive, they are actually ceremonial observances, as rigid a rite as the Mass. Repertory is strictly traditional and strictly sacred. Not only are the same pieces played every year, but the same people sit in the same seats every year to hear them. And in spite of the fact that every seat is provided with a prayer book, the service takes place in so dim a religious light that following it in the pages presumably printed for that purpose is out of the question. Is it any wonder that when you examine these pages later in the clearer illumination of a subway train or at home they turn out more often than not to contain mumbo-jumbo or, at best, a sort of devotional literature calculated less to instruct than, by its mere presence, to soothe?

Schönberg Variations Heard for First Time

Monitor Oct 21, 1944

By L. A. Sloper

The performance, for the first time anywhere, of Arnold Schönberg's Theme and Variations for Orchestra, Op. 43B, was the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Friday concert of the season, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky scheduled the work in honor of the composer's seventieth anniversary.

Another novelty was Martinů's Concerto for Two Pianos, heard for the first time in Boston. Otherwise the program read: Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, Corelli-Pinelli; Mozart, Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra (K-365); Rimsky-Korsakov, Suite from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan." The pianists were Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff.

Schönberg, one of the most controversial figures in music, is not in the least formidable in this latest work. Can this be because it was first written for a band? Whatever the reason, it is closer in spirit to the early "Verklärte Nacht" or "Pelleas and Melisande" than to the "Pierrot Lunaire" or "Die Glückliche Hand."

Here we have a clearly stated theme, seven variations and a conclusion, in classical form, and in an idiom no more forbidding than those of Wagner, Mahler or Strauss. It is scholarly, of course, but readily understandable and not too dissonant, I should think, for anybody's enjoyment.

But it would be unwise to conclude that Schönberg is seizing his seventieth anniversary as occasion for turning back to romanticism, or anything of that sort. He is no Stravinsky, and he has kept a pretty straight course. If his music has been for the eye rather than the ear, that may be the fault of contemporary ears.

"I have never had a theory in my life," writes Schönberg in a "statement" quoted in the program notes from a book edited by Merle Armitage. "I write what I feel in my heart—and what finally comes on paper is what first coursed through every fiber of my body." So the man has been a romantic all the time? Perhaps, but a very intellectual one.

Martinů's new work is a concerto in the older sense, a composition designed to display the virtuosity of the soloists, with the orchestra providing an accompaniment. A showpiece it is, too, with a glittering surface and nothing much in the way of musical content underneath. Has the composer been spending too much time in the night clubs? For this concerto certainly smells of the hot spots. It is the sort of thing Liszt might have written if he had been born 80 years later, and in the United States.

Of course Mr. Luboshutz and Mme. Nemenoff were equal to all the demands the composer could make on them, and so was the orchestra—though it is possible that this kind of music would get a better performance from a dance orchestra, which would better understand its Weltanschauung.

But the soloists, and the orchestra too, made a far more important contribution to culture with their interpretation of the Mozart concerto. This was the same composition we heard from the same forces at Tanglewood last summer, but this time it was without the additional accompaniment of a thunderstorm. Again the performance was the high point of the particular concert, a pure musical delight.

Globe Oct 21

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the third program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Pierre Luboschutz and Genia Nemenoff, duo-pianists, were the soloists. The program follows:

Corelli—Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie (arr. for strings by Pinelli)
Schoenberg—Theme and Variations, Op. 43B.
Mozart—Concerto in E flat for Two Pianos (K.365).
Martinu—Concerto for Two Pianos.
Rimsky-Korsakov—Suite from "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Salton."

Yesterday's concert, if you ask me, was a perfect symphony concert. It was virtually flawless as a performance, so far as that goes, but it was an extraordinary bit of programming, and it is hard to see how anyone could have come away disappointed.

There was, first of all, Pinelli's graceful arrangement for string orchestra of three pieces from Corelli. It is music of the utmost grace and repose, and it is incomparable, both as a display piece for the string section of the orchestra and as an entr'act to a concert of more substantial music.

Schoenberg's Theme and Variations, here having its first performance, is a curious and baffling work. Not that it is particularly difficult listening even the first time around. On the contrary, such thematic and harmonic candor, coming from Schoenberg, is like being handed a bon bon from a chap you've many times caught trying to poison your tea: you are sure there must be arsenic in it somewhere.

Taking it at its face value, however, it cannot be considered important music coming from so gigantic a musical figure as Schoenberg. Were it the music of a newcomer it would be important as a promise of things to come, but it is, actually, a singular retrogression to a point near where Schoenberg left off decades ago after "Verklaerte Nacht." Thus the implication—and it is as devastating as it is faulty—is that the years devoted to the 12-tone system were fruitless. But of this more later on; the immediate point is that the new piece is good to hear, but that is sounds like something Gershwin might have written if he had studied with Richard Strauss, and later with Schoenberg.

Luboschutz and Nemenoff, who did the Mozart Concerto with Dr. Koussevitzky this summer at Tanglewood, repeated their fine success with the work yesterday. They play it with great refinement and delicacy and nuance, and it sounds wonderful. I felt the first movement needed more blood and thunder and more zip, so to speak, but the slow movement and the rondo were exquisitely conceived. But it was in the Martinu Two Piano Concerto the pianists really came into their own. In the first place, the Concerto is truly marvelous. It is almost incandescent in its forward motion or, if you prefer, in its inspiration. There is never a sense of Let's See, What Shall I Do Now? about it as there is in so much contemporary music. It begins and it goes on, and that going on is completely inevitable, completely right. I know of no recent slow movement which is so irresistible, and no recent composition which achieves such expressive, yet unforced, sonorities throughout. In the second place, it was performed with the most sympathetic insight as well as technical skill by the pianists (for whom it was written) and orchestra.

And to conclude, there was the Suite of Pieces from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan." As this contains "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," as well as some sparkling fairy-tale music, it brought the concert to an end with plenty of dash.

YOUTH CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The first of the current season of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, under the direction of Wheeler Beckett, took place yesterday afternoon. The fact that the hall was full when the concert began and partly empty when it ended, suggested that the programme was full long. Interesting and instructive as these are, Mr. Beckett might have curtailed his verbal comments, particularly since they virtually duplicated the information contained in the programme leaflet. The youngsters might well be encouraged to discover these matters for themselves.

As for the contents of this list, beginning was made with the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," and the portion before intermission also contained Enesco's First Rumanian Rhapsody, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," according to Mr. Beckett, one of the numbers most frequently requested, and the conductor's new march, "The Open Road" (after Whitman), which he brought out under another title at an Esplanade concert last August. The music has a strong folk flavor, it is inspiring and effectively scored, but a trifle monotonous as to tonality.

The most taxing piece was yet to come, the Piano Concerto of Schumann, with Leo Litwin as the soloist. To this romantic composition the Boston pianist brought technical skill, musical taste and, under the circumstances, probably enougn of sentiment. His reception by an audience that had behaved throughout in exemplary fashion, was enthusiastic.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 18 1944

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Opens Season in Providence at the Metropolitan

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Bostor Symphony Orchestra played last night in Metropolitan Theater, opening its Providence season of five concerts. The audience was large and willing.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who was expected to conduct, did not, which disappointed many. A program insert explained that he was ill and that Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, would substitute. Mr. Burgin is a very able man and he gave a satisfying performance. It lacked something of polish and fine detail, as is inevitable in such circumstances, but it was hearty, it moved, it sounded.

The third symphony of Beethoven, the "Eroica," led the list. Mr. Burgin attacked it with characteristic energy, and the orchestra followed his guidance with enthusiasm. The quality and quantity of tone in themselves were something to hear, and the familiar themes sounded fresh and compelling. Even the funeral march, which many a listener finds somewhat longer than necessary, bore up. The scherzo and the finale exhilirated the audience with speed and rhythm. Mr. Burgin was applauded insistently.

A new American composition, "Prayer in Time of War," by William Schuman, was played. It induced at times, a solemn and contemplative mood; at other times the bitter warring of neighboring notes was more than my ears could conveniently swallow, to mix a midnight metaphor. I tried to like it. I tried to find in it the value that great musicians claim for it. I couldn't. But I am glad it was played, and I hope the orchestra will play much more music by serious contemporaries, whether people like it or not.

This better dose was followed by a big piece of candy, the suite from "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan." The strings were not up to snuff in pizzicato, but they and the woodwinds made exquisite work of the bumblebee, and the whole orchestra ended in one of those hurricanes of tone that send the customers away feeling that they are certainly glad they were there.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 22 1944

To Koussevitzky Great Music Is 'Life Necessity'

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not only a great musician but a keen philosopher. "Great music," he says, "is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

The Boston Symphony is one of six orchestras which will be heard in the coming Bushnell Symphony Series, a course that brings here such distinguished symphony groups and leaders as Cleveland Orchestra (Vladimir Golschmann); National Symphony (Dr. Hans Kindler); Philadelphia Orchestra (Eugene Ormandy); Rochester Philharmonic (Sir Thomas Beecham) and New York Philharmonic Symphony (Artur Rodzinski.)

"Great music," Koussevitsky contends, "makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes a life dull is the experience of tragedy in some form, and rising to its challenge. The great composers all have had their trials by tragedy. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite the opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians, and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

Globe Oct 20

Lt Laus, Newton, Killed in Action

NEWTON, Oct. 20—1st Lt Andre N. Laus, 29, son of Mr. and Mrs. Abdon Laus of 101 Washington st., has been killed in action in France where he was assigned to the French Army of Liberation, according to word received here by his family.

Lt Laus was born in France. He was graduated from Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1937 and was a research chemist for the Monsanto Chemical Company. His father has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 27 years.

1ST LT ANDRE H. LAUS

"After almost two years my dream is at last becoming a reality and you will all be happy to know I am with the Army of Liberation," Lt Laus wrote to his family.

Besides his parents, Lt Laus is survived by his wife, the former Aline Perrin of Brookline; a son, Jacques-Andre, aged 2, and a brother, Jacques Laus of Manchester-by-the-Sea.

A pro-burial mass will be celebrated at the French Church, Notre Dame des Victoires, Isabella st., Boston, on Saturday, Oct. 28, at 11 o'clock.

Globe Oct 21

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL '44'

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Due-pianists Pierre Luboshutz and his wife, Genia Nemenoff, are the first soloists of the season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They played yesterday afternoon—and will again tonight—two remarkable scores, the E-flat Concerto (K. 365) by Mozart, and the Concerto for Two Pianos by Bohuslav Martinu. The latter is new to Boston.

The remainder of the program consists of Ettore Pinelli's familiar string arrangement of the Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie by Corelli; Arnold Schoenberg's Theme and Variations for Orchestra, Op. 43b (first performances), and the Suite of four orchestral excerpts from the opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" by Rimsby-Korsakoff. Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

It was high time that Luboshutz and Nomenoff appeared at a pair of Symphony concerts in the "regular" series, for they are brilliant virtuosi and distinguished musicians. The extreme precision and smoothness of their ensemble, together with their exact sense of style, were superb in Mozart's graceful, effervescent work. And their playing underscored the inherent brilliance of Martinu's effective and very lively score.

The Martinu Concerto involves the two pianos almost as orchestral instruments, yet most of the way the keyboard parts stand out in the colorful, closely-knit tonal fabric. Martinu's idiom is modern, crisp and expressive and not too dissonant. The composer knows exactly where he is going and there is no uncertainty of direction except where the orchestra gets to ruminating a bit in the slow movement. This Concerto almost surely is a landmark in the history of composition for paired pianos. The audience received soloists and music ecstatically.

The Schoenberg work, first conceived for band, contains the theme, seven variations and a finale, all short. While there is considerable dissonance and much harmonic straying out-of-key, the score does have the key signature of G minor, unusual for Schoenberg. There are some engaging sounds and color, but I found the work elephantine and not very interesting.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the strings again accomplished prodigies of nuance and silken tone with the lovely little movements of Corelli. It was good to hear again the depictive and orientally colored music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which can be listened to for the sheer luxurious pleasure of rich sounds, and without any of the intellectual wondering-what-the-devil-this-is-all-about required by Schoenberg and certain other abstract composers. The orchestra played magnificently.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Oct 21

Would that more Symphony Concerts were as entertaining as that of yesterday afternoon. There was plenty of variety, nothing was stale, and two pieces were new, Schoenberg's Theme and Variations for Orchestra and Martinu's Concerto for two Pianos. In its own way each piece contributed its full quota of listening pleasure. The other numbers on this week's exemplary list are the Corelli-Pinelli Suite for strings; Mozart's E-flat major Concerto for two pianos, played, like the Martinu, by Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff; and the colorful Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan," which contains the popular "Flight of the Bumble-Bee" and much else besides.

Arnold Schoenberg, who reached his 70th birthday in his California home last month, has recanted by word and deed. Yesterday's Variations, performed for the first time anywhere, are not of the Schoenberg that few have understood and still fewer have really enjoyed. Here is relatively old-fashioned music, in a definite key and full of familiar sound-patterns, given fresh currency by the skill with which they are used. In the matter of style the listener is chiefly reminded of the later Strauss, after he had passed his period of storm and stress. There are faint suggestions of Mahler. This is new Schoenberg but it is the sort of thing he wrote at the beginning of his career, before he tried to revolutionize music with the 12-tone technique which he now appears to have forsaken

Even Martinu has turned his face toward the past to the extent of suggesting Debussy, chiefly in the middle movement and in some degree in the finale, of his exceedingly well-wrought and altogether grateful Concerto, especially composed for the pair which yesterday brought it to such delightful performance, with the substantial help of Dr. Koussevitzky and an orchestra that was on its best behavior throughout the afternoon. Seldom, in recent years, has a new piece made so striking and satisfying a first impression.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 24 1944

Boston Symphony Often Programs New Compositions

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its world-famous conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky were recently the subject of an enthusiastic editorial in the Boston Herald. On the occasion of the start of the orchestra's 64th season, the writer paid well deserved tribute both to the institution and its leader.

The editorial comment in the Herald reads in part as follows:—"Come war or politics, the Boston Symphony Orchestra keeps playing. Announcement of plans for the 64th season, with presentations of new music, reveals one of the reasons for the astounding career of this superb company. Growing old, it yet has remained young and alert to modern times. Tied irrevocably to the classics, it still finds place for the new composers, thereby increasing its mighty influence upon the music world. Above all living features of the new program looms that giant of music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has molded so painstakingly and so beautifully Boston's greatest single contribution to the artistic life of New England."

The Boston Symphony is the first of six orchestras scheduled here in the Bushnell Symphony Series.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 18 1944

POSSELT PRESENTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

Handel, Bach, Moderns Played by Violinist at Town Hall—Lukas Foss Accompanist

Aside from its purely musical values, Ruth Posselt's recital at Town Hall last night was a noteworthy affair. For this young American violinist deserves great praise for devising a program that was at once unusual and effective. Though the classics were represented by Handel's D Major Sonata and Bach's A Major work in the same form, the major portion was devoted to contemporary works, largely by composers whose reputations are firmly established.

Included in this category were Hindemith's Sonata in E, two preludes of Shostakovich, Prokofieff's "Melodie," Milhaud's "Ipanema," a group of Rumanian folk dances by Bela Bartok, a "Concertstueck" by Henrietta Bosmans, "Hexapoda, Five Studies in Jitteroptera" by Robert Russell Bennett, "Composer's Holiday" by Lukas Foss and "Tango Espagnole" by Arbos. It was a long program; too long perhaps. But it had change of pace and was, all in all, one which other recitalists would do well to note.

Miss Posselt's playing was, as usual, marked by enthusiasm and great vitality. The tone she drew from her violin was not pleasing part of the time, sounding hard and metallic; though in the beautiful larghetto of the Handel sonata she achieved a genuinely poetic effect. Most successful was the last movement of the Hindemith sonata, which gave the artist a chance to employ the vigorous, technical powers she has at her command.

No small share of the credit for the success of Miss Posselt's recital belongs to Lukas Foss, the young composer-pianist, who provided accompaniments that should serve as models of excellence. He brought to the concert a freshness that is so often lacking when a so-called "professional" accompanist presides at the keyboard. Mr. Foss is at present serving as pianist for the Boston Symphony and devoting himself to composition, but, judging from last night's performance, he could doubtless have a successful concert career if he wanted one.—M. A. S.

Herald Oct 23

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr. '44'

Sunday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first concert of its new series of Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Berlioz. Overture "Roman Carnival" Op. 9
Debussy
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"
Ravel
Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"
Beethoven
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

Not being exactly an organization to take risks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday backed a sure thing as it began its new series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall. The time and the place have long been sort of a Sunday afternoon musical ritual what with Richmond series of big-name concerts, so there was practically a full house and, as it turned out, a very enthusiastic one.

There was good reason for this, of course, as Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were in great form, and as the program consisted of four Boston Symphony Orchestra specials, so to speak; things Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra are famous for doing.

The Berlioz, for example. This particular item hasn't been done here for some time, but Dr. Koussevitzky has always had a knack for doing things to Berlioz to make the listener's back hair bristle, as in that blast of the trombones near the end. There he calls for a sforzando which has all the freedom, spontaneity and drive of a jazz trombonist "bending" a note . . . and the odd thing about it is that it couldn't seem more completely right.

In the Ravel, perhaps the most personal property of this orchestra and conductor in the repertoire, too, there are countless touches of incredible sensitivity. There's one place in particular in the Danse generale, impossible to locate without being technical (but which reminds me of a horseman letting his mount go for the final stretch), which is the most exciting moment in music—but only when Koussevitzky does it, as you can see if you compare recorded versions. The juxtaposition of the Debussy and the Ravel proved an interesting demonstration in subtly differing coloristic values, and also an opportunity to hear the marvelous instrumental qualities achieved by Mr. Laurent on the flute and Mr. Gillet on the oboe. The second half of the program offered Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, about which I can think of nothing whatever to say.

SONG OF THANKSGIVING

Globe Oct 30-1944

Outwardly the sight seemed nothing unusual. It was last December after a concert in Sanders Theatre and the audience was pouring down those big wooden staircases into the transept of Memorial Hall. On the marble pavement below stood a group looking up at that slow-motion cascade of humanity with amused astonishment. Mostly the audience were young men and women (the men of course in uniform), but that was not the point. The point was that the concert had been of chamber music by a string quartet, the most austere of musical forms, and the quartets played were the last three by Beethoven, the most abstruse ever written, music which lays the heaviest demand on its listeners. True, the concert was free; but so far was that from explaining this capacity house that the little group of incurable concert-goers in the transept were recalling to one another a time when string quartet concerts drew Scriptural audiences . . . "where two or three are gathered together."

Great oaks from little acorns grow. On South Mountain at Pittsfield a quarter of a century ago, a beautiful little old country church was converted into a modest concert hall for chamber music. Here began the celebrated Berkshire Festivals which were held annually from 1918 to 1924, and irregularly thereafter. In the next decade they became the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

In the Library for Congress at Washington, meanwhile, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, who founded the Berkshire Festivals, had caused to be built an auditorium and had endowed under the Federal Government festivals and single concerts of chamber music, not only there but in cities of the United States as widely sundered as Portland, Oregon, and Athens, Georgia.

Three bereavements in a single year had preceded these benefactions. In 1916-1917 Mrs. Coolidge had suffered the loss of her husband, her father and her mother. Since then her life and her fortune have been devoted to this enrichment of our aesthetic experience as a people. Her work has been encyclopedic. The programs of the concerts she has sponsored, the personnel of the chamber musicians who perform them, the composers, classic or contemporary, whose works are played, the new works commissioned for first performance, first at South Mountain and later in Washington, with prizes awarded for the best, are a compendium of the art of chamber music in our land and time.

Decades later the curious historian traces back to its origin some mighty stream of life and art, coming at last to a clear spring in some such secluded spot as South Mountain at Pittsfield.

Chamber music is a delicate plant. It needed skillful transportation from Europe and careful tendance in this new soil and rugged climate. Having these it has survived, taken deep root, has grown, spread and flourishes until now it gives promise of being a noble tree in the Elysium of American art. After the Kneisels, the Flonzaleys, after the Flonzaleys, South Mountain and all that has followed.

On that afternoon last December in Sanders Theatre before the performance of Beethoven's Quartet in A Minor, opus 132, the first violinist paused to make an announcement. That 15th Quartet contains the Song of Thanksgiving, written by the composer in gratitude for his recovery from a severe illness. The violinist said that Mrs. Coolidge, who had hoped to be present at this series of concerts, had been gravely ill but was recovering, and the Song of Thanksgiving would be played in loving and grateful thought of her.

Today, Oct. 30, 1944, she keeps her eightieth birthday, and multitudes of people think of her with a depth of gratitude which can be uttered only in the music of that Quartet by Beethoven.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Her

MUSIC

Oct. 28-

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richmond Burgin conducting, gave the fourth program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Zino Francescatti, violinist, was soloist, and Lukas Foss, pianist, was assisting artist. The program:

Overture to "The Impressario"	Mozart
Toccata in C major (orch. Weiner)	Bach
Concerto in D, Op. 6	Paganini
Theme and Variations According to the Four Temperaments	Hindemith
Alborada del Gracioso	Ravel

It was manifestly Zino Francescatti's day at the Symphony yesterday. He made his first appearance with the orchestra playing a piece that hasn't been played at these concerts in 50 years or more, and while he proved beyond doubt it shouldn't be played again for at least another 50 years, he gave at the same time one of the most remarkable demonstrations of violin mastery to come this way in seasons. Moreover, he made something out of the musical whatnot he played, and for a time there he had us all convinced he was performing one of the thanscendent masterpieces of music.

In a way, at that, he was. There are violin concertos which are harder than this one, but there is certainly none which looks or sounds harder. And as most of the fun in works like this comes from watching the virtuoso at work, due credit must be given Paganini on the strength of that feat, never mind the quality of his musical inspiration as such. Mr. Francescatti, using the Hart collection Stradivarius of 1727, played it for all it was worth, achieving an extraordinarily warm, golden tone, and negotiating its fabulous intricacies effortlessly.

It is hard to isolate the most remarkable moments of his playing; the passages in thirds, the chromatic scales in sixths and tenths, or the harmonics in double stops. They were all hair-raising, while his spiccato bowing in the rondo was particularly delightful. Yet shining through the fireworks at all times was the violinist's fine musical sensitivity, and now that he has staggered us with his virtuosity, let us hope he returns soon again in a worthier composition.

Not far behind him in interest—and way ahead as pure music—was the Hindemith Theme and Variations. They were done at the final concert of the summer series of the orchestra in September, and at that time it seemed to me they were the most agreeable things Hindemith has done in years. I still think they are, and I would rank them very high on the list of this year's music. The music retains the great strength, the uncompromising astringency of the earlier Hindemith, yet it is more expansive and grateful and, at times, even humorous. It is difficult if not impossible to retain the three themes during the subsequent variations even on a second or third hearing, but I can't see that it matters very much. Again Lukas Foss proved his exceptional pianistic accomplishments, while the string orchestra under Mr. Burgin sounded fine.

The unfamiliar Mozart Overture was so brief as to be over before you really got settled down: the Weiner transcription of the towering C major Toccata of Bach proved acceptable (although it is fortunate I think that this orchestra hasn't got the habit of doing Bach transcriptions very often), and Ravel's Alborada del Grazioso brought the concert to a pleasant conclusion. Mr. Burgin conducted very capably throughout, and the orchestra played as it always plays, which is to say superbly.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 29 1944

TO GRETCHANINOFF

The following tribute to Alexandre Gretchaninoff, resident in this city, whose eightieth birthday occurred Oct. 25, was paid him, on behalf of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, chairman of its committee on music, and a long personal friend of the distinguished Russian composer and octogenarian:

To the Music Editor:

A tribute, as wide and warm as the human heart, goes to the loved dean of the Russian composers, Alexandre Gretchaninoff, on the happy occasion of his eightieth anniversary.

It is a special joy for me, dear Alexandre Tikhonovitch, to extend to you the congratulations and greetings on behalf of the Musicians Committee of the National Council of American - Soviet Friendship.

Your art holds the deep-rooted tradition and the ever-present love for your motherland. But it also holds a profound spiritual meaning.

Your greatest achievement among the contemporary composers, amid a war-torn world, has been to raise the voice of music above all disparity and difference of creed and belief. Your music has helped to unite mankind in the light of eternal truth and love, serving God and serving men.

May your eightieth birthday be blessed by the beauty and comfort your music brings into the world and be warmed by our affection, admiration and gratitude.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 29 1944

CHICAGO'S ORCHESTRA

By VIRGIL THOMSON

AMONG America's great symphony orchestras that of Chicago stands third in seniority (only Boston and the New York Philharmonic Symphony being older) and among the first three in quality (its standards of execution being comparable to those of Boston and Philadelphia). For fifty-one years it had only two permanent conductors, Theodore Thomas and Frederick Stock, though Eric Delamarter took it over for two seasons during the other world war, when Dr. Stock, at that time a German citizen, was in retirement from public life. On Dr. Stock's death, two years ago, the post fell vacant. His assistant Hans Lange being asked to carry on for the rest of the season.

From an artistic point of view the post is a plum, since the orchestra is first-class, the Chicago musical public both large and enlightened, and the tradition of long tenure for conductors one inspiring of any man's best efforts. Among many distinguished applicants, the appointment fell a year ago to the Belgian conductor Desire Defauw previously known on this continent chiefly through his work with the Montreal Symphony Orchestra and from a few guest appearances in Boston. Chicago has been a battle ground ever since.

The front of the opposition has been Claudia Cassidy, music critic of "The Chicago Tribune," who has carried on a press campaign of no small vigor to expose what she considers to be Mr. Defauw's musical unworthiness for a post so rich in tradition and so high in responsibility. Being curious to taste the qualities of a workman who has been the object of so sustained a discussion, your reviewer took occasion last week to attend the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series in orchestra hall. With no wish in the world to insert himself into a Chicago dispute and one which shows signs of quieting down this season, anyway, he offers here no reflected opinion of Mr. Defauw's work (nor could he from one hearing) but simply a review of a musical occasion that he happened to attend.

* * *

Attest Program

THE program was one well designed to show off any conductor's gifts and weaknesses; it might have been set as an examination. There was a Berlioz overture (the "Benvenuto Cellini"), a Brahms symphony (No. 2), Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and (of all things) the Scriabin "Poeme de l'Extase." The Berlioz is an easy piece, though few play it well; they mostly let it go rackety. The Scriabin is not at all an easy piece either for the players or for the conductor. Its rhythm has a tendency to go spineless and its instrumentation to get blurred. It requires eight horns, moreover, an outlay of brasses difficult to produce in war time. Their presence is required also, of course, for the "Scythian Suite." As for Brahms and Prokofieff, the conductor does not live who can interpret both writers equally well, so utterly opposed are they in their understanding of rhythm.

Brahms, as you may well imagine, came off least well among the composers represented. I say you may well imagine, because Mr. Defauw is a musician of French rather than of German training and because, as a youngish man (turned fifty, I should guess), he is a child of the twentieth century rather than of the nineteenth. His Brahms was handsomely phrased and cleanly articulated, but it didn't seem to be about anything. It was not careless or mushy or overweening. It was just too neatly sculptured to make any of the kind of sense Brahms's music must make if it is to avoid being pompous. Certainly it had none of the dreamy quality that made Stock's playing of this same music so lovely and so enveloping.

* * *

Twentieth-Century Musicianship

THE Gallicism of Mr. Defauw's musical mind was exemplified constantly in the clarity of all his orchestral textures. Loud or soft, you could always hear what was being played. That orchestra in that hall can make the most resonant fortissimos in America. Terribly, wonderfully loud, these were always beautiful and always clean. The modernity of his rhythmic understanding was exemplified in the Prokofieff and Scriabin works, where quantitative scansion and tonic stresses must be kept separate. Defauw is a clear-minded musician, a master of equilibrium, of rhythm and of phraseology; and he has a taste for brightness of sound. For these qualities I can forgive him much. He makes good programs, too, if the four or five printed in the program book are typical, mixing the romantic century constantly with our own and not forgetting the eighteenth.

It is not for what musicians play badly that we remember them but for what they play well. And this listener will long remember the performance he heard in Chicago of Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and of Scriabin's melodically outmoded but orchestrally still sumptuous "Poem of Ecstasy." He has heard many pretentious and vain renderings of both. Neither is it the first time he has slept through somebody's Brahms. But he has never heard the two Russian works rendered with so high a degree of luminosity. And that luminosity was the result of precise orchestral balances and correct rhythm scansion. One is grateful for these qualities in a world where overworked orchestras and overadvertised conductors are becoming increasingly careless about both.

Globe MUSIC - Oct. 26 -

SYMPHONY HALL
First Youth Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

The seventh season of Youth Concerts given under auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., began yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Wheeler Beckett, conductor of the series since their inception, began the afternoon—following the "Star Spangled Banner"—with the Prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and ended it with the Schumann Piano Concerto with Leo Litwin as soloist. In between came Enesco's First Romanian Rhapsody, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, and Mr. Beckett's own bright march "The Open Road."

The last-named was suggested by verses from Whitman's "Song of the Open Road" and is appropriately cheerful and bustling if not remarkable in its thematic material. Yet the scoring is technically competent—the piece does "sound," and it winds up with a really exciting peroration. Mr. Beckett introduced it, under another title, at the Esplanade last Summer.

Yesterday's warm, damp weather was not good for music, especially for strings, and the orchestra of Boston Symphony men did not present its usual clear, rich tone. That could not have been the only reason for performances of less than usual polish, however, because the Enesco and Debussy were coarse in tone and detail. The Schumann Concerto went well enough, Mr. Litwin taking the keyboard part competently, but it ran to sluggish tempi.

There can be no doubt that the virtually capacity audience of youngsters enjoyed the program. But it would be wise for the adults who accompanied them to put in a decisive word about silence while the music is going on.

SYMPHONY DEBUT—Zino Francescatti, violinist, who makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony playing Paganini's Concerto in D major, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Herald

MUSIC

Nov. 11-

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, gave the sixth program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. William Primrose, violist, was the soloist. The program:

Toch	"Pinocchio, a Merry Overture"
Berlioz	"Harold in Italy," Op. 16
Bloch	Suite for Viola and Orchestra
Strauss	"Till Eulenspiegel," Op. 28

Yesterday's concert may be added to the really notable concerts of the season. It would have been if only for the appearance as soloist of William Primrose, but it was equally so for its program, which contrasted Toch's delightful "Pinocchio" with Strauss's enormously clever "Till Eulenspiegel," and Berlioz's mauve "Harold in Italy" with Bloch's exotic Suite for Viola. And all this was superbly set forth by Dr. Koussevitzky at the top of his form and by the orchestra in the top of its. In short, the concert was as full of interest as an egg's full of meat.

For all its pleasures of sentiment, lyricism and sheer sound and fury, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" was forced into the background by Bloch's atmospheric Suite for Viola, and by Mr. Primrose's traversal of it. In the Berlioz (which is sentimental enough, Lord love it), the soloist had a tendency to lean on lushness a little too much for propriety, but his approach to the Bloch was admirable, while his technical accomplishments on the instrument were quite beyond belief in both the Berlioz and the Bloch compositions.

As in all of Bloch's music, there is a singularly mystical, personal quality about the Suite for Viola (one movement of which was omitted yesterday). There is a rapture of ecstasy which is hardly to be resisted, and here, set against the composer's own vision of the Far East, it is even more magical, more exotic, more hypnotic. Yet it never descends to sensation, always retaining a becoming reserve, and leaving something to the creative imagination of its audience. "Harold in Italy," on the other hand, is all feelings run in soft luxurious flow, as Cardinal Newman put it. Yet it doesn't by any means faint at every woe; on the contrary, when Berlioz switches off his sentiment he unleashes some rattling good bombast, and it is all wonderfully entertaining.

Like "Harold in Italy," "Till" is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's miracles. You get the impression there is a world of wisdom and tolerance in his conception of the character. There is nothing vicious or cruel or capricious in his reading of the score; Till is comedy, yes, but he is also tragedy, and the grim part of it is the tragedy is as much our own as "Till's," for Till was a rogue all right, but he died fighting (in his own way) against oppression.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 22 1944

REPORT FROM BOSTON

BOSTON.

THE Boston Symphony, entering its sixty-fourth year and its twenty-first under Serge Koussevitzky, is attracting a new segment to the public, and indications are that new attendance records will be set. Season subscriptions are above last year's, but individual concert ticket sales are startling even the almost imperturbable box-office overseers. Such sales indicate that the new public, informally designated as the younger business people, have discovered there is something to serious music and that, perhaps for the first time, they have enough money to risk a season.

Too, it is quite possible that Dr. Koussevitzky's confidence in American composers and the more frequent presentation of their works have something to do with the upsurge. In any event, there is a definite new interest in the Boston Symphony.

Conducted While Ill

Koussevitzky has more than rewarded this new audience, arising from a sick bed to conduct the first pair of concerts in Symphony Hall. Afflicted with a heavy cold which he has not yet shaken off, the 70-year-old conductor wove the première of David Diamond's Second symphony into last week's program as further proof that young American composers are being watched.

Mr. Diamond's work was well received, especially by the more varied Saturday night audience that heartily endorsed Koussevitzky's presentation and called Mr. Diamond to the stage three times. The Friday afternoon gathering, which included more of old Boston than the younger set, was only mildly receptive to the new work.

Boston music critics paid Mr. Diamond a great deal of attention. Their chief complaint seemed to be that he had written too long, that his composition was interesting rather than good. They conceded Mr. Diamond's excellent technical equipment, his display of a "considerable gift of melody," but pointed out an "excessively dissonant idiom" derived from Shostakovich and Roy Harris in the latter's Third Symphony.

Schoenberg Played

Another new work had its first public performances last Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony. This was Arnold Schoenberg's Theme and Variations for Orchestra, his latest score. It was completed last year.

In addition to the twenty-four regular Friday and Saturday concerts at home, the orchestra will present twenty-four other local concerts. Six Sunday afternoon concerts are an innovation, the Tuesday afternoon presentations having been canceled to accommodate the younger business people. There will also be six Monday night concerts and six Wednesday afternoon youth concerts, while the usual eight concerts in Cambridge have been reduced to six this year.

WILLIAM M. BLAIR.

Richard Burgin Conducts Fourth Symphony Concert

Monitor Oct. 28, '44

By L. A. Sloper

Richard Burgin has put together a program of considerable variety for the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, yesterday and tonight. Opening with Mozart's Overture to "The Impresario," it continues with the Weiner orchestration of Bach's Organ Toccata in C major, Paganini's Violin Concerto in D major, Hindemith's Theme and Variations according to the Four Temperaments, for strings and piano, and Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso."

If the artistic pattern of this arrangement is not apparent, the list has at all events some elements of novelty. The Hindemith, introduced by Mr. Burgin at one of the summer series of concerts last September, had yesterday its first hearing in Symphony Hall. Zino Francescatti ,the soloist, appeared for the first time with the Boston orchestra, and the concerto he chose had gone so long unheard here that it was virtually new to the town. Mozart's Overture was performed for the first time at these concerts.

The high point musically was unquestionably Hindemith's Variations, which probably will rank with his best works, such as "Mathis der Maler" and "Nobilissima Visione." The score reveals not only scholarship but imagination and emotion, and even humor, as witness the final section of the movement representing the Phlegmatic Temperament. Without humor this movement could hardly have been written, since to express the phlegamtic temperament in sound must be something like writing music suggesting silence.

The other moods are more easily called up: the Melancholic, the Sanguine, and especially the Choleric. Remember Leo Ornstein's little piano pieces? Not that we should think of comparing Ornstein to Hindemith. Ornstein declared himself "not concerned with form." And Hindemith's Variations are not to be judged by their success in evoking temperaments. Their interest lies rather in their musical content and their design. Their instrumental sonorities and their dark coloring constitute a lagnappe.

Mr. Burgin secured a brilliant performance, notable for its precision, clarity, and balance. Lukas Foss distinguished himself by his playing of the piano part; and since this was his introduction to the Symphony audience as a member of the orchestra, the conductor brought him forward to take a bow.

Mr. Francescatti's success yesterday reached the proportions of an ovation. He earned the tribute by displaying his mastery of all the tricks of the violinist's trade. His tone is sweet, though not broad, his intonation sure, and his rhythmic feeling vital. Whether his musicianship ranks with his virtuosity can hardly be decided until he is heard in a more musically interesting composition. Paganini was a rather absurd figure in a rather absurd era, and his music is for violinists.

Mozart's Overture is characteristic. He is one of the very few composers who seem never to have written anything dull.

PIC
NEW YORK CITY

OCT [illegible]

Pic People

Colorful personalities and characters you may have missed in day's news

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky celebrated his 21st year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the Allis-Chalmers sponsored broadcasts came back to the Blue airwaves on October 7th. Topranking with internationally famous conductors, Koussevitzky is the ardent sponsor of many aspiring American composers. A citizen of the world, Koussevitzky believes the role of music in promoting international brotherhood cannot be overemphasized. He urges an international music festival soon.

Globe MUSIC Nov. 11

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky was back in all the fire and magnificence of his usual form at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. All outward signs of the illness that had plagued him for weeks was gone, and he whipped the orchestra into a white heat of virtuosity. The program was one to scintillate all the more for such treatment, and it brought Ernst Toch's "Pinocchio, a Merry Overture," the "Harold in Italy" Symphony of Berlioz, the Suite for Viola and Orchestra by Ernest Bloch, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

William Primrose, the distinguished soloist in both Berlioz and Bloch, made his first appearance with the orchestra. His playing, brilliant from a technical view and utterly marvelous from that of emotion and expression, won him a reception from the Friday audience that was notably cordial. From the instrument of love, as certain poets have called the viola, Mr. Primrose draws a tone pure and round, one that glows in the low register and glints up high. His technic involves that muscular coordination of accuracy, precision and speed which bespeaks a great master.

The appeal of Berlioz' music is completely sensuous. Berlioz must be played with absolute conviction and drastic force because his music is all passion, color and youthful ardor. When recreated thus it can enthrall you in a way of which no other music is capable save that of the two Richards—Wagner and Strauss, and the two Impressionists—Debussy and Ravel. Yesterday's "Harold in Italy" was supremely captivating, representing orchestral and solo virtuosity and unflawed rapport between them both.

The Suite by Bloch, heard here but once before, in 1925, is another matter. Though an agreeable, modern and colorful score, it is long and diffuse, and its idiom all too often betrays heavy indebtedness to the style of Debussy. Much of the interest lies in the orchestra, but of course the solo part affords brilliant display for the violist. Unless I had read Mr. Bloch's avowal of the background of the Suite, I would never think of the East Indies and their shrouded mystery as having been his inspiration. The second movement, incidentally, was omitted.

Toch's fanciful Overture is altogether charming. It is also highly condensed and to the point. The composer, who was present and bowed, must have enjoyed Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent reading. "Till Eulenspiegel" always fires the conductor to play it with the utmost wit and intensity. Yesterday's "Till" was quintessential Strauss and Kousevitzky.

Globe MUSIC Oct. 23, '44

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY CYRUS DURGIN

A very large audience heard the first concert in the new Sunday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program of what may accurately be called "popular masterpieces": Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture; "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy; the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. Each is a masterpiece, and each is popular.

Abandonment of the Tuesday series in favor of Sundays, on the evidence of yesterday's audience, was a wise decision. For some years the Tuesday audiences had been declining. Now the beauties of the Boston Symphony are available to a large public with leisure on Sundays. One who follows Boston concert audiences season after season comes to recognize their general appearance. Looking about Symphony Hall yesterday one would have said that the great orchestra indisputably is attracting new listeners. That is all to the good.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were in taut form. It seemed that everything was overplayed a little [illegible] the side of increased volume and intensity. That was all right, too, for each of the pieces—with the possible exception of Debussy's languorous raptures—can take it.

The sounds of the orchestra were utterly marvelous in Debussy and Ravel—which last, as some Bostonians know, Mr. Koussevitzky interprets with a distinction all his own.

The occasional "raw" scoring of Berlioz' showy Overture was made to sound the more so, but since brilliance in color and effect is the governing purpose of the "Roman Carnival," the music did not suffer. Mr. Koussevitzky's way with the mighty Fifth of Beethoven simply intensifies the driving emotional force and makes it even mightier.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Leonard Bernstein is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week. His program consists of two long and exacting works, the D minor Piano Concerto of Brahms, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the Fifth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovich.

Beyond all doubt young Mr. Bernstein has made great progress as conductor since he last appeared here, in February. Then he was heard in his own "Jeremiah" Symphony and Copland's "El Salon Mexico." This time, with an entire program as his responsibility, he shows increased technical maturity and freedom of expression. Symphony Hall reverberated yesterday afternoon with the handclapping of a notably enthusiastic reception. One deeply interested listener in the first balcony, who himself applauded cordially, was the orchestra's own conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Bernstein's exceptional talents now have a sharper focus and deeper concentration. The more extravagant of his gestures are gone. He no longer seems to conduct with an emotional fury that threatens to burn itself out. His work has taken on perception and refinement at no cost of essential passion. His ear for tonal balance and subtle colors must be keener.

From the start Mr. Bernstein showed a grasp of organic musical structure, which is the ability to recreate a piece of music with the main emphasis upon motion and the main architectural lines, but in which there is a fine adjustment of details to the work as a whole. That ability counted heavily in the D minor Piano Concerto, a solid but spreading and chunkily scored work of Brahms' youth and inexperience. A conductor must gage a reading of this Concerto most carefully, otherwise it divides into fragmentary episodes.

Between them, Mr. Sanroma and Mr. Bernstein gave a highly competent and often exciting performance. Mr. Sanroma's technique met Brahms' difficulties triumphantly, and though he did not cut loose, expressively, in the flying-hair rhapsodies of the "Romantic" tradition, he played with weight and feeling and comprehension of the Brahms style.

Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony had an electrical effect, as when the fur of a cat is rubbed the wrong way. The colors were vivid, the rhythms exact and lively, and the climaxes mounted into a frenzy of emotion and orchestral big sounds.

Herald MUSIC Nov. 4

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the fifth program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program follows:

Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84; Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92
Shostakovitch—Symphony No. 6

Very little to get excited about yesterday at the symphony concert that I could see. The Beethoven was good and the Shostakovitch was less good while the performance of both under Mr. Burgin (Dr. Koussevitzky being ill but not, fortunately, seriously), was neat, precise and orderly.

Nothing ever really took fire, so to speak, but the communication between orchestra and audience was assured in the Beethoven, of course, because it was Beethoven and because anybody who doesn't like Beethoven is sure there must be something wrong with him anyway, and in the Shostakovitch because everyone was curious to hear what there was about it that caused the powers that be to single it out from the dozens of other new works which have had performances here in recent seasons.

Frankly, I couldn't see that there was much of anything about it which should give it rehearing precedence over, say, Martinu's First Symphony. However, it is certainly the most distinguished of Shostakovitch's symphonies. Its first movement, the first two-thirds of it at any rate, stands as serious music of the highest order. The theme of the largo itself is distinguished, even elevated in tone, but it comes to a complete stop over protracted trilled pedal points which continue so long that by the re-entrance of the principal theme you have all but lost patience. You feel, quite properly, that the composer could have had his say in a little less time.

The scherzo which follows is bright, amusing and really very satisfactory, but the finale comes perilously near to cheapness. The composer is right in contrasting his serious, even oppressive, first movement with two short and entertaining movements, but the finale is a little too tasteless to accept, and it brings down the general level of the work.

The first movement was exceptionally well played by the orchestra under Mr. Burgin; the other two wanted in the brilliance and verve necessary to overcome, by sheer force, the commonness of the inspiration. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was especially well and clearly done, however. Mr. Burgin's conception was straightforward, notable for its honesty and its sincerity. There were no emotional distortions or interpretative excesses, but on the other hand there was no tension or glamor, so to speak. You could take it or you could leave it alone, depending upon your mood. And it must be said the audience yesterday was in the mood to take it.

Globe MUSIC Nov. 4

SYMPHONY HALL 1944

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin is conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts at Symphony Hall again this week, due to the continued indisposition of Serge Koussevitzky. The program consists of the "Egmont" Overture and Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, and the Sixth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovich.

The great Overture of Beethoven, last heard in the Friday-Saturday series in 1935, was disappointingly performed. Indeed, most of the afternoon the orchestra's playing was far short fo the polish, tonal richness and overall precision usual at the Symphony concerts. In the "Egmont" the strings were thin and a little coarse; Mr. Burgin's pace was stodgy and he permitted numerous details vital to the general dramatic effect to be lost in the shuffle.

On the whole, the A major Symphony went much better, although the finale was taken so fast—as indeed it is by all conductors—that the rushing figures for strings were anything but clean-cut. Mr. Burgin began the famous allegretto, whose correct tempo is one of the most delicate matters in symphonic literature, a bit on the rapid side, but slowed down within eight measures. I liked his way with the scherzo, which rippled along clearly and lightly, and whose trio was neither too slow nor too fast.

The Sixth Symphony of Shostakovich is certainly one of his best and I suspect it will last longer than either of its gargantuan successors, the Seventh and the Eighth. No one need take hte Sixth very seriously, however, for it is not profound. But it is well scored and the buoyant allegro and caricature march have a lot of wit.

That melancholy phrase heard so often during the long and slow first movement in the form of solos over organ-point bass, is probably labored a little too much. But the music is full of color and warmth and it "sounds" all the way. That the Symphony is not profound is no barrier to its enjoyment for its positive merits of rhythm, orchestration, tunes and Slavic flavor. There is room in music for both entertainment and the deeper emotions.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Making his first appearance as guest-conductor, in the fullest acceptance of the term, Leonard Bernstein prepared for the current Symphony Concerts a programme that seemed fraught with certain perils. Paired on this list are a piano concerto, the First of Brahms, and a symphony, the Fifth of Shostakovitch, both in the somber key of D minor and consuming between them close on two hours. Moreover, those of yesterday afternoon and this evening are the seventh of the latter piece at Symphony Hall in a little under six years. Now Shostakovitch is both the most important and the most popular composer of symphonies to emerge since Sibelius called it quits, but the Finn's symphonies were run into the ground, and if the proponents of the Soviet composer don't watch out they'll place him in the same predicament.

All fears, however, were set at rest. The intermission cancelled the monotony of key and the Shostakovitch Symphony received a performance comparable in intensity, excitement and tonal richness to Dr. Koussevitsky's own and no doubt served to win some new converts.

Shostakovitch completed his Fifth Symphony when he had just turned 30; Brahms was in his 26th year, practically the age that Mr. Bernstein is now, when he finished the Concerto that remains, the most un-get-atable though by no means the least rewarding of his larger works. The pianist yesterday, to mention belatedly a significant achievement, was Jesus Maria Sanroma. Chiefly famed for his brilliant handling of modern music, Mr. Sanroma has not before tackled publicly anything so serious and profound. He has matured enormously, else he could not have brought to pass so penetrating a performance. If he and Mr. Bernstein between them did not reveal everything that was in the score, they came close enough to it to make their joint effort a minor, if not a major triumph. Boston can point to both of them with pride, and yesterday's audience seemed sensible of the fact.

Brooklyn Inst - [illegible]

OTHER CONCERTS OF THE MONTH

Richard Tucker

Dr. Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

The Test of a Great Conductor

In war as in peace, the Boston Symphony Orchestra adheres to its tradition of superlative performance. And back of its plans and its ideals looms that giant of music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Institute welcomes his return for the annual Brooklyn series of five Friday night concerts, the first of which will be given on November 17.

It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest, the extent of his vision, and his ability to perfect his orchestra. These qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's have been demonstrated over a lengthening term. He has maintained an absorbing approach to the more familiar classics; he has shown a rewarding catholicity of taste; and he imparts genuine inspiration to the men under his baton. The plans he has announced for the 1944-1945 year reveal another reason for the perennial enjoyment of the Boston Symphony. They will continue to find place for the new composers. It is a striking fact that compositions which Dr. Koussevitzky once had the prophetic vision to see as permanent additions to orchestral repertory have become so. That is because he has sought not the merely new, but the new and good.

To the regular attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts, the gestures of Serge Koussevitzky are a marvel of grace and eloquence. How many of his followers must wish that they could watch him face to face, as his musicians see him! A newspaper reporter, who smuggled himself into a choral group appearing with the orchestra, had just such an experience. He has told how Dr. Koussevitzky takes his place before the "desk," pausing for an instant with head slightly bent. Then he sweeps his glance over the faces of the musicians. Next, he stretches his hand out rather deliberately for the baton. Suddenly both hands are raised and again he eyes the orchestra until there is breathless attention on their part. Then down come the arms, swift but gliding, and the sound of the music rises. The amazing expression of hands, body, and face disclose how Dr. Koussevitzky commands the effects achieved in his music. More, they reveal the subjectiveness of his own statement—"Great music is a necessity of life. Great music makes life complete."

Two American Artists

The third and fourth recitals in the American Artists Series, held on Sunday afternoons at 5:30 o'clock, bring Ethel Elfenbein, pianist, on November 12 and Fredell Lack, violinist, on November 26.

Miss Elfenbein was born and educated in New York. At an early age she began to pick out tunes on the piano and was playing in public even before she had received any formal musical instruction. Today, with a B.S. degree in music, she has mastered an unusually extensive repertory and has over a dozen concerti at her command. She is a member of the the faculty at the Henry Street Settlement Music School and has appeared in numerous recitals since her debut in 1939. Radio audiences know Ethel Elfenbein well through her broadcasts over WQXR, WHN, and WNYC.

Fredell Lack is a native of Oklahoma. Since her first public performance there as an eight-year-old, she has won one national and two state awards sponsored by the National Federation of

---

ADVERTISER
CINCINNATI, OHIO

Allis-Chalmers To Renew Popular Broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra . . .

MEN and women workers of major war industries in America are being honored by the Allis-Chalmers broadcasts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in a special series of six salutes which pay tribute to the distinguished service of both management and labor in time of national crisis. Staats Cotsworth, stage and radio actor, is narrator for this series of brief intermission features scheduled from October 14 to December 23. The schedule includes salutes to the Steel industry, Pulp and Paper, Chemical, and Mining industries.

Allis-Chalmers advertisements featuring these salutes are running in trade publications and newspapers in key production cities. Industrial executives, city officials and heads of business groups in each of these cities are notified in advance regarding highlights of the particular broadcast.

Broadcasts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and the Boston "Pops," with Arthur Fiedler as conductor, are heard for the second consecutive year over the Blue Network exclusively (Saturdays, 8:30 P.M., EWT), under the sponsorship of The Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company of Milwaukee. The current symphonic season includes guest artists and conductors of prominence, and guest conductors. After the conclusion of the 30 scheduled broadcasts of the symphony orchestra the Boston "Pops" will again be heard.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 12 1944

Boston Symphony Plays New Composition Here

Schuman's "Prayer In Time of War," Two Symphonies To Be Offered At Second of Woolsey Series Tuesday

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky comes to Woolsey Hall on Tuesday evening as the second event of the 1944-45 Woolsey Hall Series two symphonies and a new composition by a distinguished American composer will be the musical fare of the occasion.

William Schuman's "Prayer In Time of War" will be the opening selection, to be followed by the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 6 and Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 5.

Composing "Prayer in Time of War" on the eve of the year 1943, William Schuman first titled the work "Prayer—1943," and it was originally performed by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra in Pittsburgh under the direction of Fritz Reiner on February 26, 1943. Since then it has been played by several orchestras, and the Boston Symphony presented it successfully at the current season's opening concert there.

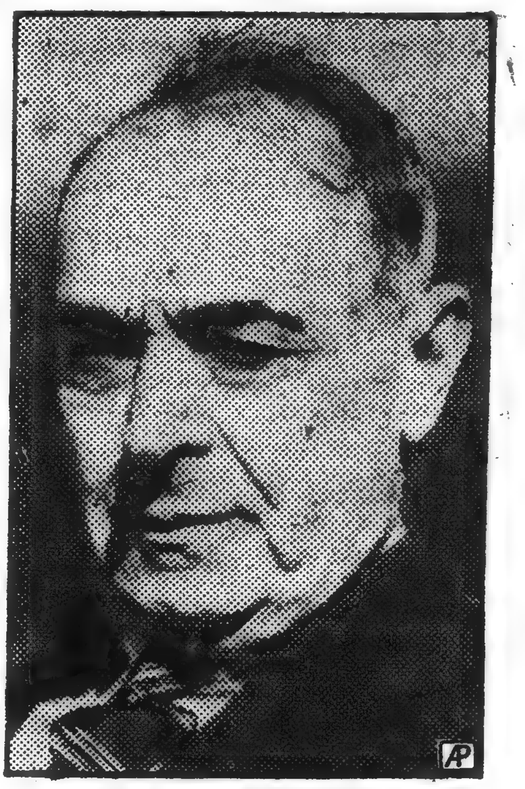
Mr. Schuman's compositions have been widely played by American orchestras in recent years, and his Third Symphony, performed by the Boston Orchestra in 1941, was dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. Another work, his Symphony for Strings, was written for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and presented in Boston a year ago this month.

REVISED SCORE

The Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch had its first performance at a festival in Moscow, December 3, 1939, and was introduced to this country at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conducting, the following year. The score was published with numerous alterations of detail by the composer, and it is this score that will be used at the first New Haven hearing of the piece.

Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony was completed in 1888, and given in St. Petersburg under the composer's direction the same year. Tchaikowsky's slight opinion of his Fifth Symphony as compared to his ardent belief in his Fourth and Sixth is a curious fact, coming as it did from the incorrigible self-analyst who had so much to say to his intimate friends about his doubts and beliefs as to the progress of his music.

Although he was skeptical about the work from the start, first performances were a popular success, and with the passing of years the Tchaikowsky composition has grown in favor with symphony audiences throughout the world.



AP

SERGE A. KOUSSEVITZKY

As usual, the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven is highlighted by the appearance of it's distinguished Russian conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The famous musician has led the one hundred and ten piece organization for more than a quarter of its history, far exceeding the tenure of any previous leader. The way in which he has brought the orchestra to new heights of eloquence and renown since assuming the conductor's post in 1924 is too familiar to need retelling.

Fine orchestras are no longer a rarity as they were when this one was in its infancy. Symphonic music is at every hand. It comes out of the ether to us as well as across the footlights. An orchestra to hold a pre-eminent position in such manifold and distinguished company must look to its qualities—something which the Boston Symphony easily does, thanks to a great extent to its famed leader for the past 29 years.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

2 1944

Concert Of Boston Symphony Will Further Sixth War Loan Drive

Works of two contemporary composers, one Russian, the other American, will make up the program for the Saturday, November 18 broadcast, 7:30-8:30 p. m., over the BLUE Network, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the concert, from unter College, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will inaugurate the series of five broadcasts to come during the season from this college.

The concert, the first broadcsat on tour this year, will be dedicated to the Sixth War Bond drive. Admission will be by the purchase of bonds, the lowest costing $100. Twenty-five seats have been reserved for purchasers of $1,000 bonds. The Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., of Milwaukee, sponsors for the second consecutive season of the concerts over the BLUE, has purchased $1,000,000 worth of bonds.

The progra mselected by Dr. Koussevitzky comprises William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," written by the New York composer last year and formerly called "Prayer—1943," and the Sixth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, composed at the outbreak of the war. The Sixth Symphony was first performed in Moscow in December, 1939, and has no political or social significance, according to the composer.

Glob MUSIC Nov. 7

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By JOHN RILEY

Serge Koussevitzky was back at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening for the season's first concert in the Monday series. Looking remarkably fit, after a bout with one of the prevailing Fall colds, Mr. Koussevitzky vigorously led the orchestra through a generally familiar, though exacting program.

There were Mozart's lyric, Autumnal Symphony in E-flat (K. 543); Schoenberg's new Theme and Variations for Orchestra; Ettore Pinelli's transcription for strings of the Sarabande, Gigue and Bandinerie by Corelli; the Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch.

Particularly striking about last evening's performance was the manner in which Mr. Koussevitzky handled orchestral sonorities. Though the tonal balances and relations which he maintains are always notable pure and clear, they were even more obvious, especially in the Schoenberg and Corelli. The results, not always aesthetically satisfactory, were a revelation so far as orchestral technic is concerned.

The Schoenberg Theme and Variations, largely an exciting exercise in voluptuous sounds, profited by this treatment. The conflict between Schoenberg's artificial austerity and natural romantic temperament often leads to the production of an unclear orchestral texture. Mr. Koussevitzky has separated the complicated lines of his counterpoint into luminous, floating layers of tone that are still clearly related to one another. In other words, he he made musical sense out of possible confusion.

The Corelli, though turned out with the same technical perfection, became the more artificial and glass-like. With his unerring instinct for heightening melodic tension where a score is sometimes prolix, Mr. Koussevitzky made the Shostakovitch Sixth a new experience all over again. Amusing were the jazzy effects, toward the end of the third movement, which sounded for all the world like a 1920 dance band.

Herald MUSIC Nov. 7,

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, gave the first program of its series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall last night: The program was as follows:

Mozart.....Symphony in E-flat (K. 543)
Schoenberg.Theme and Variations, Op. 43B
Corelli....Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie
(arr. Pinelli).
Shostakovitch...........Symphony No. 6.

The Monday series of Symphony concerts started off last night with a good program, a full house and a fine performance by the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky, who looked very fit after his recent indisposition. The program was good because it was one of those something old, something new, something borrowed and something blue programs which could hardly fail to please enough of the audience enough of the time to make it interesting to all.

The old was the Mozart Symphony, but it is anything but old in spirit. On the contrary, its vitality, its communicative quality seems stronger than ever before, and it is to be doubted if the slow movement and the Menuetto and Trio were ever more elegantly traversed than they were last night. The Schoenberg, a new addition to the repertoire, remains a curious piece. It has some exceptionally beautiful passages but on the whole it is fairly thin and strangely uneffective. The theme itself is the nearest thing to banality; the treatment of it varies from the sublime, as in the poco adagio, to ridiculous, as in the finale. The Corelli Suite, also one of Dr. Koussevitzky's most delightful favorites, was superbly realized by the string band of the orchestra, while Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony brought the program to an end.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post Nov 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last week's Symphony Concerts were Richard Burgin's from the start. Dr. Koussevitzky had planned to conduct the current pair, but he cannot seem to shake the cold which has beset him since the first of the season and yesterday afternoon a slip in the programme book announced that Mr. Burgin would take over.

The associate conductor would hardly have elected to play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, done here less than a year ago. Nevertheless, a new approach made the speedy repetition a little less obvious. Conducting with both earnestness and enthusiasm, Mr. Burgin still managed to present the music more objectively than does Mr. Koussevitzky, though he falls into the latter's error of playing the finale so fast that many passages cannot be clearly articulated.

We have waited much longer to hear Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," nine years, in fact, almost to a day. Dr. Koussevitzky has developed a prejudice against overtures in general, and many masterpieces in this form have fallen into undeserved neglect hereabouts.

With the Netherlands once more under the heel of an oppressor, this tonal glorification of the Dutch patriot who gave his life for his country is particularly appropriate at this time, and no doubt Dr. Koussevitzky had that in mind when he placed it at the head of this week's list. As with the Symphony, Mr. Burgin's approach was sound and musicianly, but there might have been a shade more of dramatic fire.

That curious work, Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, fills the period after intermission. Consistency is the least of Shostakovitch's concerns. He does not hesitate to begin with a long and brooding slow movement and end in musical comedy vein with a no doubt unconscious appropriation of the March from Herbert's "Melle. Modiste." Both this finale and the scherzo-like middle movement are popular in character. The opening Largo has both depth and beauty, though it does not escape the vague and relatively empty stretches that are to be found in the corresponding sections of both the preceding and the subsequent symphonies. Taken by and large, however, the Sixth is a work of much appeal and yesterday it was finely set forth.

Brooklyn Inst Bulletin Nov 44

OTHER CONCERTS OF THE MONTH

Richard Tucker

Dr. Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

The Test of a Great Conductor

In war as in peace, the Boston Symphony Orchestra adheres to its tradition of superlative performance. And back of its plans and its ideals looms that giant of music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Institute welcomes his return for the annual Brooklyn series of five Friday night concerts, the first of which will be given on November 17.

It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest, the extent of his vision, and his ability to perfect his orchestra. These qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's have been demonstrated over a lengthening term. He has maintained an absorbing approach to the more familiar classics; he has shown a rewarding catholicity of taste; and he imparts genuine inspiration to the men under his baton. The plans he has announced for the 1944-1945 year reveal another reason for the perennial enjoyment of the Boston Symphony. They will continue to find place for the new composers. It is a striking fact that compositions which Dr. Koussevitzky once had the prophetic vision to see as permanent additions to orchestral repertory have become so. That is because he has sought not the merely new, but the new and good.

To the regular attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts, the gestures of Serge Koussevitzky are a marvel of grace and eloquence. How many of his followers must wish that they could watch him face to face, as his musicians see him! A newspaper reporter, who smuggled himself into a choral group appearing with the orchestra, had just such an experience. He has told how Dr. Koussevitzky takes his place before the "desk," pausing for an instant with head slightly bent. Then he sweeps his glance over the faces of the musicians. Next, he stretches his hand out rather deliberately for the baton. Suddenly both hands are raised and again he eyes the orchestra until there is breathless attention on their part. Then down come the arms, swift but gliding, and the sound of the music rises. The amazing expression of hands, body, and face disclose how Dr. Koussevitzky commands the effects achieved in his music. More, they reveal the subjectiveness of his own statement—"Great music is a necessity of life. Great music makes life complete."

Two American Artists

The third and fourth recitals in the American Artists Series, held on Sunday afternoons at 5:30 o'clock, bring Ethel Elfenbein, pianist, on November 12 and Fredell Lack, violinist, on November 26.

Miss Elfenbein was born and educated in New York. At an early age she began to pick out tunes on the piano and was playing in public even before she had received any formal musical instruction. Today, with a B.S. degree in music, she has mastered an unusually extensive repertory and has over a dozen concerti at her command. She is a member of the the faculty at the Henry Street Settlement Music School and has appeared in numerous recitals since her debut in 1939. Radio audiences know Ethel Elfenbein well through her broadcasts over WQXR, WHN, and WNYC.

Fredell Lack is a native of Oklahoma. Since her first public performance there as an eight-year-old, she has won one national and two state awards sponsored by the National Federation of

---

ADVERTISER
CINCINNATI, OHIO

OCT - - 1944

Allis-Chalmers To Renew Popular Broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra . . .

MEN and women workers of major war industries in America are being honored by the Allis-Chalmers broadcasts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in a special series of six salutes which pay tribute to the distinguished service of both management and labor in time of national crisis. Staats Cotsworth, stage and radio actor, is narrator for this series of brief intermission features scheduled from October 14 to December 23. The schedule includes salutes to the Steel industry, Pulp and Paper, Chemical, and Mining industries.

Allis-Chalmers advertisements featuring these salutes are running in trade publications and newspapers in key production cities. Industrial executives, city officials and heads of business groups in each of these cities are notified in advance regarding highlights of the particular broadcast.

Broadcasts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and the Boston "Pops," with Arthur Fiedler as conductor, are heard for the second consecutive year over the Blue Network exclusively (Saturdays, 8:30 P.M., EWT), under the sponsorship of The Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company of Milwaukee. The current symphonic season includes guest artists and conductors of prominence, and guest conductors. After the conclusion of the 30 scheduled broadcasts of the symphony orchestra the Boston "Pops" will again be heard.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 12 1944

Boston Symphony Plays New Composition Here

Schuman's "Prayer In Time of War," Two Symphonies To Be Offered At Second of Woolsey Series Tuesday

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky comes to Woolsey Hall on Tuesday evening as the second event of the 1944-45 Woolsey Hall Series two symphonies and a new composition by a distinguished American composer will be the musical fare of the occasion.

William Schuman's "Prayer In Time of War" will be the opening selection, to be followed by the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 6 and Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 5.

Composing "Prayer in Time of War" on the eve of the year 1943, William Schuman first titled the work "Prayer—1943," and it was originally performed by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra in Pittsburgh under the direction of Fritz Reiner on February 26, 1943. Since then it has been played by several orchestras, and the Boston Symphony presented it successfully at the current season's opening concert there.

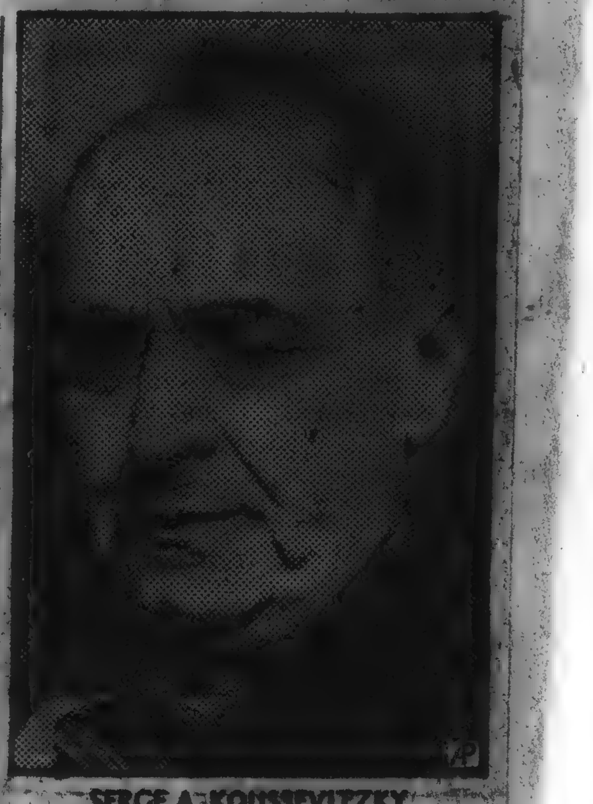
Mr. Schuman's compositions have been widely played by American orchestras in recent years, and his Third Symphony, performed by the Boston Orchestra in 1941, was dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. Another work, his Symphony for Strings, was written for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and presented in Boston a year ago this month.

REVISED SCORE

The Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch had its first performance at a festival in Moscow, December 3, 1939, and was introduced to this country at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conducting, the following year. The score was published with numerous alterations of detail by the composer, and it is this score that will be used at the first New Haven hearing of the piece.

Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony was completed in 1888, and given in St. Petersburg under the composer's direction the same year. Tchaikowsky's slight opinion of his Fifth Symphony as compared to his ardent belief in his Fourth and Sixth is a curious fact, coming as it did from the incorrigible self-analyst who had so much to say to his intimate friends about his doubts and beliefs as to the progress of his music.

Although he was skeptical about the work from the start, first performances were a popular success, and with the passing of years the Tchaikowsky composition has grown in favor with symphony audiences throughout the world.



SERGE A. KOUSSEVITZKY

As usual, the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven is highlighted by the appearance of it's distinguished Russian conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The famous musician has led the one hundred and ten piece organization for more than a quarter of its history, far exceeding the tenure of any previous leader. The way in which he has brought the orchestra to new heights of eloquence and renown since assuming the conductor's post in 1924 is too familiar to need retelling.

Fine orchestras are no longer a rarity as they were when this one was in its infancy. Symphonic music is at every hand. It comes out of the ether to us as well as across the footlights. An orchestra to hold a pre-eminent position in such manifold and distinguished company must look to its qualities—something which the Boston Symphony easily does, thanks to a great extent to its famed leader for the past 29 years.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

NOV 12 1944

Concert Of Boston Symphony Will Further Sixth War Loan Drive

Works of two contemporary composers, one Russian, the other American, will make up the program for the Saturday, November 18 broadcast, 7:30-8:30 p. m., over the BLUE Network, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the concert, from unter College, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will inaugurate the series of five broadcasts to come during the season from this college.

The concert, the first broadcsat on tour this year, will be dedicated to the Sixth War Bond drive. Admission will be by the purchase of bonds, the lowest costing $100. Twenty-five seats have been reserved for purchasers of $1,000 bonds. The Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., of Milwaukee, sponsors for the second consecutive season of the concerts over the BLUE, has purchased $1,000,000 worth of bonds.

The progra mselected by Dr. Koussevitzky comprises William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," written by the New York composer last year and formerly called "Prayer—1943," and the Sixth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, composed at the outbreak of the war. The Sixth Symphony was first performed in Moscow in December, 1939, and has no political or social significance, according to the composer.

Herald

MUSIC

Nov. 7,

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, gave the first program of its series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall last night. The program was as follows:

Mozart.......Symphony in E-flat (K. 543)
Schoenberg.Theme and Variations, Op. 43B
Corelli....Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie
(arr. Pinelli).
Shostakovitch..........Symphony No. 6.

The Monday series of Symphony concerts started off last night with a good program, a full house and a fine performance by the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky, who looked very fit after his recent indisposition. The program was good because it was one of those something old, something new, something borrowed and something blue programs which could hardly fail to please enough of the audience enough of the time to make it interesting to all.

The old was the Mozart Symphony, but it is anything but old in spirit. On the contrary, its vitality, its communicative quality seems stronger than ever before, and it is to be doubted if the slow movement and the Menuetto and Trio were ever more elegantly traversed than they were last night. The Schoenberg, a new addition to the repertoire, remains a curious [illegible]. It has some exceptionally beautiful passages but on the whole it is fairly thin and strangely uneffective. The theme itself is the nearest thing to banality; the treatment of it varies from the sublime, as in the poco adagio, to ridiculous, as in the finale. The Corelli Suite, also one of Dr. Koussevitzky's most delightful favorites, was superbly realized by the string band of the orchestra, while Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony brought the program to an end.

Globe

MUSIC

Nov. 7-

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By JOHN RILEY

Serge Koussevitzky was back at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening for the season's first concert in the Monday series. Looking remarkably fit, after a bout with one of the prevailing Fall colds, Mr. Koussevitzky vigorously led the orchestra through a generally familiar, though exacting program.

There were Mozart's lyric, Autumnal Symphony in E-flat (K. 543); Schoenberg's new Theme and Variations for Orchestra; Ettore Pinelli's transcription for strings of the Sarabande, Gigue and Bandinerie by Corelli; the Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch.

Particularly striking about last evening's performance was the manner in which Mr. Koussevitzky handled orchestral sonorities. Though the tonal balances and relations which he maintains are always notable pure and clear, they were even more obvious, especially in the Schoenberg and Corelli. The results, not always aesthetically satisfactory, were a revelation so far as orchestral technic is concerned.

The Schoenberg Theme and Variations, largely an exciting exercise in voluptuous sounds, profited by this treatment. The conflict between Schoenberg's artificial austerity and natural romantic temperament often leads to the production of an unclear orchestral texture. Mr. Koussevitzky has separated the complicated lines of his counterpoint into luminous, floating layers of tone that are still clearly related to one another. In other words, he he made musical sense out of possible confusion.

The Corelli, though turned out with the same technical perfection, became the more artificial and glass-like. With his unerring instinct for heightening melodic tension where a score is sometimes prolix, Mr. Koussevitzky made the Shostakovitch Sixth a new experience all over again. Amusing were the jazzy effects, toward the end of the third movement, which sounded for all the world like a 1920 dance band.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post Nov 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last week's Symphony Concerts were Richard Burgin's from the start. Dr. Koussevitzky had planned to conduct the current pair, but he cannot seem to shake the cold which has beset him since the first of the season and yesterday afternoon a slip in the programme book announced that Mr. Burgin would take over.

The associate conductor would hardly have elected to play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, done here less than a year ago. Nevertheless, a new approach made the speedy repetition a little less obvious. Conducting with both earnestness and enthusiasm, Mr. Burgin still managed to present the music more objectively than does Mr. Koussevitzky, though he falls into the latter's error of playing the finale so fast that many passages cannot be clearly articulated.

We have waited much longer to hear Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," nine years, in fact, almost to a day. Dr. Koussevitzky has developed a prejudice against overtures in general, and many masterpieces in this form have fallen into undeserved neglect hereabouts.

With the Netherlands once more under the heel of an oppressor, this tonal glorification of the Dutch patriot who gave his life for his country is particularly appropriate at this time, and no doubt Dr. Koussevitzky had that in mind when he placed it at the head of this week's list. As with the Symphony, Mr. Burgin's approach was sound and musicianly, but there might have been a shade more of dramatic fire.

That curious work, Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, fills the period after intermission. Consistency is the least of Shostakovitch's concerns. He does not hesitate to begin with a long and brooding slow movement and end in musical comedy vein with a no doubt unconscious appropriation of the March from Herbert's "Melle. Modiste." Both this finale and the scherzo-like middle movement are popular in character. The opening Largo has both depth and beauty, though it does not escape the vague and relatively empty stretches that are to be found in the corresponding sections of both the preceding and the subsequent symphonies. Taken by and large, however, the Sixth is a work of much appeal and yesterday it was finely set forth.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 16 1944

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Offers 'Eroica' and 'Harold in Italy'—Viola Solo by William Primrose

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Carnegie Hall last night for their first New York concert of the season, and made the occasion memorable by the constitution of the program and their playing of it.

The excellence of the orchestra is an old story. For this writer it is incontestably king of all the orchestras which are heard in this city, matching the beauty of its tone and the finish of its playing with its extreme sensitiveness of nuance and color. To these characteristics last night was united special virility and grandeur in the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, and a dramatic passion that it would have been hard to surpass in the wildly romantic "Harold" symphony of Berlioz, a work which had not been heard for many seasons, and was so brilliantly interpreted that one hastened to revise, at least in details, previous estimates of its position among Berlioz' compositions.

A sentence in the program, underneath the announcement of the "Eroica" symphony, was significant of Dr. Koussevitzky's unprecedented interpretation. It explained that the performance of the "Eroica" was dedicated "to the heroes of the United Nations"—even as Beethoven himself had finally dedicated this, perhaps the greatest of all symphonies, to the heroic spirit of man.

Notes on the Tempo

We had heard fine performances of this score by Dr. Koussevitzky in earlier seasons, but they had not seemed to be at once so unified in the form and so plastic in conception, or inhabited by such an intrinsic greatness and flame. Of course, no listener to a familiar work agrees completely with every quarter note in it, and exception could be taken to the tempo of the scherzo, nearer a presto than an "allegro vivace," and so fast that a horn had trouble in negotiating the fanfares of the middle part. However, the sense of awakening life, or nature's resurrection—whatever image, in fact, goes through the individual listener's mind as he hearkens to these vibrations of the invisible world—was distinct in it; and thereafter, as rarely, the cosmic variations that make the finale were driven home.

Then there was the complete change in style, technic and imaginative utterance in the passionate music of the wild-eyed, romantic Berlioz symphony. Here the composer had the further asset of the presence of William Primrose, as master of the solo viola part, and voice for the nonce of Harold in his Italian wanderings.

As Master and Poet

Mr. Primrose played not only as a master but a poet and dramatist of his instrument. He had not always a grateful task, nor is Berlioz, acknowledged master of instrumentation, always found writing for the viola in the most effective way. No wonder that Paganini, whom Berlioz claimed commissioned him to write an orchestral piece with viola solo for him, was dissatisfied with this result. It is only occasionally that the solo viola part really fits, and some of the writing, such as the monotonous arpeggios in the pilgrim's march, is useless.

In a word, Berlioz was making an experiment only partially successful, falling between the two stools of a symphony with a conspicuous solo part and a concerto for viola combined with an uncommonly full and vivid score, used for purposes of tone-painting. For all that, there is so much of originality and imagination in the music itself, and Mr. Primrose, playing his wonderful "MacDonald" Strad, gave such haunting beauty and intensity to his part that this work alone would have made the occasion memorable. Three great artists, soloist, conductor and virtuoso orchestra, became one, and their expression the very voice of the Eighteen Thirties. The pages of balderdash in this curious score need not detain us. It is, for all its defects and hiatuses, an explosion of genius, and such a performance, had it been of much commoner stuff, would have been intoxicating.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 16 1944

Boston Symphony Begins Series Here

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Making its seasonal bow in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, offered a two-part program last evening. The numbers were the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony and the Berlioz, "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose to play the solo viola part.

Almost any of Berlioz's music is welcome in the concert hall, welcome even to the inveterate listener of Berlioz. For that French composer can give you as many musical joys as he ever does, and—to be all inclusive—just as many moments of boredom as he ever does.

But in the midst of a sequence, say, of thrice-familiar phrases—phrases that you know by their nicknames, so familiar are they to 19th century music, there is sure to be a sudden lift in the shape of some thrilling instrumental shock, or some unusually lovely line that is as fresh as the next second, or some wonderful trick of tonal comminglings.

At any rate, so it was during the performance of the Berlioz Symphony. And there was the shiny and superior playing of Mr. Primrose to add further interest. All this and Primrose, too, you see.

The violist, who is just about tops in his field, had his seconds of so-so intonation. But those could have been attributed, in great part to the weather, which was wet. You know what that can do to strings.

Orchestra and soloist, however, joined forces in a communicative reading of the score. Its great parts are all-time great, and its prosaic ones worth overlooking, therefore. It was mostly with pleasure that one heard the piece, which is something of a rarity in the concert hall these days.

The "Eroica" received a glistening performance. Every note fitted into its proper slot, every phrase, every line, ditto. The rendering was a miracle of continuity and Boston Symphony polish. A fine evening of music, and a fitting inaugural of the Boston band's local appearances.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

NOV 16 1944

Koussevitzky At Carnegie

By GRENA BENNETT

It is always a gala event when the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits New York, and last evening that splendid company of musicians, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its first concert this season in Carnegie Hall. The program contained only two compositions, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony.

But numbers are of no importance when the material is of such richness and the performance of so superb a quality. It seems incredible that anything new can be revealed in so familiar a work as the "Eroica," yet every measure that was given with such perfection of tone, balance and musicianship—a performance dedicated last night to the heroes of the United Nations—was imbued with such eloquence that it assumed uncommon and unusual beauty.

In the Berlioz Symphony, William Primose played the solo viola part, and while a considerable portion of his share of the score was closely interwoven in the ensemble, enough of it was sufficiently clear and prominent to enable the listeners to realize the prime artistry of his presentation.

* * *

MUSIC

Nov. 16-

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 56 .... Beethoven
"Harold in Italy," symphony in four movements .... Berlioz (William Primrose, viola solo)

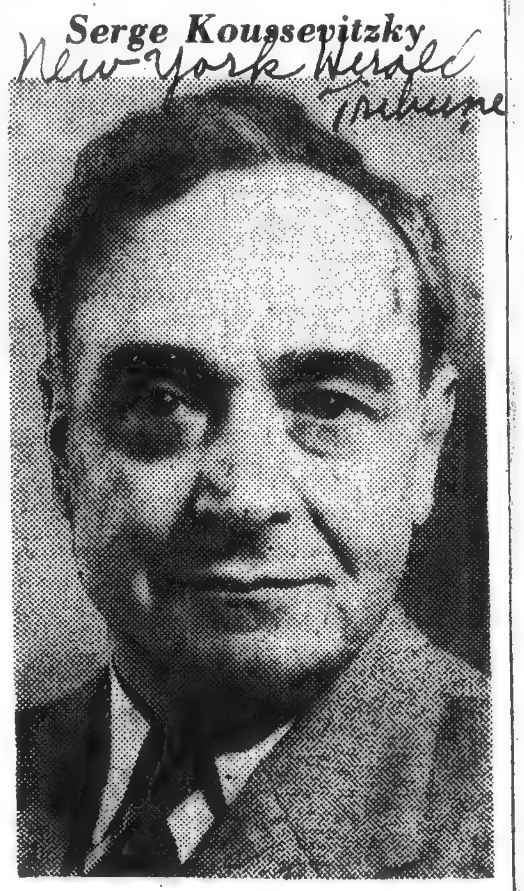
Serge Koussevitzky

New York Herald Tribune



Conductor of "Bostonians

Over-Trained

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season, which took place last night in Carnegie Hall, consisted of two works only and lasted two hours. They were beautiful works, handsomely executed. With the exception of the impossible horn passage in the trio of Beethoven's "Eroica" scherzo, your commentator could find no fault in the playing. And yet he was aware of the slow passage of time.

* * *

Serge Koussevitzky's tempos not slow. In the Beethoven symphony they were, in fact, most gratefully animated. And the mechanism of orchestral articulation was, as always with this group, delightful to observe. Everything was right, including William Primerose, who played the viola solo of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." It was the old story, I am afraid, of familiar pieces so elegantly turned out that one scarcely recognized them. They were not deformed. Their clear spirit was not violated. They were simply so completely groomed that one was not aware of any spirit present. The slickness of their surfacing made them seem hollow and laborious underneath, which they are not.

* * *

The truth of the matter, in my opinion, is simply that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is overtrained and has been for several years. Its form is perfect, but it does not communicate. The music it plays never seems to be about anything, except how beautifully the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play. Perfection of execution that oversteps its purpose is a familiar phenomenon in art. That way lies superficiality and monotony. And music has no business sounding monotonous, since no two pieces of it are alike. Whenever a series of pieces or of programs starts sounding that way you may be sure that the execution is at fault, is obtruding itself.

One longs, in listening to this orchestra's work, for a little ease. It is of use for all the sonorous elements to be so neatly in place unless there is some illusion created thereby that their being so is spontaneous. Music is not the result of rehearsal. It is an auditory miracle that can take place anywhere. When it occurs among disciplined musicians its miraculous quality is merely heightened. When the frequency of its occurrence in any given group starts diminishing, there are only two possible remedies. Either the members must play together more often or they must get some new pieces.

Obviously, this group does not need more rehearsing. And it knows now all the pieces there are in standard repertory; it even knows nearly all the kinds of pieces there are for large orchestra. There is nothing to be done about it. It has passed the peak of useful executional skill, and executional hypertrophy has set in. The pattern is a familiar one, and regrettable. But there is no use trying to deceive one's self about it.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Nov. 7, 1944

Last evening's symphony concert, the first of the Monday series, offered a programme drawn in large measure from those already presented this season on Friday and Saturday. The one item peculiar to the occasion was Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major. The other numbers, which followed it in the order named, were Schoenberg's new Variations for orchestra, the Suite for strings made by Ettore Pinelli from the music of Corelli, and the Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch, now become an established repertory piece. Dr. Koussevitzky, apparently restored to health, conducted with his wonted zeal.

There were many delightful details in the performance of Mozart's ever-youthful symphony. There were also evidences of Dr. Koussevitzky's tendency to force most older music to a bigness, brilliance and speed not wholly proper to it. Few conductors nowadays can let well enough alone. It has now been possible to hear Schoenberg's Variations three times. Once having recovered from the shock occasioned by the music's conservatism—for this is the work of a reformed radical, returning to the ways of his youth—it can be seen that, despite many arresting details and even moments of real beauty, the piece is monotonous in mood and color, and not a little stodgy.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

NOV 6 1944

Gracie to Tap Out Concerto With Orchestra

BOSTON, Nov. 6 (UP).—Gracie Allen, cinema and radio comedienne, slips into her latest role—concert pianist—here, Nov. 15 when she solos at a benefit performance of her "Concerto for the Index Finger" under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, it was learned today.

The concert will be sponsored by the community fund and held in Boston Garden. Musical authorities have described the piano part of the composition as a "run up the scale which ends on the wrong note" with the orchestration "guaranteed to work the musicians into a lather."

Efforts made to obtain Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra for the performance collapsed because the symphony will be on tour at Hartford, Conn., on that date.

PUEBLO, COLO.
CHIEFTAIN

NOV 17 1944

TEN SYMPHONY LEADERS WILL HONOR COMPOSER

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 16.—(UP)—In tribute to Arnold Schoenberg, famous composer retiring this year as professor of music on the Los Angeles campus of the University of California, ten major symphony orchestras will perform one of his works during the coming season.

Responding to a survey conducted by the Schoenberg 70th birthday committee, headed by Adolph Weiss, Arthur Rodzinski of the New York Philharmonic said he will offer the premiere of the new Schoenberg work, "Ode to Napoleon."

Leopold Stokowski will perform the "Second Chamber Symphony."

Other conductors who plan Schoenberg tributes are Serge Koussevitsky, Boston symphony; Desire Defaw, Chicago symphony; Karl Kreuger, Detroit symphony; Hans Kindler, National symphony; Fabien Sevitsky, Indianapolis symphony; Vladimir Golschmann, St. Louis symphony; Howard Hansen, Eastman symphony, and Alfred Wallenstein, Los Angeles symphony.

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS

NOV 5 - 1944

By SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
[Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra]

I support President Roosevelt because he has saved the country at a time of distress, given it stability, raised the cultural standard and lifted the spirit of our people. The hour has come for the people of America to make a momentous decision, for us writers, scientists and musicians to raise our voice. We artists voice our vote for President Roosevelt because we believe him to be the greatest son of America today.

SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN

NOV 12 1944

Ten Symphony Leaders To Honor Composer

LOS ANGELES (U.P.)—In tribute to Arnold Schoenberg, famous composer retiring this year as professor of music on the Los Angeles campus of the University of California, 10 major symphony orchestras will perform one of his works during the coming season.

Responding to a survey conducted by the Schoenberg 70th Birthday Committee, headed by Adolph Weiss, Artur Rodzinski of the New York Philharmonic said he will offer the premiere of the new Schoenberg work, "Ode to Napoleon."

Leopold Stokowski will perform the "Second Chamber Symphony."

Other conductors who plan Schoenberg tributes are Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony; Desire Defaw, Chicago Symphony; Karl Kreuger, Detroit Symphony; Hans Kindler, National Symphony Fabien Sevitsky, Indianapolis Symphony; Valdimir Golschmann, St. Louis Symphony; Howard Hansen, Eastman Symphony, and Alfred Wallenstein, Los Angeles Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 16 1944

BOSTONIANS BEGIN SYMPHONY SERIES

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Two symphonies sufficed for the Boston Symphony's opening New York concert under Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall last night. They were Beethoven's "Eroica" and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," composed within a span of thirty years and products of the first third of the last century. For the Berlioz work, the solo violist was William Primrose and the choice could scarcely have been more fortunate. A musicianly and imaginative artist, Mr. Primrose possesses an instrument that makes him the envy of his fellows. He plays the "Macdonald" Stradivarius.

The first of the Boston Symphony's ten concerts of a season in Carnegie Hall is always occasion for exhilaration. The orchestra returned last night the highly perfected and expressive medium that it has been for many seasons, intimately responsive to the vigorous and clear leadership of its conductor, whose readings are always logical, and, many times, of a supreme eloquence. The Boston Symphony audiences are as distinctive as the concerts, and that which greeted Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians last night, applauding the performances of the two symphonies whole-heartedly, was in itself refreshingly superior—if such a thing can be surmised from its manner of listening.

But the long Berlioz symphony is always something of a trial for its listeners, musical or otherwise. There was a scattering of early departures before the last movement—which Berlioz described as "that furious orgy, where wine, blood, joy, rage, all combined, parade their intoxication." Dr. Koussevitzky led a particularly vital performance, in which Mr. Primrose played with exceptional tone and very resourcefully. There were some minor blemishes of the pitch, but they were incidental and unimportant. Still, in spite of consecration and virtuosity, the question of the Berlioz programmatic symphonies remains. For those who like "Harold in Italy," it again proved itself melodious and exciting, as well as a lesson in orchestration. For those who do not, the final allegro frenetico particularly was overwritten bombast.

"Harold in Italy" was preceded in the program order by the earlier work, the third of Beethoven's nine symphonies. Its performance could scarcely have been more stirring, coming from this orchestra, under this conductor. And it is a superb orchestra, with a superb conductor. Opinions will continue to differ, however, as to the kind of ensemble tone the Koussevitzky Bostonians produce. This reviewer finds it overbright for the Beethoven symphonies. But he concedes readily that for others it is altogether right. The quality of the tone aside, Beethoven's great striding basses cut through. For all its thrust and dramatic accentuation, the symphony was a marvel of clarity.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

NOV 17 1944

Boston Symphony Opens Rutgers Concert Series Before 3,000

Koussevitzky Directs Orchestra in Brilliant Novelty Program Received With Ovation by Audience

By MARY PURNELL

Three distinct music personalities were faithfully recreated last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Rutgers gymnasium. An audience of 3,000, happy at the restoration of the full concert series after a lapse of two years, responded with delight to the opening event, a concert by their favorite performers.

Marked by superb playing and subtle direction, the customary reward of an evening with the Boston Symphony, the program included a suite for string orchestra arranged by Pinelli, who selected for it three movements from Corelli sonatas ;a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan"; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A Major.

A more varied group of works can hardly be imagined; yet Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra interpreted them with such versatility and sympathy that each radiated an intense individuality.

Novelties to the average concert-goer were the Corelli suite and the "little pictures" formed from the Rimsky-Korsakov opera. The first work included a majestic Sarabande and Gigue and ended with a miniature movement titled "Badinerie," a choice piece of nonsense, wittily presented by the orchestra. Although the suite culled from violin sonatas retained a 17th century charm, its arrangement clothed it with a magnificence and projected it in such large dimensions that its genial composer would no doubt be astounded to hear it.

Musical Contrast

Directly opposing the simple grace of this music was the suite of Rimsky-Korsakov, who with his usual ear for lavish tonal effect piled triangle, bells, xylophone, celesta and numerous other instruments on the sumptuous full orchestra. The excerpts from the setting of Pushkin's fairy tale were the more spectacular their harmonies the more pungent for following Corelli.

The suite included a march-like movement set forth with mock gravity; the introduction to Act II; that perennial Major Bowes' delight — the inescapable "Flight of the Bumble Bee," for once leaving nothing to be desired; and "The Three Wonders," a showy conclusion which the orchestra performed brilliantly.

The self-important trumpet fanfares which announced each section were engaging evidence of the deliberately naive quality as planned by the composer.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony formed the second half of the program. Here both the orchestra and Beethoven appeared to full advantage, beautifully matched.

For all its drive and electric energy, its inexhaustible originality, this symphony is characteristically compact, neat and economical.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra summoned their full resources to sound out its tantalizing rhythms and its unpredictable dynamic shades. It was shaped with a compelling attention to its significant proportions and a reverance for its fertile detail. The introduction artfully welded to the most ingenious ending in the world; the third movement of violently contrasting moods and the exultant shout of the Allegro con brio—all were thrillingly produced by the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky received ovations both before and after the concert, which opened with "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Last night's concert contrasted with those which were held before the two lean years when wartime conditions suspended the Rutgers series.

Before the war the concerts were social events of the first order. Last night there was no display of gowns; the music was the thing. Musical enthusiasm here fortunately, did not in the least wane when it had no concerts to feed upon. On the contrary it has increased, as may be judged by the representative character of the audience. Everybody was there, townspeople, students, faculty, visitors from neighboring communities and many people in service.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There was just one thing the matter with yesterday's altogether remarkable Symphony Concert: there was a bit too much of it, and the superfluous number, the last, was our old and very familiar friend, Strauss' "Till Eulenspeigel." All of that tone poem wasn't played as well as some of it, either. Far better would it have been, in this reviewer's opinion, to perform the omitted second number of Bloch's enthralling Suite for viola and orchestra, heard here just once before, in 1925.

For this Suite, one of the finest things Bloch has done, comparable indeed to his "Schelomo," we are indebted this week to William Primrose, by almost universal consent, the greatest living violinist. Not before had the Scotch-born virtuoso appeared in Symphony Hall, though we heard him at a Statler Musicale last season. The impression he made yesterday was overwhelming, both in the Bloch Suite and in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," which was played for his benefit. Mr. Primrose's instrument, the "Macdonald" Stradivarius, must receive some of the credit. Between them the great artist and the matchless maker of stringed instruments were able to prove that neither a violin nor a 'cello can emit more ravishing sounds than the instrument whose place in the musical scheme of things is decidedly a subordinate one, however indispensable it may be to both the orchestra and the string quartet.

Anyway you look at it, Mr. Primrose is an artist of towering stature, and his participation in the performance made Berlioz' Symphony seem a greater work than ever before. After long neglect Dr. Koussevitzky has now played it three seasons in succession. We can hear it still more and we could hear more Berlioz in general than we do. With every passing year the French composer throws a longer shadow. To emphasize Mr. Primrose should not be to minimize the part played in yesterday's unforgettable concert by Dr. Koussevitzky and an inspired orchestra. The programme began, by the way, with Ernst Toch's "Pinocchio," well subtitled "A Merry Overture." The composer, who has come here from California to give a series of lectures at Harvard, was in the audience and was warmly ap

---

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

6 1944

Boston Symphony Gives First Carnegie Concert

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony made their first appearance of the new season in Carnegie Hall last night in a two-work program containing Beethoven's "Eroica" and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony. The performance of the "Eroica" was dedicated to the heroes of the United Nations. William Primrose was the accomplished soloist in the Berlioz, which was eloquently set forth though it added up to old-fashioned music.

The orchestra makes its Brooklyn visit tomorrow night.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

NOV 18 1944

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Boston Symphony in Top Form Returns for Series at Academy

If ever there was a thoroughbred among orchestras, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the criterion. Trained fine, in the true Bostonian sense, it presented its exemplary self at the Academy of Music last night in top form for its annual series. To speak of its performance is to restate self-evident truths. Serge Koussevitzky drew from it the refinement of playing for which he is noted, for it is he, rather than the musicians, who is responsible for that degree of perfection associated with this orchestra.

To many people the program was undoubtedly most satisfying. The American work, with which the concert began, was so much "in the tradition" that it ruffled no feelings and offered no disturbing sound. The Russian work which followed showed off the orchestra in excellent fashion without the slightest cause to raise an eyebrow. The Beethoven Symphony rounded out an evening secure in its conservatism and totally devoid of the stimulation of the contemporary scene.

Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings has now become a well-established work and deserves its position because of its inherent musical worth. Its workmanship is as agreeable as its refinement; there is about it the air of a well-bred acknowledgement of European tradition with polite assertion of American gentility, in the beg-to-differ-but-not-too-much school of thought. As one refined medium to another, the Bostonians' performance fit like a glove.

One is grateful to Koussevitzky for retrieving Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from the Opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" from partial eclipse, if only to place the hackneyed "Flight of the Bumble Bee" in its proper surroundings. With its bright orchestral colors, its fairy-tale atmosphere, and its oriental mood, the work has charm and gaiety. It brought delight to last night's audience for the spirit of the performance as well as the music.

Of the Beethoven Seventh, it might be said that a performance so deliberate and so refined robbed the music of some of its inherent exhilaration. Though admirably played, it came out from under this cloud only in the latter half of the Finale when on the home stretch Koussevitzky let loose and achieved some of the abandon that is so much a part of the music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

NOV 19 1944

Simon

MUSICA

Viola Star

It is not often that a violist plays a prominent part in two important musical events within a few days of each other, but William Primrose did it during the past week by appearing with the New Friends of Music Sunday afternoon and with the Boston Symphony Wednesday night.

The Boston Symphony, giving its first New York program of the season, featured the Berlioz Harold in Italy, in which the composer conceived of Byron's hero as a tenorish fellow whose sentiments are wordlessly conveyed on a viola. There isn't much chance for a virtuoso violist to show off his technique (which is probably why Paganini, for whom it was written, refused to play it), but Mr. Primrose drew a tone so firm, clear and strong that it sang with effortless melodiousness even when balanced against the entire cello section of the Boston Symphony. The melodies themselves are commonplace, the romantic conception less striking than it is in more frequently heard works by Berlioz. But the performance was a beauty. So was the performance of Beethoven's Eroica, which constituted the other half of the program.

With the New Friends of Music, Mr. Primrose was guest artist in an all-Mozart program by the newly reconstituted Lener Quartet. The Leners paid this fine artist the unusual compliment of having him sit at the first viola desk in the E-flat Horn and C-minor Viola quintets. Guest artists usually take the second seat. The performances had all the musical vitality we have learned to expect from a group led by Jeno Lener, though the balance and finish we may expect later on have not yet been achieved.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

NOV 16 1944

Words and Music

Skilled Bostonians Are One With Their Musical General

By Harriett Johnson

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall last night in the opening concert of its subscription series, held forth like a general. His convictions were so strong, his decisions so forceful that for the moment we were convinced this was the only way to play Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." Though we became saner upon reflection, the two performances stand out as uncommonly fine and worthy of this magnificent orchestra's best.

Mr. Koussevitzky had dedicated the "Eroica's" playing to the heroes of the United Nations. Music is most eloquent when it is least literal but its suggestive power is unlimited. The evoking of both tragedy and grandeur is a frequent emotional counterpart of listening to this third symphony of Beethoven. These qualities were starkly vivid in last night's performance.

The rare discipline of the ensemble and its smooth, fluid sound added tonal beauty to the whole. An extraordinary rapport between Mr. Koussevitzky and his men makes it possible to concentrate every atom of energy on getting at the core of the music.

Berlioz' score, especially the exuberant first movement, was a perfect program complement to the more profound and serious Beethoven work. William Primrose's playing of the solo viola was superb and the bright orchestral colors contrasting with the dark quality of the solo part were entrancing to the ear. This work gives us some of the French composer's most spontaneous writing.

Harold, "a melancholy dreamer, after the manner of Byron's Childe Harold," wanders through the mountains and reflects his experiences in music during four movements of the symphony. His personality is illustrated by the viola. Nobody could have made the young man more appealing than Mr. Primrose and the equally ingratiating sounds of the orchestra quite appropriately gave us a nostalgia for the country, Italian or otherwise.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 19 1944

SYMPHONY AT WEST POINT

New York, Nov. 18—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a special concert tomorrow afternoon in the auditorium of the U. S. Military Academy at West Point the orchestra management announced today.

Globe AN EMINENT DOG EXERCISER Nov. 19

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starts out from the stage door with his cocker spaniel, Bemol, for a walk.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER

NOV 19 1944

Boston Symphony To Play at Point

NEW YORK—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra will play a special concert this afternoon in the auditorium of the U. S. Military academy at West Point, the orchestra management said yesterday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 14 1944

TO RESUME RECORDINGS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Starts Schedule Monday

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Nov. 13—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will resume making recordings next Monday as a result of the Radio Corporation of America's Victor division yielding to the demands of the American Federation of Musicians.

The orchestra has made no records for five and a half years. It stopped when the recording companies made contracts with the union to record only musicians who were union members. The Boston Symphony was not unionized at that time. When the orchestra signed with the union in December, 1942, the union's ban on manufacture of recordings generally was already in effect.

The Boston group makes records under two names: Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Pops, under Arthur Fiedler.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 15 1944

Last Night's Concert

E. C. R.

Boston Symphony at Woolsey Hall

Boston Symphony Orchestra was at its technical best last evening at Woolsey Hall as the Second Concert in the Woolsey Hall Series took place, the evening being given over to the most brilliant order.

Three compositions, one written in 1888, another in 1906, and a very recent one composed only in 1943, comprised the program. As Koussevitzky presented them, they were all show pieces. Disagreement about type, form and style continue, but everyone agrees that when this great 110-piece orchestra performs fresh admiration is awakened for whatever he undertakes to present. Koussevitzky puts his whole heart, zeal of mind, body and soul into the inexhaustible preparation of his program. As always, his stirring personality, charm, mannerisms, and beautifully expressive hands were a determining factor in his direction and ever-increasing popularity. It would be interesting if Serge Koussevitzky were to give voice to what he expresses in pantomine. To hear him in rehearsal must, indeed, be an experience forever remembered.

Playing up the most extraordinary skill of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that of many instruments playing the same note and sounding as one instrument—the first number on last night's concert, "Prayer in Time of War" by William Schuman, opened in a very quiet and prayerful mood, then gradually brought in the rest of the orchestra in a magnificent organ effect. One of the interesting phases was the dramatic use of the drum showing an unusual opportunity for this instrument. An interesting interplay of trumpet and woodwind followed, with muted violin accompaniment. Deserved praise should be given the French horn player for his impeccable performanse. The number was closed very appropriately by a prayer-like ending with all instruments voicing the "Amen."

Dimitri Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 6, first performed at a Festival in Moscow on December 3, 1939, opened with an expressive theme by the woodwinds and strings. The English horn and flute featured predominently. The playing was intimate and subtle with the result that one thought less about the performance and more about the music. Altogether delightful was the Allegro movement, which was more of a brilliant Scherzo in style. Variety was furnished by melodic runs and skips. The clarinets, woodwinds and piccolo were highly individualized by their colorful interpretation. A climax of brass and full orchestra preceded the light close. Brilliant and substantial was the finals, Presto, in the character of a folk dance.

The concluding selection was Tschaikowsky's 5th Symphony, written in the unusual key of E Minor, which up to this time had appeared prominently only in the 4th Symphony of Brahms. This symphony is a struggle against Fate, its ideals of peace on earth, good will to men, being justified by religious character in the opening and close. Complaints voiced in a rather sad and yearning strain are followed by a repetition of an earlier rallying call. A lovely melody, familiar to us in "The Song of Songs" is sung by the solo horn. Tschaikowsky's Scherzo takes the popular waltz form. The Finale appears in a triumphant march time, with the strings playing a steady accompaniment of octaves in triplets. Nowhere in music is there a better demonstration of the psychological difference between the major and the minor moods. Altogether an amazing display of musicianship with continuous melodic interest and fascinating experiments in orchestration made forever memorable this superb presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

NOV 20 1944

There's

Music in the Air

Koussevitzky and Shostakovitch's Sixth

By John Rosenfield

BOSTON SYMPHONY: Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, a far less pretentious work than the Seventh and Eighth of the war years, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Shostakovitch's music, if it does nothing else, exploits a modern symphony with the utmost confidence. The Bostonians form quite an orchestra to exploit and Koussevitzky is nothing loath to help. This is to say the end result could not help being terrific. The first movement of the Sixth is longer than the other two combined. It is rhythmically slow and contains moments of genuine feeling and haunting loveliness of timbres. Its relation to the pair of galloping shorter movements is not clear. The finale is a syncopated two-step sounding like nothing so much as the finish of a Betty Grable musical.

Koussevitzky apparently has set a pattern of bracketing Shostakovitch with William Schuman, the young New York composer. The only other number in the broadcast period was Schuman's Prayer in Time of War, which was known two years ago as Prayer—1943. This is a simple statement of mood, at once fervent and at once tragic. It resolves into a proclamation of faith and fortified will. Koussevitzky gave the Schuman Prayer nobler proportions and more dignity of utterance than have other conductors who have played it over the air. The Prayer, like most of Schuman's more recent music, acquires strength and intelligibility through the seasons.

(Blue Network, through KGKO, 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. Saturday.)

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

NOV 13 1944

Symphony on Air From Milwaukee

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast their weekly Saturday night concert from Milwaukee Auditorium Dec. 9.

The celebrated 105 piece orchestra, which performs on a coast to coast network under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing co., is being brought to Milwaukee by the Arion Musical club.

Because the radio broadcast must go on promptly at 7:30 p. m., no concertgoers will be seated after 7:15.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 20 1944

ARCHER INTERPRETS

Lectures on Music to Be Played by Boston Symphony.

Music Critic John Archer gave his interpretation of music to be played here tomorrow night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a lecture in Brown University's Marston Hall yesterday afternoon.

Archer's lecture, illustrated with recordings and sessions at the piano, was the first in a series to be held at the university each Sunday preceding the Boston Symphony concerts of the season. About 50 persons attended.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 20 1944

Capacity Audience at Academy Welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky .. ....

A capacity audience welcomed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at the opening concert of their current Brooklyn season in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program featured a performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and also included the Suite for Strings by Arthur Foote and the Suite, "Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Seated in Box No. 1 were Mrs. William H. Good and her guests, Judge and Mrs. George E. Brower, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Roulston, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Rudolph Reimer and Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, hostess in Box No. 2, entertained Mr. and Mrs. William E. Robertson, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mrs. James M. Fawcett and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett.

Box No. 3 was occupied by Mrs. Benjamin Prince and her guests.

Members of the Brooklyn Women's Club were seated in Box No. 4: Mrs. Burgess Osterhout, president; Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. H. S. Rasi, Mrs. George Hills Iler, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Adolph L. Muller and Mrs. William E. Howes.

Seated in Box No. 5 were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest; Mr. and Mrs. William B. Parker and their guests, Misses Rosalie and Katherine Parker; and Miss Jessie Lockitt and her guest, Mrs. Henry V. Raymond.

Tickets for Box No. 7 were distributed to service men and noncommissioned officers by Lt. L. Wambaugh, U.S.N. This box was a gift of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, chairman.

Tickets for Box No. 8 were distributed to officers of Ft. Hamilton and guests by Col. Harry W. Maas. This box was also a gift of the committee.

The second concert of the 1944-1945 series will take place on Jan. 12. This series is presented each season under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Concerts.

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS

NOV 20 1944

Observant Citizen

By MARJORIE B. SHARPE

Symphony Hall, home of Boston's famous Symphony, offers a contrast for music lovers in winter and summer. At the height of the former season, Serge Koussevitsky, wields his baton. Early in May Arthur Fiedler leads the Boston Pops to a packed house nightly. Later on in the summer, the Pops orchestra adjourns to a shimmering shell alongside the river. There, thousands of music lovers sit, recline, and stand to hear the master's works played.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 22 1944

MUSIC

Bernstein Conducts Boston Symphony with Pianist Sanroma as Soloist.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The young conductor Leonard Bernstein appeared as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Metropolitan Theater. The audience was large, despite bad weather, and Mr. Bernstein was greeted with resounding admiration.

The program was the Brahms piano concerto in D minor, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the fifth symphony of Shostakovitch.

At 26, Mr. Bernstein is already a conductor of considerable attainments. Merely to make one's way through such intricate scores is no small task; to do so with elegance and insight, as Mr. Bernstein did, arouses respect. His grimaces and gestures are often amusingly like those of his illustrious instructor, Serge Koussevitzky, but that will wear off as he progresses to his own style. His directions are clear and exact, his beat has meaning and decision, his familiarity with the music is thorough. If he could have imparted to the orchestra some share of his own seeming intensity, we should all have been lifted from our seats at moments, but the orchestra played, in general, with a stolid virtuosity, perhaps even with virtuoso stolidity.

Mr. Sanroma is also intense, and his control of the piano is comprehensive; yet I did not think his tone particularly beautiful nor feel that he and Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra, for all the superior phases of the performance, were quite able to make this music, as a whole, exciting. I don't see how anybody could. The rest of the audience was of a different mind. The appla vigorous and prolonged.

The symphony was played fine finish and with much splen demonstration of individual voices. Mr. Bernstein excelled himself in the largo, inducing an hypnotic silence and concentration in his listeners, and his adroitness in exploiting the contrasting rowdiness of the finale was remarkable. If this music is great, I am mistaken, but it is effective and Mr. Bernstein knew how to discourse it. He received deserved approval.

Paper Mill and Wood Pulp News
NEW YORK, N.Y.

NOV 25 1944

Allis-Chalmers Salutes the Paper Industry

Saturday, December 2, at 8:30 P. (E. W. T.) over 189 stations of Blue Network Allis-Chalmers will sal the Paper Industry with a radio p gram. The Boston Symphony Orchest with Serge Koussvitzky as conductor.

Tune in this tribute. Listen and proud as a nation-wide network te America of your industry's great co tribution to the war effort . . . the pr duction records you and your associat have helped to set, the many ways yo industry is helping to speed Victory!

This is Allis-Chalmers salute to yo . . . to every man and woman working America's great Pulp and Paper Indu try. Don't miss it!

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 22 1944

MUSIC

Leonard Bernstein and Jesus Maria Sanroma With Hub Symphony

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The young conductor, Leonard Bernstein, appeared as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Metropolitan Theater. The audience was large, despite bad weather, and Mr. Bernstein was greeted with resounding admiration.

The program was the Brahms piano concerto in D minor, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the fifth symphony of Shostakovitch.

At 26, Mr. Bernstein is already a conductor of considerable attainments. Merely to make one's way through such intricate scores is no small task; to do so with elegance and insight, as Mr. Bernstein did, arouses respect. His grimaces and gestures are often amusingly like those of his illustrious instructor. Serge Koussevitzky, but that will wear off as he progresses to his own style. His directions are clear and exact, his beat has meaning and decision, his familiarity with the music is thorough. If he could have imparted to the orchestra some share of his own seeming intensity, we should all have been lifted from our seats at moments, but the orchestra played, in general, with a stolid virtuosity, perhaps even with virtuoso stolidity.

Mr. Sanroma is intense, and his control of the piano is comprehensive; yet I did not think his tone particularly beautiful nor feel that he and Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra, for all the superior phases of the performance, were quite able to make this music, as a whole, exciting. I don't see how anybody could. The rest of the audience was of a different mind. The applause was vigorous and prolonged.

The symphony was played with fine finish and with much splendid demonstration of individual voices. Mr. Bernstein excelled himself in the largo, inducing an hypnotic silence and concentration in his listeners, and his adroitness in exploiting the contrasting rowdiness of the finale was remarkable. If this music is great, I am mistaken, but it is effective and Mr. Bernstein knew how to discourse it. He received deserved approval

---

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered only music already heard this season, either at the so-called regular concerts or at the first of the new series on Sunday afternoons. At both ends of the programme came Hector Berlioz, by way of the scintillant "Roman Carnival" overture, and the imaginative, pictorial "Harold in Italy" symphony, with the incomparable William Primrose once more to play the important part for solo viola. The central item was pictorial also, the suite drawn from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera of Russian legends, "Tsar Saltan." In all these pieces Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestro are—and were—at their best.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1944

Koussevitzky to Conduct First Milwaukee Concert on Dec. 9

CONTRARY to rumors hereabouts, the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra is not yet a sellout. The Arion club, sponsoring the Dec. 9 event, reports that about 1,000 of the 6,500 seats in the Auditorium are still available.

Although the Boston orchestra has played here several times in the last 50 years, the concert will mark the first Milwaukee visit of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, one of the great symphony directors of musical history. He was born 70 years ago in a central Russian province, Tver. His father opposed the boy's musical ambitions, so he ran away to Moscow and applied for a scholarship at the conservatory. The only opening for him was in the double bass department, so he accepted it and became the finest bass player in the world.

He assembled his own orchestra in Moscow and took it down the Volga river in a chartered boat, giving concerts in towns which had never heard such music. He transferred his activities to Paris after the Russian revolution, and in 1924 he was brought to Boston. Under his leadership the already great orchestra has come to be considered the finest today.

Tonight's concert by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, over KHMO and the Blue Network at 7:30 p. m., will be dedicated to the Sixth War Bond Drive. With the concert, from Hunter college, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will inaugurate the series of five broadcasts to come during the season from this college. During the full-hour concert tonight the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will play William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," and the Sixth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, composed at the outbreak of the war.

[illegible]
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 15 [illegible]

Last Night's Concert

E. C. R.

Boston
Symphony at Woolsey Hall

Boston Symphony Orchestra was at its technical best last evening at Woolsey Hall as the Second Concert in the Woolsey Hall Series took place, the evening being given over to the most brilliant order.

Three compositions, one written in 1888, another in 1906, and a very recent one composed only in 1943, comprised the program. As Koussevitzky presented them, they were all show pieces. Disagreement about type, form and style continue, but everyone agrees that when this great 110-piece orchestra performs fresh admiration is awakened for whatever he undertakes to present. Koussevitzky puts his whole heart, zeal of mind, body and soul into the inexhaustible preparation of his program. As always, his stirring personality, charm, mannerisms, and beautifully expressive hands were a determining factor in his direction and ever-increasing popularity. It would be interesting if Serge Koussevitzky were to give voice to what he expresses in pantomine. To hear him in rehearsal must, indeed, be an experience forever remembered.

Playing up the most extraordinary skill of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that of many instruments playing the same note and sounding as one instrument—the first number on last night's concert, "Prayer in Time of War" by William Schuman, opened in a very quiet and prayerful mood, then gradually brought in the rest of the orchestra in a magnificent organ effect. One of the interesting phases was the dramatic use of the drum showing an unusual opportunity for this instrument. An interesting interplay of trumpet and woodwind followed, with muted violin accompaniment. Deserved praise should be given the French horn player for his impeccable performanse. The number was closed very appropriately by a prayer-like ending with all instruments voicing the "Amen."

Dimitri Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 6, first performed at a Festival in Moscow on December 3, 1939, opened with an expressive theme by the woodwinds and strings. The English horn and flute featured predominently. The playing was intimate and subtle with the result that one thought less about the performance and more about the music. Altogether delightful was the Allegro movement, which was more of a brilliant Scherzo in style. Variety was furnished by melodic runs and skips. The clarinets, woodwinds and piccolo were highly individualized by their colorful interpretation. A climax of brass and full orchestra preceded the light close. Brilliant and substantial was the finale, Presto, in the character of a folk dance.

The concluding selection was Tschaikowsky's 5th Symphony, written in the unusual key of E Minor, which up to this time had appeared prominently only in the 4th Symphony of Brahms. This symphony is a struggle against Fate, its ideals of peace on earth, good will to men, being justified by religious character in the opening and close. Complaints voiced in a rather sad and yearning strain are followed by a repetition of an earlier rallying call. A lovely melody, familiar to us in "The Song of Songs" is sung by the solo horn. Tschaikowsky's Scherzo takes the popular waltz form. The Finale appears in a triumphant march time, with the strings playing a steady accompaniment of octaves in triplets. Nowhere in music is there a better demonstration of the psychological difference between the major and the minor moods. Altogether an amazing display of musicianship with continuous melodic interest and fascinating experiments in orchestration made forever memorable this superb presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 22 1944

MUSIC

Bernstein Conducts Boston Symphony with Pianist Sanrôma as Soloist.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The young conductor Leonard Bernstein appeared as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Metropolitan Theater. The audience was large, despite bad weather, and Mr. Bernstein was greeted with resounding admiration.

The program was the Brahms piano concerto in D minor, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the fifth symphony of Shostakovitch.

At 26, Mr. Bernstein is already a conductor of considerable attainments. Merely to make one's way through such intricate scores is no small task; to do so with elegance and insight, as Mr. Bernstein did, arouses respect. His grimaces and gestures are often amusingly like those of his illustrious instructor Serge Koussevitzky, but that will wear off as he progresses to his own style. His directions are clear and exact, his beat has meaning and decision, his familiarity with the music is thorough. If he could have imparted to the orchestra some share of his own seeming intensity, we should all have been lifted from our seats at moments, but the orchestra played, in general, with a stolid virtuosity, perhaps even with virtuoso stolidity.

Mr. Sanroma is also intense, and his control of the piano is comprehensive; yet I did not think his tone particularly beautiful nor feel that he and Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra, for all the superior phases of the performance, were quite able to make this music, as a whole, exciting. I don't see how anybody could. The rest of the audience was of a different mind. The appla[illegible] vigorous and prolonged.

The symphony was played [illegible] fine finish and with much splen[illegible] demonstration of individual voices. Mr. Bernstein excelled himself in the largo, inducing an hypnotic silence and concentration in his listeners, and his adroitness in exploiting the contrasting rowdiness of the finale was remarkable. If this music is great, I am mistaken, but it is effective and Mr. Bernstein knew how to discourse it. He received deserved approval.

Tonight's concert by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, over KHMO and the Blue Network at 7:30 p. m., will be dedicated to the Sixth War Bond Drive. With the concert, from Hunter college, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will inaugurate the series of five broadcasts to come during the season from this college. During the full-hour concert tonight the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will play William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," and the Sixth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, composed at the outbreak of the war.

[illegible]

There's

Music in the Air

Koussevitzky and Shostakovitch's Sixth

By John Rosenfield

BOSTON SYMPHONY: Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, a far less pretentious work than the Seventh and Eighth of the war years, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Shostakovitch's music, if it does nothing else, exploits a modern symphony with the utmost confidence. The Bostonians form quite an orchestra to exploit and Koussevitzky is nothing loath to help. This is to say the end result could not help being terrific. The first movement of the Sixth is longer than the other two combined. It is rhythmically slow and contains moments of genuine feeling and haunting loveliness of timbres. Its relation to the pair of galloping shorter movements is not clear. The finale is a syncopated two-step sounding like nothing so much as the finish of a Betty Grable musical.

Koussevitzky apparently has set a pattern of bracketing Shostakovitch with William Schuman, the young New York composer. The only other number in the broadcast period was Schuman's Prayer in Time of War, which was known two years ago as Prayer—1943. This is a simple statement of mood, at once fervent and at once tragic. It resolves into a proclamation of faith and fortified will. Koussevitzky gave the Schuman Prayer nobler proportions and more dignity of utterance than have other conductors who have played it over the air. The Prayer, like most of Schuman's more recent music, acquires strength and intelligibility through the seasons.

(Blue Network, through KGKO, 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. Saturday.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 20 1944

ARCHER INTERPRETS

Lectures on Music to Be Played by Boston Symphony.

Music Critic John Archer gave his interpretation of music to be played here tomorrow night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a lecture in Brown University's Marston Hall yesterday afternoon.

Archer's lecture, illustrated with recordings and sessions at the piano, was the first in a series to be held at the university each Sunday preceding the Boston Symphony concerts of the season. About 50 persons attended.

Paper Mill and Wood Pulp
News
NEW YORK, N.Y.

NOV 25 1944

Allis-Chalmers Salutes the Paper Industry

Saturday, December 2, at 8:30 P. (E. W. T.) over 189 stations of Blue Network Allis-Chalmers will sal the Paper Industry with a radio p gram. The Boston Symphony Orches with Serge Koussvitzky as conductor

Tune in this tribute. Listen and proud as a nation-wide network te America of your industry's great c tribution to the war effort . . . the p duction records you and your associa have helped to set, the many ways yo industry is helping to speed Victory!

This is Allis-Chalmers salute to y . . . to every man and woman working America's great Pulp and Paper Indu try. Don't miss it!

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 22 1944

MUSIC

Leonard Bernstein and Jesus Maria Sanroma With Hub Symphony

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The young conductor, Leonard Bernstein, appeared as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Metropolitan Theater. The audience was large, despite bad weather, and Mr. Bernstein was greeted with resounding admiration.

The program was the Brahms piano concerto in D minor, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the fifth symphony of Shostakovitch.

At 26, Mr. Bernstein is already a conductor of considerable attainments. Merely to make one's way through such intricate scores is no small task; to do so with elegance and insight, as Mr. Bernstein did, arouses respect. His grimaces and gestures are often amusingly like those of his illustrious instructor, Serge Koussevitzky, but that will wear off as he progresses to his own style. His directions are clear and exact, his beat has meaning and decision, his familiarity with the music is thorough. If he could have imparted to the orchestra some share of his own seeming intensity, we should all have been lifted from our seats at moments, but the orchestra played, in general, with a stolid virtuosity, perhaps even with virtuoso stolidity.

Mr. Sanroma is intense, and his control of the piano is comprehensive; yet I did not think his tone particularly beautiful nor feel that he and Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra, for all the superior phases of the performance, were quite able to make this music, as a whole, exciting. I don't see how anybody could. The rest of the audience was of a different mind. The applause was vigorous and prolonged.

The symphony was played with fine finish and with much splendid demonstration of individual voices. Mr. Bernstein excelled himself in the largo, inducing an hypnotic silence and concentration in his listeners, and his adroitness in exploiting the contrasting rowdiness of the finale was remarkable. If this music is great, I am mistaken, but it is effective and Mr. Bernstein knew how to discourse it. He received deserved approval.

[illegible] WIS.
[illegible]NEL

[illegible] 3 [illegible]

Symphony on Air From Milwaukee

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast their weekly Saturday night concert from Milwaukee Auditorium Dec. 9.

The celebrated 105 piece orchestra, which performs on a coast to coast network under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing co., is being brought to Milwaukee by the Arion Musical club.

Because the radio broadcast must go on promptly at 7:30 p. m., no concertgoers will be seated after 7:15.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 20 1944

Capacity Audience at Academy Welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky .. ....

A capacity audience welcomed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at the opening concert of their current Brooklyn season in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program featured a performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and also included the Suite for Strings by Arthur Foote and the Suite, "Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Seated in Box No. 1 were Mrs. William H. Good and her guests, Judge and Mrs. George E. Brower, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Roulston, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Rudolph Reimer and Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, hostess in Box No. 2, entertained Mr. and Mrs. William E. Robertson, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mrs. James M. Fawcett and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett.

Box No. 3 was occupied by Mrs. Benjamin Prince and her guests.

Members of the Brooklyn Women's Club were seated in Box No. 4: Mrs. Burgess Osterhout, president; Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. H. S. Rasi, Mrs. George Hills Iler, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Adolph L. Muller and Mrs. William E. Howes.

Seated in Box No. 5 were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest; Mr. and Mrs. William B. Parker and their guests, Misses Rosalie and Katherine Parker; and Miss Jessie Lockitt and her guest, Mrs. Henry V. Raymond.

Tickets for Box No. 7 were distributed to service men and noncommissioned officers by Lt. L. Wambaugh, U.S.N. This box was a gift of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, chairman.

Tickets for Box No. 8 were distributed to officers of Ft. Hamilton and guests by Col. Harry W. Maas. This box was also a gift of the committee.

The second concert of the 1944-1945 series will take place on Jan. 12. This series is presented each season under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Concerts.

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS

NOV 20 1944

Observant Citizen

By MARJORIE B. SHARPE

Symphony Hall, home of Boston's famous Symphony, offers a contrast for music lovers in winter and summer. At the height of the former season, Serge Koussevitsky, wields his baton. Early in May Arthur Fiedler leads the Boston Pops to a packed house nightly. Later on in the summer, the Pops orchestra adjourns to a shimmering shell alongside the river. There, thousands of music lovers sit, recline, and stand to hear the master's works played.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered only music already heard this season, either at the so-called regular concerts or at the first of the new series on Sunday afternoons. At both ends of the programme came Hector Berlioz, by way of the scintillant "Roman Carnival" overture, and the imaginative, pictorial "Harold in Italy" symphony, with the incomparable William Primrose once more to play the important part for solo viola. The central item was pictorial also, the suite drawn from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera of Russian legends, "Tsar Saltan." In all these pieces Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestro are—and were—at their best

Pst Nov 28

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1944

Koussevitzky to Conduct First Milwaukee Concert on Dec. 9

CONTRARY to rumors hereabouts, the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra is not yet a sellout. The Arion club, sponsoring the Dec. 9 event, reports that about 1,000 of the 6,500 seats in the Auditorium are still available.

Although the Boston orchestra has played here several times in the last 50 years, the concert will mark the first Milwaukee visit of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, one of the great symphony directors of musical history. He was born 70 years ago in a central Russian province, Tver. His father opposed the boy's musical ambitions, so he ran away to Moscow and applied for a scholarship at the conservatory. The only opening for him was in the double bass department, so he accepted it and became the finest bass player in the world.

He assembled his own orchestra in Moscow and took it down the Volga river in a chartered boat, giving concerts in towns which had never heard such music. He transferred his activities to Paris after the Russian revolution, and in 1924 he was brought to Boston. Under his leadership the already [illegible] orchestra has come to be consi[illegible] the finest [illegible]

JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 15

Last Night's Concert

E. C. R.

Boston Symphony at Woolsey Hall

Boston Symphony Orchestra was at its technical best last evening at Woolsey Hall as the Second Concert in the Woolsey Hall Series took place, the evening being given over to the most brilliant order.

Three compositions, one written in 1888, another in 1906, and a very recent one composed only in 1943, comprised the program. As Koussevitzky presented them, they were all show pieces. Disagreement about type, form and style continue, but everyone agrees that when this great 110-piece orchestra performs fresh admiration is awakened for whatever he undertakes to present. Koussevitzky puts his whole heart, zeal of mind, body and soul into the inexhaustible preparation of his program. As always, his stirring personality, charm, mannerisms, and beautifully expressive hands were a determining factor in his direction and ever-increasing popularity. It would be interesting if Serge Koussevitzky were to give voice to what he expresses in pantomine. To hear him in rehearsal must, indeed, be an experience forever remembered.

Playing up the most extraordinary skill of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that of many instruments playing the same note and sounding as one instrument—the first number on last night's concert, "Prayer in Time of War" by William Schuman, opened in a very quiet and prayerful mood, then gradually brought in the rest of the orchestra in a magnificent organ effect. One of the interesting phases was the dramatic use of the drum showing an unusual opportunity for this instrument. An interesting interplay of trumpet and woodwind followed, with muted violin accompaniment. Deserved praise should be given the French horn player for his impeccable performance. The number was closed very appropriately by a prayer-like ending with all instruments voicing the "Amen."

Dimitri Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 6, first performed at a Festival in Moscow on December 3, 1939, opened with an expressive theme by the woodwinds and strings. The English horn and flute featured predominently. The playing was intimate and subtle with the result that one thought less about the performance and more about the music. Altogether delightful was the Allegro movement, which was more of a brilliant Scherzo in style. Variety was furnished by melodic runs and skips. The clarinets, woodwinds and piccolo were highly individualized by their colorful interpretation. A climax of brass and full orchestra preceded the light close. Brilliant and substantial was the finals, Presto, in the character of a folk dance.

The concluding selection was Tschaikowsky's 5th Symphony, written in the unusual key of E Minor, which up to this time had appeared prominently only in the 4th Symphony of Brahms. This symphony is a struggle against Fate, its ideals of peace on earth, good will to men, being justified by religious character in the opening and close. Complaints voiced in a rather sad and yearning strain are followed by a repetition of an earlier rallying call. A lovely melody, familiar to us in "The Song of Songs" is sung by the solo horn. Tschaikowsky's Scherzo takes the popular waltz form. The Finale appears in a triumphant march time, with the strings playing a steady accompaniment of octaves in triplets. Nowhere in music is there a better demonstration of the psychological difference between the major and the minor moods. Altogether an amazing display of musicianship with continuous melodic interest and fascinating experiments in orchestration made forever memorable this superb presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 22 1944

MUSIC

Bernstein Conducts Boston Symphony with Pianist Sanroma as Soloist.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The young conductor Leonard Bernstein appeared as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Metropolitan Theater. The audience was large, despite bad weather, and Mr. Bernstein was greeted with resounding admiration.

The program was the Brahms piano concerto in D minor, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the fifth symphony of Shostakovitch.

At 26, Mr. Bernstein is already a conductor of considerable attainments. Merely to make one's way through such intricate scores is no small task; to do so with elegance and insight, as Mr. Bernstein did, arouses respect. His grimaces and gestures are often amusingly like those of his illustrious instructor, Serge Koussevitzky, but that will wear off as he progresses to his own style. His directions are clear and exact, his beat has meaning and decision, his familiarity with the music is thorough. If he could have imparted to the orchestra some share of his own seeming intensity, we should all have been lifted from our seats at moments, but the orchestra played, in general, with a stolid virtuosity, perhaps even with virtuoso stolidity.

Mr. Sanroma is also intense, and his control of the piano is comprehensive; yet I did not think his tone particularly beautiful nor feel that he and Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra, for all the superior phases of the performance, were quite able to make this music, as a whole, exciting. I don't see how anybody could. The rest of the audience was of a different mind. The applause was vigorous and prolonged.

The symphony was played with fine finish and with much splendid demonstration of individual voices. Mr. Bernstein excelled himself in the largo, inducing an hypnotic silence and concentration in his listeners, and his adroitness in exploiting the contrasting rowdiness of the finale was remarkable. If this music is great, I am mistaken, but it is effective and Mr. Bernstein knew how to discourse it. He received deserved approval.

Tonight's concert by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, over KHMO and the Blue Network at 7:30 p. m., will be dedicated to the Sixth War Bond Drive. With the concert, from Hunter college, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will inaugurate the series of five broadcasts to come during the season from this college. During the full-hour concert tonight the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will play William Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," and the Sixth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, composed at the outbreak of the war.

TEX.
NEWS

There's

Music in the Air

Koussevitzky and Shostakovitch's Sixth

By John Rosenfield

BOSTON SYMPHONY: Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, a far less pretentious work than the Seventh and Eighth of the war years, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Shostakovitch's music, if it does nothing else, exploits a modern symphony with the utmost confidence. The Bostonians form quite an orchestra to exploit and Koussevitzky is nothing loath to help. This is to say the end result could not help being terrific. The first movement of the Sixth is longer than the other two combined. It is rhythmically slow and contains moments of genuine feeling and haunting loveliness of timbres. Its relation to the pair of galloping shorter movements is not clear. The finale is a syncopated two-step sounding like nothing so much as the finish of a Betty Grable musical.

Koussevitzky apparently has set a pattern of bracketing Shostakovitch with William Schuman, the young New York composer. The only other number in the broadcast period was Schuman's Prayer in Time of War, which was known two years ago as Prayer—1943. This is a simple statement of mood, at once fervent and at once tragic. It resolves into a proclamation of faith and fortified will. Koussevitzky gave the Schuman Prayer nobler proportions and more dignity of utterance than have other conductors who have played it over the air. The Prayer, like most of Schuman's more recent music, acquires strength and intelligibility through the seasons.

(Blue Network, through KGKO, 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. Saturday.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 20 1944

ARCHER INTERPRETS

Lectures on Music to Be Played by Boston Symphony.

Music Critic John Archer gave his interpretation of music to be played here tomorrow night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a lecture in Brown University's Marston Hall yesterday afternoon.

Archer's lecture, illustrated with recordings and sessions at the piano, was the first in a series to be held at the university each Sunday preceding the Boston Symphony concerts of the season. About 50 persons attended.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 22 1944

stein and Sanroma
-fisted ymphony

VERIDGE

ductor, Leonard ed as guest with ony Orchestra last itan Theater. The arge, despite bad Mr. Bernstein was ounding admiration. was the Brahms in D minor, with nroma as soloist, and hony of Shostakovitch. Bernstein is already a considerable attainely to make one's such intricate scores is k; to do so with elegance , as Mr. Bernstein did, spect. His grimaces and re often amusingly like his illustrious instructor. oussevitzky, but that will as he progresses to his own his directions are clear and is beat has meaning and de his familiarity with the mu horough. If he could have ed to the orchestra some share own seeming intensity, we all have been lifted from our at moments, but the orchestra d, in general, with a stolid osity, perhaps even with virtu stolidity. r. Sanroma is intense, and his trol of the piano is comprehenve; yet I did not think his tone parcicularly beautiful nor feel that he and Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra, for all the superior phases of the performance, were quite able to make this music, as a whole, exciting. I don't see how anybody could.

The rest of the audience was of a different mind. The applause was vigorous and prolonged.

The symphony was played with fine finish and with much splendid demonstration of individual voices. Mr. Bernstein excelled himself in the largo, inducing an hypnotic silence and concentration in his listeners, and his adroitness in exploiting the contrasting rowdiness of the finale was remarkable. If this music is great, I am mistaken, but it is effective and Mr. Bernstein knew how to discourse it. He received deserved approval.

Paper Mill and Wood Pulp News
NEW YORK, N.Y.

NOV 25 1944

Allis-Chalmers Salutes the Paper Industry

Saturday, December 2, at 8:30 P. M. (E. W. T.) over 189 stations of the Blue Network Allis-Chalmers will salute the Paper Industry with a radio program. The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussvitzky as conductor.

Tune in this tribute. Listen and be proud as a nation-wide network tells America of your industry's great contribution to the war effort . . . the production records you and your associates have helped to set, the many ways your industry is helping to speed Victory!

This is Allis-Chalmers salute to you . . . to every man and woman working in America's great Pulp and Paper Industry. Don't miss it!

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 20 1944

Capacity Audience at Academy Welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky .. ....

A capacity audience welcomed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at the opening concert of their current Brooklyn season in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program featured a performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and also included the Suite for Strings by Arthur Foote and the Suite, "Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Seated in Box No. 1 were Mrs. William H. Good and her guests, Judge and Mrs. George E. Brower, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Roulston, Judge and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Rudolph Reimer and Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, hostess in Box No. 2, entertained Mr. and Mrs. William E. Robertson, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mrs. James M. Fawcett and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett.

Box No. 3 was occupied by Mrs. Benjamin Prince and her guests.

Members of the Brooklyn Women's Club were seated in Box No. 4: Mrs. Burgess Osterhout, president; Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. H. S. Rasi, Mrs. George Hillsller, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Adolph L. Muller and Mrs. William E. Howes.

Seated in Box No. 5 were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest; Mr. and Mrs. William B. Parker and their guests, Misses Rosalie and Katherine Parker; and Miss Jessie Lockitt and her guest, Mrs. Henry V. Raymond.

Tickets for Box No. 7 were distributed to service men and noncommissioned officers by Lt. L. Wambaugh, U.S.N. This box was a gift of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, chairman.

Tickets for Box No. 8 were distributed to officers of Ft. Hamilton and guests by Col. Harry W. Maas. This box was also a gift of the committee.

The second concert of the 1944-1945 series will take place on Jan. 12. This series is presented each season under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Concerts.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1944

Koussevitzky to Conduct First Milwaukee Concert on Dec. 9

CONTRARY to rumors hereabouts, the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra is not yet a sellout. The Arion club, sponsoring the Dec. 9 event, reports that about 1,000 of the 6,500 seats in the Auditorium are still available.

Although the Boston orchestra has played here several times in the last 50 years, the concert will mark the first Milwaukee visit of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, one of the great symphony directors of musical history. He was born 70 years ago in a central Russian province, Tver. His father opposed the boy's musical ambitions, so he ran away to Moscow and applied for a scholarship at the conservatory. The only opening for him was in the double bass department, so he accepted it and became the finest bass player in the world.

He assembled his own orchestra in Moscow and took it down the Volga river in a chartered boat, giving concerts in towns which had never heard such music. He transferred his activities to Paris after the Russian revolution, and in 1924 he was brought to Boston. Under his leadership the already great orchestra has come to be considered the finest [illegible]

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

Symphony on Air From Milwaukee

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast their weekly Saturday night concert from Milwaukee Auditorium Dec. 9.

The celebrated 105 piece orchestra, which performs on a coast to coast network under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing co., is being brought to Milwaukee by the Arion Musical club.

Because the radio broadcast must go on promptly at 7:30 p. m., no concertgoers will be seated after 7:15.

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS

NOV 20 1944

Observant Citizen

By MARJORIE B. SHARPE

Symphony Hall, home of Boston's famous Symphony, offers a contrast for music lovers in winter and summer. At the height of the former season, Serge Koussevitsky, wields his baton. Early in May Arthur Fiedler leads the Boston Pops to a packed house nightly. Later on in the summer, the Pops orchestra adjourns to a shimmering shell alongside the river. There, thousands of music lovers sit, recline, and stand to hear the master's works played.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered only music already heard this season, either at the so-called regular concerts or at the first of the new series on Sunday afternoons. At both ends of the programme came Hector Berlioz, by way of the scintillant "Roman Carnival" overture, and the imaginative, pictorial "Harold in Italy" symphony, with the incomparable William Primrose once more to play the important part for solo viola. The central item was pictorial also, the suite drawn from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera of Russian legends, "Tsar Saltan." In all these pieces Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestro are—and were—at their best.

Post Nov 28

URDAY, NOVEMBER 25,

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, gave the seventh program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist in the following program:
Brahms—Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15.
Shostakovitch—Symphony No. 5, Op. 47.

We are accustomed—in Symphony Hall of a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening as the case may be—to having our scalps lifted a few notches once or twice a semester by a shockingly mettlesome performance of something or other. Indeed, given a program designed for such purposes (and more and more of them are), Dr. Koussevitzky seldom fails. But yesterday it was Leonard Bernstein who achieved the goal; two of them in fact.

It is pretty generally accepted that Mr. Bernstein is an extraordinary fellow who, if he keeps going as he is now, will probably achieve the distinction of being the first American born and American-trained conductor to whom the word "great" may be applied. For while it would be pompous to say he doesn't do this right or that right now but that he will when he is older, it would be foolhardy to say he hasn't got the stuff of great musical stature.

He is, in the first place, a very sound musician; that must be taken for granted. But he has a number of extra-musical qualities which contribute vastly to his audience success. The chief of these is vividness; the motions he makes in the air seem to look as the music sounds. Next is an air of complete authority; there is nothing tentative about him in anything he does. Then he has great vigor, and this is alway fascinating to watch whether in a boxer, a race horse or a conductor; yet it is a physical force modified by balance, rhythm and poise, and a force capable of being forceful even in repose. Finally, Mr. Bernstein has showmanship; a good deal of it, and when he turns to the violas and passionately exhorts them to lay on (they are already laying on, mind you), you are not in the least disturbed because you are aware it was his personality which by its presence got them to lay on in the first place. And so all these things contribute to the impression that Mr. Bernstein is not merely superintending; he is playing everything all at once, and it is this remarkable faculty he—and I think he alone—shares with Dr. Koussevitzky.

It may be said that it was all this combined with the similar X factors abundantly possessed by Jesus Maria Sanroma which made the Brahms D minor Concerto so effective. It was not a good performance, technically speaking, for Mr. Sanroma has often appeared to more striking advantage, but he and the orchestra under Mr. Bernstein did play it like men. The first movement had a driving, relentless quality set off in its lyrical moments by a tenderness which was always masculine. The slow movement also had sinew behind its sentiment, and the rondo was wiry, athletic, good-humored. True, the whole was sometimes rough and out of control, yet we must remember this Concerto can languish more than most and prove debilitating in the extreme. It didn't yesterday, and for that, a few violations of the conventional conception—or even a few technical errors—are small matters indeed. Seeing an advertisement protruding from below, I can only add the performance by orchestra and conductor of the Shostakovitch Fifth was hair-raising.

STRANGE INTERLUDE

Globe Nov. 26

In the concert halls of the United States symphony orchestras are once more recording masterworks. The veto by the Musicians' Union lasted twenty-seven months. That is, for more than two years in the floruit of the world's greatest orchestras and in the careers of soloists equally eminent, the books of printed sound which make accessible to multitudes the classics of one of the world's great literatures were forbidden to be printed.

A first casualty was the art of music itself. Valuable time and occasion have been lost which can never be fully overtaken. Continental European orchestras have all but ceased to exist; American orchestras in that strange interlude of twenty-seven months were in the full flower of their unparalleled splendor and were led by the most eminent conductors on earth, some of whom are no longer young. The physical obstacles to overtaking that fugitive loss may be grasped from some elementary arithmetic: the Boston Symphony Orchestra can record one hundred sides of discs in one year. It takes three hours to record ten sides—three hours meaning two hours of playing. One symphony may fill twelve records, as does Tschaikowsky's Fifth which was being recorded at Symphony Hall last Wednesday morning. Further: three complete recordings of Brahms' Violin Concerto by our orchestra under Dr. Koussevitsky with Mr. Heifetz had to be made before a set was produced which those artists were willing to publish. The performance is, of course, a masterpiece both of art and technology, but it cost something and in more kinds of coin than money alone.

The thankfulness of those who study musical literature by phonograph records that these Aldine presses of the world's classics are once more being allowed to print, however fervent it may be, is slightly chilled by the events attending their stoppage and by the terms which their release had to be obtained. No doubt it was all legal—until such time as Congress shall equate our copyright laws with the advance of scientific techniques which have made books of printed sound.

These queer and beautiful volumes have a mysteriously high voltage. They admit the listener to an intimacy with the thoughts of men of genius such as was not physically possible before our own lifetimes to any but professional musicians and not entirely to them. The spiritual content of the greatest of these musical works is equivalent to philosophical truth and religious experience of which indeed it is one of the varieties, and if their fructifying power were as well known as are the names of their composers, dealers in them would be cleaned out of stock faster than they could replenish.

> I often wonder what the Vintners buy
> One-half so precious as the stuff they sell.

But the stoppage of this spiritual current in a world, which needs the nourishment it can give as it has never been needed before, is one of those prodigies which stun the comprehension of the unworldly.

Who owns the sky over a given patch of earth? National sovereignty of the air, which is even now being decided, runs a close second in bizarre fantasy to physical proprietorship in the works of long-dead men of genius. Genius is of course one of the rarest articles on earth and one of the most precious, as might perhaps be inferred from the ferocious attempts of those who have it not to exploit the achievements of those who have. Beethoven referred to such gentry as "the hell-hounds that gnaw my brains," sighing resignedly that it might as well be one as another. And yet whose sky is it? Whose is the air? Whose music is it? And whose the divine revelation which flows through music into the consciousness of the listener?

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Her MUSIC Nov. 28

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and William Primrose soloist, presented the following program at Symphony Hall last evening:
"Roman Carnival" Overture......Berlioz
Suite from "Tsar Saltan" Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Harold in Italy"..................Berlioz

A program of music by two of the greatest orchestral geniuses of all time is exciting enough merely to contemplate; when this program becomes a reality here in Symphony Hall, the effect is little short of intoxicating.

However, thrilling as all this is, the lack of balance on such a program is all too apparent. A certain amount of froth is all very well, but last night it was all froth. Beethoven's Seventh, for instance, which was originally scheduled, would have added a great deal of substance to a list which displayed a bad lack of it.

For pure gorgeous sonority there are few pieces around that can approach the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Tsar Saltan" Suite. His emphasis is on exotic tints; he loves to exploit odd percussion effects and impossible acrobatics for the brass. Musically, the suite is definitely a lightweight, but such effects as the familiar "Flight of the Bumblebee," and the trumpet fanfares at the end are unforgettable. Needless to say, the performance was magnificent.

The Berlioz overture is, of course, a staple item, but seldom does it receive the majestic sweep that Dr. Kousevitzky brought to bear. And as for "Harold in Italy," fast becoming a warhorse with the orchestra, here we have the same unfathomable mixture of great music and pure bombast that has brought disrepute to most of Berlioz' other large works. There are many pages of real beauty, notably the Pilgrims' March and most of the Mountaineer's Serenade, but there are also too many pages of mere thrashing around for comfort.

The traversal of this score by Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Primrose was tonally and architecturally overwhelming. There will undoubtedly be greater music heard in Symphony Hall this season, but as pure sound last night's concert ranks among the best.

A. R.

Gl. MUSIC Nov. 28

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a night of high carnival, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting Berlioz and Rimsky-Korsakoff, and William Primrose as soloist. There was an ounce of adagio to a deal of allegro frenetico in the program which included "The Roman Carnival" Overture, and "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite from the opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" and the large audience enjoyed every minute of it.

Both works of Berlioz have been performed at previous concerts this season and both appear to increase in gusto with each hearing. The "Roman Carnival" Overture in particular, which was written originally as an introduction to the opera's second act, affords a field day for the brass section standing firmly against counterpoint in the strings.

The viola appeared to considerable advantage, both in playing second fiddle to the first violins in the Roman Carnival and as the solo instrument of the "Harold in Italy." William Primrose chose to accent the harsher tones of the viola in the opening movement and the finale of the brigands' orgy in contrast to the languorous sweetness of the serenade.

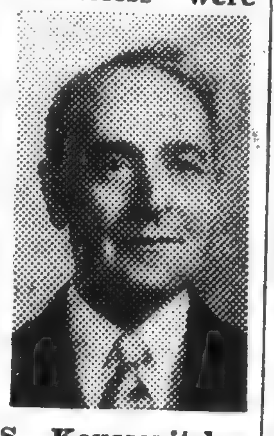
High point to this reviewer in the series of musical crises which the Berlioz Symphony winds together is the electrical change in the atmosphere of the second movement when the sustained notes of the strings suddenly give way to the hypnotic two-dimensional march of the pilgrims executed by the solo instrument.

The essential gaiety of the Rimsky-Korsakoff Suite from Pushkin's fairy tale was dulled by uneven timing in the second part but rose quickly to its proper sphere in the familiar "Flight of the Bumble-Bee" and the more imaginative "Three Wonders." The quicksilver rhythms of the last section demonstrate Koussevitzky's ability to transform hackneyed material into a fresh vein indeed, just as Pushkin's magic squirrel whistles folk songs and produces emerald kernels from nuts with golden shells.—P. W.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

NOV 26 1944

Blue Profile



S. Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky was born on July 26, 1874 in a tiny Russian village called Iver, of middle-class parents who nevertheless were musically inclined. In this congenial atmosphere the talents of young Serge were given a chance to grow and find direction. He became an accomplished pianist at an early age, was equally at home with several other instruments. Even at that time however he felt that there was something within him that demanded greater activity and wider range of expression. To satisfy this urgent need, Serge would line up all of the parlor chairs, find himself a box to stand on and begin to conduct. He would gesture violently and sing loudly the various parts of the composition and sometimes would attempt to sing them all at once. It was inevitable that such energy would eventually find its way into more formal channels of study.

With only three rubles in his pockets, a bundle of clothes on his back and a wealth of confidence, Serge was off to Moscow. Arriving there he went directly to the "Conservatory" and enrolled as a student. The only scholarships left were for horn, trombone and double bass. For some unknown reason he picked the double bass and rapidly became the greatest living double bass player. The knowledge of this instrument was directly responsible for his meeting Nathalie Ouskoff who attended one of his concerts. They were married and lived a graceful, happy life until Mrs. Koussevitzky passed away some years ago.

Koussevitzky has been conducting for 38 years, more than 20 of which have been devoted to developing the Boston Symphony into one of the world's greatest orchestras. For a number of years now Dr. Koussevitsky has broadcast regularly over the BLUE Network on Saturday evenings. Koussevitzky has been described as resembling a rather kindly diplomat of the Napoleonic-era. But he nevertheless wears old clothes at rehearsals and is the constant delight of his musicians. When he conducts he shakes his head violently, gracefully moves his hands, shouts and sometimes gives the impression of being completely possessed.

Outside of being the best and most consistent conductor in the world, he is the greatest champion of the modern idiom and especially of talented young American composers.

Typical of his attitude is the now famous comment made by his great admirer Oscar Levant, "He is unparalleled in the performance of Russian music, whether it is by Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff Strauss, Wagner or Aaron Copeland."

ANDERSON, IND.
HERALD

NOV 26 1944

Russian-Born Serge Koussevitzky Is Composer, Conductor

S. Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky was born on July 26, 1874 in a tiny Russian village called Iver, of middle-class parents who nevertheless were musically inclined. In this congenial atmosphere the talents of young Serge were given a chance to grow and find direction. He became an accomplished pianist at an early age ,was equally at home with several other instruments. Even at that time however, he felt that there was something within him that demanded greater activity and wider range of expression. To satisfy this urgent need, Serge would line up all of the parlor chairs, find himself a box to stand on and begin to conduct. He would gesture violently and sing loudly the various parts of the composition and sometimes would attempt to sing them all at once. It was inevitable that such energy would eventually find its way into more formal channels of study.

With only three rubles in his pocket, a bundle of clothes on his back and a wealth of confidence, Serge was off to Moscow. Arriving there he went directly to the "Conservatory" and enrolled as a student. The only scholarships left were for horn, trombone and double bass. For some unknown reason he picked the double bass and rapidly became the greatest living double bass player. The knowledge of this instrument was directly responsible for his meeting Nathalie Ouskoff who attended one of his concerts. They were married and lived a graceful, happy life until Mrs. Koussevitzky passed away some years ago.

Koussevitzky has been conducting for 38 years, more than 20 of which have been devoted to developing the Boston Symphony into one of the world's greatest orchestras. For a number of years now Dr. Koussevitzky has broadcast regularly over the Blue Network on Saturday evenings. Koussevitzky has been described as resembling a rather kindly diplomat of the Napoleonic-era. But he nevertheless wears old clothes at rehearsals and is the constant delight of his musicians. When he conducts he shakes his head violently, gracefully moves his hands, shouts and sometimes gives the impression of being completely possessed.

Outside of being the best and most consistent conductor in the world, he is the greatest champion of the modern idiom and especially of talented young American composers.

Typical of his attitude is the now famous comment made by his great admirer Oscar Levant, "He is unparalleled in the performance of Russian music, whether is is by Moussorgky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Strauss, Wagner or Aaron Copeland."

GARY, IND.
POST-TRIBUNE

DEC 1 5 1944

Boston Symphony to Salute Gary on Radio

[illegible] is one of the key centers [illegible] steel industry which will be [illegible] in a radio broadcast of the Boston symphony orchestra over [illegible] network tomorrow night [illegible] 7:30 and 8:30, Mayor Jos- [illegible] Finerty announced today. [illegible] musical numbers are Men- [illegible] "Symphony No. 3 in A [illegible] Gould's "Spirituals" for [illegible] choir and orchestra. [illegible] salute," Mayor Finerty said, [illegible] dramatize the important role [illegible] men and women of the [illegible] industry have played in back [illegible] war effort on the home

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

DEC 2 1944

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Orchestra Hall Friday evening, and at the Opera House next Sunday afternoon.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

DEC 1944

Boston Symphony Returns

Tuesday night in Public Music Hall the world's foremost symphony orchestra will make its fifth annual appearance in Cleveland. The visits of Sergei Koussevitzky, its director, and his 110 men always have been highlights of Cleveland's winter musical season.

Not only has Koussevitzky made thrilling music with his orchestra, but he—more than any other man in this country in this generation—has helped American composers and American artists to come to public attention.

Aaron Copland and Leonard Bernstein were among his proteges, and so was Dorothy Maynor, the soprano, and William Kapell, the young pianist. Without "Koussy's" help and encouragement, these Americans might have had harder musical rows to hoe. It is a privilege for Clevelanders to welcome the Boston orchestra and its distinguished leader.

Boston Symphony Returns

Dec

Tuesday night in Public Music Hall the world's foremost symphony orchestra will make its fifth annual appearance in Cleveland. The visits of Sergei Koussevitzky, its director, and his 110 men always have been highlights of Cleveland's winter musical season.

Not only has Koussevitzky made thrilling music with his orchestra, but he—more than any other man in this country in this generation—has helped American composers and American artists to come to public attention.

Aaron Copland and Leonard Bernstein were among his proteges, and so was Dorothy Maynor, the soprano, and William Kapell, the young pianist. Without "Koussy's" help and encouragement, these Americans might have had harder musical rows to hoe. It is a privilege for Clevelanders to welcome the Boston orchestra and its distinguished leader.

Herald Dec. 2

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the eighth program in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Overture to "Idomeneo" (K 366) ..... Mozart
Concerto for Orchestra .... Bartok
Symphony in D minor .... Franck

It is hardly necessary at this point to remark on the strength of the musical personality disclosed by Bartok's music. His Orchestral Concerto, given yesterday for the first time, is a work which must rank as the composer's masterpiece, which is to say it must also rank among the musical masterpieces of recent years.

Despite its basic simplicity, it is a composition of great contemporary complexity and, for the most part, of typical Bartokian austerity and severity, and it was not (barring the graceful, exquisite intermezzo) taken readily to heart by yesterday's audience. This should not dismay Bartok, whose music has withheld its innermost secrets from the general public for years. And it is by no means clear, even today, that his day is coming, but I would hazard a guess that if this extraordinary composition were to be heard as often as Shostakovitch's antiquated sensations, it would speak powerfully to the musical public.

The concerto is the product of a gloomy period in the composer's life. Bartok has not been well in recent months; nor has he been especially successful (if repeated performances are what make success). And when Dr. Koussevitzky through his music foundation approached him to commission this work, Bartok is said to have felt himself incapable of going through with the project. It may be reading things into the work which are not there, but the feeling of increasing optimism, of increasing strength and vigor is strongly conveyed in this work, and I have more than a suspicion that it is highly personal, even autobiographical music.

It begins with a phrase of gentle, luminous beauty which is soon carried away in a turbulent stream of conflicting rhythms and harmonies representing, perhaps, the composer's search for an idiom, his struggles to find, in clashing contemporary schools, his voice. There follow, in succeeding movements, reminiscences of other schools, fragments of other styles (the fourth movement might have been by Smetana), and finally, as if in triumphant assertion that he had been on the right track all along, he brings his Concerto to an end in his own individual idiom. All this, you understand, is pure speculative twaddle. It is simply what it might be and what it was to me.

From a more musical approach, however, there is no denying the splendors of its harmonic network or the expressiveness of its melodic sensibilities. There is a nobility and a purity to the music—all the more apparent in contrast to the Franck orgy which followed—which is akin esthetically to Bach—and which speaks most clearly to those with their deepest musical roots in that prodigious fountain. The Concerto, by the way, is fearfully difficult, and every man in the orchestra, not to mention Dr. Koussevitzky, must be congratulated for their technical feat in the mere negotiation of the work, while conductor and orchestra cannot be praised enough for endowing it with such great musical feeling. The composer came to the stage to acknowledge the applause, of which there was a heartening volume. Yes, if a composition of transcendent musical art may be defined as one which, in its own way, is a summation of all that has gone before, then the Orchestra Concerto is a work of art... and a great one.

Gl. Dec 3

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky is back at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following his two weeks' respite during which Dimitri Mitropoulos was guest conductor. As always, he was most cordially received yesterday when he first walked upon the stage, and the Friday audience applauded him heartily after each number of the afternoon.

The program brought for early repetition the Concerto for Orchestra by Bela Bartok, which had been given first performances this month. Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain" stood as opening-piece and as finale came the splendors and grandeur of Brahm's First Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitsky was well advised to let us hear Mr. Bartok's amiable music again so soon, before the effects of its first impressions had become lost. Yesterday, as before, one was struck by the prevailingly light mood of the Concerto, its fastidious workmanship which results in a clear texture of sound, and by its lively rhythms, some of which have a folk-song character.

To be sure, the five movements make a longish composition; but that is no deterrent to whole-hearted enjoyment of matter and style. In the orchestration you can find some derivations from Ravel and others, perhaps even a touch or two from Puccini in certain woodwind figures. Yesterday's performance was admirably taut and precise and the uncanny speed just before the end was such as only a virtuoso orchestra can achieve.

"A Night on Bald Mountain," not often has been heard here in the last few years. Generally Moussorgsky's macabre depiction is hair-raising, but yesterday for some unaccountable reason it seemed a little tame. Was music or performance or—more likely—this listener at fault. At any rate, Mr. Koussevitzky read the Slavic music with Slavic devotion to its intensities. But perhaps his performance has cooled a little, too.

No season would becomplete without a performance of Brahms' C minor Symphony, no matter how many times everyone has heard it. The tunes may no longer have their first appeal, and the cumulative grandeur of Brahms' conception as a whole may no longer retain its initial majesty. It is a sad fact of this world that increasing acquaintance with great works of art has just this effect.

Nevertheless it is the listener who changes, not the music. And in the future, when the first process of assimilation is complete, and the secondary one, in which you note hitherto unobserved details, has begun, the work will regain its freshness and impact. The C minor Symphony has long been a favorite with Mr. Koussevitzky. His ardor in performing it has not decreased.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

DEC 4 1944

Welcome Visitor

News 5

There is reason for unusual interest in the coming visit of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony. The distinguished leader of this notable musical organization—one of the top symphonies of the country—has come to the point where touring has lost its attraction for him.

Many of us have reached that decision, too. But Dr. Koussevitzky, one of the great musicians of his time, is reported ready to give up this annual migration into the provinces. Thus, the concert at Music Hall tomorrow night may be his final appearance in Cleveland.

We are so accustomed to annual farewell appearances of public figures that we are skeptical. We hope we will not be saying goodby to Dr. Koussevitzky. His yearly visit here is a cherished event.

The Boston orchestra under Koussevitzky guidance often strays from the Three Bs. Despite the director's 70 years, there is nothing hidebound about his musical taste. Many modern musical works have received their first performances under him. Many youthful artists got their start at Symphony Hall.

Second oldest symphony in the country—it was born in 1881 and teethed on a million dollar gift by Banker Higginson—the Boston Symphony has come to be one of America's musical landmarks. We who have been thrilled by the growth of our own symphony always are eager to welcome the old masters.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

DEC 5 1944

Koussevitzky Returns

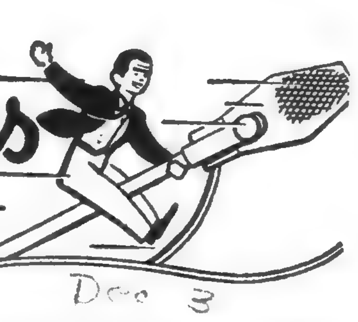
The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Public Music Hall tonight will mark the fifth consecutive year that this celebrated organization has been presented here under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno. Clevelanders and musicians everywhere have both a sentimental and an intellectual attachment to the Boston Orchestra.

The orchestra has for some years represented the acme of symphonic achievement. The conductor who carried it to the heights, Serge Koussevitzky, has won a place in the hearts of concertgoers that very few other musicians have attained. Dr. Koussevitzky is past 70, and there is none who applaud him unaware that some of these days he will turn over the baton to a younger man, yet all hope that time is still years ahead.

Jokes have been made about solo playing on the big bass fiddle, yet it was just that which first carried Koussevitzky to fame. He has composed a concerto for his instrument besides numerous shorter pieces. But long ago he turned to conducting. In his 20 years in Boston he has unfolded a talent rarely equaled. He builds a perfection of ensemble, while retaining freshness and vitality, that serves as the model for the world.

Riding the Airwaves

with Richard K. Bellamy



Milwaukee Journal Dec 3

WHAT sort of man is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor whose Boston symphony (playing in Milwaukee next Saturday) has come to be regarded as the finest organization of its kind today? He was born a Russian, but became a cosmopolitan and now must be looked upon as an American.

Koussevitzky came to this world July 26, 1874, at Iver, a small Russian village, and had the advantage of a musical background. His father taught the violin and his mother was an accomplished pianist. The artistic riches were his, the financial riches lacking. While but a child, it is related, he would line up chairs in his home and "conduct" them. In doing this, he developed some of that sweeping baton technique which he still possesses, as well as another faculty which his Boston players know so well—namely, of singing the phrases and themes to them. Now the high pitched voice has taken on a falsetto color, but it still guides the musicians over intricate passages. The chairs are no longer empty: In them are the best musicians he can secure.

At the age of 14, Koussevitzky, with three rubles in his dream lined pocket, left home to attend the Philharmonic conservatory in Moscow. On his arrival there he found scholarships available only in horn, trombone and the double bass. Undaunted, he selected the latter instrument and in 1894, upon his graduation, found a job at the Moscow Imperial theater. Two years later he had embarked on a career as a double bass soloist, something unheard of, yet his concerts brought the comment that he succeeded in drawing from the strings of this instrument a tone comparable in warmth and color to that of the cello.

So today it should hardly be strange that critics comment upon the warmth and sonorities of the Boston symphony's string section.

After his concert tour Koussevitzky went to Berlin to study with Artur Nikisch and in 1906 he made his bow as conductor, presiding over the Berlin Philharmonic. Shortly afterward, Koussevitzky engaged a steamboat and brought his concerts to points along Russia's famous Volga so that those who could not travel to the cities to hear the best and latest in music might have it brought to them. It was a crusade, and the crusader's spirit has never left him.

Paris followed, where he published new scores he had premiered from manuscripts, and in 1924 he was invited to fol-

Milwaukee Journal

Dec 3

A Great Orchestra

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor and musical director of the famed Boston symphony orchestra, will bring his renowned organization to Milwaukee's Auditorium on Saturday for a broadcast concert at 7:30 p. m.—and for the benefit of those holding tickets to attend, it is here noted that the doors will close at 7:15 sharp. This will give the whisperers 15 minutes to subside before the orchestra takes to the air over the Blue network (WCFL, WEMP) and over WMFM, The Journal's FM station.

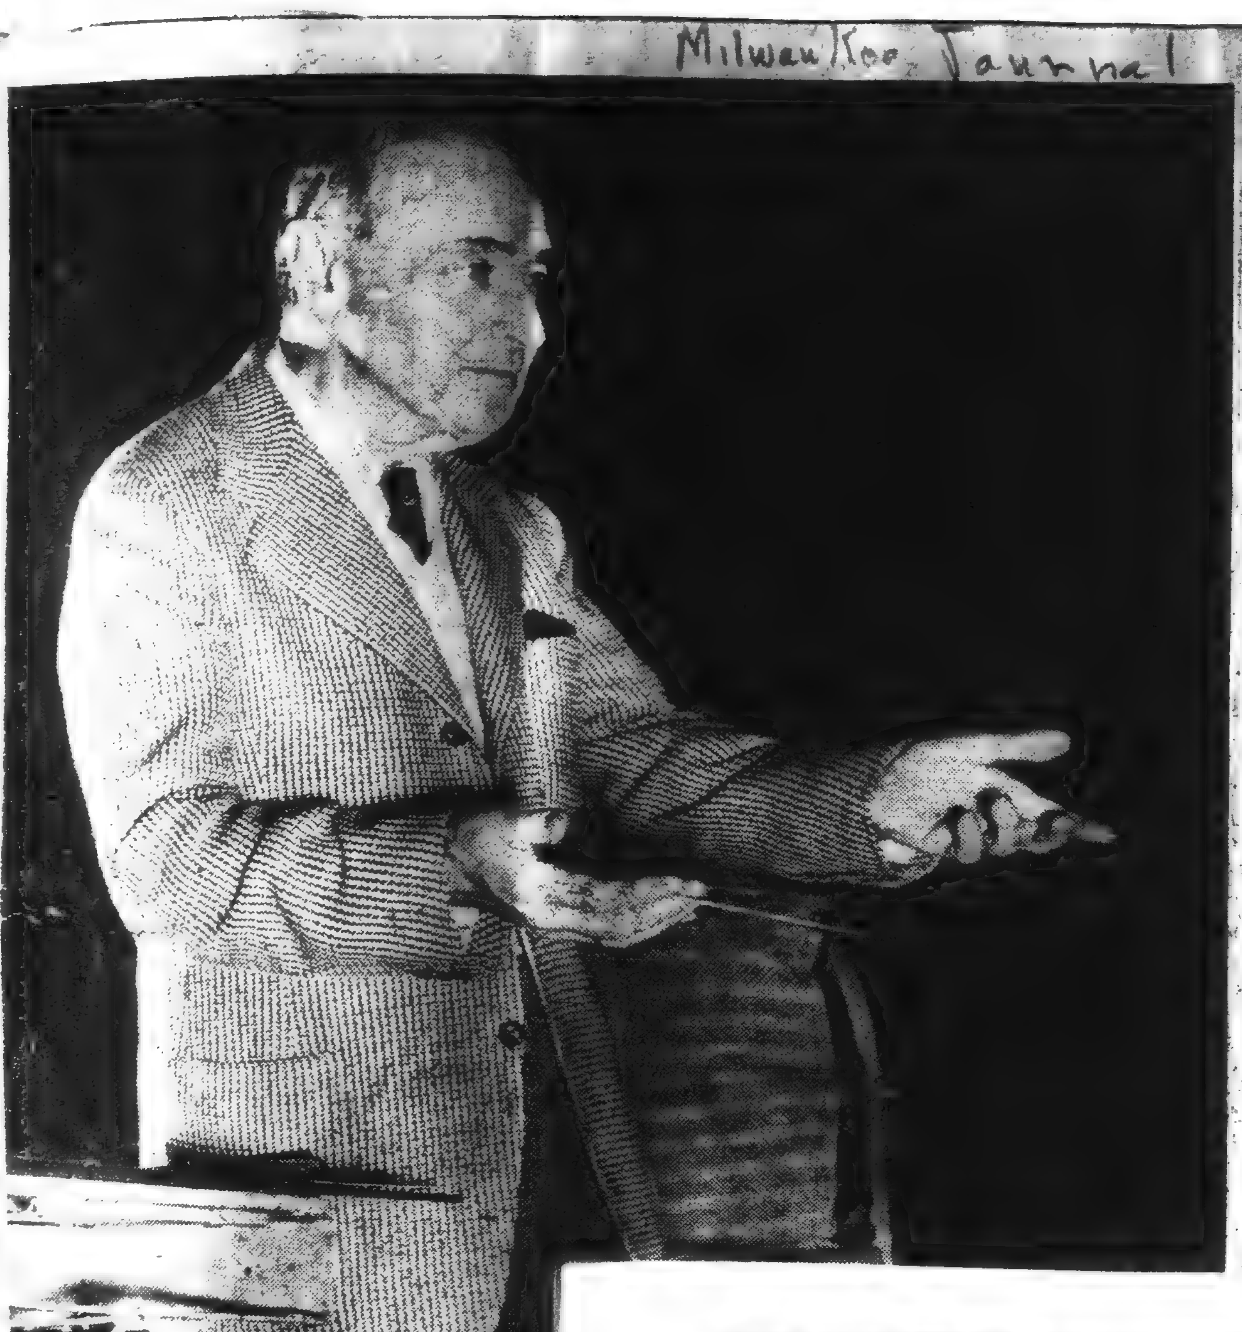
The Boston symphony does not come every year to Milwaukee. This will be its first appearance here in 30 years. Some 6,500 persons are expected to be on hand for the occasion.

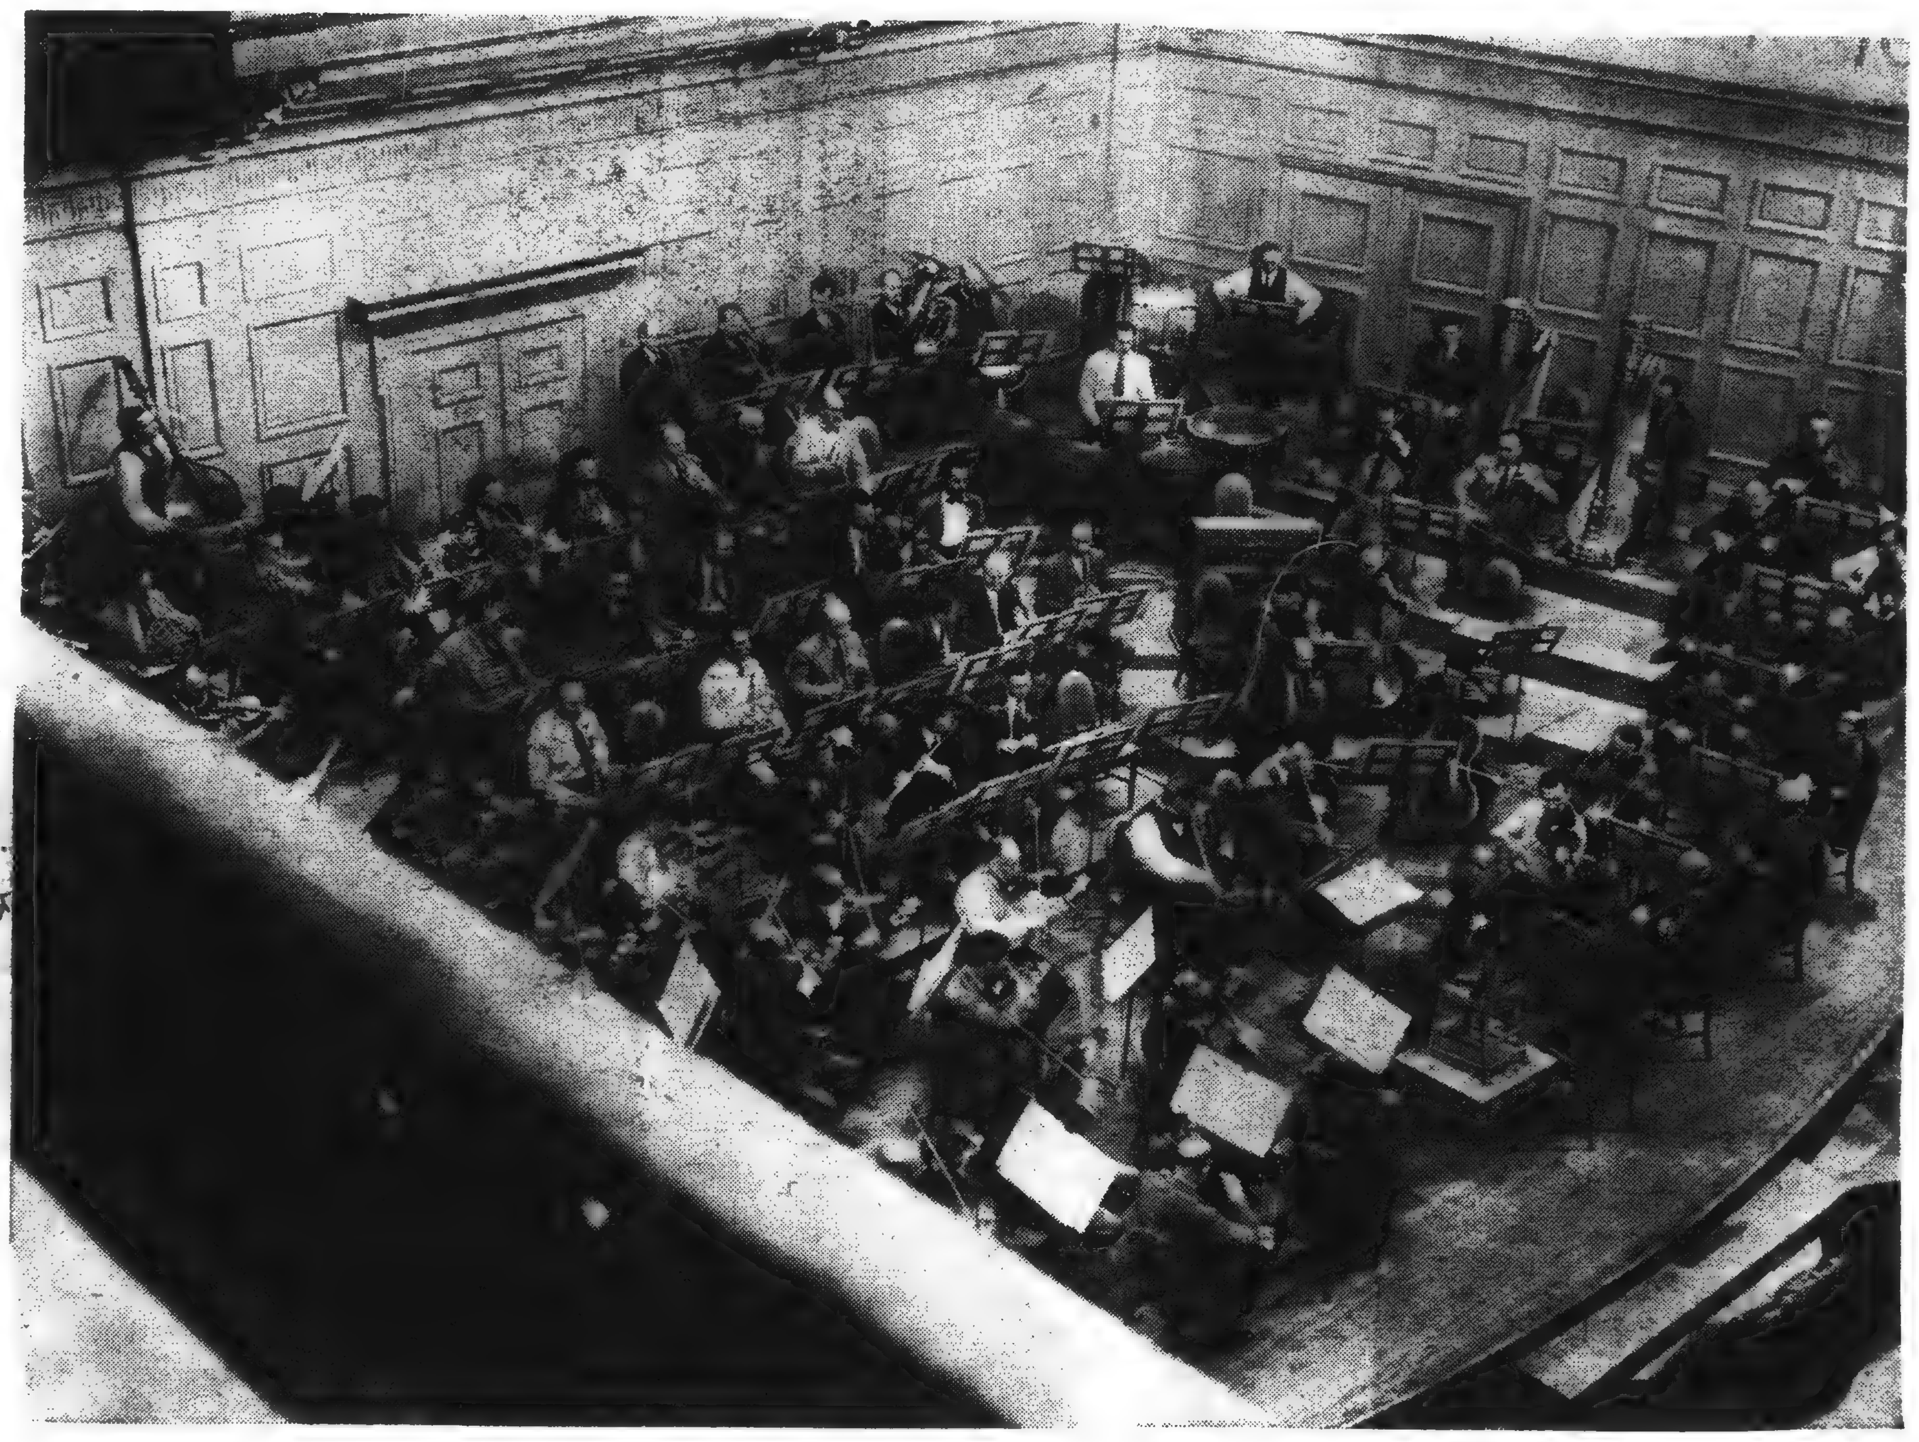
The one hour broadcast portion of the concert is sponsored, this Saturday as on all other Saturdays of the orchestra's season, by a vast and versatile manufactory whose principal operations are concentrated in West Allis, Wis. On the air Saturday Koussevitzky will conduct the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky; after the radio sign-off at 8:30 p. m. comes an intermission and later the orchestra will play, but not broadcast, a Corelli suite for strings and the preludes to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin."

For 20 years, or more than a quarter of its history, Koussevitzky has directed the Boston symphony, a tenure far exceeding that of any previous conductor and not often paralleled in the history of any orchestra. That admittedly is a tribute to his great leadership. The group's repertory of classic and contemporary scores testifies to his ardor and his keen sense of mixing the old and the new, the familiar and the strange, so that audiences, radio and visible, can enjoy a cross-section of the changes and developments in Koussevitzky's beloved art of music.

He is renowned as an exponent of new music and new composers, as witness his early support of Debussy, Ravel and Prokofieff, and, in this country, Roy Harris, Paul Creston, Aaron Copland and innumerable others—support that brought them the consideration and attention which is so necessary before they are "accepted" by others.

Koussevitzky feels that radio will continue to play an increasingly important role in the development of a national and indigenous American music. He has seen opposition to contemporary music break down in England, France and Russia, and he knows that the dike of conservatism is yielding in this country. Composer Copland has put Koussevitzky's unique reputation thus: "While every 10 year old American boy dreams of becoming president, every 20 year old American composer dreams of being played by Koussevitzky."





The Boston symphony orchestra, which plays here Dec. 9 in a broadcast concert, has few if any peers in the world. One reason is its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, shown (above) in an ingratiating mood. A facial resemblance to Eric Blore, the movie butler, has been noted by some. The other picture shows the orchestra busy at rehearsal in Boston's mellow old Symphony hall.

Mil. Jour. Dec 3

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS EXCITINGLY

Cleveland Plain Dealer

Enduring Quality Imparted to Good Music

Dec 6 - 1944

BY HERBERT ELWELL

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a capacity audience at Public Music Hall last night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky provided one of the most momentous musical evenings Cleveland has had for some time. The impression was of that deep and enduring quality which only this great orchestra and its eminent leader can evoke. And the reception was a demonstration of appreciation of which Cleveland as well as the visitors may be proud.

The triumph was the more magnificent for having been achieved with a program which, under ordinary circumstances, could be forbidding to the uninitiated. It contained just two symphonies, both unusually long, the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the Fifth of Dimitri Shostakovich. But Cleveland Civic Concert Course audiences have an instinct for what is good and can take it in large doses. Besides, the performance from start to finish was too exciting to allow one to entertain the possibility of lighter fare.

The gift for sustaining tension is given to Koussevitzky in a supreme degree. How often the listener's attention lags in the last movement of the "Eroica." But not so when Koussevitzky transforms it for us into Beethoven's truly clairvoyant vision of an ordered and exultant world of beauty. How often have we heard the horns bleat and fumble in the Scherzo. But not so under the light, precise touch of the Boston brasses.

Perceptions Deepened

Again what depths of human suffering, pathos and compassion were conjured in the Funeral March, and by what simple means. From the opening theme of the first movement the picture of the hero was complete. Yet it was no blustering, posturing hero, feeling his way toward an uncertain millennium, but the conqueror of self, the mastery of a mind come into complete possession of its spiritual birthright. And for such a picture one can only thank the mature genius of a conductor whose perceptions have constantly deepened with the passing of years.

Historians may give Shostakovich credit for being as great a representative of our time as Beethoven was of his. Certainly in so perfect an interpretation as was offered last night, the Soviet composer's Fifth took on unsuspected meanings of no small import. It seemed to grow to a tremendous stature and bring one breathlessly to the threshold of a disturbingly unpredictable but awe-inspiring future. Yet the comparison invited by juxtaposition with the "Eroica" was certainly in no way damaging to Beethoven.

Here then is a program that will be talked about no end, but amid the provocative discussions it may well arouse one thing is certain and that is our debt of gratitude to Mrs. Emil Brudno for bringing back to us this superb organization.

Koussevitzkys Win Ovation In Civic Course Program

Cleveland News Dec. 6, 44

BY ELMORE BACON

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY could have been elected mayor last evening. At any rate the capacity audience at Music Hall would have given him the city. Instead, this famous musician and his Boston Symphony Orchestra won a double-barreled ovation from the big crowd stirred to the highest pitch of enthusiasm by marvelous performances of the Beethoven Eroica Symphony and the Shostakovich Fifth.

The eminent conductor and his orchestra took six bows after each of the performances. And there were "Bravos" especially at the close of the brilliant presentation of the Russian music.

Last year in the Cleveland Civic Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno, Dr. Koussevitzky was ill and unable to direct here, his place being taken by the associate director, Richard Burgin, who also is concertmaster. So last night Dr. Koussevitzky was given a welcome that was really heartfelt.

These Bostonese, let it be hinted, may have a cold exterior. There's a sprinkling of snow along the thatchways. But there's nothing cold about their playing. And Koussevitzky's conducting reminds one of a volcano under wraps.

THE Boston strings have a tone all their own. It is golden, pulsating with life and of crystal purity. The symphonists, guided by the Koussevitzkian intuitive impulses, play with a glow of interpretive finesse that makes mere orchestral polish seem harsh in comparison.

The Koussevitzky reading of the Erocia was breath-taking. And he unfolded a New Shostakovich.

Koussevitzky shook a lot of the angularities out of the Shostakovich opus and revealed all of its beauty and brilliance. He really didn't change the Shostakovich music. He merely led you through its vagaries and subtleties with such a discernment that what in earlier hearings had seemed to be post-vodka ramblings, were revealed as beautiful Slav countryside views, with a dash here and there of Moscow pep and patriotism, plus an emotional slow movement that is really gripping.

Shostakovich wrote this Fifth in celebration of the Soviet Union's twentieth anniversary. That was back in 1937. Many complained that it was noisy and "too modern." It now has become part of the standard orchestral repertoire. Through its four movements there are flashes reminiscent of other music. But only flashes.

YOU find the Russian peasant threading his jolly way through all of the symphony. The allegretto is a marvel of gaiety dropped in between the brilliant and forceful opening and the Largo in which Ivan lays bare his love longings—a thrilling emotional experience under the baton of Koussevitzky. Shouting brass working up to a tremendous climax marks the closing allegro.

Beethoven sang his hero song most brilliantly in the Koussevitzky reading of the Eroica. He brought life even to the funeral march which seemed to give the departed soul first a startling view at the brink of eternity, and then a reassuring push over into the bliss of the Great Beyond. The joyous Sherzo and the triumphant finale were given beautiful performances.

The Shadow of Henry Higginson

Dec 4

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Coming Here Dec. 9, Monument to Banker Whose Love of Music Made Him a One Man Sponsor; Devoted Life and a Million Dollars to Its Success

WHEN Emerson remarked that an institution is the lengthened shadow of a man, he might have been looking squarely at a young fellow Bostonian, Henry Lee Higginson. For the superlative Boston orchestra, which is coming to Milwaukee Dec. 9—its first visit in 30 years—is the fruit of the labors and hopes of one man, a shrewd and generous banker who thought all his life that music was the best thing in the world. Maj. Higginson has been dead for 25 years, but his orchestra is more alive and more famous than ever.

A strange career it was for this son of old line Massachusetts Puritans. The Higginsons for generations had been eminent as seamen, merchants, pastors, patriots. But musicians—well! Henry was not born to wealth. His father had a small commission house and the boy was expected to go into business along with all other Higginsons. He enrolled at Harvard. In his freshman year his eyes went back on him. A jaunt through Europe was prescribed, and at 17 Henry sailed.

Of all the things that Europe offered the youth, nothing equaled its music. "Heard Mario, Grisi, Marini, Ronconi," he jotted down. "Mario perfectly delicious and Grisi best prima donna, Ronconi best baritone, Marini best bass I ever heard. Splendid acting and orchestra."

So goes the boy's diary for page after page, listing hundreds of musical programs he attended. For his years, he must have had a remarkably good ear and perception. He recognized the worth of Wagner when Wagner was just gaining recognition. He perceived the faults of the early Verdi which were later to be overcome triumphantly. He disliked the German students' fighting, beer drinking and smoking—a true Puritan—but their music was something else.

When it was time for him to return to America, he wrote his father: "I am thankful that I have had weak eyes, for it has given me the time and opportunity to find out how much music is to me, and it has opened pleasures to me that otherwise would possibly have never been discovered."

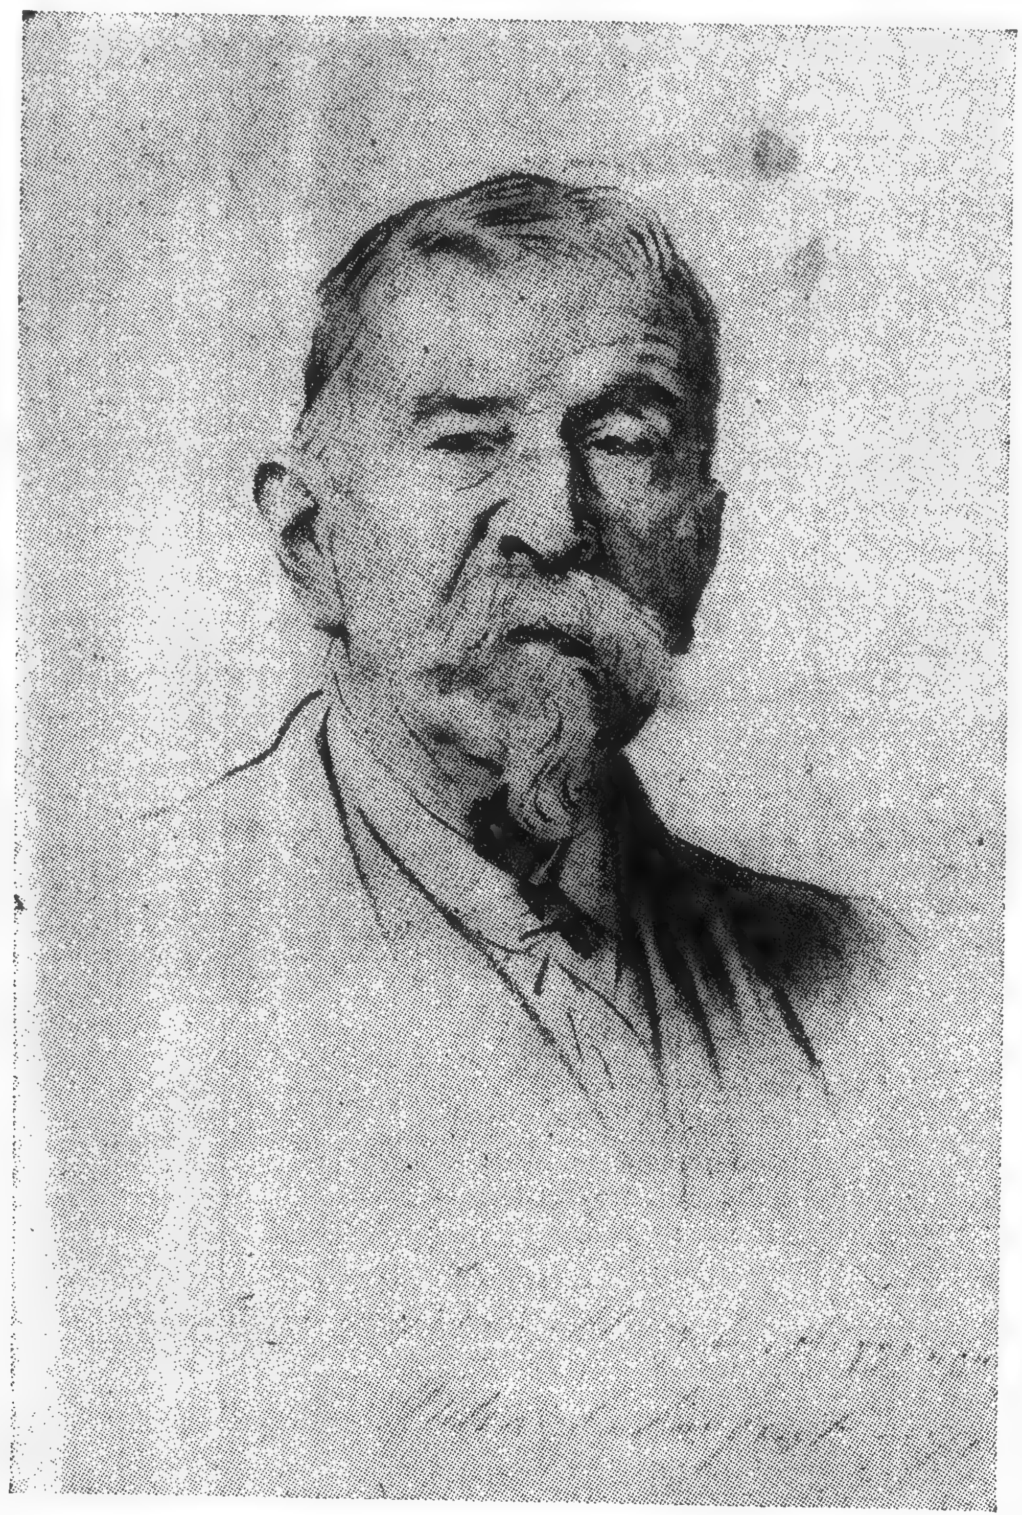
He wanted to study music as a profession but back in Boston he mounted a counting house stool and labored over the ledgers. Then at 22 he chucked them and returned to Vienna. This time he studied piano so intensely that his health began to fail. He suffered incessant headaches. He went to a barber-surgeon and that authority recommended the old remedy of bleeding. In drawing the blood from the youth's arm, he severed a nerve. His right arm and hand were permanently impaired for piano playing.

In despair he admitted defeat and returned to the United States, just in time to enlist for the Civil war, the war which was to give him his major's commission. In his first engagement, the battle of Aldie Gap, he was severely wounded, incapacitated for the duration. The rest of his life he wore upon his right cheek the deep long scar left by a Confederate saber.

After the war Higginson plunged into business. Oil and cotton, stock and bonds—the great firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. flourished under his guidance. He became a millionaire, but the love of music never left him. And the kind of music that Boston had—the college and civic music societies—was not the kind he had learned to love in Europe.

In 1881, after "two very good years of business," Maj. Higginson, at the age of 47, was enabled to give his city the kind of an orchestra he thought it deserved. "It seemed best to undertake the matter single handed," he observed in later years, "and beyond one fine gift from a dear friend I have borne the costs alone. This has been the dream of my life. For many years my hope for music lay asleep. Then it revived."

Maj. Higginson expected to pay out heavy sums. He spent $100,000 to start the orchestra, and some $20,000 a year to meet its deficits. Thirty-three years after the orchestra was founded he had paid $900,000 for its support. "My friends have begged me again and again to stop the concerts because the strain was too great; but the work has gone on, and the result is the present beautiful orchestra of which we all are proud." This was the Boston orchestra of 1914, under the peerless leadership of Karl Muck, of whom more later.



Henry Lee Higginson. (From crayon portrait by John Singer Sargent)

Higginson made it a point to hire the best men available. The first conductor was George Henschel, an Anglicized German, who had fair success. Next came Wilhelm Gericke, a talented Teuton, who really made the orchestra, and after him Artur Nikisch, one of the greatest conductors in music history.

Maj. Higginson kept a fatherly eye on all proceedings. "At one time I knew every man in the orchestra," he told the players late in life. "If that is not the case now, I know many of you, and listen carefully to the playing of this man or that man. I watch the musicians almost too much, for it often interferes with my pleasure, thinking whether they are playing their best, and listening for the various points instead of listening for the whole. Whenever I go to a concert, there is always a sense of responsibility on my mind, and there is always a great joy."

If a musician was not doing his best, out he went, on the major's personal order. Each man's contract read: "If said musician fails to play to the satisfaction of said Higginson, said Higginson may dismiss said musician from the orchestra, paying his salary to the time of dismissal, and shall not be liable to pay him any compensation or damages for such dismissal."

Some of "these masters of heavenly music" caused him difficulties, too. In the manner of musicians since time immemorial, they would drink and gamble and have embarrassing affairs of the heart. He took it upon himself to solve each problem personally. Once it was suggested that a ladies' committee might take care of some of the details. He refused with a laugh: "No woman would wish to reprove a man for drinking or gambling, or would listen to foolish love affairs. . . . If the world consisted only of musicians it would go to pieces at once."

The thrifty members of the orchestra gave him their money to invest for them, and the improvident knew that the major had a notoriously scft heart and was always good for a liberal touch in times of stress.

Artistically the orchestra made marvelous progress. "The orchestra had been primitive under Mr. Henschel," wrote the famous critic H. T. Parker. "It had become expert under Mr. Gericke. It had turned romantic under Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur." Indeed, when Emil Paur took the orchestra in hand in 1893, he found it "the best in the world." And Paur's successor, Karl Muck, certainly did nothing to lower its musical prestige.

It was Karl Muck who was to give Maj. Higginson the deepest wound of his life. Muck was a proud and arrogant Bavarian, the favorite conductor of Kaiser Wilhelm II and the best conductor in Germany. It took considerable persuasion to induce the kaiser to let Muck come to America Muck gave the orchestra a tone and polish and grandeur it had never known, even in the great days of Nikisch. But he was also a loyal son of Germany, and when America entered the war in 1917 he made no effort to conceal his German sympathies.

The cry for Muck's dismissal arose through the east. Maj. Higginson stood stanchly by his conductor, arguing that art was above nationality. He refused to accept Muck's resignation. When Muck neglected to play "The Star Spangled Banner" in Providence, the shrieks of protest resounded throughout the land, and the governor of Maryland suggested that it might be a good idea to mob Muck to death.

Maj. Higginson stood his ground for several months, but at last the chorus of defamation was too loud. When Muck played "The Star Spangled Banner" with "Tannhaeuser" counterpoint, Higginson could stand no more. He announced in the spring of 1918 that Dr. Muck's resignation would go into effect at the end of that season. However, the government had different ideas, and federal agents arrested him in March on charges of espionage. He was interned at Fort Oglethorpe until 1919 and then deported to Germany.

The affair broke the aging Higginson's heart, especially as he had learned "that there was indisputable proof of Dr. Muck's base personal character." The details of Dr. Muck's "baseness" have never been divulged. In that harrowing spring of 1918 Maj. Higginson finally consented to yield the orchestral reins to a committee. He was 84 years old, and he had spent more than a million dollars on his favorite project in the 38 seasons he had supervised it.

It was not known until long afterward that financial ruin was upon him in 1918, and that he averted it only by the most desperate of margins. He had wanted to leave a million dollar bequest to his beloved orchestra, but when he counted up his money shortly before his death he found that he had none to give away. Those persons were mistaken who believed that he refused to endow the orchestra because of anger over the Muck scandal. Up to the day of his death, in 1919, when he was 85, his love for his orchestra abated not a bit.

The orchestra passed through some stormy days after 1918, too. With Muck's disappearance, the absence of conductorial magic was quite apparent. Not until 1924, when the celebrated Koussevitzky was imported from Paris, did the Boston orchestra again attain the beauty and magnificence which had been the lifelong dream of Maj. Higginson.

WALTER MONFRIED.

Globe

MUSIC

Dec.

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Overtures are not often found on Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony programs. The regular concerts this week at Symphony Hall are an exception, for they begin with a Mozart Overture that is both lesser and lesser-known: that of "Idomeneo, King of Crete." The other numbers are Bela Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra, given first performances, and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D minor.

Possessing neither the sparkle of the "Figaro" Overture nor the drama of that to "Don Giovanni," the "Idomeneo" represents the practical or virtue-by-necessity rather than the inspired side of Mozart. Yet it has its interests and is good to hear.

The conventional view of the music of Bela Bartok probably can be expressed thus: "It's awfully modern, don't you think? Full of discords and crazy rhythms and—well, you know—awfully modern. I may not know music, but I know what I—well, it's awfully modern."

Bearing this in mind, it must have been a pleasant surprise to many of the Friday subscribers to find that his Concerto for Orchestra is easy to take. The style is fairly light, the dissonance is expressive rather than idiomatic, and the five movements are, on the whole, engagingly emotional. And more than a few places seem to be in a joking mood.

The composer prefers to call his work a Concerto rather than a Symphony because he has treated some of the instruments in a "virtuoso" or "concerted" style. The point is not to be labored except by pedants. Call it a different sort of symphony and you arrive near enough to the truth. The main point is that you find practically nothing of the harmonic sourness or the rigorously intellectual patterns of a prominent modernist whose previous music has earned him, among some people, the scorn of such words as arid and eccentric.

The Friday audience seemed to like the Concerto and it applauded the short, white-haired composer when he appeared on the stage and bowed with grave shyness. So much new music is heard once or twice and then forgotten that I hope Mr. Bartok's Concerto will be a fortunate exception to the role. Let's hear it again this season.

Yesterday's concert ended with a Koussevitskyan reading of Franck's ubiquitous Symphony. This means that every drop of melodic jui[illegible] and every ounce of passion w[illegible] squeezed from the notes in a performance that made you sit bolt upright no matter how many times you have heard the Symphony in the concert hall or over the air. Yet there could have been more transparency in the rich orchestral sounds, which got a bit thick at times. Some of those "inner voices" could have been brought to the fore without harm to the main lines of tune or rhythm.

Cleveland Press - Dec. 6 '44

Koussevitzky Leads Thrilling Concert by Boston Symphony

By MILTON WIDDER, Music Editor

The incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra and its inspiring leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, repeated their thrilling successes of previous years last night in Public Music Hall.

Their sterling performance was greeted with a prolonged ovation by a capacity audience.

And the program was not of the most popular nature. It consisted of two long symphonies—Beethoven's "Eroica" and the modern Fifth by Shostakovitch.

No matter how often one has heard a work or how well one knows it, when Koussevitsky reads it with that perfect instrument of his—the Boston—the work takes on new significance, it is given added zest, and the good doctor unearths hitherto hidden beauties. This was true last night in both symphonies.

The Shostakovitch, in spite of some tedious spots and an orchestral dress that can be called gaudy, becomes a classical masterpiece under the Koussevitzky baton. It has fire, dramatic impact and a youthful drive that builds up a terrific excitement within the hearer. In the turmoil it is hard to tell whether the broiling is due the composer or because this master of baton is up there before 110 men lashing them into a fury of musical recreation.

Much has been said of the precision of this great orchestra, which—from where I sit—is the gretaest orchestra in the world today. Yet it appeared last night that the precision is not metronomical, but fluid and beautiful. How those strings sing and sway to the slightest wish expressed by the conductor is a marvel to hear.

The "Eroica" was the product of perfect communion between Koussevitzky and Beethoven. The fervor of the interpretation was humble and overwhelming. Some might have though the funeral march movement too slow, but I am letting my hero worship go so far as to accept the Koussevitzky version as the way it should be done.

* * *

The third afternoon concert of

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

[illegible] 1944

Koussevitzkys Win Ovation In Civic Course Program

BY ELMORE BACON

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY could have been elected mayor last evening. At any rate the capacity audience at Music Hall would have given him the city. Instead, this famous musician and his Boston Symphony Orchestra won a double-barreled ovation from the big crowd stirred to the highest pitch of enthusiasm by marvelous performances of the Beethoven Eroica Symphony and the Shostakovich Fifth.

The eminent conductor and his orchestra took six bows after each of the performances. And there were "Bravos" especially at the close of the brilliant presentation of the Russian music.

Last year in the Cleveland Civic Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno, Dr. Koussevitzky was ill and unable to direct here, his place being taken by the associate director, Richard Burgin, who also is concertmaster. So last night Dr. Koussevitzky was given a welcome that was really heartfelt.

These Bostonese, let it be hinted, may have a cold exterior. There's a sprinkling of snow along the thatchways. But there's nothing cold about their playing. And Koussevitzky's conducting reminds one of a volcano under wraps.

• • •

THE Boston strings have a tone all their own. It is golden, pulsating with life and of crystal purity. The symphonists, guided by the Koussevitzkian intuitive impulses, play with a glow of interpretive finesse that makes mere orchestral polish seem harsh in comparison.

The Koussevitzky reading of the Eroica was breath-taking. And he unfolder a new Shostakovich.

Koussevitzky shook a lot of the angularities out of the Shostakovich opus and revealed all of its beauty and brilliance. He really didn't change the Shostakovich music. He merely led you through its vagaries and subtleties with such a discernmen that what in earlier hearings had seemed to be post-vodka ramblings, were revealed as beautiful Slav countryside views, with a dash here and there of Moscow pep and patriotism, plus an emotional slow movement that is really gripping.

Shostakovich wrote this Fifth in celebration of the Soviet Union's twentieth anniversary. That was back in 1937. Many complained that it was noisy and "too modern." It now has become part of the standard orchestral repertoire. Through its four movements there are flashes reminiscent of other music. But only flashes.

• • •

YOU find the Russian peasant threading his jolly way through all of the symphony. The allegretto is a marvel of gaiety dropped in between the brilliant and forceful opening and the Largo in which Ivan lays bare his love longings—a thrilling emotional experience under the baton of Koussevitzky. Shouting brass working up to a tremendous climax marks the closing allegro.

Beethoven sang his hero song most brilliantly in the Koussevitzky reading of the Eroica. He brought life even to the funeral march which seemed to give the departed soul first a startling view at the brink of eternity, and then a reassuring push over into the bliss of the Great Beyond. The joyous Sherzo and the triumphant finale were given beautiful performances.

Recital

The Fortnightly Musical Club gave its third afternoon concert yesterday at Steinway Hall, Halle Bros. Co., with Genevieve Davisson Fritter, violinist, Mrs. Jean Webster Erisman, soprano, and the Fortnightly Chorus, directed by Anne B. Hisey, taking part. Mrs. Fritter played numbers by Lalo, Boulanger, deFalla and Shostakovich. Mrs. Erisman offered Christmas songs and the chorus sang numbers by Johnson, Eichhorn Wagner and D'Indy.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

DEC 7 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS EXCITINGLY

Enduring Quality Imparted to Good Music

(Reprinted From Yesterday's Late Edition)

BY HERBERT ELWELL

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a capacity audience at Public Music Hall last night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky provided one of the most momentous musical evenings Cleveland has had for some time. The impression was of that deep and enduring quality which only this great orchestra and its eminent leader can evoke. And the reception was a demonstration of appreciation of which Cleveland as well as the visitors may be proud.

The triumph was the more magnificent for having been achieved with a program which, under ordinary circumstances, could be forbidding to the uninitiated. It contained just two symphonies, both unusually long, the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the Fifth of Dimitri Shostakovich. But Cleveland Civic Concert Course audiences have an instinct for what is good and can take it in large doses. Besides, the performance from start to finish was too exciting to allow one to entertain the possibility of lighter fare.

The gift for sustaining tension is given to Koussevitzky in a supreme degree. How often the listener's attention lags in the last movement of the "Eroica." But not so when Koussevitzky transforms it for us into Beethoven's truly clairvoyant vision of an ordered and exultant world of beauty. How often have we heard the horns bleat and fumble in the Scherzo. But not so under the light, precise touch of the Boston brasses.

Perceptions Deepened

Again what depths of human suffering, pathos and compassion were conjured in the Funeral March, and by what simple means From the opening theme of the first movement the picture of the hero was complete. Yet it was not blustering, posturing hero, feeling his way toward an uncertain millennium, but the conqueror of self, the mastery of a mind come into complete possession of its spiritual birthright. And for such a picture one can only thank the mature genius of a conductor whose perceptions have constantly deepened with the passing of years.

Historians may give Shostakovich credit for being as great a representative of our time as Beethoven was of his. Certainly in so perfect an interpretation as was offered last night, the Soviet composer's Fifth took on unsuspected meanings of no small import. It seemed to grow to a tremendous stature and bring one breathlessly to the threshold of a disturbingly unpredictable but awe-inspiring future. Yet the comparison invited by juxtaposition with the "Eroica" was certainly in no way damaging to Beethoven.

Here then is a program that will be talked about no end, but amid the provocative discussions it may well arouse one thing is certain and that is our debt of gratitude to Mrs. Emil Brudno for bringing back to us this superb organization.

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

DEC 8 1944

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Peristyle Audience

Serge Koussevitzky's Conducting Leads Critic To Ponder Over Word 'Perfect' in Report

By MILLICENT BELL

The right to use the word "perfect" comes rarely to audience or critic, but come sometime it does.

After hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, in the peristyle last night, we walked out into the damp and indifferent darkness with that stark, that slightly terrible, word hugged to the heart.

I thought about all that I had ever heard about Koussevitzky and the matchless Boston—the high stool from which, as a one-time double-bass player he still likes to work in rehearsals, the legendary opera cape, his showmanship and independence, his salary which has been as high as $75,000 a season.

Other Concerts Recalled

I recalled other concerts heard from behind that back in its perfectly fitting dress suit, the bent left elbow, the bird-like alertness; no conductor in America has so triumphed in the single-minded extension of personality over the orchestra, or has given hearing to so many valid new works, both domestic and foreign.

And it was still hard to say anything other than that it was perfect, in the range, balance, and elasticity of blended tones, perfect in luminous voice, manifold eloquence, suppleness of utterance.

Servant of the servants of God, the early popes used to call themselves, and so indeed might Dr. Koussevitzky. He himself has said that a perfect interpretation is "like a mystic experience which puts the listener in direct touch with the absolute reality hidden in the great work."

They say that the old and dying Vieuxtemps sent for the young Ysaye that he might hear one of his violin concertos played as he had imagined it. It is so, one imagines, that composers living and dead would think about performances of their works by this orchestra and its conductor, grown peerless in the penetration of mood, the apprehension of individual design.

Opened With "Roman Carnival"

Last night's concert opened with Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture, and it is amusing to remember that Berlioz, after conducting its first performance, advised all composers to learn to conduct, for "don't forget, the most dangerous of your interpreters is the conductor."

The Berlioz piece, with its exciting rhythms and cascading crescendos, its brilliant use of the whole keyboard of the orchestral instrument, was a sure-fire demonstration piece for the Boston.

The major work on the program was the Sixth Symphony of Dimitri Shostakovich. The opening, largo movement had a largeness of feeling, thrilling melody upon a shimmering background of sound; the second movement a delightful, dry, chirping delicacy; the last, a humorous, percussive playfulness.

Ravel's cunningly-put-together ballet series, "Daphnis and Chloe," was full of ravishing instrumental opportunities and poetic form. Especially enjoyable was the activity of the flute in the famous solo of Pan. The flutist of the orchestra had plenty of work last night, altogether, for he bore the principal theme also of the Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun."

That work, flawless in its imaginative and dreamy atmosphere, its exquisite harmony, like the shadowed sunlight of a forest, was what one might expect from Koussevitsky, whose interpretations of the French composer have always been of the most amazing intimacy.

A bit of contrast out of the 17th century, sharp as intaglio, was provided by the "Suite for Strings" by Corelli. One movement of this suite, the Gigue, was played here recently, in its original, unorchestrated form by the New Friends of Music orchestra.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

DEC 8 1944

Mayor Welcomes Boston Orchestra

The Boston ~~Symphony~~ orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, were formally welcomed to Milwaukee yesterday in a statement by Mayor Bohn. The orchestra will perform Saturday night at the Auditorium.

Koussevitzky Claims America's Musical Future Is Secure

Dec 9

By MILTON WIDDER, Music Editor

Americans need not fear their musical future.

That pronouncement was uttered today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra—a man who more than any other single individual in this generation has helped the cause of American composers and performers.

"I look into the future of music very, verp optimistically," Dr. Koussevitsky said. "We have in this country — and Russia has in hers—a great many gifted boys, a great many. It is only our duty to perform American artists as much as possible and give performers a chance to appear before the public."

He mentioned four young conductors and composers who, he thinks, will be among the leaders of American music—and these he adds to Copland, Schuman, Dukelsky (Vernon Duke) and a score of others.

These four are Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss (who is the Boston's official pianist), Handel and Fennell. The last two mentioned are in the armed forces.

"Bernstein is an extraordinary talent," the doctor said. "He is not only a fine composer and an excellent pianist, but the greatest of the gifted young composers." Bernstein has just written, with Jerome Robbins, a ballet for Billy Rose's "The Seven Lively Arts" and he is the composer of the "Jeremiah" Symphony and the ballet music of "Fancy Free."

The conductor and his orchestra of 110 men appear in Public Music Hall tonight. The program consists of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; Shostakovitch's Fifth and a short work by Arnold Schoenberg.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

DEC 8 1944

SYMPHONY

A SUBSCRIBER to the regular series of symphony concerts at Orchestra Hall was the other day buying a couple of seats for tonight's concert there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he pocketed the tickets he said, "It's too bad I have to hear Defauw conduct Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony Thursday night when Koussevitzky is going to play it Friday night."

The boxoffice, too, said it was too bad. Said that although they had warned Koussevitzky that Defauw was playing the "Eroica" this week, Mr. K. had refused to alter his announced program.

Damn stubborn, these Russians.

Hub Symphony Player Tells Why U. S. Artists Give to 6th War Loan

Globe Dec. 14

The attitude of all the artists who are contributing their services to the Retail Trade Board War Bond Symphony Concert to be held at Boston Garden on Dec. 14 was voiced yesterday when in an interview Rosario Mazzeo, clarinetist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra said: "I was asked if I would contribute my services to play at the concert for the Sixth War Loan. Yes, I will. You see music is my life. It always has been. The happiness it gave me when I was a boy was increased a thousand fold when I first found the satisfaction of making music with sympathetic friends. My horizon moved outward and has never stopped moving. Here was something real, lasting, beautiful. It was possible only because our group met by common consent, because we had a common motive and a complete congeniality of spirit.

"Now what was formerly only a pleasure has become also my economic staff of life. It takes a mighty occasion to rise above the perfect. This is the occasion. The making of this concert will be pleasurable because it is a part of the way of life we all want. We are completely for it—convinced of its goodness—and happiest of all in the knowledge that it is the choice of us all. Of course I will play!"

Tickets to the Boston Symphony Orchestra War Bond Concert to be held in the Boston Garden on Dec. 14 are being given free to buyers of War Bonds in the retail stores of Boston.

FREE TICKETS TO WAR BOND BUYERS
IN SIXTH WAR LOAN

Dec 9

BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor Concert to be held in Boston Garden
Thursday, Dec. 14th
BUY YOUR BOND HERE

Leopold Morse Co

Dec 9 Daily News

Boston Symphony Tomorrow.

SECOND of the two concerts Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are playing in Chicago this visit will be heard at the Civic Opera House tomorrow afternoon. Programed are Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy and the Overture, "Roman Carnival" of Berlioz. Mr. Koussevitzky played Beethoven's Third Symphony and Shostakovitch's Fifth last night at

Koussevitzky Scores In Museum Concert

Boston Symphony Presents Program Of Consummate Taste

By FREDERICK KOUNTZ Dec 8

There is really never any great need of reviewing a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

When you have once heard the orchestra; when you have experienced the ultimate finish, the preciseness, the fullness of its playing; when you have seen and felt it respond as one instrument even to the slightest pursing of its conductor's lips, then you know once and for all the approximation of perfection which is in Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

You expect the same thing every time you hear the orchestra thereafter. And you always get it. Last night at the Art museum we heard it again. We shall always look forward to hearing it and we shall hear it as long as Koussevitzky is able to conduct.

It was quite fitting last evening that Koussevitzky should have changed the order of the program. Shostakovich does not belong in a group with Ravel and Debussy and Corelli. It was apparent throughout that the whole program was one of consummate taste.

Demand On Orchestra

It has been said many times that Berlioz did not compose great music. He was a master in the use he made of the orchestra. His Roman Carnival overture uses the orchestra to the fullest. But it demands that the orchestra give its fullest to the music. It was exactly in that manner that we heard the music played. The Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich which followed the Berlioz is an overblown work. The first movement labors too long over what it has to say. And the precision and dash of the second and third movements cannot recall the overstatements of the first. But Koussevitzky might have said, "Here is the music. We shall play it for you so that you will hear and begin to understand all of it." That was how he played it.

The music of Corelli had about it a dignified, almost aristocratic bearing. In the Badinerie is the finest accounting of the composer; the meticulous taste, the considered lightness, the beauty of preciseness. It seemed to me that the highest realization of the evening was in the presentation together of the music of Ravel and Debussy. They are almost always thought of together and wrongly.

Perfection Approached

Debussy does not give us in music simply a picture of a faun at play. Rather he projects a changing background for the dreams and desires of the faun on a hot summer afternoon. He does it with lush sounds that play about in the air and wrap us in their beauty. Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite is clear, precise. Its beauty resides rather in its style than in any qualities of expressiveness.

The wonderful thing about the playing of the Boston orchestra was that it was only necessary to listen to know finally the differences in the two men.

It is more than a lifetime job to approach perfection. For some twenty odd years Koussevitzky has been doing it in this country. The unchanging excellence of his conducting has never become lifeless or uninteresting. He has been and he remains a headstone among conductors.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

DEC 10 1944

14,000 to Hear Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will address the largest audience in its history when it performs to 14,000 in the Boston Garden Thursday night at 8:30 for the benefit of the 6th War Loan, (all seats have been obtained by purchase of bonds at the retail stores of Boston). The program will consist of Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and the same composer's Fifth Symphony in C minor, and four patriotic numbers of the Allied Nations; Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance"; the March "Lorraine" by Ganne; "Dubinushka" by Rimsky-Korsakov; and "The Stars and Stripes Forever" by John Philip Sousa. The program will end with Tchaikovsky's Overture "1812." As called for in the score, the wind section of the Symphony Orchestra will be augmented by the U. S. Naval Training Station Band of Newport, R. I.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

DEC 8 1944

'Eroica' of Beethoven Is Given Heroic Performance

BY C. J. BULLIET.

A PERFORMANCE worthy of its high merit was given Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony at Orchestra Hall last night by Desire Defauw conducting the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight in the same auditorium the "Eroica" will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

* * *

Beethoven himself knew the merit of this, his Third Symphony.

For when Napoleon Bonaparte proved himself unworthy of the idolatry of him that went into its making, by declaring himself Emperor instead of remaining a Consul of the people, Beethoven in a rage withdrew his dedication.

But the "damage" was already done, fortunately for the world, and the "Eroica" takes its place among the few really immortal works in music, poetry or fiction inspired by a hero in his lifetime.

* * *

In the all-Beethoven program last night, second of the season, Mr. Defauw included another composition in which a military leader was celebrated, only this time it was the long-dead Roman Coriolanus.

In "Overture, 'Coriolanus,'" however, Beethoven assails as sharply the tyrant as he might have done Napoleon had the "Eroica" been written after instead of before Bonaparte put on imperial robes.

Mr. Defauw last night not only intelligently and emotionally differentiated "Eroica" and "Coriolanus," but he performed the symphony, one of the most majestic of the nine, with an extraordinary sensitivity to light and shade.

* * *

After the outburst and long-sustained expression of hero worship of the first movement, the symphony goes into the funeral march, one of the most noble in the whole range of music.

Then comes the light, almost humorous scherzo, in artful contrast, and the symphony ends with an eloquent, rich flowering of as beautiful music as the master ever wrote.

Mr. Defauw and his orchestra gave eloquent expression throughout to these grand vagaries that totaled the immortal "Eroica."

* * *

Two of Beethoven's symphonies are to be on each of four programs Mr. Defauw is devoting to the master this season, with the Ninth alone on a program for the grand windup.

Besides the "Eroica" last night, the Fourth Symphony was played. This was Beethoven in still another mood—rather a series of moods—from "Coriolanus" and the Third Symphony.

The Fourth is pastoral in its simplicity and melody—a Greek idyl with human sentiment added.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

DEC 10 1944

Shostakovich Symphony

The other work was the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovich. In this was revealed for the first time the lordly splendors of Mr. Koussevitzky's brass. Even more than Beethoven's work did this Russian piece show off the virtuosity of the conductor and his men, for the cohesion and dramatic tension of the first movement, the dazzling spirit of the second, the exalted tonal investiture of the Largo by the strings, were of the highest order.

The visiting orchestra will give one more concert, tomorrow afternoon at the Opera House. The program will comprise Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune;" Ravel's "Daphne et Chloe" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. F. B.

Koussevitzky Conducts Dynamic Boston Symphony

Chicago Sun

By Felix Borowski. Dec 9

ORCHESTRA Hall was filled with a great and bravo-shouting multitude when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert there last evening.

It was the first time in five years that the organization had appeared in Chicago, and it deepened the conviction, entertained at the previous visit, that the Massachusetts city possesses a superb and pliant body of players.

There was a deep and all-embracing richness of texture and a flaming intensity in dramatic passages. The purity of tone and resilience of the woodwind, the mellow and warm expressiveness of the strings—the violoncellos particularly were of arresting tonal beauty—were beyond all praise.

Two Works on Program.

The program contained only two works. It began with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This was read with great nobility of style, reinforced by Mr. Koussevitzky's remarkable dynamic contrasts. Special emphasis was put upon Beethoven's demand for forcible accentuation, but there was no neglect of the passages of cantilene, which were played with entrancing loveliness of tone.

A vivid sense of drama quickened the solemnity of the funeral march and the section following the fugato, with the trumpets calling to high heaven, was electrifying, if only because the conductor held his forces in reserve until the moment arrived to unleash them. The scherzo was given with pellucid brilliance. When it came to the Finale, it was possible, perhaps, to breathe a sigh of relief, in that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fallible and human after all. The introductory passage to the theme found the strings for a moment clearly lacking in precision.

Shostakovich Symphony Given.

The other work was the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovich. In this was revealed for the first time the lordly splendors of Mr. Koussevitzky's brass. Even more than Beethoven's work did this Russian piece show off the virtuosity of the conductor and his men, for the cohesion and dramatic tension of the first movement, the dazzling spirit of the second, the exalted tonal investiture of the Largo by the strings, were of the highest order.

The visiting orchestra will give one more concert, tomorrow afternoon at the Opera House. The program will comprise Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune;" Ravel's "Daphne et Chloe" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

Chicago Hears Superb Music Perfectly Done

Daily Tribune Dec 9

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented at Orchestra hall Friday evening, Dec. 8, 1944. The program:

Symphony No. 3, E-flat major, "Eroica" ....Beethoven Symphony No. 5..............Shostakovich

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY.

What an orchestra, what a conductor, and what a concert! The Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky paid one of its rare visits to Chicago last night, and Orchestra hall was packed to do it honor. Packed with people, with magnificent music, with a wealth of gratitude for that music, and with the mysterious affinity created when a deeply affected audience is held in thrall by superb performance.

For the first of his two concerts [the other takes places tomorrow afternoon in the Civic Opera house], Mr. Koussevitzky chose two symphonies, the monumental "Eroica" of Beethoven, and that lode star of the modern repertory, the Shostakovich Fifth. Not since the nights of Frederick Stock had Orchestra hall heard such music. In fact, there were many who said that, closing their eyes during the "Eroica," they could conjure that beloved presence, so richly was it felt in the music.

⸻

For Mr. Koussevitzky, like all great conductors, is—where music is concerned—a simple man. He has great dignity, so native to him that it gives him no concern. He has puckish humor. Did you note how he brought in the timpani in the national anthem merely by lifting those faintly Mephistophelean brows? He has a magnificent ear for music, an uncanny gift for keeping a great orchestra in superb equilibrium, and the technical skill to communicate his own vast knowledge, both to his players and to his audience. He is a master craftsman who brings music richly, warmly, magnificently to life.

His orchestra is the carefully wrought masterpiece of a lifetime. You do not say of the Boston orchestra that its strings are superb, which they are, or that its winds and brass have a special glory, which they have. You say Boston has the finest orchestra in the country, which nowadays means the finest in the world. You say that, you observe Mr. Koussevitzky's sensitively authoritative presence, and you leave the rest to them, while you relax and listen.

In so many ways the Beethoven was like Stock's. It was all of a piece, leading in cumulative splendor to one mighty climax. It was fresh and beautiful to the ear, with a glory that was like the wind on a mountain top and a compassion that walked with you in the valleys. It was the "Eroica" in all its mighty implications, the utterance of a giant that lesser men could understand. Tonally, structurally, imaginatively, it was a heroic performance. And those tricky horns in the trio? Well, last night you would have thought Beethoven loved horn players.

⸻

In its own way the Shostakovich was no less richly realized. For all his long residence in this country which idolizes him, Mr. Koussevitzky is a Russian. He has that music in his bones and it pours from his fingertips with singular brilliance. For one thing, he does not try to make it a showpiece, tho when he gets thru with it, your spine is tingling. He gives it a kind of stark dignity, a gleaming, glittering vitality. He does not consider the scherzo amusing, or even particularly sardonic. In his hands it becomes arrestingly dramatic. The largo he turned in a molten mesmerism, spun in a filament of tone that rose challengly to its climax, then slipped again into the exquisite tension that only a great orchestra can accomplish. Then, and only then, did he turn loose the furies of Shostakovich that some conductors batter from start to finish of his symphonies. As I seem to have said before this morning, what an orchestra, what a conductor—and what a concert!

Koussevitzky Spellbinding

Herald-American Dec 9

BY WESLEY HARTZELL.

Last night Serge Koussevitzky and the incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of two Chicago concerts.

At Orchestra Hall the "world's greatest orchestra" played the Beethoven Eroica Symphony and Shostakovich's Fifth.

We're willing to concede the title on the basis of Koussevitzky's work on that strange combination of beatific vision and sheer animal spirits which is Shostakovich at his best.

When the score called for the angels to sing, they sang and no mistake. What's more they had their harps with them. And when that amazing score called for the stomp of Russian boots, we got those too. Which is to say that the magnificent ensemble and its great leader were absolutely spellbinding.

The Beethoven work suffered by comparison and by Koussevitzky's proclivity to take the finale slowly and gracefully. Thus it seemed to have little spiritual kinship with the heroic opening movement and the universal grief of the funeral music.

Sunday afternoon the orchestra goes to the Civic Opera House for its final concert.

Dec 9 Daily Tribune

Koussevitzky Is Glad to Pay Chicago a Visit

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The volcanic temperament many critics attribute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was not apparent yesterday when he received reporters, photographers, and radio network representatives in his hotel suite.

He was in rare good form and glad to be back in Chicago after an absence of five years. But reporters, who had read the colorful and dramatic antics credited to him, were a bit skeptical about his high spirits and good humor. After all, wasn't he the conductor who halted a concert and walked off the stage because he was angered at late comers? Didn't he refuse to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of a political attack on his fellow conductor, Arturo Toscanini? And didn't he ban smoking between rest periods by members of his orchestra on the ground that it was "disrespectful to art?"

⸻

This musician was a good natured little man who joked and walked around the room with his hands clasped behind his back. He expressed delight with the view of the lake, inquired about the members of the orchestra who had come to Chicago on a slower train, and permitted photographers to take shot after shot.

"This isn't the Koussevitzky critics write about," one reporter whispered to another. "This is the Koussevitzky who gained the distinction of being the 'finest virtuoso of all time on the double bass.'"

And did the Russian born musician who is ranked by authorities as one of the greatest of all conductors frown when he overheard that? He did not. He recalled that he left home with only three rubles in his pocket to study the double bass under Rambaussec and later traveled thru Europe as the acknowledged master of the instrument. He even admitted he now conducts rehearsals in baggy pants and an old sweater.

⸻

When reporters failed to get around to the subject of music, he wondered why. When he was told the reporters present were more familiar with murders, holdups, and such news, be beamed. "This is the best interview I ever had," he concluded.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

Score of Broadway Show, "On the Town" Latest Musical Work of Roxbury Maestro

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ALTHOUGH it is possible for a musician to achieve distinction as composer, conductor and virtuoso—the case of Mendelssohn is typical—such diffusion of effort is likely to exact too high a price. Rachmaninoff might have become as eminent a conductor as he was pianist. Largely on the strength of his powerful projection of his own "The Island of the Dead" he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony. He chose, and perhaps wisely, to be a great pianist instead. Dimitri Mitropoulos, whose present term as guest-conductor of our orchestra expires this afternoon, was once ambitious to become a composer and wrote orchestral and chamber music and an opera. More and more rarely, it would appear, does he indulge in his sensational practice of playing a concerto with one hand, as you might say, and leading the orchestra with the other.

All of which brings us to the season's other guest conductor, thus far, Leonard Bernstein. Since last February young Mr. Bernstein has conducted here his notable "Jeremiah" Symphony, which later won the New York Critics' Award, as the outstanding American symphonic composition of the season. In May he showed up at the Pops, leading the orchestra in music by Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Copland, Brahms and Johann Strauss, and playing most capably the Ravel Piano Concerto while Louis Speyer took over the podium. A week later he was at the Opera House, in joint appearance with Muriel Smith, playing Brahms, boogie-woogie and his own "Seven Anniversaries." A few weeks ago he was represented there as composer of a lively ballet, "Fancy Free." Subsequently he was conducting in impressive fashion music by Brahms and Shostakovitch at Symphony Hall, only to turn up shortly afterwards as composer of the musical play, "On the Town," which last evening ended its stay at the Colonial Theatre.

* * *

Last Monday evening he successfully relieved Max Goberman of his post of conductor. And all this, mind you, in one city and within the space of 10 months.

Such a combination of versatility and precocity might not seem so startling in Europe. It is something new around here. One can only wonder what Mr. Bernstein will do next and whether he will continue to cultivate his many roles. Much of his music for "On the Town,' like that of his ballet, was an energetic, dynamic blend of Stravinsky and Gershwin. The vitality never flagged, even if the inspiration did, and there were a few good tunes, though perhaps not quite enough of them to turn "On the Town" into a musical hit. As to that, we must wait and see.

* * *

Dr. Mitropoulos, to get back to him, looks upon his composing chiefly as a sort of valuable preparation for the career he finally adopted. "The world did not need my music," he says, "and besides, my head is so full of the music of others I doubt if there would be room in it for my own." And since he commits to memory every score that he conducts, whether he likes it or not, as he was at pains to point out, the force of the above remark becomes all the more apparent. By a curious coincidence Katina Paxinou, starring in "Sophie" at the Plymouth Theatre, and Dr. Mitropoulos found themselves in Boston at the same time. Not only have they been life-long friends, but Mme. Paxinou took part in the one and only production of Dr. Mitropoulos' opera based on Maeterlinck's "Sister Beatrice." The composer was then 20, and though the performances took place in Athens, the work was sung in French, the language of the original drama.

* * *

In his three visits to Boston the Greek conductor has won not only the Symphony public but also the Symphony musicians. And for our orchestra he entertains a particular regard. He admires its dignity, its artistic integrity. He feels that the men take pride in their work and that the audience takes a very special pride in them. Nor has he discovered in the public of the Symphony Concerts any evidence of the traditional Boston coldness.

* * *

At this week's regular concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will offer Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," a repetition of the new Bartok Concerto and the First Symphony of Brahms.

VICKSBURG, MISS.
POST

DEC 9 - 1944

BLUE NETWORK SHOWS WIN TOP HONORS IN POLL

Breakfast At Sardi's And Breakfast Club In Daytime Lead

NEW YORK, Dec. 9 — The Blue Network won both first and second place in the annual Motion Picture Daily-Fame poll of radio editors for daytime programs with Breakfast at Sardi's and Breakfast Club, it was announced today.

Alan Young, star of his own Blue show, was voted the "Most Promising Star of Tomorrow." Milton J. Cross was chosen as the best announcer for his work on the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts; Raymond Gram Swing led the news commentators; Guy Lombardo and his Royal Canadians, the dance bands; and George Hicks won a special award for the best individual news job with his D-Day broadcasts.

Other Blue awards were won by Herbert Marshall, as a film player on the air; Harry Wismer, as a sports announcer; Serge Koussevitzky, as a symphonic conductor; the Boston Symphony, as a symphonic orchestra; the Lone Ranger, as a children's program; the Fred Waring, in musical shows; and Meet Your Navy, in war programs.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

DEC 10

KOUSSEVITZKY: INCOMPARABLE

6,500 Enthralled by Orchestra

By EDWARD P. HALLINE

Sixty-five hundred concertgoers, the biggest throng Milwaukee has ever sent to hear a symphony orchestra, heard Boston's famous band at the Auditorium last night.

It was an experience as awe inspiring as it was exciting, for the grave, benevolent looking Serge Kousseveitzky and his musicians made all their music sound as if it were being performed for some great religious rite or pageantry. Not in a long time has the Auditorium had such a hushed and reverent atmosphere.

DIGNIFIED ELOQUENCE

The Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony, impetuous and hot blooded in most of its concert appearances, was magnificent this time in its dignity and eloquence. There was solemnity rather than tears, great voices shouting up to the heavens rather than a confused oratory. It moved slowly, like a great procession. But every line of it was sharply defined, every phrase was heard, and the climaxes were shattering in their impact.

In such a symphony, which takes nearly an hour to play, many a conductor can produce somnolence by the sheer richness and volume of tone. Dr. Koussevitzky kept the music carefully controlled with those swiftly gesticulating hands of his and still kept his listeners wide awake without resorting to any hysterical outbursts.

LIKE A DRAMA

The symphony, indeed, unfolded like a drama. Even the impassioned slow movement, so familiar in the transcriptions wet with glycerine tears, was done in the manner of a story being told. Dr. Koussevitzky's intention was not to break any hearts or bring on an epidemic of weeping.

So it was all the more thrilling, especially whenever the golden throated trumpets and trombones broke into the singing with their challenging cries.

The waltz movement was beautiful. Certainly no other orchestra could have matched its studied grace, and perhaps no other orchestra could have brought in the ominous motto so delicately and yet it was as sinister a death's head as was ever reared at a dance.

As might be expected from such an orchestra, the light bathed Prelude to "Lohengrin" was practically perfection. The strings generated that soft, white radiance which shines through the music, and the incomparable brasses came in with an affirmation of faith which shook the heavens.

GLORIOUS BRASSES

The brasses again were the glorious heralds in the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," another piece of Wagnerian pageantry. Clear and triumphant, their voices rose above the great tidal wave of sound which brings the Prelude to its climax.

But the strings had their brief moment with a suit arranged by Ettore Pinelli from some Corelli violin sonatas. They displayed their rich tone in a solemn, lovely sarabande. They danced a blue blooded gigue. They produced some dignified merriment in the closing badinerie. Light hearted music probably has never had such a high polish.

CHEMICAL & ENGINEERING
NEWS
EASTON, PA.

DEC

Allis-Chalmers Salutes Chemical Industry in Symphony Broadcasts

Men and women workers of the chemical and processing industry were honored on November 18 by the Allis-Chalmers broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the third of a special series of salutes to American industry and American workers.

Salutes will also be tendered steel, pulp and paper, and oil industries.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

DEC 10 1944

Koussevitzky Here; Moved by Bigness of Milwaukee

Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, one of the great conductors of music history, paid his first visit to Milwaukee Saturday, for the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra.

"A beautiful city," the maestro repeated, "and so big." The surprise at the bigness was most evident when he was driven around the Allis-Chalmers plant, which hires his orchestra for Saturday night broadcasts. Walter Geist and Herman Falk were his escorts. No, he wasn't cold, he assured them with a laugh. "Don't forget, I come from Russia, where it really gets cold," he remarked. "In Moscow, it is sometimes 30 or 40 degrees below zero, and it looks just as pleasant outside as it is here today."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor —Journal Staff

The conductor was jovial and dapper as he met his callers in the Pfister hotel in the afternoon. His Russian accent is unmistakable. At times he pauses a moment or two for the right word, but his gracefully waving arms and shining eyes carry out his ideas uninterruptedly. He looks younger than his 70 years. Dr. Koussevitzy is a zealot for music, all right, especially for American music, which is his favorite subject of conversation.

"The situation for your music is most optimistic," he exclaimed. "Everywhere I find a tremendous upsurge. Think how young your musical art is. Your 'old' composers like Paine and Chadwick and Foote—they lived only yesterday.

"Now, look at the fine men who have come up in recent years—Aaron Copland, a man of extraordinary culture and intellect, Roy Harris and Roger Sessions—and since them, there is an even younger generation, like Samuel Barber and William Schuman and David Diamond—men of great gifts.

"True, you have produced no Beethoven yet. We must prepare the ground for youth, we must change musical education, so that when a genius comes along, everything will be ready for him.

"But already musical progress in America is wonderful. When I came to Boston—and that was only 20 years ago—I could not find first desk players in America. The foreigners were dominant. I had to go to Paris or Germany or Russia or Austria to get them.

"Today," and he chuckled, "if I need a good player, I can have my choice of 20, from your American boys and from the refugees. It is your music schools that are giving such wonderful training."

"Yes, you have a right to be proud of your American music," he added. "It is true that many concertgoers do not care so much for it, as yet. But little by little we are overcoming their resistance. Always they have thought that it had to come from Paris or some other far place, to be good. But they will find that American music is good, too."

Koussevitzky Conducts Dynamic Boston Symphony

Dec 9

By Felix Borowski. Chi. Sun

ORCHESTRA Hall was filled with a great and bravo-shouting multitude when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert there last evening.

It was the first time in five years that the organization had appeared in Chicago, and it deepened the conviction, entertained at the previous visit, that the Massachusetts city possesses a superb and pliant body of players.

There was a deep and all-embracing richness of texture and a flaming intensity in dramatic passages. The purity of tone and resilience of the woodwind, the mellow and warm expressiveness of the strings—the violoncellos particularly were of arresting tonal beauty—were beyond all praise.

Two Works on Program.

The program contained only two works. It began with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This was read with great nobility of style, reinforced by Mr. Koussevitzky's remarkable dynamic contrasts. Special emphasis was put upon Beethoven's demand for forcible accentuation, but there was no neglect of the passages of cantilene, which were played with entrancing loveliness of tone.

A vivid sense of drama quickened the solemnity of the funeral march and the section following the fugato, with the trumpets calling to high heaven, was electrifying, if only because the conductor held his forces in reserve until the moment arrived to unleash them. The scherzo was given with pellucid brilliance. When it came to the Finale, it was possible, perhaps, to breathe a sigh of relief, in that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fallible and human after all. The introductory passage to the theme found the strings for a moment clearly lacking in precision.

Shostakovich Symphony Given.

The other work was the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovich. In this was revealed for the first time the lordly splendors of Mr. Koussevitzky's brass. Even more than Beethoven's work did this Russian piece show off the virtuosity of the conductor and his men, for the cohesion and dramatic tension of the first movement, the dazzling spirit of the second, the exalted tonal investiture of the Largo by the strings, were of the highest order.

The visiting orchestra will give one more concert, tomorrow afternoon at the Opera House. The program will comprise Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune;" Ravel's "Daphne et Chloe" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

DEC 16 1944

George Szell conducted "Walkuere" and "Goetterdaemmerung." adding to his already considerable fame as a Wagnerian. Szell is listed for 14 weeks with the Metropolitan, after which he will accompany the company on its spring tour. In the interim he also, will do four weeks with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, two weeks with the Boston Symphony and one week each with the Cleveland and Montreal symphonies.

Leading Citizen

Dec 10

Is Boston today as good a breeding-place for "leading citizens" as it once was, or is it only that they do not stand forth so clearly in this crowded time? Who, for example, is the present counterpart or successor of Henry Lee Higginson?

Here was a man who never held office, yet constantly played a leading part in the affairs of the community—civic, financial, humanitarian, educational. His presence was picturesque and impressive. He had the gift of effective, incisive speech, a gift through which he registered his distinctive personality whenever he had occasion to address an audience, small or large.

His character and his loyalties owed much to the molding forces of the Civil War. The simplicity and directness of a soldier remained with him through more than half a century of peace. He had, besides, the tastes and instincts of an artist. Denied the wish to lead the life of a musician himself, he devoted himself to bringing the best fruits of musical art to others. Through so doing he hoped to carry into America at peace the spirit of dear friends he had lost in war.

These reflections spring from the fact that the members of the permanent institution launched by Major Higginson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are about to render their volunteered service, through a notable concert in the Boston Garden, to the cause of the Sixth War Loan. Here is but one of many fruits of the idealism of one man, remembered more for his single interest in music than for anything else. In these days of a vastly greater war than any conflict in which he took part, who shall say that ideals of the very sort that inspired Major Higginson are not nourishing leading citizens of the years to come?

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

Score of Broadway Show, "On the Town" Latest Musical Work of Roxbury Maestro

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ALTHOUGH it is possible for a musician to achieve distinction as composer, conductor and virtuoso—the case of Mendelssohn is typical—such diffusion of effort is likely to exact too high a price. Rachmaninoff might have become as eminent a conductor as he was pianist. Largely on the strength of his powerful projection of his own "The Island of the Dead" he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony. He chose, and perhaps wisely, to be a great pianist instead. Dimitri Mitropoulos, whose present term as guest-conductor of our orchestra expires this afternoon, was once ambitious to become a composer and wrote orchestral and chamber music and an opera. More and more rarely, it would appear, does he indulge in his sensational practice of playing a concerto with one hand, as you might say, and leading the orchestra with the other.

All of which brings us to the season's other guest conductor, thus far, Leonard Bernstein. Since last February young Mr. Bernstein has conducted here his notable "Jeremiah" Symphony, which later won the New York Critics' Award, as the outstanding American symphonic composition of the season. In May he showed up at the Pops, leading the orchestra in music by Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Copland, Brahms and Johann Strauss, and playing most capably the Ravel Piano Concerto while Louis Speyer took over the podium. A week later he was at the Opera House, in joint appearance with Muriel Smith, playing Brahms, boogie-woogie and his own "Seven Anniversaries." A few weeks ago he was represented there as composer of a lively ballet, "Fancy Free." Subsequently he was conducting in impressive fashion music by Brahms and Shostakovitch at Symphony Hall, only to turn up shortly afterwards as composer of the musical play, "On the Town," which last evening ended its stay at the Colonial Theatre.

* * *

Last Monday evening he successfully relieved Max Goberman of his post of conductor. And all this, mind you, in one city and within the space of 10 months.

Such a combination of versatility and precocity might not seem so startling in Europe. It is something new around here. One can only wonder what Mr. Bernstein will do next and whether he will continue to cultivate his many roles. Much of his music for "On the Town,' like that of his ballet, was an energetic, dynamic blend of Stravinsky and Gershwin. The vitality never flagged, even if the inspiration did, and there were a few good tunes, though perhaps not quite enough of them to turn "On the Town" into a musical hit. As to that, we must wait and see.

* * *

Dr. Mitropoulos, to get back to him, looks upon his composing chiefly as a sort of valuable preparation for the career he finally adopted. "The world did not need my music," he says, "and besides, my head is so full of the music of others I doubt if there would be room in it for my own." And since he commits to memory every score that he conducts, whether he likes it or not, as he was at pains to point out, the force of the above remark becomes all the more apparent. By a curious coincidence Katina Paxinou, starring in "Sophie" at the Plymouth Theatre, and Dr. Mitropoulos found themselves in Boston at the same time. Not only have they been life-long friends, but Mme. Paxinou took part in the one and only production of Dr. Mitropoulos' opera based on Maeterlinck's "Sister Beatrice." The composer was then 20, and though the performances took place in Athens, the work was sung in French, the language of the original drama.

* * *

In his three visits to Boston the Greek conductor has won not only the Symphony public but also the Symphony musicians. And for our orchestra he entertains a particular regard. He admires its dignity, its artistic integrity. He feels that the men take pride in their work and that the audience takes a very special pride in them. Nor has he discovered in the public of the Symphony Concerts any evidence of the traditional Boston coldness.

* * *

At this week's regular concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will offer Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," a repetition of the new Bartok Concerto and the First Symphony of Brahms.

VICKSBURG, MISS.
POST

DEC 9 - 1944

BLUE NETWORK SHOWS WIN TOP HONORS IN POLL

Breakfast At Sardi's And Breakfast Club In Daytime Lead

NEW YORK, Dec. 9 — The Blue Network won both first and second place in the annual Motion Picture Daily-Fame poll of radio editors for daytime programs with Breakfast at Sardi's and Breakfast Club, it was announced today.

Alan Young, star of his own Blue show, was voted the "Most Promising Star of Tomorrow." Milton J. Cross was chosen as the best announcer for his work on the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts; Raymond Gram Swing led the news commentators; Guy Lombardo and his Royal Canadians, the dance bands; and George Hicks won a special award for the best individual news job with his D-Day broadcasts.

Other Blue awards were won by Herbert Marshall, as a film player on the air; Harry Wismer, as a sports announcer; Serge Koussevitzky, as a symphonic conductor; the Boston Symphony, as a symphonic orchestra; the Lone Ranger, as a children's program; the Fred Waring, in musical shows; and Meet Your Navy, in war programs.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

DEC 10 1944

KOUSSEVITZKY: INCOMPARABLE

6,500 Enthralled by Orchestra

By EDWARD P. HALLINE

Sixty-five hundred concertgoers, the biggest throng Milwaukee has ever sent to hear a symphony orchestra, heard Boston's famous band at the Auditorium last night.

It was an experience as awe inspiring as it was exciting, for the grave, benevolent looking Serge Kousseveitzky and his musicians made all their music sound as if it were being performed for some great religious rite or pageantry. Not in a long time has the Auditorium had such a hushed and reverent atmosphere.

DIGNIFIED ELOQUENCE

The Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony, impetuous and hot blooded in most of its concert appearances, was magnificent this time in its dignity and eloquence. There was solemnity rather than tears, great voices shouting up to the heavens rather than a confused oratory. It moved slowly, like a great procession. But every line of it was sharply defined, every phrase was heard, and the climaxes were shattering in their impact.

In such a symphony, which takes nearly an hour to play, many a conductor can produce somnolence by the sheer richness and volume of tone. Dr. Koussevitzky kept the music carefully controlled with those swiftly gesticulating hands of his and still kept his listeners wide awake without resorting to any hysterical outbursts.

LIKE A DRAMA

The symphony, indeed, unfolded like a drama. Even the impassioned slow movement, so familiar in the transcriptions wet with glycerine tears, was done in the manner of a story being told. Dr. Koussevitzky's intention was not to break any hearts or bring on an epidemic of weeping.

So it was all the more thrilling, especially whenever the golden throated trumpets and trombones broke into the singing with their challenging cries.

The waltz movement was beautiful. Certainly no other orchestra could have matched its studied grace, and perhaps no other orchestra could have brought in the ominous motto so delicately and yet it was as sinister a death's head as was ever reared at a dance.

As might be expected from such an orchestra, the light bathed Prelude to "Lohengrin" was practically perfection. The strings generated that soft, white radiance which shines through the music, and the incomparable brasses came in with an affirmation of faith which shook the heavens.

GLORIOUS BRASSES

The brasses again were the glorious heralds in the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," another piece of Wagnerian pageantry. Clear and triumphant, their voices rose above the great tidal wave of sound which brings the Prelude to its climax.

But the strings had their brief moment with a suit arranged by Ettore Pinelli from some Corelli violin sonatas. They displayed their rich tone in a solemn, lovely sarabande. They danced a blue blooded gigue. They produced some dignified merriment in the closing badinerie. Light hearted music probably has never had such a high polish.

CHEMICAL & ENGINEERING
NEWS
EASTON, PA.

DEC 10 1944

Allis-Chalmers Salutes Chemical Industry in Symphony Broadcasts

Men and women workers of the chemical and processing industry were honored on November 18 by the Allis-Chalmers broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the third of a special series of salutes to American industry and American workers.

Salutes will also be tendered steel, pulp and paper, and oil industries.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

DEC 10 1944

Koussevitzky Here; Moved by Bigness of Milwaukee

Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, one of the great conductors of music history, paid his first visit to Milwaukee Saturday, for the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra.

"A beautiful city," the maestro repeated, "and so big." The surprise at the bigness was most evident when he was driven around the Allis-Chalmers plant, which hires his orchestra for Saturday night broadcasts. Walter Geist and Herman Falk were his escorts. No, he wasn't cold, he assured them with a laugh. "Don't forget, I come from Russia, where it really gets cold," he remarked. "In Moscow, it is sometimes 30 or 40 degrees below zero, and it looks just as pleasant outside as it is here today."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor —Journal Staff

The conductor was jovial and dapper as he met his callers in the Pfister hotel in the afternoon. His Russian accent is unmistakable. At times he pauses a moment or two for the right word, but his gracefully waving arms and shining eyes carry out his ideas uninterruptedly. He looks younger than his 70 years. Dr. Koussevitzy is a zealot for music, all right, especially for American music, which is his favorite subject of conversation.

"The situation for your music is most optimistic," he exclaimed. "Everywhere I find a tremendous upsurge. Think how young your musical art is. Your 'old' composers like Paine and Chadwick and Foote—they lived only yesterday.

"Now, look at the fine men who have come up in recent years—Aaron Copland, a man of extraordinary culture and intellect, Roy Harris and Roger Sessions—and since them, there is an even younger generation, like Samuel Barber and William Schuman and David Diamond—men of great gifts.

"True, you have produced no Beethoven yet. We must prepare the ground for youth, we must change musical education, so that when a genius comes along, everything will be ready for him.

"But already musical progress in America is wonderful. When I came to Boston—and that was only 20 years ago—I could not find first desk players in America. The foreigners were dominant. I had to go to Paris or Germany or Russia or Austria to get them.

"Today," and he chuckled, "if I need a good player, I can have my choice of 20, from your American boys and from the refugees. It is your music schools that are giving such wonderful training."

"Yes, you have a right to be proud of your American music," he added. "It is true that many concertgoers do not care so much for it, as yet. But little by little we are overcoming their resistance. Always they have thought that it had to come from Paris or some other far place, to be good. But they will find that American music is good, too."

Koussevitzky Conducts Dynamic Boston Symphony

Dec 9 By Felix Borowski. Chicago Sun

ORCHESTRA Hall was filled with a great and bravo-shouting multitude when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert there last evening.

It was the first time in five years that the organization had appeared in Chicago, and it deepened the conviction, entertained at the previous visit, that the Massachusetts city possesses a superb and pliant body of players.

There was a deep and all-embracing richness of texture and a flaming intensity in dramatic passages. The purity of tone and resilience of the woodwind, the mellow and warm expressiveness of the strings—the violoncellos particularly were of arresting tonal beauty—were beyond all praise.

Two Works on Program.

The program contained only two works. It began with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This was read with great nobility of style, reinforced by Mr. Koussevitzky's remarkable dynamic contrasts. Special emphasis was put upon Beethoven's demand for forcible accentuation, but there was no neglect of the passages of cantilene, which were played with entrancing loveliness of tone.

A vivid sense of drama quickened the solemnity of the funeral march and the section following the fugato, with the trumpets calling to high heaven, was electrifying, if only because the conductor held his forces in reserve until the moment arrived to unleash them. The scherzo was given with pellucid brilliance. When it came to the Finale, it was possible, perhaps, to breathe a sigh of relief, in that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fallible and human after all. The introductory passage to the theme found the strings for a moment clearly lacking in precision.

Shostakovich Symphony Given.

The other work was the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovich. In this was revealed for the first time the lordly splendors of Mr. Koussevitzky's brass. Even more than Beethoven's work did this Russian piece show off the virtuosity of the conductor and his men, for the cohesion and dramatic tension of the first movement, the dazzling spirit of the second, the exalted tonal investiture of the Largo by the strings, were of the highest order.

The visiting orchestra will give one more concert, tomorrow afternoon at the Opera House. The program will comprise Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune;" Ravel's "Daphne et Chloe" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

DEC 16 1944

George Szell conducted "Walkuere" and "Goetterdaemmerung," adding to his already considerable fame as a Wagnerian. Szell is listed for 14 weeks with the Metropolitan, after which he will accompany the company on its spring tour. In the interim he also, will do four weeks with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, two weeks with the Boston Symphony and one week each with the Cleveland and Montreal symphonies.

Leading Citizen

Dec 10

Is Boston today as good a breeding-place for "leading citizens" as it once was, or is it only that they do not stand forth so clearly in this crowded time? Who, for example, is the present counterpart or successor of Henry Lee Higginson?

Here was a man who never held office, yet constantly played a leading part in the affairs of the community—civic, financial, humanitarian, educational. His presence was picturesque and impressive. He had the gift of effective, incisive speech, a gift through which he registered his distinctive personality whenever he had occasion to address an audience, small or large.

His character and his loyalties owed much to the molding forces of the Civil War. The simplicity and directness of a soldier remained with him through more than half a century of peace. He had, besides, the tastes and instincts of an artist. Denied the wish to lead the life of a musician himself, he devoted himself to bringing the best fruits of musical art to others. Through so doing he hoped to carry into America at peace the spirit of dear friends he had lost in war.

These reflections spring from the fact that the members of the permanent institution launched by Major Higginson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are about to render their volunteered service, through a notable concert in the Boston Garden, to the cause of the Sixth War Loan. Here is but one of many fruits of the idealism of one man remembered more for his single interest in music than for anything else. In these days of a vastly greater war than any conflict in which he took part, who shall say that ideals of the very sort that inspired Major Higginson are not nourishing leading citizens of the years to come?

[26]

Monitor December 10 1944

Mitropoulos Wins Triumph With Symphony

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Speak of Dimitri Mitropoulos and laugh; and again speak of him, having in mind how he led the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through music of Mendelssohn and Rachmaninov in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and marvel that a conductor of such technical command and interpretative mastery should be available to Dr. Koussevitzky to call upon for a fortnight as "guest." Probably Dr. Mitropoulos cares little if we laugh; indeed he must have been perfectly willing for the matinee audience to be amused at his jazz-like deportment in directing the middle piece on his program, "Spirituals" for String Choir and Orchestra, by Morton Gould (composer present and appearing on the platform in response to applause).

But not to put too much stress on the diversion which the Gould work brought into proceedings, nor to let it weigh too heavily on the national conscience that the "Spirituals" are about the measure of American attainment in the orchestral art, especial remark must go to the presentation the visitor gave to Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scottish," op. 56; and to Rachmaninov's Symphony No. 2 in E minor, op. 27. As for his style of behavior when he had serious things to do, that may bear a word also.

It should be enough to observe that the Boston players asserted their highest standard of effort, and not the slightest let-up, from the moment Dr. Mitropoulos lifted his hands in indication of the pace of the opening Andante of the "Scottish" Symphony till he made the last flashing gesture in the fourth movement of the E minor Symphony, signifying that the day was done. For the team he took charge of tightens to harness only for the right man.

Mendelssohn in these days has become a simple problem, as far as the externals of execution go; and he has become antiquarian commonplace, as far as listening is concerned. What, then, resides in his quietly-conceived score to excite so much interest? It is the practice with modern musicians to overhaul outworn and outgrown compositions to find matters there which the old executants missed. The "Scottish" Symphony treated in this manner becomes a new study in sonority. Shadings, phrasings, contrasts, and affirmations and responses are revealed in surprising novelty.

Is it because, in this case, the conductor dispensed with book and baton and improvised his rendering, reading, recitation, or whatever is the word, right out of the time, the place, and the performing set-up? Certainly much that came through in this realization of Mendelssohn's pages is not obvious in the print. Bar-lines, notes, and indications of tempi disappear. Mechanism becomes completely expression.

As for Rachmaninov, he was revealed as the real great figure of twentieth-century Russia. Once he sounded like relabored Tchaikowsky, but not now. The Symphony in E minor comes up to the level of anything by Brahms. It causes what has trailed along after the Rimsky-Korsakov fashion to seem light and "popular." Here is music in the classic line, without need of "neo-" for prefix and apology; in a word, the genuine.

Boston Symp ncert;
Maurice Sc rce

By

NOT all the gol ymphony
Orchestra's rich ig Opera House yesterday afte rt under Serge Koussevitzky it to be described with the eran conductor and his discip Debussy, Ravel and Tschaiko vely and warmly, in a progr itute the artistic peak of this year's History and Enjoyment of Music Series, and perhaps of Chicago's entire music season.

Berlioz' sure-fire "Roman Carnival" overture had plasticity of tonal texture and a keen sense of proportion that didn't permit its brassy climax to arrive too soon or too loudly.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" excerpts were revealed in full color and freshness, though some of their sensuous overtone vanished in the cavernous Opera House which seems to soak up the music of an orchestra seated on its stage.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 was given one of the finest readings it is apt to experience—a definitive performance but one of utter simplicity.

Mr. Koussevitzky, a seasoned musician of such stature that he doesn't consider it necessary to eschew the use of a score during performance, even for a work as familiar as the Tschaikowsky fifth, showed versatility as well as conductorial acumen in his two Chicago concerts, for six composers were represented—and represented masterfully—in Friday night's program at Orchestra Hall and yesterday's at the Opera House.

Koussevitzy, Boston Symphony Play Great Orchestra Hall Concert

Sun By William Leonard D

THE greatest orchestra in the land came to Orchestra Hall last night to present a concert which rocked a capacity crowd to its heels, then set it off on the most tumultous ovation that historic auditorium has heard in years. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its first Chicago appearance in five seasons, played a Beethoven "Eroica" symphony and a Shostakovich fifth, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, such as this town isn't used to hearing.

With classic simplicity of style and a full, silken tone which has no equal, the Bostonians painted the majestic and magnificent "Eroica" in all its splendor.

It was orderly but it was filled with sensitivity. It's phrases were not run one into the other but it had unbroken line. It was mellow but it was lively. It had precision without losing suppleness. It had style and authority and such a relentless pressing home of the minutest details that the music, for all its familiarity, exerted a semi-hypnotic spell.

No division of the orchestra was weak or out of balance, and Mr. Koussevitzky, though he played with scrupulous attention to smoothness and beauty of tone, did not sacrifice spontaneity. The result was a performance memorable in these parts for its all-around brilliance.

The Shostakovich Symphony No. 5 which comprised the last half of the program provided admirable contrast, in style and texture, with the Beethoven. It was interpreted with intensity and a depth of dramatic utterance, coherently and with consummate power. There was nothing episodic about it, despite its deceptively shifting tempi. None of the lofty utterance of its slow movement was lost, none of its sustained lyrical flight was interfered with.

Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled six times at its conclusion and could be taking bows yet, if he had not waved a sign that enough was enough.

The Bostonians will play at the Opera House tomorrow afternoon, in the History and Enjoyment of Music Series.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL
DEC 10 1944

THE HOUR GLASS

BY THE TIME KEEPER

TODAY symphony orchestras offer the most highly perfected form of instrumental musical expression, representing a cultural and artistic asset of inestimable value. Virtually every city in the United States with a population of over 50,000 has its own orchestra. By radio and phonograph the music of our most famous orchestras is brought into millions of homes.

Present perfection in musical entertainment, however, came only after the foundation had been laid in the early 19th century. The Boston Symphony orchestra, the first really permanent one in America, was founded by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, a shrewd and generous banker for whom music was a ruling passion.

◦ ◦ ◦

The major was not born to wealth but through the use of exceptional brain power and unstinted work he built up a fortune in which multitudes have shared.

When weak eyes forced young Higginson to give up his studies at Harvard in 1851, he went to Europe and there on the continent found opportunities to study and listen to the finest in music. Wagner, Verdi and other great masters opened new worlds for the youthful enthusiast.

But fate withheld from him an active musical career. After a stretch in the civil war where he acquired the title of major and a long saber cut across his face, Henry Higginson plunged into business. He became head of the great firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. and thereafter accumulated the wealth which enabled him to found and support the Boston Symphony.

◦ ◦ ◦

The orchestra was the dream of his life. Maj. Higginson spent $100,000 to start the organization of 60 pieces in 1881. From then on he kept a fatherly eye on all its activities, hiring the best performers and conductors available. Up to the day of his death in 1919, at the age of 85, his love for the orchestra never lessened.

Under the magical baton of Serge Koussevitzky since 1924, the Boston Symphony stands today as a monument to the public spirit of Maj. Higginson, who for more than 30 years complacently shouldered its annual deficit of $20,000.

◦ ◦ ◦

Post Dec. 9

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Of new compositions, particularly large scale orchestral works, it may be said that if they possess real value one hearing of them is not enough, and that if they are of little or no account, and that applies to not a few of them, one hearing may be too much. In the first, not the second class, falls Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, which is receiving its first performances anywhere at the Symphony concerts this week. It was, in fact, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, so the premiere would, as a matter of course, belong to the Boston Orchestra.

The name of Bartok was once associated with all that was glum and gloomy, dour, dissonant and (to some) disagreeable. Of late years, however, his music has been much more likeable and the new Concerto is a piece that should win many friends. The beginning of the first movement and the Elegy are in more serious vein, the second movement and the fourth, entitled an Intermezzo interrotto (interrupted Intermezzo), are frankly light and might almost find their way into the Pops. The Finale is exciting and in its headlong rush reminds you of certain things in Smetana's "The Bartered Bride." The distinguished Hungarian composer is now living in this country and his last previous appearance in this city was when he gave a concert of his own works in Jordan Hall, assisted by his wife, Joseph Szigeti and Benny Goodman. Yesterday he was most cordially received when Dr. Koussevitzky escorted him to the platform.

Hitherto unaccountably overlooked at Symphony Hall, Mozart's fine Overture to "Idomeneo" began the concert and the popular Symphony of Franck ended it. It was an afternoon of brilliant playing, particularly in the case of the Bartok piece, much of which is of virtuoso character and full of highly individual orchestral effects.

Heart-warm ovation for Boston Symphony

Dec 10 By REMI GASSMANN Times

JUBILANT, unrestrained applause was the reward Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony received at the conclusion of their Orchestra Hall concert—and for good reason.

It was more than a cordial welcome—a heart-warming ovation. In the wild enthusiasm, in the din and in the vociferous bravos, was injected a note of utter gratitude—genuine thanks to a great conductor and a perfecty disciplined orchestra for a magnificent performance that recalled the days when our own Chicago Symphony, under its beloved Frederick Stock, was equal to occasions such as this and merited the same measure of acclaim.

Here again was an orchestral tone of the purest symphonic luster; a string section of the most engaging brilliance and precision; a woodwind choir, in several respects not equal to ours, but careful of every slight nuance and welded in the fabric of strings, brass and percussion by a master hand that achieves eloquence without strain, from which the music flows naturally and unpretentiously.

Yes, this was great conducting, and it is a great orchestra that has been trained to respond to it. It is not easy to attain this degree of orchestral perfection; but it is easy to slip down from it with disheartening rapidity.

It was the first of two performances the Boston orchestra will play during its Chicago visit. This afternoon at the Civic Opera house, the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5 will be presented.

• • •

Noisy insistence was required to coax an extra out of the impassive Koussevitzky—he is truly a figure en route to a pedestal when not conducting—but at last it came. It came and it snapped the applauders straight up in their chairs. It was Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

This was no condeseension, not at all. This was stirring music, played with such gusto, such lively imagination, such prankish individuality that the house was tickled as well as moved.

Further clamor availed nothing. That was the end of a concert so good that many who heard it are doubtless still hugging themselves.

And since it was that good, there seems no point in being coy about the people who brought it to the town. It was the Allis-Chalmers broadcast and the local concert management was the Arion club. A nod to both of them.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
C 10 1944

Men of Boston in Great Form

Koussevitzky Conducts

By RICHARD S. DAVIS

OCCASIONS for shouting arrive not too often in Milwaukee, but one of them came Saturday evening. The Boston symphony orchestra, under the magnificent Serge Koussevitzky, played in the Auditorium for just about all the hall would hold, and the night was as rich in its music as the town has ever known.

It is always a little futile to try thumping the cymbals on a typewriter, but perhaps this time the effort will go a little better. The jubilant reporter hopes, in any case, to let you know something of the satisfaction, something of the excitement, and above all something of the inspiration that came with the vibrant concert by the robust Koussevitzky and his many men. The entire program, you should know, was an experience to be cherished for years to come. Glorious is the word for it.

Surely it isn't usual for people hereabouts to leap from their suppers and scramble into a concert hall at 7 p. m., but the thousands did it Saturday night and actually enjoyed the hurrying. Clearly they counted on something unusual, and that is what was given them—something of a spirit lively and intense, something out of a deep musical understanding, something to represent the capacity for expression of a truly great conductor. They looked for all that but still they were astonished when it came winging to them from the crowded stage.

It was more than a little pleasure merely to watch the delight of an audience that knew what it wanted and got more than it asked. This audience, moreover, was sure in its feeling for music, not merely curious. The men from Boston may travel the country over and never find a house more comfortably in tune. And even the cranky cavern which is the Auditorium seemed to be behaving its best.

* * *

The shrewd Koussevitzky chose to give Milwaukee the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony, knowing full well that the work had become something of a pudding hereabouts. He knew even better, that is, what his reading could do for the work—the flavor and the texture that would emerge from measures so often made trite and juiceless. It was no chance he took, not he.

Scant profundity lies in the obvious comment that since Koussevitzky is a Russian he ought to feel the throbbing melodies of Tschaikowsky better than most men do, and that he ought to have the pulse for the compatriot's dancing rhythms. True enough, but the beauty of the fifth symphony as evoked by the suave conductor from Boston is not so easily explained. Here were shades of coloring, quick inflections and subtle nuances that could only be created by a universal musician.

In this Tschaikowsky, to be sure, there was the typical ebb and flow of melody and it was as sentimental as it should be, but always there was a fineness that held emotion tightly under rein. It was music that never once spilled over ev as it splashed. Rhythmicall never less than eagerly alive. lift was tremendous.

* * *

The symphony was the section of the program that was broadcast. The second half was devoted to the music of the violently different Corelli and Wagner, the one a gentle singer of lovely tunes, the other a musical swashbuckler of infinite genius. And they got on amazingly well together.

As for the Corelli, it was the familiar suite for strings, which asks chiefly for a sunny spirit and a positive grace afoot. The orchestra's exceptional string sections made a delight of all the three movements, particularly the gigue.

The first Wagner was the wisely chosen prelude to "Lohengrin," which is so close to the spiritual that the difference cannot be discerned, pagan music or no. The quality of tone in this prelude was often all but breathless, but still it came to the ear with absolute eloquence. To this reporter it was in sundry ways the most grateful episode of the night.

And then there was the "Meistersingers" prelude — Wagner at his ebullient magnificent best. The various choirs, so consistently subdued before, now had their opportunity to sing in mighty voice and the invitation was accepted with proper flourish. It could scarcely have been less than a smashing success.

[27]

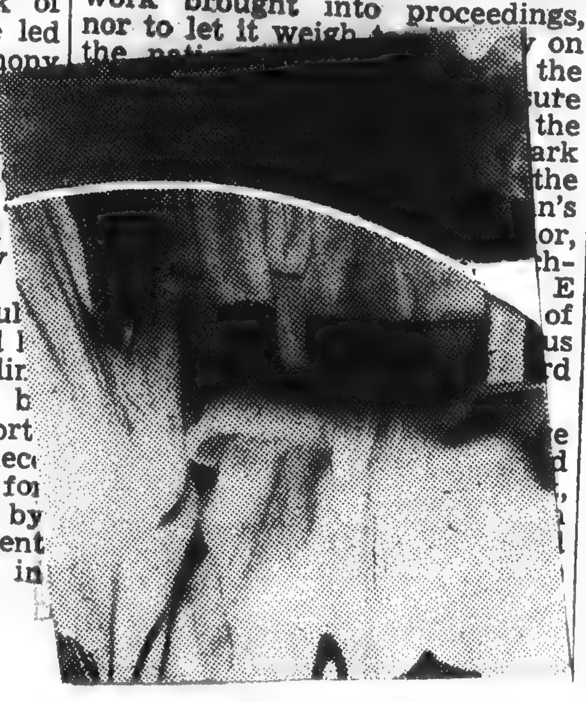
Monitor December [illegible] 1944

Mitropoulos Wins Triumph With Symphony

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Speak of Dimitri Mitropoulos and laugh; and again speak of him, having in mind how he led the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through music of M delssohn and Rachmaninov Symphony Hall yesterday af noon, and marvel that a condu of such technical command interpretative mastery should available to Dr. Koussevitzky call upon for a fortnight "guest." Probably Dr. Mitropoul cares little if we laugh; indeed must have been perfectly willir for the matinee audience to b amused at his jazz-like deport ment in directing the middle piec on his program, "Spirituals" fo String Choir and Orchestra, by Morton Gould (composer present and appearing on the platform in response to applause).

But not to put too much stress on the diversion which the Gould work brought into proceedings, nor to let it weigh



Is it because, in this case, the conductor dispensed with book and baton and improvised his rendering, reading, recitation, or whatever is the word, right out of the time, the place, and the performing set-up? Certainly much that came through in this realization of Mendelssohn's pages is not obvious in the print. Bar-lines, notes, and indications of tempi disappear. Mechanism becomes completely expression.

As for Rachmaninov, he was revealed as the real great figure of twentieth-century Russia. Once he sounded like relabored Tchaikowsky, but not now. The Symphony in E minor comes up to the level of anything by Brahms. It causes what has trailed along after the Rimsky-Korsakov fashion to seem light and "popular." Here is music in the classic line, without need of "neo-" for prefix and apology; in a word, the genuine.

Boston Symphony in Second Concert; Maurice Schwartz Turns to Farce

By William Leonard [illegible]

NOT all the golden glory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rich tone was apparent in the big Opera House yesterday afternon, though its second concert under Serge Koussevitzky was another musical event to be described with the word "perfection." The veteran conductor and his disciplined crew presented Berlioz, Debussy, Ravel and Tschaikowsky flawlessly, communicatively and warmly, in a program that probably will constitute the artistic peak of this year's History and Enjoyment of Music Series, and perhaps of Chicago's entire music season.

Berlioz' sure-fire "Roman Carnival" overture had plasticity of tonal texture and a keen sense of proportion that didn't permit its brassy climax to arrive too soon or too loudly.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" excerpts were revealed in full color and freshness, though some of their sensuous overtone vanished in the cavernous Opera House which seems to soak up the music of an orchestra seated on its stage.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 was given one of the finest readings it is apt to experience—a definitive performance but one of utter simplicity.

Mr. Koussevitzky, a seasoned musician of such stature that he doesn't consider it necessary to eschew the use of a score during performance, even for a work as familiar as the Tschaikowsky fifth, showed versatility as well as conductorial acumen in his two Chicago concerts, for six composers were represented—and represented masterfully—in Friday night's program at Orchestra Hall and yesterday's at the Opera House.

Koussevitzy, Boston Symphony Play Great Orchestra Hall Concert

Com By William Leonard Dec [illegible]

THE greatest orchestra in the land came to Orchestra Hall last night to present a concert which rocked a capacity crowd to its heels, then set it off on the most tumultous ovation that historic auditorium has heard in years. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its first Chicago appearance in five seasons, played a Beethoven "Eroica" symphony and a Shostakovich fifth, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, such as this town isn't used to hearing.

With classic simplicity of style and a full, silken tone which has no equal, the Bostonians painted the majestic and magnificent "Eroica" in all its splendor.

It was orderly but it was filled with sensitivity. It's phrases were not run one into the other but it had unbroken line. It was mellow but it was lively. It had precision without losing suppleness. It had style and authority and such a relentless pressing home of the minutest details that the music, for all its familiarity, exerted a semi-hypnotic spell.

No division of the orchestra was weak or out of balance, and Mr. Koussevitzky, though he played with scrupulous attention to smoothness and beauty of tone, did not sacrifice spontaneity. The result was a performance memorable in these parts for its all-around brilliance.

The Shostakovich Symphony No. 5 which comprised the last half of the program provided admirable contrast, in style and texture, with the Beethoven. It was interpreted with intensity and a depth of dramatic utterance, coherently and with consummate power. There was nothing episodic about it, despite its deceptively shifting tempi. None of the lofty utterance of its slow movement was lost, none of its sustained lyrical flight was interfered with.

Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled six times at its conclusion and could be taking bows yet, if he had not waved a sign that enough was enough.

The Bostonians will play at the Opera House tomorrow afternoon, in the History and Enjoyment of Music Series.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL
DEC 10 1944

THE HOUR GLASS

BY THE TIME KEEPER

TODAY symphony orchestras offer the most highly perfected form of instrumental musical expression, representing a cultural and artistic asset of inestimable value. Virtually every city in the United States with a population of over 50,000 has its own orchestra. By radio and phonograph the music of our most famous orchestras is brought into millions of homes.

Present perfection in musical entertainment, however, came only after the foundation had been laid in the early 19th century. The Boston Symphony orchestra, the first really permanent one in America, was founded by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, a shrewd and generous banker for whom music was a ruling passion.

◆ ◆ ◆

The major was not born to wealth but through the use of exceptional brain power and unstinted work he built up a fortune in which multitudes have shared.

When weak eyes forced young Higginson to give up his studies at Harvard in 1851, he went to Europe and there on the continent found opportunities to study and listen to the finest in music. Wagner, Verdi and other great masters opened new worlds for the youthful enthusiast.

But fate withheld from him an active musical career. After a stretch in the civil war where he acquired the title of major and a long saber cut across his face, Henry Higginson plunged into business. He became head of the great firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. and thereafter accumulated the wealth which enabled him to found and support the Boston Symphony.

◆ ◆ ◆

The orchestra was the dream of his life. Maj. Higginson spent $100,000 to start the organization of 60 pieces in 1881. From then on he kept a fatherly eye on all its activities, hiring the best performers and conductors available. Up to the day of his death in 1919, at the age of 85, his love for the orchestra never lessened.

Under the magical baton of Serge Koussevitzky since 1924, the Boston Symphony stands today as a monument to the public spirit of Maj. Higginson, who for more than 30 years complacently shouldered its annual deficit of $20,000.

◆ ◆ ◆

Post Dec 9

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Of new compositions, particularly large scale orchestral works, it may be said that if they possess real value one hearing of them is not enough, and that if they are of little or no account, and that applies to not a few of them, one hearing may be too much. In the first, not the second class, falls Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, which is receiving its first performances anywhere at the Symphony concerts this week. It was, in fact, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, so the premiere would, as a matter of course, belong to the Boston Orchestra.

The name of Bartok was once associated with all that was glum and gloomy, dour, dissonant and (to some) disagreeable. Of late years, however, his music has been much more likeable and the new Concerto is a piece that should win many friends. The beginning of the first movement and the Elegy are in more serious vein, the second movement and the fourth, entitled an Intermezzo interrotto (interrupted Intermezzo), are frankly light and might almost find their way into the Pops. The Finale is exciting and in its headlong rush reminds you of certain things in Smetana's "The Bartered Bride." The distinguished Hungarian composer is now living in this country and his last previous appearance in this city was when he gave a concert of his own works in Jordan Hall, assisted by his wife, Joseph Szigeti and Benny Goodman. Yesterday he was most cordially received when Dr. Koussevitzky escorted him to the platform.

Hitherto unaccountably overlooked at Symphony Hall, Mozart's fine Overture to "Idomeneo" began the concert and the popular Symphony of Franck ended it. It was an afternoon of brilliant playing, particularly in the case of the Bartok piece, much of which is of virtuoso character and full of highly individual orchestral effects.

Heart-warm ovation for Boston Symphony

MUSIC

Dec 10 By REMI GASSMANN Times

JUBILANT, unrestrained applause was the reward Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony received at the conclusion of their Orchestra Hall concert—and for good reason.

It was more than a cordial welcome—a heart-warming ovation. In the wild enthusiasm, in the din and in the vociferous bravos, was injected a note of utter gratitude—genuine thanks to a great conductor and a perfecty disciplined orchestra for a magnificent performance that recalled the days when our own Chicago Symphony, under its beloved Frederick Stock, was equal to occasions such as this and merited the same measure of acclaim.

Here again was an orchestral tone of the purest symphonic luster; a string section of the most engaging brilliance and precision; a woodwind choir, in several respects not equal to ours, but careful of every slight nuance and welded in the fabric of strings, brass and percussion by a master hand that achieves eloquence without strain, from which the music flows naturally and unpretentiously.

Yes, this was great conducting, and it is a great orchestra that has been trained to respond to it. It is not easy to attain this degree of orchestral perfection; but it is easy to slip down from it with disheartening rapidity.

It was the first of two performances the Boston orchestra will play during its Chicago visit. This afternoon at the Civic Opera house, the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5 will be presented.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
C 10 1944

Men of Boston in Great Form

Koussevitzky Conducts

By RICHARD S. DAVIS

OCCASIONS for shouting arrive not too often in Milwaukee, but one of them came Saturday evening. The Boston symphony orchestra, under the magnificent Serge Koussevitzky, played in the Auditorium for just about all the hall would hold, and the night was as rich in its music as the town has ever known.

It is always a little futile to try thumping the cymbals on a typewriter, but perhaps this time the effort will go a little better. The jubilant reporter hopes, in any case, to let you know something of the satisfaction, something of the excitement, and above all something of the inspiration that came with the vibrant concert by the robust Koussevitzky and his many men. The entire program, you should know, was an experience to be cherished for years to come. Glorious is the word for it.

Surely it isn't usual for people hereabouts to leap from their suppers and scramble into a concert hall at 7 p. m., but the thousands did it Saturday night and actually enjoyed the hurrying. Clearly they counted on something unusual, and that is what was given them—something of a spirit lively and intense, something out of a deep musical understanding, something to represent the capacity for expression of a truly great conductor. They looked for all that but still they were astonished when it came winging to them from the crowded stage.

It was more than a little pleasure merely to watch the delight of an audience that knew what it wanted and got more than it asked. This audience, moreover, was sure in its feeling for music, not merely curious. The men from Boston may travel the country over and never find a house more comfortably in tune. And even the cranky cavern which is the Auditorium seemed to be behaving its best.

* * *

The shrewd Koussevitzky chose to give Milwaukee the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony, knowing full well that the work had become something of a pudding hereabouts. He knew even better, that is, what his reading could do for the work—the flavor and the texture that would emerge from measures so often made trite and juiceless. It was no chance he took, not he.

Scant profundity lies in the obvious comment that since Koussevitzky is a Russian he ought to feel the throbbing melodies of Tschaikowsky better than most men do, and that he ought to have the pulse for the compatriot's dancing rhythms. True enough, but the beauty of the fifth symphony as evoked by the suave conductor from Boston is not so easily explained. Here were shades of coloring, quick inflections and subtle nuances that could only be created by a universal musician.

In this Tschaikowsky, to be sure, there was the typical ebb and flow of melody and it was as sentimental as it should be, but always there was a fineness that held emotion tightly under rein. It was music that never once spilled over even as it splashed. Rhythmically it was never less than eagerly alive. Its lift was tremendous.

* * *

The symphony was the section of the program that was broadcast. The second half was devoted to the music of the violently different Corelli and Wagner, the one a gentle singer of lovely tunes, the other a musical swashbuckler of infinite genius. And they got on amazingly well together.

As for the Corelli, it was the familiar suite for strings, which asks chiefly for a sunny spirit and a positive grace afoot. The orchestra's exceptional string sections made a delight of all the three movements, particularly the gigue.

The first Wagner was the wisely chosen prelude to "Lohengrin," which is so close to the spiritual that the difference cannot be discerned, pagan music or no. The quality of tone in this prelude was often all but breathless, but still it came to the ear with absolute eloquence. To this reporter it was in sundry ways the most grateful episode of the night.

And then there was the "Meistersingers" prelude — Wagner at his ebullient, magnificent best. The various choirs, so consistently subdued before, now had their opportunity to sing in mighty voice and the invitation was accepted with proper flourish. It could scarcely have been less than a smashing success.

Noisy insistence was required to coax an extra out of the impassive Koussevitzky—he is truly a figure en route to a pedestal when not conducting—but at last it came. It came and it snapped the applauders straight up in their chairs. It was Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

This was no condescension, not at all. This was stirring music, played with such gusto, such lively imagination, such prankish individuality that the house was tickled as well as moved.

Further clamor availed nothing. That was the end of a concert so good that many who heard it are doubtless still hugging themselves.

And since it was that good, there seems no point in being coy about the people who brought it to the town. It was the Allis-Chalmers broadcast and the local concert management was the Arion club. A nod to both of them.

Globe Dec. 11-44

Greece Would Go Socialist If Free, Says Mitropoulos

By CYRUS DURGIN

"If given their own free will, the Greek people would turn without doubt to Socialism." That is the belief of Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Greek-born leader of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, who is here to conduct the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday.

"But remember," said the tall, thin, bald man with the friendly, wide-mouthed smile, "remember, I am speaking only as a humanist, not as a politician."

Dr. Mitropoulos crunched out a cigarette in his suite at Hotel Hemenway, lit another, and went on.

"I like the democratic system, and in the United States democracy has done more for the common man than has been achieved anywhere in the world. But I believe that democracy requires a prosperous country, like this. Greece is poor.

Doubtful About Britain

"When I was there last, in 1939, there was already a strong Socialist movement. No, I do not mean state socialism; I mean what might best be called 'labor socialism'. I mean a socialism which would be a form of the Marxist principles as interpreted by Daniel De Leon, who came from South America, and who advocated socialism when he spoke in Chicago in 1890. That was years before anyone ever heard of Lenin. Few people nowadays know of De Leon. He died in 1913.

"I cannot say whether British policy is right or otherwise. I am an artist, and I have only the humanist point of view. Mr. Churchill is a great statesman, the man who carries out the policy of a great country. I might look at the matter one way; he might regard it differently. I have understood, however, that it was decided that Greece is not in the Soviet sphere of influence."

DR. DIMITRI MITROPOULOS

This is Dr. Mitropoulos' first visit to Boston in almost eight years. He came here originally in 1936, unknown, and overnight made a sensational reputation as a dynamic interpreter of symphonic music as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony. He was invited to return in 1937.

He has not changed much in appearance, but his years as conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony and as guest with other American orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, have given him a surfacing of what, for want of a better term, can be called "Americanism." He speaks the vernacular with ease, now, and has seen enough of the United States to give him some well-founded ideas about its people and their tastes in music.

"America has a public for everything today. There is a public for serious music and one for jazz," he says.

Defends Jazz

"Not everyone can be intellectual. Think what an impossible world it would be if everyone were intellectual. You could not live in it. Jazz to some people is the high point in music for them. Well and good. There is room for both. I have met in my life many fine people who had nothing to do with Bach or Beethoven.

"You should not expect the business man who goes to a concert because he likes Mozart and Beethoven to listen to, well—to Schoenberg and Stravinsky—as carefully as would a professional musician. The business man is tired and he wants music he can enjoy. His listening experience is different from that of the musician or the extremely intellectual layman.

"Ideally speaking, I would like to offer three concert series: first, for those whose tastes are conservative—a lot of Bach, Haydn and Mozart; second, for those whose preferences direct them toward the romantics, Beethoven—who was the first romantic, and so on; third, for the intellectuals I would play very intellectual music.

"It seems to me also many people would flock to the 'intellectual' concerts, because many like to think themselves intellectual."

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

44

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Spin Pure Gold

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY.

Blizzard or no blizzard, even the orchestra pit of the Civic Opera house was filled with people determined to hear the second and last of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. And at its end some of us were ruefully computing railroad fare and the cost of a Boston winter for the sake of hearing music like that once a week rather than once in six or seven seasons.

The most extraordinary thing about such music is that you can listen with your mind or your heart and arrive at the same bedazzled conclusion. For the Boston orchestra is as technically superb as it is emotionally dynamic. It doesn't matter in the least whether you are affected by the means or the results, and that is about as close as you can come, in performance, to the universality of great music.

◆

There were people there yesterday who spoke with a kind of bemused incredulity of Koussevitzky's mastery of nuance, pace, and color, of the patrician economy of style that reaps its reward in cumulative climax, of the ability to see a score as a whole and project not merely a sequence of alluring sounds, but music of character and significance. These people spoke of the double basses, Koussevitzky's own instrument, which reach their glory in his orchestra. They talked of the pinpoint pizzicati, the lovely, languorous legato, the sense of undertow, the glorious tone of solo instruments, each so stellar in performance that all melt into a tapestry of throbbing beauty.

Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky chose the French and Russian music for which he and orchestra long have been famous, and in every note they told us why. Here were scores in the standard repertory, too often despoiled by hackneyed or perfunctory performance. And what freshness, what spirit, what luster that orchestra not so much gave to those scores as it seemed to absorb from them! The Berlioz "Roman Carnival" crackled with brilliance and ended on an upthrust of exhilarating audacity. Debussy's "Faun" was a murmurous reverie for winds and strings that seemed not so much to be played as to hover in the air.

So exquisite is the equilibrium of that orchestra that with scarcely more than one finger Mr. Koussevitzky set the winds in liquid shimmer for Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloé," music that at its peak foams in long, low billows over sands of golden tone. And so acute is its sensitivity to line, color, and mood that the Tschaikowsky Fifth regained its dignity, its tenderness, its shadowed gaiety, and the great jubilant song of its finale, played with a climactic fury that thrust open the floodgates, releasing for the first time in the entire work the symphony's turbulent torrent of conflicting emotions. The one trouble with such music is that it supports you in orchestral style to which you would like, too often in vain, to become accustomed.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

DEC 11 1944

Music in Review

BY HERMAN DEVRIES.

Starting our musical beat yesterday afternoon in the midst of a blizzard, we reached the Civic Opera House a half hour before the concert got under way, and had time to recover our breath from the raging winds. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was greeted by an audience that taxed the theater from orchestra pit to the rafters.

To reach the peak of artistry even an orchestra, composed of virtuosos, needs at its head a commander-in-chief of outstanding ability and the chief asset of the Boston Symphony is its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who now is at the zenith of his brilliant career. The program brought out all the resources of the different choirs in broad relief from the opening strains of Berlioz' Roman Carnival to the last chord of Tschaikovsky Fifth Symphony.

It would be difficult to select the high point of the concert save that this Russian conductor's interpretation of Ravel's Daphne and Chloe is the best we have ever heard here or abroad.

Congratulations to George A. Kuyper, eminent and effective business manager of the Chicago Symphony, who yesterday entered the local impressarial field in the presentation of the Trapp Family Singers before a capacity audience in Orchestra Hall.

A short visit to the Civic Theater brought to our attention Mildred Freeman, an artist student from the class of Isador Buchalter, who has given this young pianist a good foundation on which to start a career.

Koussevitzky the Belasco of Our Orchestral World

Dec 11 Daily News

BY C. J. BULLIET.

IN his two weekend concerts in Chicago, Serge Koussevitzky, conducting his superb Boston Symphony Orchestra, demonstrated what I have long believed, that he is the David Belasco of the American orchestral world.

He has the same all but morbid instinct for perfection, the same uncanny ability to calculate to a hairline and to sustain effects, dramatic and lyric; the same power of mass hypnotism.

His perfect showmanship, akin to Belasco's in "The Music Master" and "The Darling of the Gods" (both of which tawdry melodamas needed a producer's magic), was illustrated yesterday afternoon at the Civic Opera House in the performance of Tchaikowsky's melodious circus, the Fifth Symphony.

* * *

Fright night, Koussevitzky and his orchestra, playing the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven at Orchestra Hall, directly challenged comparison with Desire Defauw and the Chicago Symphony, which had played it the night before in the same hall and under the same conditions.

As the "Eroica" unrolled, there came into memory the scene in the Mermaid Tavern in Elizabethan times, as related by Thomas Fuller.

"Many were the wit combats betwixt him [Shakespeare] and Ben Johnson, which two I behold like a Spanish great galleon and an English man-of-war. Master Jonson, like the former, was built far higher in learning—solid, but slow in his performances; Shakespeare, with the English man-of-war, lesser in bulk, but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, tack about, and take advantage of all winds by the quickness of his wit and invention."

* * *

Methought Serge Koussevitzky, giving a sonorous, impeccable, carefully calculated performance of "Eroica," was a reincarnation of "Rare Ben Jonson," whereas the fresher, more alert, more spontaneous Desire Defauw resembled Shakespeare.

Another comparison from the art of painting:

Koussevitzky was Michelangelo, Titian, more particularly Giorgione, with all the gravity, all the mellowness of tradition; whereas Defauw was more like the nimble-witted Picasso and Matisse.

* * *

The Bostonians, through a period of 20 years, have come to respond even more perfectly to their conductor than did the Chicagoans under the late Dr. Stock.

They showed it in their two Chicago concerts not only in the "Eroica" and the Tschaikowsky Fifth, but in the Fifth of Shostakovich and lighter works of Ravel, Debussy and Berlioz.

But, in all the arts there can be too much perfection — the Greek sculpture of Phidias, the Italian painting of Raphael. After the climax comes monotony and decay.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

DEC 12 1944

Symphony Gives Super-Concert

Reprinted from Yesterday's Late Editions.

By Felix Borowski.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their second Chicago concert at the Opera House yesterday in a performance that was one of the History and Enjoyment of Music series.

It was interesting to hear the organization in another place than Orchestra Hall, where it gave its first concert last Friday. The tone was less brilliant on this occasion, the sonorities less incisive. There was no doubt, however, about the magnificent qualities of the visiting orchestra. Its tone is of enchanting beauty, and the technical perfection of the playing in general, the uniformity of thought and feeling, the subordination of the players to the conductor's ideas of instrumental texture, and to his interpretation of the music, call for extravagant admiration.

The program at this second concert was more varied, and listeners were able to observe other facets of the orchestra's accomplishments than had been called forth by Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich last week.

In Berlioz' overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," a brilliant, as well as a familiar, work, Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra achieved a triumph not merely in the impeccable technical execution of an overture which is none too easy, but for an equally impeccable balance of tone, and the distinction of certain units in the unfolding of important passages of their own.

It might seem invidious, where all were so exceptional, to single out one performer for special praise; yet the playing of the English horn solo — drawn from the air, "Ah, Teresa, vous que j'aime"—was of touching and unaffected beauty immaculately phrased.

The two works which followed —Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe"—put emphasis upon delicate rather than robust interpretation. Debussy's Prelude was read by Mr. Koussevitzky and played by his men with bewitching poetry.

Perhaps Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" asks more of an orchestra's virtuosity than most other pieces of its kind. If the negotiation of such a score is an ordeal, it truthfully can be recorded that the Boston Symphony Orchestra emerged from it with banners waving in total victory.

The maximum of effect was extracted from the score, the wind section, in particular, giving a masterly performance of Ravel's complicated passages.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony closed the program.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES

12/15/44

Buy $10,000,000 Bonds At Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Dec. 15.—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give its Sixth War Loan symphony concert in Boston garden Thursday night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in co-operation with the U. S. Treasury department. Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a program which paid tribute to the armed forces and resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts war finance committee, said hundreds had been turned away, including one man who offered $5000 for two tickets.

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

DEC 15 1944

13,500 AT BOND CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Sells $10,000,000 by Its Performance.

BOSTON (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give its Sixth War Loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in co-operation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

[28]

Sixth War Loan
Symphony Concert

BOSTON GARDEN, DECEMBER 14, 1944, at 8.30 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

Assisted By
U. S. NAVAL TRAINING STATION BAND, NEWPORT, R.I.

Sponsored by the
UNITED STATES TREASURY DEPARTMENT
AND THE RETAIL TRADE BOARD OF BOSTON.

Monitor Dec 11

Noted Orchestra Leader Hopes For Political Change in Greece

By a Staff Photographer

Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos
Leader of Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

"The moment has come for Greece to try a different kind of social and political system," Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos, Greek conductor, declared today in an interview at his suite in the Hotel Hemenway in Boston.

Now conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Mitroppoulos is to direct the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next two weeks. He is back in Boston for the first time in seven years to conduct the organization from which he emerged on the American musical scene eight years ago.

A Poor Nation

"Greece has seen political systems of all shades—kingdoms, democracies, and dictatorships," Dr. Mitropoulos explained earnestly, disclosing the deep feelings which he, and undoubtedly many Greeks long absent from their homeland, have about the current situation. "Those governments didn't see a good day," he added. "I hope to see a political and social change." Asked as to what he thought Greek political leanings are now, Dr. Mitropoulos said "far to the left."

"What is good for England may not be good for Greece," he continued. "Greece cannot afford a kingdom or a democracy, Greece is a poor nation. I think it is a pity we do not let them make their own choice."

The discussion of politics, quite naturally, brought up the question of its use in art, and here Dr. Mitropoulos had as definite opinions.

"I don't think politics should interfere with art," Dr. Mitropoulos declared, "but I do think that the artist should never forget that he has to extend a hand to the people. I mean by that the artist should try to lead the people to him, educate them, but not play down to them. The artist has a duty to art—he should never forget that his art should not stay in an ivory tower.

American Composer

"Art, furthermore, should not betray itself, by the artist making it more acceptable," Dr. Mitropoulos also explained. "It may eventually spoil the artist. I think there is a high morale in art that must be considered."

He disclosed that he is to present an American composer in his first program next Friday—Morton Gould's "Spirituals," a suite of white and Negro music, he described it. Another work to be programmed is American-European Ernst Krenek's "I Wonder As I Wander," done in the United States by the Viennese composer of "Jonny Spielt Auf," the "sensation" of the twenties. The Boston performance of the work will be the third one, the premiere having been given in Minnepolis and the second performance in New York.

"American composers have come very high," he said. "Nowadays it is definitely a question of selection of American works, instead of looking around to find one," he added. He named Walter Piston, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions, and David Diamond as his leading choices of contemporary composers.

"The approbation of the American public is necessary, of course," he said, "to encourage us to conduct more American music and to improve the mind of the American composer.

"Dr. Koussevitzky has done a tremendous job in this respect—playing the utmost amount of American music," he continued. "I think Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution to the world and to America has been his constant presentation of contemporary composers."

Works Selected

Among other contemporary and standard works selected by Dr. Mitropoulos for his Boston concerts are Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, in E minor, Vaughan Williams' "London" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony No. 3, in A minor, and Schubert's Symphony No. 2, in B flat.

Dr. Mitropoulos (who is "Dr" by virtue of an honorary degree awarded him in 1942 by the University of Minnesota) said that he has done a great deal of listening to popular music in the course of his musical travels which have taken him from Winnipeg to New Orleans with his own orchestra and from coast to coast in guest engagements. He has, in fact, just come from conducting a series of concerts with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra which he stated was a "fine orchestra."

Jazz, he thinks, has become more ugly. "It has cheapened, vulgarized itself, and is itself playing down to the public."

He expressed the hope that middle western orchestras would achieve the distribution by radio and records, with the accompanying public notice, as is available to major eastern orchestras. "We don't have the privilege of being on the air now, but we're just as good. I suppose now that the Petrillo ban on recording is off much time will be devoted to major orchestras. They may get around to us later."

Post

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Through that of Sunday, Dec. 24, the Symphony Concerts are to know the electrifying presence of Dimitri Mitropoulos. Don't miss him. And if you plan to go this evening, don't be late, for Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the first number on the programme, is played, as the composer wished it, without pause, and because of the broadcast the concert must begin on time. Moreover, no matter how well you may think you know the piece, you are [illegible] to feel that you have never [illegible] heard it before. While not altogether [illegible] [illegible]ding you to the fact that Mendelssohn was a suave and elegant composer, Dr. Mitropoulos (he's Dr. [illegible]) [illegible] you realize that the Scotch [illegible] people and were once a [illegible] and that their country is one of the most romantic in Europe.

A [illegible] act of rejuvenation took place in the case of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, a work 65 years younger than Mendelssohn's but standing in [illegible] need of the energizing, [illegible], the glamorizing that it yesterday received. There were some [illegible] cuts that helped a lot but [illegible] did not tell the whole story. Under Mitropoulos' batonless hands the [illegible] piece became engrossing and [illegible] and, in the slow movement, [illegible] besides.

[illegible] was also a living composer to [illegible] by these wonders of interpretation and performance, Morton Gould, [illegible] "Spirituals" for String Choir and [illegible] were played for the first time [illegible] city. In two senses the title is [illegible], the melodic material, while [illegible] in feeling, is for the most part [illegible], and the third section, "A Little [illegible] of Sin," and the last, 'Jubilee,' [illegible]thing but spiritual, and in them, [illegible]lly, Dr. Mitropoulos suggested [illegible] might beat any of our jazz con[illegible] their own game. The "Proc[illegible]" and the "Protest" show [illegible] power, the "Sermon" deep feeling. [illegible] a most rewarding novel[illegible] composer and conductor were [illegible] by an enthusiastic audience. [illegible] this music, as elsewhere, Dr. [illegible] conducted without score, [illegible] freely and unhampered upon [illegible] as though it were some [illegible] instrument, moulding the [illegible] line, modelling the orchestral tone, [illegible]alizing the rhythm and missing not one iota of musical meaning or of musical effect.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 15 1944

Capacity Audience At Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give ~~its Sixth War Loan Sym-~~phony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

DEC 15 1944

Symphony Concert Nets $9,959,122 in War Bonds

BOSTON, Dec. 15—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give ~~its Sixth War Loan~~ symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

DEC 15 1944

Capacity Crowd

BOSTON. (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give ~~its sixth war loan~~ symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

DEC 15 1944

Audience Pays $9,959,000 In Bonds To Hear Concert By Boston Symphony

BOSTON—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston symphony orchestra give its sixth war loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts war finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

13 1944

Sioux City, Iowa, air base.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO SALUTE DULUTH

The Boston Symphony orchestra will salute ~~Duluth Saturday~~ as one of the key centers of the steel industry in a radio broadcast to be heard on the 189 stations of the Blue network. The broadcast [illegible] sponsored by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., Milwaukee.

Dimitri Mitropoulos
Guest conductor at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dec 14, Monitor

Sixth War Loan
Symphony Concert

BOSTON GARDEN, DECEMBER 14, 1944, at 8.30 o'clock

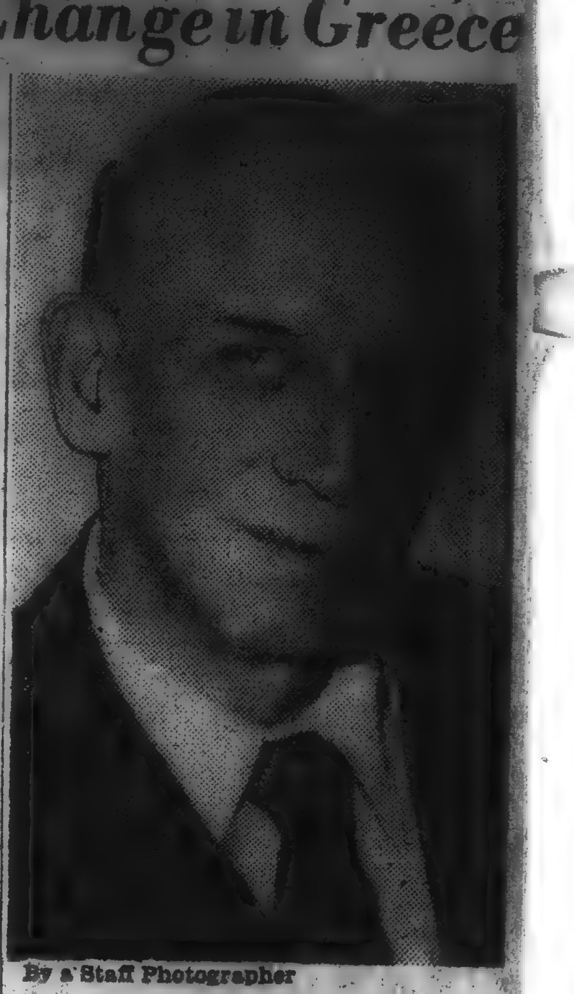
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

Assisted By
U. S. NAVAL TRAINING STATION BAND, NEWPORT, R.I.

Sponsored by the
UNITED STATES TREASURY DEPARTMENT
AND THE RETAIL TRADE BOARD OF BOSTON.

Noted Orchestra Leader Hopes For Political Change in Greece



By a Staff Photographer

Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos
Leader of Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

"The moment has come for Greece to try a different kind of social and political system," Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos, Greek conductor, declared today in an interview at his suite in the Hotel Hemenway in Boston.

Now conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Mitroppoulos is to direct the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next two weeks. He is back in Boston for the first time in seven years to conduct the organization from which he emerged on the American musical scene eight years ago.

A Poor Nation

"Greece has seen political systems of all shades—kingdoms, democracies, and dictatorships," Dr. Mitropoulos explained earnestly, disclosing the deep feelings which he, and undoubtedly many Greeks long absent from their homeland, have about the current situation. "Those governments didn't see a good day," he added. "I hope to see a political and social change." Asked as to what he thought Greek political leanings are now, Dr. Mitropoulos said "far to the left."

"What is good for England may not be good for Greece," he continued. "Greece cannot afford a kingdom or a democracy, Greece is a poor nation. I think it is a pity we do not let them make their own choice."

The discussion of politics, quite naturally, brought up the question of its use in art, and here Dr. Mitropoulos had as definite opinions.

"I don't think politics should interfere with art," Dr. Mitropoulos declared, "but I do think that the artist should never forget that he has to extend a hand to the people. I mean by that the artist should try to lead the people to him, educate them, but not play down to them. The artist has a duty to art—he should never forget that his art should not stay in an ivory tower.

American Composer

"Art, furthermore, should not betray itself, by the artist making it more acceptable," Dr. Mitropoulos also explained. "It may eventually spoil the artist. I think there is a high morale in art that must be considered."

He disclosed that he is to present an American composer in his first program next Friday—Morton Gould's "Spirituals," a suite of white and Negro music, he described it. Another work to be programmed is American-European Ernst Krenek's "I Wonder As I Wander," done in the United States by the Viennese composer of "Jonny Spielt Auf," the "sensation" of the twenties. The Boston performance of the work will be the third one, the premiere having been given in Minnepolis and the second performance in New York.

"American composers have come very high," he said. "Nowadays it is definitely a question of selection of American works, instead of looking around to find one," he added. He named Walter Piston, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions, and David Diamond as his leading choices of contemporary composers.

"The approbation of the American public is necessary, of course," he said, "to encourage us to conduct more American music and to improve the mind of the American composer.

"Dr. Koussevitzky has done a tremendous job in this respect—playing the utmost amount of American music," he continued. "I think Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution to the world and to America has been his constant presentation of contemporary composers."

Works Selected

Among other contemporary and standard works selected by Dr. Mitropoulos for his Boston concerts are Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, in E minor, Vaughan Williams' "London" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony No. 3, in A minor, and Schubert's Symphony No. 2, in B flat.

Dr. Mitropoulos (who is "Dr" by virtue of an honorary degree awarded him in 1942 by the University of Minnesota) said that he has done a great deal of listening to popular music in the course of his musical travels which have taken him from Winnipeg to New Orleans with his own orchestra and from coast to coast in guest engagements. He has, in fact, just come from conducting a series of concerts with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra which he stated was a "fine orchestra."

Jazz, he thinks, has become more ugly. "It has cheapened, vulgarized itself, and is itself playing down to the public."

He expressed the hope that middle western orchestras would achieve the distribution by radio and records, with the accompanying public notice, as is available to major eastern orchestras. "We don't have the privilege of being on the air now, but we're just as good. I suppose now that the Petrillo ban on recording is off much time will be devoted to major orchestras. They may get around to us later."

Dec 15 Post

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Through that of Sunday, Dec. 24, the Symphony Concerts are to know the electrifying presence of Dimitri Mitropoulos. Don't miss him. And if you plan to go this evening, don't be late, for Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the first number on the programme, is played, as the composer wished it, without pause, and because of the broadcast the concert must begin on time. Moreover, no matter how well you may think you know the Spiece, you are quite likely to feel that you have never really heard it before. While not altogether blinding you to the fact that Mendelssohn was a suave and elegant composer, Dr. Mitropoulos (he's Dr. now) makes you realize that the Scotch are a sturdy people and were once a warlike one, and that their country is one of the most romantic in Europe.

A similar act of rejuvenation took place in the case of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, a work 65 years younger than Mendelssohn's but standing in no less need of the energizing, the clarifying, the glamorizing that it yesterday received. There were some judicious cuts that helped a lot but they did not tell the whole story. Under Dr. Mitropoulos' batonless hands the Russian's piece became engrossing and exciting and, in the slow movement, very lush besides.

There was also a living composer to benefit by these wonders of interpretation and performance, Morton Gould, whose "Spirituals" for String Choir and Orchestra were played for the first time in this city. In two senses the title is misleading, the melodic material, while racial in feeling, is for the most part original, and the third section, "A Little Bit of Sin," and the last, "Jubilee," are anything but spiritual, and in them, incidentally, Dr. Mitropoulos suggested that he might beat any of our jazz conductors at their own game. The "Proclamation" and the "Protest" show dramatic power, the "Sermon" deep feeling. In sum, a most rewarding novelty, and composer and conductor were alike hailed by an enthusiastic audience. In this music, as elsewhere, Dr. Mitropoulos conducted without score, playing freely and unhampered upon the band as though it were some mighty instrument, moulding the melodic line, modelling the orchestral tone, vitalizing the rhythm and missing not one iota of musical meaning or of musical effect.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 15 1944

Capacity Audience At Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give its Sixth War Loan Symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
DEC 15 1944

Symphony Concert Nets $9,959,122 in War Bonds

BOSTON, Dec. 15—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give ~~its Sixth War Loan~~ symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

DEC 13 1944

Sioux City, Iowa, air base.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO SALUTE DULUTH

The Boston Symphony orchestra will salute ~~Duluth Satur~~day as one of the key centers of the steel industry in a radio broadcast to be heard on the 189 stations of the Blue network. The broadcast is sponsored by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., Milwaukee.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

DEC 15 1944

Audience Pays $9,959,000 In Bonds To Hear Concert By Boston Symphony

BOSTON—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston symphony orchestra give its sixth war loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

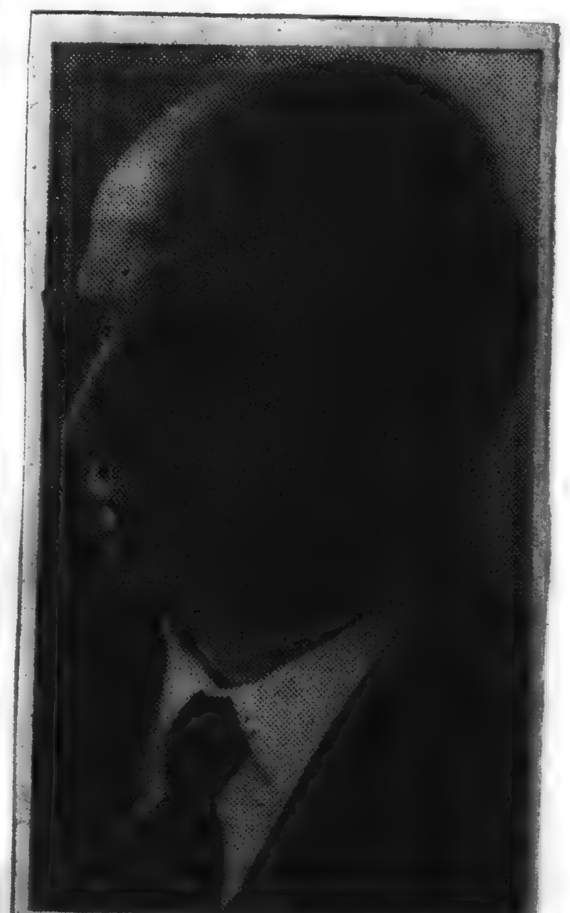
F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts war finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

DEC 15 1944

Capacity Crowd

BOSTON. (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give ~~its Sixth War Loan~~ symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.



Dimitri Mitropoulos

Guest conductor at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Dec 14 Monitor

[29]

NOTES ON THE PROGRAM

A SYMBOL may come into being quite by accident, as in the case of the Fifth Symphony, where the opening rhythm corresponds to the Morse code for the letter V. But a symbol becomes powerful only at that moment of deep and inevitable correspondence — where conviction is expressed in action. The music of Beethoven is action, arising from deep conviction, and that music speaks to us strongly in 1944 because the problem of Beethoven's world was so like ours.

He tasted the bitterness of tyranny when Vienna was twice occupied by Napoleon. The word "liberty" was a firebrand which had lately started a revolution in France, and another in the American Colonies. Beethoven made the dreams of liberation for oppressed peoples articulate, in music which was both a proclamation and an exhortation. No other voice rises so ringingly from his epoch, and surely as yet none in ours.

We need his kind of fearless conviction. Imagine Beethoven's reaction if he were with us today and were told of that incident at Vichy when the words "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity" were stricken from the statutes of the mangled Republic of France. That would have stirred Beethoven to one of his best transports of anger, for those words were Beethoven's whole credo. The old slogan has been repeated thoughtlessly these many years, but it is not threadbare yet. It was strong enough to cause uneasiness at Vichy and behind Vichy, and it will be strong enough to destroy at last all who oppose it.

The Fifth Symphony is not the only one which is defiant in its first movement, triumphant in its last. The Third Symphony, the "Eroica," has both qualities in equal degree, and so has a great deal of the music of Beethoven's middle years. And where he had a specific text, as in Goethe's "Egmont" or the opera "Fidelio," we hear again of that hope which was close to Beethoven's heart and is close to ours — the liberation of the world of men from the power of the oppressive few.

The story of Count Egmont of the Netherlands, could, with very slight changes, be a story of the same locale today. Brussels is occupied by a foreign tyrant (the Spanish Duke of Alva), whose soldiers patrol the streets, ready to put down with brutality the slightest sign of resistance. There is the silent determination of a small but proud people to resist the invader, the readiness of a patriot leader to die rather than "collaborate."

(Continued on last page)

Programme

BEETHOVEN........................Overture to "Egmont," Op. 54

BEETHOVEN...................Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67

I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

15 MINUTE INTERMISSION*

ELGAR....................."Pomp and Circumstance," March, No. 1

GANNE.."Lorraine," March

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV........"Dubinushka," Russian Folk Song, Op. 62

SOUSA......................."The Stars and Stripes Forever," March

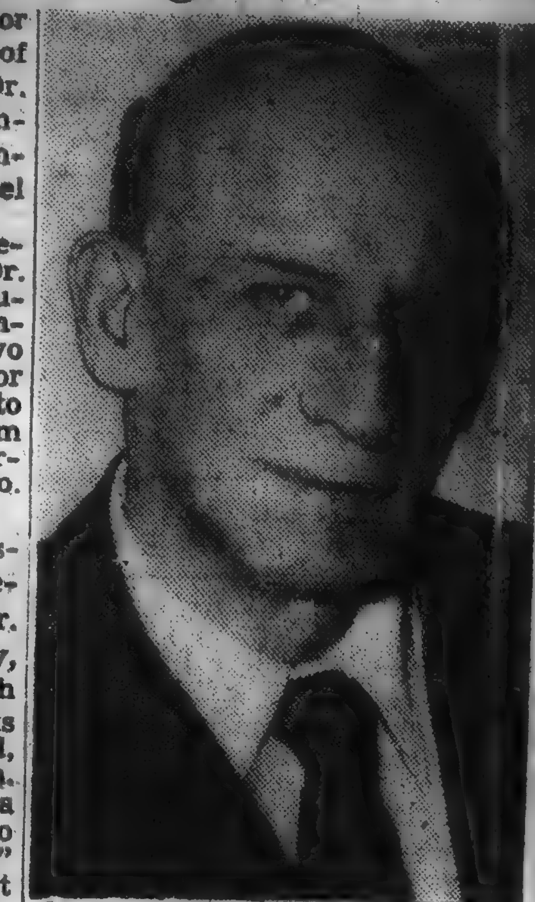
TCHAIKOVSKY.................Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Op. 49

*Preceding the second half of the concert there will be a brief announcement by F. W. Denio, State Chairman, War Finance Committee, United States Treasury Department.

The Retail Trade Board of Boston expresses its grateful appreciation to Dr. Koussevitzky and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have donated their services for this concert, — to the Boston Garden for contributing its facilities, — and to Lieutenant Warren S. Freeman, U.S.N.R. and the Newport Naval Training Station Band for their participation.

Dec 11

Noted Orchestra Leader Hopes For Political Change in Greece



By a Staff Photographer

Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos

Leader of Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

"The moment has come for Greece to try a different kind of social and political system," Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos, Greek conductor, declared today in an interview at his suite in the Hotel Hemenway in Boston.

Now conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Mitroppoulos is to direct the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next two weeks. He is back in Boston for the first time in seven years to conduct the organization from which he emerged on the American musical scene eight years ago.

A Poor Nation

"Greece has seen political systems of all shades—kingdoms, democracies, and dictatorships," Dr. Mitropoulos explained earnestly, disclosing the deep feelings which he, and undoubtedly many Greeks long absent from their homeland, have about the current situation. "Those governments didn't see a good day," he added. "I hope to see a political and social change." Asked as to what he thought Greek political leanings are now, Dr. Mitropoulos said "far to the left."

"What is good for England may not be good for Greece," he continued. "Greece cannot afford a kingdom or a democracy, Greece is a poor nation. I think it is a pity we do not let them make their own choice."

The discussion of politics, quite naturally, brought up the question of its use in art, and here Dr. Mitropoulos had as definite opinions.

"I don't think politics should interfere with art," Dr. Mitropoulos declared, "but I do think that the artist should never forget that he has to extend a hand to the people. I mean by that the artist should try to lead the people to him, educate them, but not play down to them. The artist has a duty to art—he should never forget that his art should not stay in an ivory tower.

American Composer

"Art, furthermore, should not betray itself, by the artist making it more acceptable," Dr. Mitropoulos also explained. "It may eventually spoil the artist. I think there is a high morale in art that must be considered."

He disclosed that he is to present an American composer in his first program next Friday—Morton Gould's "Spirituals," a suite of white and Negro music, he described it. Another work to be programmed is American-European Ernst Krenek's "I Wonder As I Wander," done in the United States by the Viennese composer of "Jonny Spielt Auf," the "sensation" of the twenties. The Boston performance of the work will be the third one, the premiere having been given in Minneapolis and the second performance in New York.

"American composers have come very high," he said. "Nowadays it is definitely a question of selection of American works, instead of looking around to find one," he added. He named Walter Piston, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions, and David Diamond as his leading choices of contemporary composers.

"The approbation of the American public is necessary, of course," he said, "to encourage us to conduct more American music and to improve the mind of the American composer.

"Dr. Koussevitzky has done a tremendous job in this respect—playing the utmost amount of American music," he continued. "I think Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution to the world and to America has been his constant presentation of contemporary composers."

Works Selected

Among other contemporary and standard works selected by Dr. Mitropoulos for his Boston concerts are Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, in E minor, Vaughan Williams' "London" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony No. 3, in A minor, and Schubert's Symphony No. 2, in B flat.

Dr. Mitropoulos (who is "Dr" by virtue of an honorary degree awarded him in 1942 by the University of Minnesota) said that he has done a great deal of listening to popular music in the course of his musical travels which have taken him from Winnipeg to New Orleans with his own orchestra and from coast to coast in guest engagements. He has, in fact, just come from conducting a series of concerts with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra which he stated was a "fine orchestra."

Jazz, he thinks, has become more ugly. "It has cheapened, vulgarized itself, and is itself playing down to the public."

He expressed the hope that middle western orchestras would achieve the distribution by radio and records, with the accompanying public notice, as is available to major eastern orchestras. "We don't have the privilege of being on the air now, but we're just as good. I suppose now that the Petrillo ban on recording is off much time will be devoted to major orchestras. They may get around to us later."

Dec 15 Post

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Through that of Sunday, Dec. 24, the Symphony Concerts are to know the electrifying presence of Dimitri Mitropoulos. Don't miss him. And if you plan to go this evening, don't be late, for Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the first number on the programme, is played, as the composer wished it, without pause, and because of the broadcast the concert must begin on time. Moreover, no matter how well you may think you know the Spiece, you are quite likely to feel that you have never really heard it before. While not altogether blinding you to the fact that Mendelssohn was a suave and elegant composer, Dr. Mitropoulos (he's Dr. now) makes you realize that the Scotch are a sturdy people and were once a warlike one, and that their country is one of the most romantic in Europe.

A similar act of rejuvenation took place in the case of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, a work 65 years younger than Mendelssohn's but standing in no less need of the energizing, the clarifying, the glamorizing that it yesterday received. There were some judicious cuts that helped a lot but they did not tell the whole story. Under Dr. Mitropoulos' batonless hands the Russian's piece became engrossing and exciting and, in the slow movement, very lush besides.

There was also a living composer to benefit by these wonders of interpretation and performance, Morton Gould, whose "Spirituals" for String Choir and Orchestra were played for the first time in this city. In two senses the title is misleading, the melodic material, while racial in feeling, is for the most part original, and the third section, "A Little Bit of Sin," and the last, "Jubilee," are anything but spiritual, and in them, incidentally, Dr. Mitropoulos suggested that he might beat any of our jazz conductors at their own game. The "Proclamation" and the "Protest" show dramatic power, the "Sermon" deep feeling. In sum, a most rewarding novelty, and composer and conductor were alike hailed by an enthusiastic audience. In this music, as elsewhere, Dr. Mitropoulos conducted without score, playing freely and unhampered upon the band as though it were some mighty instrument, moulding the melodic line, modelling the orchestral tone, vitalizing the rhythm and missing not one iota of musical meaning or of musical effect.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 15 1944

Capacity Audience At Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give ~~its Sixth War Loan Sym~~phony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

DEC 15 1944

Capacity Crowd

BOSTON. (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give ~~its sixth war loan~~ symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

DEC 15 1944

Symphony Concert Nets $9,959,122 in War Bonds

BOSTON, Dec. 15—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give ~~its Sixth War Loan~~ symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

DEC 15 1944

Audience Pays $9,959,000 In Bonds To Hear Concert By Boston Symphony

BOSTON—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston symphony orchestra give its sixth war loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts war finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

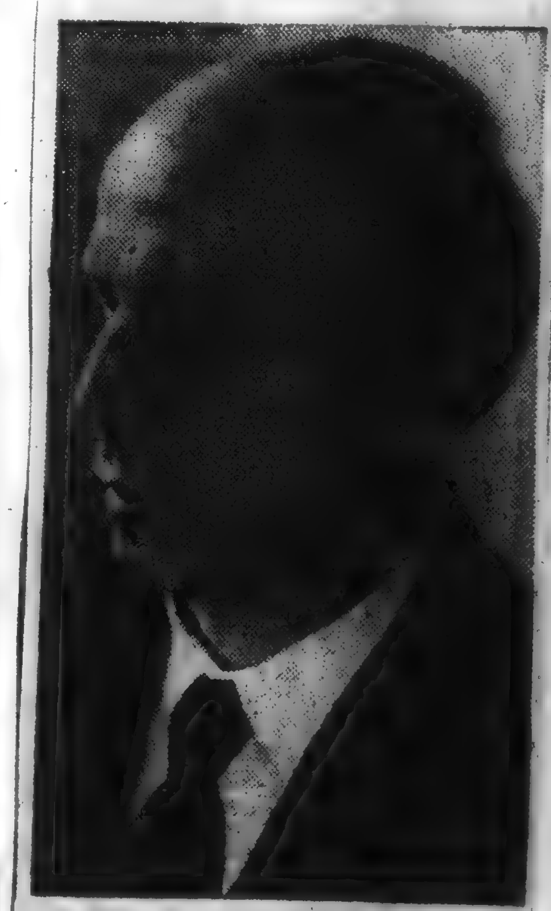
DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

DEC 13 1944

Sioux City, Iowa, air base.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO SALUTE DULUTH

The Boston Symphony orchestra will salute ~~Duluth Satur~~day as one of the key centers of the steel industry in a radio broadcast to be heard on the 189 stations of the Blue network. The broadcast is sponsored by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., Milwaukee.



Dimitri Mitropoulos

Guest conductor at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dec 14, Monitor

[29]

NOTES ON THE PROGRAM

(Continued from page two)

The March "Pomp and Circumstance" by the late Sir Edward Elgar, Maker of the King's Music, is the first and by far the best known of a projected set of six under the same title, which derives from Shakespeare's "Othello" (Act III, Scene 3):

> "Farewell the neighing steed and the shrill trump,
> The spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife,
> The royal banner, and all quality,
> Pride, pomp and circumstance of glorious war!"

The melody of the Trio the composer took from his Coronation Ode, where it appears as "Land of hope and glory."

The March "Lorraine" by Louis Ganne (1862–1923) is now often heard once more in France and is second in favor only to "La Marseillaise."

John Philip Sousa tells us in his autobiography, "Marching Along," how on a voyage from Naples to New York in 1897 the music for what was to become his most popular march suddenly occurred to him as he paced the deck: "I began to sense the rhythmic beat of a band playing within my brain. It kept on ceaselessly, playing, playing, playing. Throughout the whole tense voyage, that imaginary band continued to unfold the same themes, echoing and re-echoing the most distinct melody. I did not transfer a note of that music to paper while I was on the steamer, but when we reached shore, I set down the measures that my brain-band had been playing for me, and not a note of it was ever changed. The composition is known the world over as 'The Stars and Stripes Forever.'"

Rimsky-Korsakov's folk song setting and Tchaikovsky's overture both owe their source to critical moments in Russian history. It was in 1880 that Tchaikovsky wrote his "Ceremonial Overture" for a celebration in Moscow, in memory of the retreat of Napoleon from that city sixty-eight years before. The Overture, after a hymn-like introduction, becomes a battle piece in which Napoleon's forces, symbolized by "La Marseillaise," are routed by the Russian army at Borodino. The Imperial anthem of Lvov finally triumphs.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Dubinushka" belongs to the insurrectionary year 1905, when the composer made his own orchestral arrangement of a popular revolutionary song. He wrote it for the St. Petersburg Conservatory, where a revolution in miniature was in progress, the students taking the part of their teacher.

John N. Burk.

Noted Orchestra Leader Hopes For Political Change in Greece

By a Staff Photographer

Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos

Leader of Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

"The moment has come for Greece to try a different kind of social and political system," Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos, Greek conductor, declared today in an interview at his suite in the Hotel Hemenway in Boston.

Now conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Mitroppoulos is to direct the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next two weeks. He is back in Boston for the first time in seven years to conduct the organization from which he emerged on the American musical scene eight years ago.

A Poor Nation

"Greece has seen political systems of all shades—kingdoms, democracies, and dictatorships," Dr. Mitropoulos explained earnestly, disclosing the deep feelings which he, and undoubtedly many Greeks long absent from their homeland, have about the current situation. "Those governments didn't see a good day," he added. "I hope to see a political and social change." Asked as to what he thought Greek political leanings are now, Dr. Mitropoulos said "far to the left."

"What is good for England may not be good for Greece," he continued. "Greece cannot afford a kingdom or a democracy, Greece is a poor nation. I think it is a pity we do not let them make their own choice."

The discussion of politics, quite naturally, brought up the question of its use in art, and here Dr. Mitropoulos had as definite opinions.

"I don't think politics should interfere with art," Dr. Mitropoulos declared, "but I do think that the artist should never forget that he has to extend a hand to the people. I mean by that the artist should try to lead the people to him, educate them, but not play down to them. The artist has a duty to art—he should never forget that his art should not stay in an ivory tower.

American Composer

"Art, furthermore, should not betray itself, by the artist making it more acceptable," Dr. Mitropoulos also explained. "It may eventually spoil the artist. I think there is a high morale in art that must be considered."

He disclosed that he is to present an American composer in his first program next Friday—Morton Gould's "Spirituals," a suite of white and Negro music, he described it. Another work to be programmed is American-European Ernst Krenek's "I Wonder As I Wander," done in the United States by the Viennese composer of "Jonny Spielt Auf," the "sensation" of the twenties. The Boston performance of the work will be the third one, the premiere having been given in Minneapolis and the second performance in New York.

"American composers have come very high," he said. "Nowadays it is definitely a question of selection of American works, instead of looking around to find one," he added. He named Walter Piston, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions, duct more American music and to improve the mind of the American composer.

"Dr. Koussevitzky has done a tremendous job in this respect—playing the utmost amount of American music," he continued. "I think Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution to the world and to America has been his constant presentation of contemporary composers."

Works Selected

Among other contemporary and standard works selected by Dr. Mitropoulos for his Boston concerts are Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, in E minor, Vaughan Williams' "London" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony No. 3, in A minor, and Schubert's Symphony No. 2, in B flat.

Dr. Mitropoulos (who is "Dr" by virtue of an honorary degree awarded him in 1942 by the University of Minnesota) said that he has done a great deal of listening to popular music in the course of his musical travels which have taken him from Winnipeg to New Orleans with his own orchestra and from coast to coast in guest engagements. He has, in fact, just come from conducting a series of concerts with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra which he stated was a "fine orchestra."

Jazz, he thinks, has become more ugly. "It has cheapened, vulgarized itself, and is itself playing down to the public."

He expressed the hope that middle western orchestras would achieve the distribution by radio and records, with the accompanying public notice, as is available to major eastern orchestras. "We don't have the privilege of being on the air now, but we're just as good. I suppose now that the Petrillo ban on recording is off much time will be devoted to

---

Dec 15 Post

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Through that of Sunday, Dec. 24, the Symphony Concerts are to know the electrifying presence of Dimitri Mitropoulos. Don't miss him.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 15 1944

Capacity Audience

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

DEC 15 1944

Symphony Concert Nets $9,959,122 in War Bonds

BOSTON, Dec. 15—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to

Concert Sells $9,959,122 Bonds

Dec 15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WAR BOND CONCERT AT GARDEN LAST NIGHT

By ROBERT PLAYFAIR

A capacity crowd of 13,500 persons at the "Bond Concert" in Boston Garden last night, broke all records for attendance at a Boston Symphony concert, bought a staggering $9,959,122 in War Bonds, won the title of "Best Behaved Crowd in Garden History," earned the respect of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who called them "marvelous"—and had a grand time.

Sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, it was a strange, victorious evening . . . a night of good music in a sports arena, a triumph of the local Sixth War Loan committee, and a healthy blow at the theory that classical music belongs to the classes.

Dr. Koussevitzky arrived at his dressing room in a rented limousine, with police escort, rolling right to the door of the quarters assigned to him.

See CONCERT Page 23

Symphony Program of Last Night

Last night's record-breaking Symphony crowd at the Boston Garden heard the following "full dress" concert:

Overture to "Egmont"	Beethoven
Symphony No. 5 in C minor	Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro, Trio.
IV. Allegro.
"Pomp and Circumstance"	Elgar
"Lorraine" March.	Ganne
"Dubinushka," Russian Folk Song.	Rimsky-Korsakov
"The Stars and Stripes Forever"	Sousa
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky

Concert

Continued from the First Page

A loyal Garden management had furnished his room with a leather couch, an electric heater, and aides to do his bidding.

His entry to the arena itself was greeted with sustained clapping and even a little honest cheering. He walked sedately to the huge floor, saw the vast crowd, then ran the remaining 40 yards to the podium.

His orchestra, 110 strong, was seated on a round gilt base, with every player visible to the audience. The committee, fearing the unusual setting might upset Koussevitzky, allowed photographs only before the concert opened.

Garden Sold Out Tuesday

The Garden was sold out Tuesday, and a man was turned down at a Boston department store yesterday afternoon who wanted to buy $5000 worth of bonds and get two tickets.

It was a full dress Symphony concert, and the acoustics of the Garden amazed veteran Symphony-goers, who pronounced the evening an artistic success.

"It was just as good as in Symphony Hall," a music critic declared, "and he out-Sousa-ed Sousa in 'The Stars and Stripes Forever.' "

One of the audience who had never been to Symphony Hall, a taxi-driver, said "He sure knocked himself out on that piece. Best I ever heard it played."

Most people refrained from smoking—as at Symphony Hall. Latecomers waited patiently at the entrances until Koussevitsky finished the opening piece, Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" Op. 54.

Then came Beethoven's 5th. The lights dimmed, the Garden was hushed under the silent hockey clocks, and the French horns played the opening notes of victory.

Edward L. Hubbard, president of the Retail Trade Board, presented Koussevitsky with roses in his dressing room before the performance, and termed the crowd "a great tribute to you and your orchestra."

Only guests were 450 members of women's service groups, including WAVES, SPARS, lady Marines, WACS and Cadet Nurses.

Eleven hundred persons on the floor alone represented more than $1,000,000 in bond purchases.

The United States Naval Training Station band from Newport, R. I., joined in the National Anthem and played a march of its own when the service women's groups marched in.

F. W. Denio, state chairman of the War Finance Committee, called the bond sale "a staggering figure" and disclosed that it "has never been duplicated in New England, if anywhere in the country."

During a 15-minute intermission, vendors sold ice cream. By that time many of the Symphony habitues were smoking, and one of them said, "They ought to sell ice cream at Symphony Hall."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
DEC 15 1944

SYMPHONY SETS RECORDS

BOSTON, Dec. 15.—(INS) A new record for attendance at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was inscribed ~~today by~~ a crowd of 13,500 which filled Boston Garden and bought a staggering total of $9,959,122 in war bonds. The performance by the staid Boston Symphony in a sports arena broke precedent in behalf of the Sixth War Loan drive, but Conductor Serge Koussevitsky expressed himself as happy over the results. A large part of the audience had never before been present at a symphony concert and expressed its pleasure by cheers rather than sedate applause, but the Russian-born conductor called the new patrons "marvelous."

GARDEN CONCERT RECORD FOR U. S.

Post

13,500 Pay $9,952,122 in War Bonds to Hear Symphony Concert ---Greatest Indoor Bond Event

AT BIG WAR LOAN CONCERT
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, left, and President Edward L. Hubbard of the Boston Retail Trade Board at the big war loan symphony concert at Boston Garden.

A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid the record sum of $9,952,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give its unprecedented Sixth War Loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night, and figuratively raised the roof in an ovation to the great orchestra and its leader.

THE PROGRAMME

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra did not sound in the Boston Garden last evening precisely as it does in Symphony Hall. It probably did not sound exactly the same in every part of the huge auditorium. But even in those vast spaces its unique qualities were still apparent. It was a happy thought to place it in the centre, instead of at one end, as was done with Stokowski's Youth Orchestra a couple of years ago, and the inevitable amplification was well managed.

The sound, then, was satisfactory, and so was the programme. Containing just enough serious music and just enough patriotic music, Dr. Koussevitzky's well-contrived list was also timely and appropriate in every respect. Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" recalled another time when the Netherlands was oppressed by tyranny, a tyranny over which the soul of a brave man was able to triumph. Not only because of its V-for-victory motive is Beethoven's Fifth Symphony appropriate to times like these, and in the numbers that filled the second half of the evening Dr. Koussevitzky recognized all of the United Nations save China, and on that particular score there wasn't much that he could do. These pieces were Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" March, No. 1; the March "Lorraine" of Ganne, now exceedingly popular in liberated France; Rimsky-Korsakov's transcription of "Dubinushka," a Russian revolutionary song of the early years of the present century; Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever" and Tchaikovsky's Overture "1812."

It had been announced that extra bells would be collected for Tchaikovsky's Overture. They were not in evidence; only the familiar set of tubular chimes. But there were extra brass instruments, played by members of the U. S. Naval Training Station Band from Newport, R. I. The added sonority was somewhat less than one might have expected, but, anyway, there was noise enough and the overture got the best hand of the evening. We are accustomed to hearing Dr. Koussevitzky and the full orchestra in the music of Beethoven, though not in what might be called Pop concert marches and, to be perfectly frank, the above comments on excellence of the orchestral tone, the finish of the orchestral performance were meant to apply to Beethoven, not to the other composers of the evening. The second half of the programme was merely the Pops, only more so. And that, under the circumstances, was very much in order.

GARDEN CONCERT RECORD FOR U. S.

Continued From First Page

Acknowledged by the Treasury Department to have been the largest indoor event for war bonds in the history of the United States, the occasion reached into the highest brackets of patriotic achievement, earning more money for the country's war effort than even had been hoped in the wildest dreams of its sponsors.

In announcing the accomplishment, F. Winchester Denio, general chairman of the Sixth War Loan drive here, told the big audience, which filled floor and balconies, that the sale of bonds for the concert "staggers anything expected."

He paid tribute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra, which had donated its talents and services, to the Naval Training Station band from Newport, which augmented the Symphony musicians in the grand finale, Tchaikovsky's "1812," and to the sponsoring organizations—the United States Treasury Department and the Boston Retail Trade Board, which distributed the tickets and issued the bonds for them here.

The huge auditorium was undecorated, except for a big American flag suspended over the great white circular orchestra stage in mid-arena—where the middle ring of the circus, and centre-ice for the hockey games, and the ring for prize fights and wrestling bouts usually hold the spotlights.

Ranged around the great floor were tiers of the women's military services—WAVES, WACS, SPARS, women marines, army and navy nurses, the light blue-clad cadet nurses, and a detail of the gray-uniformed Red Cross.

Truly it was, in the words of Chairman Denio, "an event that never can be duplicated, because it is the first performance the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever has given in Boston Garden, and to the biggest audience it ever played to in New England."

Every Ticket Sold

The huge crowd began arriving early, pouring in from street cars, buses, elevated trains and in private cars. Every walk of life was represented.

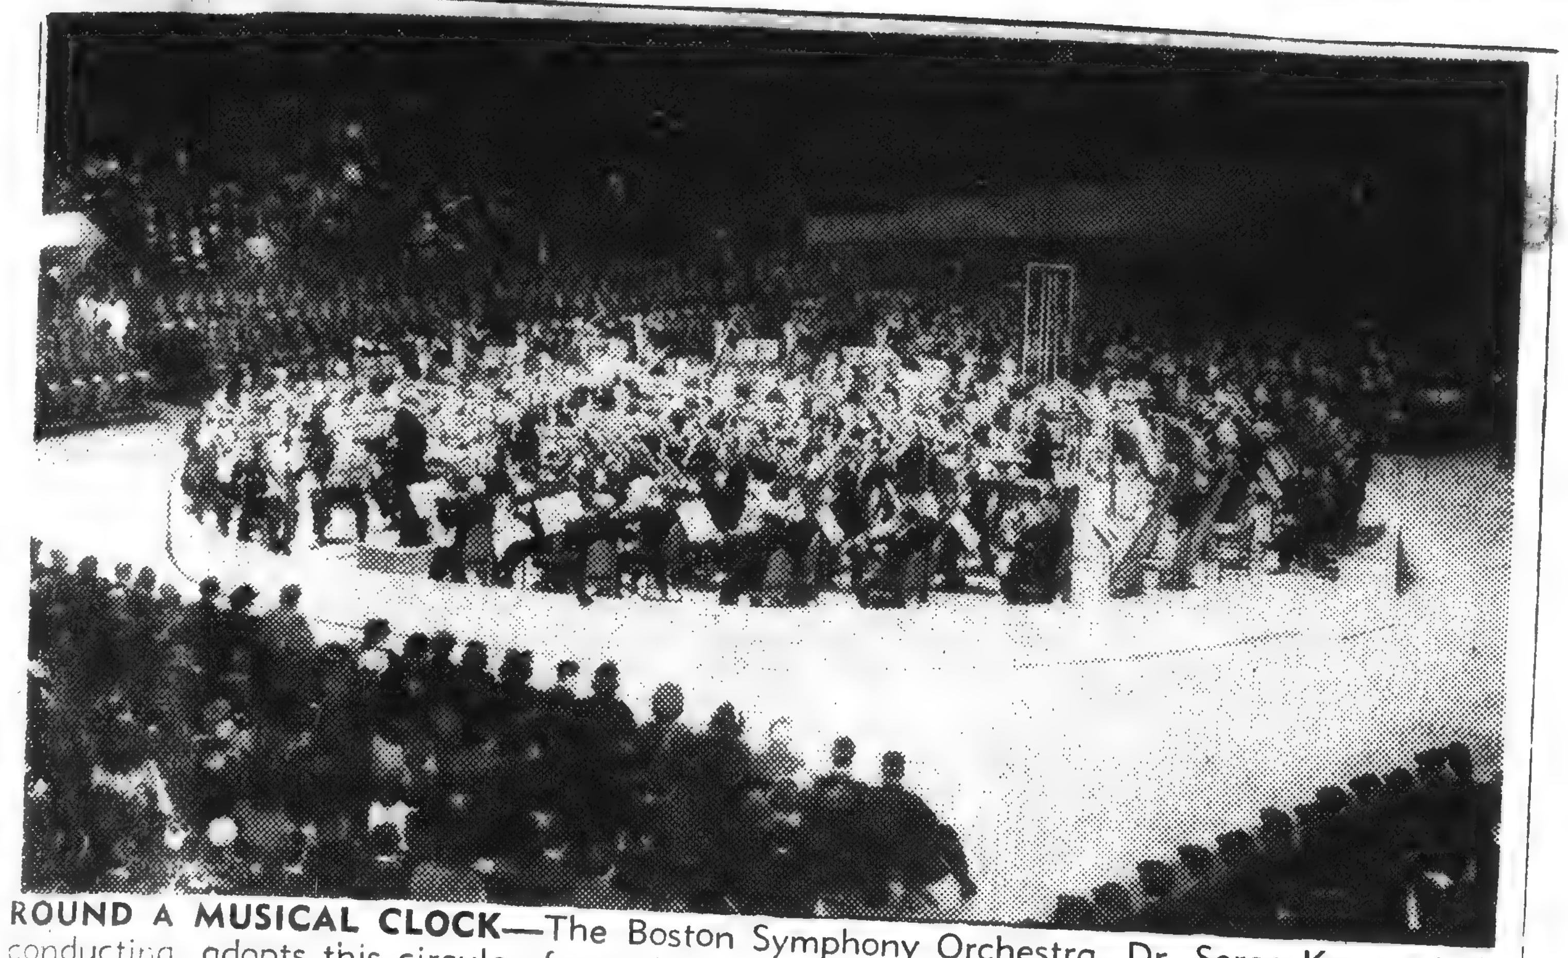
The Naval Training Station band played the women's services into the big hall, and they made a smart appearance as they marched to their places. When Dr. Koussevitzky strode to the dais, the entire great audience rose to its feet.

And it stood again, on floor and in the balconies, as the orchestra played the "Star Spangled Banner," prelude to its concert of the evening.

In the Naval Training Station Band, augmenting the orchestra in the final number, were three symphony men, incidentally, on leave to serve with the navy. They are Roger Voisin, trumpet player; Vinal Smith, trombone, and Paul Keaney, French horn.

The sale of tickets for the big event had been completed by yesterday morning. They were taken by men and women who bought war bonds ranging from $50 to $1000 or more. All the $100 and $50 bonds had been sold three weeks ago, in the first three days of the sale, it was stated. Everything else had gone by Wednesday night except eight tickets turned back by the army, and they were snapped up first thing yesterday.

And, finally, the orchestra last night played to good acoustic conditions, for a special job had been done on the big Garden for the occasion and no one, no matter what part of the huge auditorium they were seated, failed to hear well, it was announced afterward.



ROUND A MUSICAL CLOCK—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, adopts this circular formation for its first Boston Garden appearance under his baton. Almost $10,000,000 in Sixth War Loan bond sales was realized from the concert, last night.

Dec 15

13,500 HEAR SYMPHONY IN $10,000,000 CONCERT

By WILLIAM F. HOMER, Jr.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky changed platforms from Symphony Hall to the Boston Garden for the first time last night. There, a capacity 13,500 throng heard an inspiring Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

The gathering took pride in a new high of close to $10,000,000 in audience war bond buying patriotism. Every one seemed pleased.

The sponsoring Boston Retail Trade Board and F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, who spoke briefly, were delighted at the Sixth War Loan bond total of $9,959,122 represented by the crowd.

The appreciative listeners heard a performance of symphony standard, with full complement of musicians, augmented in a martial second half by 33 musicians from U. S. Naval Training Station Band, Newport, R. I.

The orchestra played the following program:

Overture to "Egmont," Op. 54 . . Beethoven
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67
Beethoven
"Pomp and Circumstance" . . . . Elgar
"Lorraine" . . . . Ganne
"Dubinushka," Russian Folk Song, Op. 62
Rimsky-Korsakov
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March, Sousa
Ouverture Solennelel, "1812," Op. 49
Tchaikovsky

For his Garden bow, Dr. Koussevitzky deserted the traditional Symphony Hall alignment of his men. For his musicians, he adopted a modified pie chart formation, and conducted from its outer crust. Percussion was directly opposite on the outer rim of the foot-high circular raised stand. Harpsichord was on the conductor's extreme right, bass on his left. Brasses and woodwinds ranged forward in the circle to strings on either side of the baton.

Acoustically, the formation worked out well. Throughout the Beethoven half of the two hour program, tones and nuances were sustained, marred by no echoings in the cavernous hall.

The march sequence, the selections a graceful gesture to four of the large Allied nations, changed audience reaction from polite enthusiasm to applause for robust old friends. The lilting, then powerfully demanding "Dubinushka" made pleasing contrast to the militant tempo of the second half of the evening.

The Beethoven was well done, particularly the second movement of the symphony, soothing the defiance and triumph of the other three allegros. In this andante, the acoustics really passed their test. From the floor, only the stemwinding Sousa march produced any clash in overtones.

For the almost saintly opening and battle-like development of the "1812," the Navy band was available to augment the Symphony. At least three of the sailors took particular pains with their brasses. From Newport, Roger Voisin, trumpet; Vinal Smith, trombone, and Paul Keaney, French horn, are peacetime members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Navy band played for a pre-concert parade of women in all the armed services, who lined both sides of the rink's straightaway. About 500 were represented from the WAC, WAVES, SPARS, women Marines and cadet nurses.

Fifteen years ago critics scoffed indulgently at Dr. Koussevitzky's fondness for "Festivals." His festivals, however, had an uncommon knack of being timely: Beethoven's death centenary in 1927, Brahms' birth centenary in 1933 and Bach ad libitum. Also the music of these festivals was magnificent. But in addition to this the conductor has an uncanny sense for the timeliness of certain kinds of music, like Bach's "Magnificat" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He now employs his talent for festivals in a public event which reveals the Boston Symphony Orchestra as at one and the same time an instrument of fine art and of civic usefulness, belonging not alone to this city or this region but to the American people.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 15 1944

Symphony Concert Means $9,959,122 to Boston Bond Sellers

Boston, Dec. 15.—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give its 6th War Loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5000 for two tickets.

LACONIA, N. H.
CITIZEN

DEC 15 1944

OFFERED $5,000 FOR TWO TICKETS

BOSTON, Dec. 15—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give ~~its Sixth War Loan symphony~~ concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

DEC 15 1944

Nearly $10 Million In War Bonds Sold At War Loan Symphony

BOSTON-(AP)-A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Sym- [illegible] give its [illegible] Loan [illegible] concert in Boston Garden last [illegible].

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

DEC 15 1944

Symphony Fans Buy $9,959,122 in Bonds

BOSTON, Dec. 15, (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston symphony orchestra give its sixth [illegible] symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the U. S. Treasury department.

Retail Trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts war finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 15 1944

Pay Nearly 10 Million for Band Concert

Boston, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give its ~~Sixth War~~ loan symphony concert in Boston [illegible]

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5000 for two tickets

---

Globe Dec 14

BOTH WORLDS

The Quakers thought of it first. Their motive was religious principle, but its result was unexpectedly lucrative. They had decided that strict honesty required them to charge one and the same price for a given article to every customer. Previously customers had been charged according to their supposed ability to pay. This arrangement was so convenient that in no time the Quakers were getting all the business. "It seems hardly fair," added my informant, "that the Quakers should have had so much the best of both worlds!"

They are being run a close second by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For a trifling matter of six decades, that musical instrument has existed primarily for the sake of quality. Quality costs money and unless sold in sufficient quantity the annual deficit must be paid by persons who likewise value quality for its own sake. Then finally comes the day when quality begets quantity.

Tonight in the Boston Garden the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert before 14,000 people, the largest audience this Orchestra has ever appeared before in the flesh. The concert is for the 6th War Loan and is sponsored by the United States Treasury and the Retail Trade Board of Boston, who dispensed the tickets in their stores to purchasers of War Bonds. The "gate" is by far the largest amount ever taken at the Boston Garden and one of the biggest sums ever received for an indoor event in this country, being about $7,000,000.

The Orchestra, which was playing in Chicago last Friday and Sunday, and broadcast from its Saturday night concert in Milwaukee—at all three of which performances it won tremendous applause and earned golden opinions—hustled home from a concert at Ann Arbor, Michigan, in order to be on hand tonight when its services are of course contributed free; and Dr. Koussevitzky has interrupted his December vacation week to conduct this concert, his Orchestra being augmented by the United States Naval Training Station Band from Newport, Rhode Island.

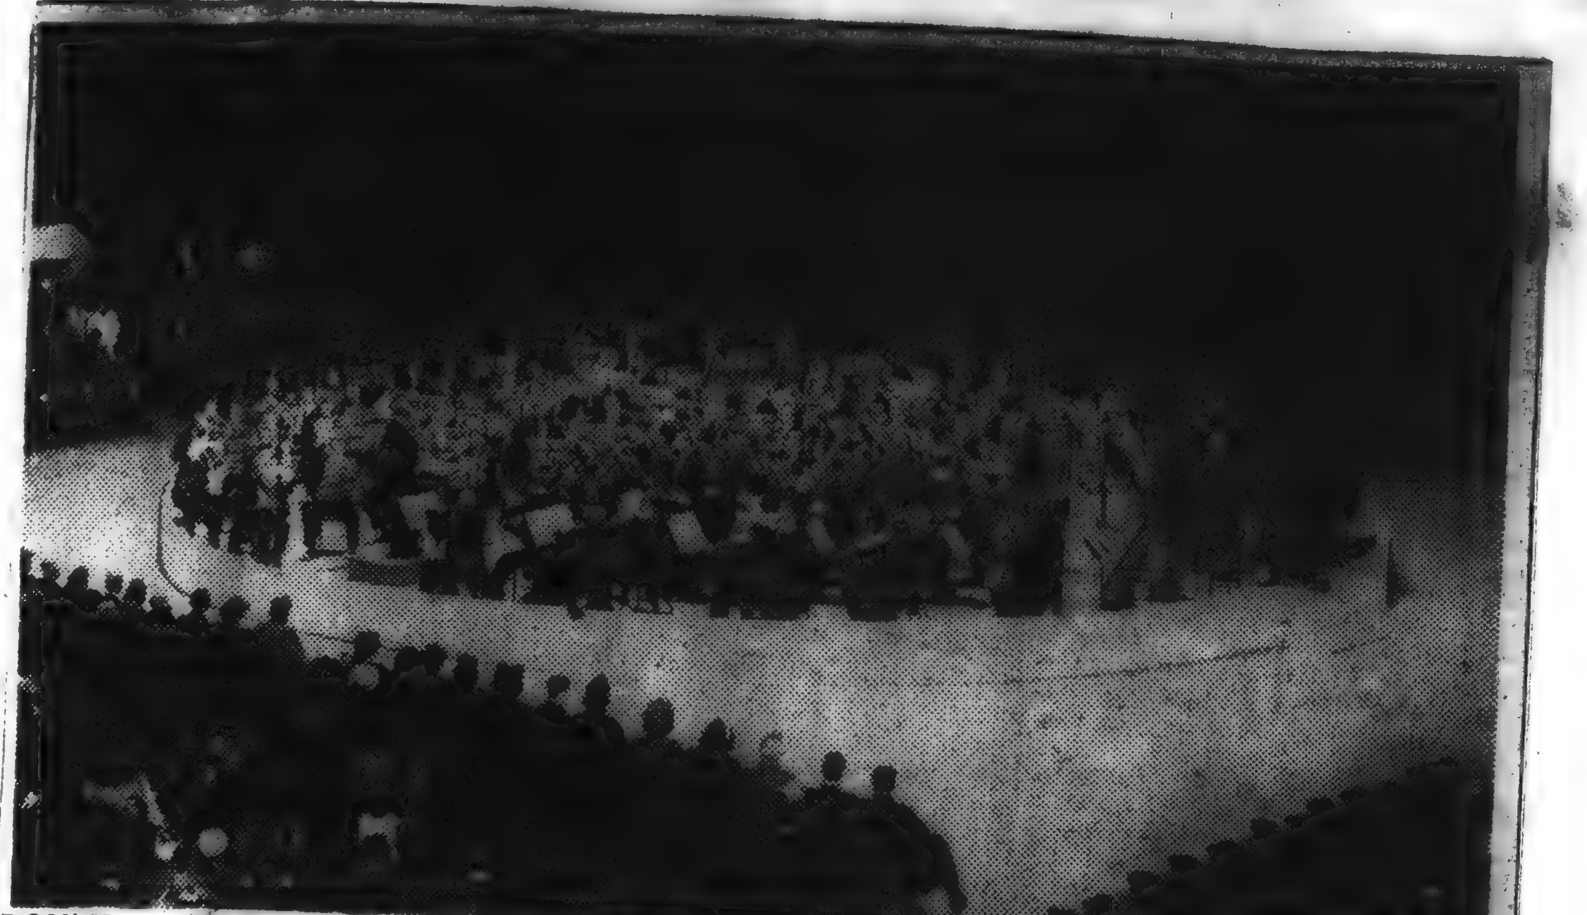
His program is a model. We begin with Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, revolutionary music for a drama of European revolution; we follow this with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, whose opening notes have been adopted by the Allies as their Victory theme. This is generous measure for the first half of the program; for the second, come three rousing marches, one by an American named Sousa, another by an Englishman named Elgar, a third by a Frenchman named Ganne; then for a middle and end, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Dubinushka," a folk song of the Russian revolution of 1905, and Tchaikowsky's Overture "1812," which celebrates the defeat of Napoleon before Moscow, an event which since 1942 the Western World has been privileged to watch on a somewhat magnified scale. Tchaikowsky's "1812" is a hair-raiser of a piece and for its finale Koussevitzky has asked for all the bells they can assemble.

This performance may be expected to raise the 14,000 listeners right out of their sole leather. But like the Quakers', it is at the same time based on principle: the music, while popular, is also classic and the performance, while blood-warming, will not for one instant cease to be fine art. Here is an Ivory Tower whose doors are thrown wide open to the public. Ivory Towers have an insidious effect on people who never thought they would care for them; once in, there comes an overwhelming desire to repeat the experience.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

The rare discipline of the ensemble and its smooth, fluid sound added tonal beauty to the whole. An extraordinary rappaport between Mr. Koussevitsky and his men makes it possible to concentrate every atom of energy on getting at the core of the music.—The Post.

All right, Rappaport, come out from behind that podium!



ROUND A MUSICAL CLOCK—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, adopts this circular formation for its first Boston Garden appearance under his baton. Almost $10,000,000 in Sixth War Loan bond sales was realized from the concert, last night.

Herald Dec 15

13,500 HEAR SYMPHONY IN $10,000,000 CONCERT

By WILLIAM F. HOMER, Jr.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky changed platforms from Symphony Hall to the Boston Garden for the first time last night. There, a capacity 13,500 throng heard an inspiring Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

The gathering took pride in a new high of close to $10,000,000 in audience war bond buying patriotism. Every one seemed pleased.

The sponsoring Boston Retail Trade Board and F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, who spoke briefly, were delighted at the Sixth War Loan bond total of $9,959,122 represented by the crowd.

The appreciative listeners heard a performance of symphony standard, with full complement of musicians, augmented in a martial second half by 33 musicians from U. S. Naval Training Station Band, Newport, R. I.

The orchestra played the following program:

Overture to "Egmont," Op. 54 . . Beethoven
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67
Beethoven
"Pomp and Circumstance" . . . . Elgar
"Lorraine" . . . . Ganne
"Dubinushka," Russian Folk Song, Op. 62
Rimsky-Korsakov
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March, Sousa
Ouverture Solennelel, "1812," Op. 49
Tchaikovsky

For his Garden bow, Dr. Koussevitzky deserted the traditional Symphony Hall alignment of his men. For his musicians, he adopted a modified pie chart formation, and conducted from its outer crust. Percussion was directly opposite on the outer rim of the foot-high circular raised stand. Harpsichord was on the conductor's extreme right, bass on his left. Brasses and woodwinds ranged forward in the circle to strings on either side of the baton.

Acoustically, the formation worked out well. Throughout the Beethoven half of the two hour program, tones and nuances were sustained, marred by no echoings in the cavernous hall.

The march sequence, the selections a graceful gesture to four of the large Allied nations, changed audience reaction from polite enthusiasm to applause for robust old friends. The lilting, then powerfully demanding "Dubinushka" made pleasing contrast to the militant tempo of the second half of the evening.

The Beethoven was well done, particularly the second movement of the symphony, soothing the defiance and triumph of the other three allegros. In this andante, the acoustics really passed their test. From the floor, only the stem-winding Sousa march produced any clash in overtones.

For the almost saintly opening and battle-like development of the "1812," the Navy band was available to augment the Symphony. At least three of the sailors took particular pains with their brasses. From Newport, Roger Voisin, trumpet; Vinal Smith, trombone, and Paul Keaney, French horn, are peacetime members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Navy band played for a pre-concert parade of women in all the armed services, who lined both sides of the rink's straightaway. About 500 were represented from the WAC, WAVES, SPARS, women Marines and cadet nurses.

Fifteen years ago critics scoffed indulgently at Dr. Koussevitzky's fondness for "Festivals." His festivals, however, had an uncommon knack of being timely: Beethoven's death centenary in 1927, Brahms' birth centenary in 1933 and Bach ad libitum. Also the music of these festivals was magnificent. But in addition to this the conductor has an uncanny sense for the timeliness of certain kinds of music, like Bach's "Magnificat" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He now employs his talent for festivals in a public event which reveals the Boston Symphony Orchestra as at one and the same time an instrument of fine art and of civic usefulness, belonging not alone to this city or this region but to the American people.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 15 1944

Symphony Concert Means $9,959,122 to Boston Bond Sellers

Boston, Dec. 15.—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give its 6th War Loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in co-operation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5000 for two tickets.

LACONIA, N. H.
CITIZEN

DEC 15 1944

OFFERED $5,000 FOR TWO TICKETS

BOSTON, Dec. 15—(AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give its Sixth War Loan [illegible] concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in co-operation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

DEC 15 1944

Nearly $10 Million In War Bonds Sold At War Loan Symphony

BOSTON-(AP)-A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give [illegible] Loan swmphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in co-operation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

DEC 15 1944

Symphony Fans Buy $9,959,122 in Bonds

BOSTON, Dec. 15, (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston symphony orchestra give its sixth [illegible] symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in co-operation with the U. S. Treasury department.

Retail Trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts war finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 15 1944

Pay Nearly 10 Million for Band Concert

Boston, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give its [illegible] War loan symphony concert in Boston [illegible]

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade board, in co-operation with the United States Treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered [illegible]

Globe Dec 19

BOTH WORLDS

The Quakers thought of it first. Their motive was religious principle, but its result was unexpectedly lucrative. They had decided that strict honesty required them to charge one and the same price for a given article to every customer. Previously customers had been charged according to their supposed ability to pay. This arrangement was so convenient that in no time the Quakers were getting all the business. "It seems hardly fair," added my informant, "that the Quakers should have had so much the best of both worlds!"

They are being run a close second by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For a trifling matter of six decades, that musical instrument has existed primarily for the sake of quality. Quality costs money and unless sold in sufficient quantity the annual deficit must be paid by persons who likewise value quality for its own sake. Then finally comes the day when quality begets quantity.

Tonight in the Boston Garden the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert before 14,000 people, the largest audience this Orchestra has ever appeared before in the flesh. The concert is for the 6th War Loan and is sponsored by the United States Treasury and the Retail Trade Board of Boston, who dispensed the tickets in their stores to purchasers of War Bonds. The "gate" is by far the largest amount ever taken at the Boston Garden and one of the biggest sums ever received for an indoor event in this country, being about $7,000,000.

The Orchestra, which was playing in Chicago last Friday and Sunday, and broadcast from its Saturday night concert in Milwaukee—at all three of which performances it won tremendous applause and earned golden opinions—hustled home from a concert at Ann Arbor, Michigan, in order to be on hand tonight when its services are of course contributed free; and Dr. Koussevitzky has interrupted his December vacation week to conduct this concert, his Orchestra being augmented by the United States Naval Training Station Band from Newport, Rhode Island.

His program is a model. We begin with Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, revolutionary music for a drama of European revolution; we follow this with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, whose opening notes have been adopted by the Allies as their Victory theme. This is generous measure for the first half of the program; for the second, come three rousing marches, one by an American named Sousa, another by an Englishman named Elgar, a third by a Frenchman named Ganne; then for a middle and end, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Dubinushka," a folk song of the Russian revolution of 1905, and Tchaikowsky's Overture "1812," which celebrates the defeat of Napoleon before Moscow, an event which since 1942 the Western World has been privileged to watch on a somewhat magnified scale. Tchaikowsky's "1812" is a hair-raiser of a piece and for its finale Koussevitzky has asked for all the bells they can assemble.

This performance may be expected to raise the 14,000 listeners right out of their sole leather. But like the Quakers', it is at the same time based on principle: the music, while popular, is also classic and the performance, while blood-warming, will not for one instant cease to be fine art. Here is an Ivory Tower whose doors are thrown wide open to the public. Ivory Towers have an insidious effect on people who never thought they would care for them; once in, there comes an overwhelming desire to repeat the experience.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

DEC 16 1944

The rare discipline of the ensemble and its smooth, fluid sound added tonal beauty to the whole. An extraordinary rappaport between Mr. Koussevitzky and his men makes it possible to concentrate every atom of energy on getting at the core of the music.—The Post.

All right, Rappaport, come out from behind that podium!

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

DEC 15 1944

Pay 9 Million In War Bonds to Hear Symphony

Boston, Dec 15 (AP)—Capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give ~~its sixth war loan~~ symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade board, in co-operation with the United States Treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD

DEC 15 1944

13,500 PEOPLE ATTEND SYMPHONY CONCERT

BOSTON, Dec. 15—(AP)— A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston symphony orches~~tra give its sixth war loan sym~~phony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston retail trade board, in co-operation with the United States treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestras' distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the desistance groups of the united nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts war finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT

1:30 p. m. (WCFL): Dimitri Mitropoulos will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A Minor, better known as the "Scottish," and Morton Gould's "Spirituals."

9 p. m. (WMAQ): Screen star Linda Darnell will visit the Barry Wood-Patsy Kelly show.

9 p. m. (WGN): Kalman's gypsy operetta, "Sari," will be presented on the "Chicago Theater of the Air."

10:45 p. m. (WGN): The DePaul-Illinois basketball game will be broadcast from Chicago Stadium.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

DEC 15 1944

Bond Concert Take Is $9,959,122

BOSTON, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give ~~its 6th War Loan~~ symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board in co-operation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

12/15/44

CONCERT SETS BOND MARK

BOSTON, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give ~~its sixth War Loan~~ Symphony concert in Boston Garden Thursday night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

DEC 15 1944

9 Million Hub Bond Audience

BOSTON (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for War Bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give its Sixth War Loan Symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade board, in cooperation with the United States treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance commitee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5000 for two tickets.

FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL

DEC 15 1944

10 Million In Bonds Raised At Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give its Sixth War Loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in co-operation with the U. S. treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestra performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

DEC 15 1944

Symphony Gives War Bond Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give its Sixth War Loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

KEENE, N. H
SENTINEL

DEC 16 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WAR LOAN BENEFIT

Boston, Dec. 15, (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give its Sixth War Loan symphony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States treasury department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

ON MR. MITROPOULOS

~~Post Dec. 26~~ Post Dec

His Present Visit as Guest Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra Is a Pleasant One

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

WHEN Dimitri Mitropoulos first came to Boston as guest-conductor of the Symphony in the season of 1936-37 few people in this city, or indeed in this country, has heard of him. When he returned a year later he was at least known in Boston and Minneapolis, where he took over the post that he now holds, and in the meantime he has become nationally famous through his conducting of the New York Philharmonic and other orchestras, which means a large radio audience, and through the excellent recordings he has made with his own band. Those who picked him for a winner at the outset can harbor a certain feeling of satisfaction.

The brilliant Greek maestro came back to us last week, and in just one respect there was slight disappointment. Both of the symphonies which made up the greater part of his programme, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" and Rachmaninoff's Second, had been heard here fairly recently, though they are far from being everyday occurrences. We had looked to Mr. Mitropoulos to broaden our experience, and he will come nearer doing that this week. Mozart's "Magis Flute" Overture, the first item on his list, is standard stuff, of course. Ernst Krenek's Variations on the South Carolina folk song, "I Wonder as I Wander," is a new piece, Schubert's Second Symphony has hitherto escaped performance by our orchestra, though the now-defunct Peoples' Symphony played it, and Vaughan-Williams' "London" Symphony had not been heard at Symphony Hall since 1933 when Dr. Koussevitzky revived it four years ago under the prompting of the initial German blitz on the British capital.

* * *

Both the Williams Symphony, which, to point a moral, may be called a major work of a minor composer, and the little Symphony in B-flat, which Schubert wrote early in his 19th year and is, unarguably, a minor work of a major composer, are typical of the sort of freshening that all our programmes, orchestral and otherwise, badly need. To claim that once-important music may not in time become valueless is no less foolish than to assume that only those things which are currently played and sung are worth the doing. The core of the difficulty seems to be that those who determine upon our musical fare are inclined to concentrate on two classes of compositions; unique masterpieces and contemporary novelties. This leaves out an enormous amount of music which may be heard, both to pleasure and to profit.

Once in a while somebody does something about it, of course, but unfortunately, such adventurousness is generally in direct proportion to the obscurity of the adventurer. In other words, the big shots, whether conductors, singers or virtuosi, are inclined to play safe.

From Vladimir Dukelsky (alias Vernon Duke), composer-pianist, and Rose Dirman, soprano, New York has lately heard two programmes of overlooked songs, and regarding them Mr. Dukelsky-Duke, as quoted in the New York Times, had these wise words to say: "I have long been considering a society for producing fine music that was always neglected or that has been forgotten. We hear too much talk in America about 'master' things—'master music,' 'master classics,' 'master' this and that. Much fine music has thus been lost to the public because artists won't perform it, saying that it does not suit their voice, their style, or the taste of their public. It is such music that I want to produce—and to have published. These concerts, which will, if possible, be an annual feature and will be given in other cities also, will be a step in righting this bad situation and will serve to sound out the public's reaction to the idea. I, myself, am a composer, and I don't like the idea of my music being forgotten a few years after I am gone."

* * *

Mr. Mitropoulos also conducts the Symphony concert of next Sunday afternoon, repeating the "London" Symphony and adding to it a Chopin-Levitzky Suite and Falla's ballet suite, "The Three-Cornered Hat." On Wednesday afternoon Wheeler Beckett and his 70 Symphony men will play at the third Youth Concert a programme of music appropriate to the season, including the Prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite.

* * *

At Jordan Hall this afternoon Jan Smeterlin, pianist, will play music by Schumann, Brahms and his specialty, Chopin. On Wednesday evening the Boston chapter of France Forever will present Emile Baume, pianist; Lucas Foss, composer-pianist, and a group of Symphony musicians in a programme that follows the lines recommended above, and contains, among other things, little-known works by Mozart and Gounod.

MUSIC

Herald

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

Dec

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dmitri Mitropoulos conducting, gave the ninth program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in A minor "Scottish" Op. 56 .... Mendelssohn
"Spirituals" for String Choir and Orchestra .... Gould Symphony in E minor ...... Rachmaninoff

"Why, who makes much of miracles?
As for me, I know nothing else but miracles."

It happens to have been Walt Whitman speaking, but it could have been Dmitri Mitropoulos. His music making with the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon was a continuous miracle, a revelation, you might say; a glimpse at a musical world of strange tempestuous beauty, a world which is not better than the one we know, but which is different and startling and fascinating.

We are face to face, in Mitropoulos' case as in Koussevitzky's, with musical genius of the very first rank. They differ profoundly, it is true, on almost every point but their utter mastery of orchestral technic, and comparison is out of the question. Thus it can be no reproach to the man who has made our orchestra what it is to say that a "revelation" took place yesterday. On the contrary, it is a compliment that another man could step in and with but two rehearsals make so vivid an impression as Mr. Mitropoulos did.

Take the "Scottish" Symphony, for example. We are accustomed to hearing it in the most well-bred and elegant fashion (which is doubtless the way Mendelssohn intended us to hear it). But Mr. Mitropoulos, evidently recalling that knuckle-end of England and the "sweep of its broad claymore" goes at the symphony as if it actually were Scottish through and through, and gad, if it doesn't sound so. In any case, it suddenly comes alive and you find yourself immersed in it, nor floating politely on top of it.

With the Rachmaninoff Symphony Mr. Mitropoulos' approach was more in line with our own conductor's, for both endow it with great romantic tension and both whip up its luscious outpourings almost beyond endurance. Yesterday it was stronger and wilder and somewhat rougher, but it was an overwhelmingly forceful reading well calculated to reduce its hearer to emotional rags and tatters.

Morton Gould's "Spirituals," in their first performance here, were delightful. It seems to me that Mr. Gould's music, although admittedly light in character, is more honestly "American" than anything Roy Harris ever committed to paper. There is nothing whatever pretentious or sententious or hollow; it is frankly and straightforwardly music of diversion, but it carries more weight behind its scintillating surface than 90 per cent. of the so-called "serious" music which is offered to us in the name of Abraham Lincoln or Carl Sandburg or Walt Whitman.

Moreover, Mr. Gould's command of the orchestra is perfectly incredible; the sonorities and the effects he achieves are extraordinarily brilliant. The orchestra, which really hasn't had a chance to work it out, wasn't quite comfortable in Mr. Gould's idiom, and the performance was not without flaw, but it must be complimented for doing as well as it did with the entire program.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

DEC 16 1944

Concert Sells Nearly Ten Million in Bonds

Boston, Dec. 15 (AP)—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra give its ~~sixth war loan sym~~phony concert in Boston Garden last night.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in cooperation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail Trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever raised at a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, led his men through a musical program which paid tribute to the armed forces and the resistance groups of the United Nations.

F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, said that hundreds had been turned away from the concert, including one man who yesterday offered $5,000 for two tickets.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL

DEC 17 1944

Taxi Driver Inquires As To Bond Winner

BOSTON, Dec. 16 (AP)—The appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston Garden, where hockey players and boxers usually perform, was a little too much for at least one taxi driver.

As F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance Committee, emerged from the building and entered a cab after the War Bond concert, the driver asked: "Who won?"

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 17 1944

Taxi Driver Confuses Symphony And Fight

Boston, Dec. 16—(AP)—The appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday night in Boston Garden, where hockey players and boxers usually perform, was a little too much for at least one taxi driver.

As F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts war finance committee, emerged from the building and entered a cab after the war bond concert, the driver asked: "Who won?"

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

Boston Orchestra In Heroic Role At Hill Auditorium

By Carl Gehring

Heroic notes were struck last evening at Hill auditorium in the sixth concert of the Choral Union Series. Whether by intention or otherwise the Boston Symphony orchestra under the guiding genius of Serge Koussevitzky sounded a large[illegible] of hope and resolution for Americans who are bound to see [illegible] and soul-searing war to a triumphant conclusion. Contributing their respective parts to the [illegible] out of this design were the [illegible] of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat Major (Eroica) Op. 55; the supplication of William Howard Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War"; the essential [illegible] of the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's fanciful Opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," Op. 57 and the triumphant resolution of Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" March which, as encore, concluded the program.

One left this concert rejuvenated and better equipped to meet the [illegible] and uncertainties of the future. Music, utterly sustaining and a compensation without parallel for mankind in a maelstrom of torment, elevated and pointed the way to hope and a triumph of the spirit. In its way and heard at such a time this concert was a marvelous example of calculated effect. Musically, it comprised an adroit [illegible] of program planning. From the larger psychological standpoint, it was perfect as a tonic and a spur for renewed effort in the prosecution of a bitter war.

Orchestra In New Role

The Boston orchestra, well known here as one of the finest in the world, scarcely could add to its laurels on the basis of orchestral playing alone. Accordingly, it essayed a new role, that of a concert band, in a hair-raising performance of an arrangement of Sousa's March. Here, of course, the brasses were outstanding, resounding with such power and resonance, with quality undiminished, as would have done credit to the late John Philip Sousa's band at its best. Even so, the shadings in so rugged an opus were smooth and lustrous, the strings and woodwinds in the quieter passages having all of the finish which characterized their work in the strictly orchestral numbers.

In these selections, Koussevitzky revealed that largeness of address and catholicity of taste which identify the greatest artists. Leading off with a titanic interpretation of the "Eroica" Symphony, the conductor added his own cosmopolitan touch to the universality of Beethoven's music in a performance which transported his hearers and carried all before it. His articulation of the long and learned first movement was utterly lucid and moving; the building up of the Funeral March to its climax a masterpiece of attaining an objective; the contrast between the fitful Scherzo and the sedate Trio beautifully wrought; the finale, a theme and variations, finely evolved and built into an imposing musical structure.

Modern American Work

Koussevitzky's predilection for modern American music, shown by his espousal of several national composers, was emphasized in his sympathetic handling of Schuman's impressive "Prayer in Time of War." This work, more modest in design than the Third Symphony which we heard several years ago and not so involved in its working out, is an interesting study in gradation which opens with slender and sinister intonations in the lower registers and builds into climactic material. The idiom of the "Prayer," quite modern, nevertheless does not emphasize the intellectual approach to the detriment of expressiveness which we recall as being the case in the Third Symphony. Both works warrant rehearings, however, for a fuller appreciation of their value, and we herewith speak for more Schuman.

"Tsar Saltan," entirely characteristic of Rimsky-Korsakoff's zest for color and piquant effects, offered brilliant examples of orchestral acrobatics which the Boston musicians manipulated with great elan. Outstanding was the familiar "Flight of the Bumble Bee," the theme of which was tossed from strings to woodwinds and back again with the last word in orchestral ping. The brasses, too, were noteworthy, with several arresting fanfares and some beautiful playing in the French horns. These instruments, incidentally, also did noble work in the demanding Trio of the third movement in Beethoven's "Eroica," adding one more feature to a stupendous musical evening.

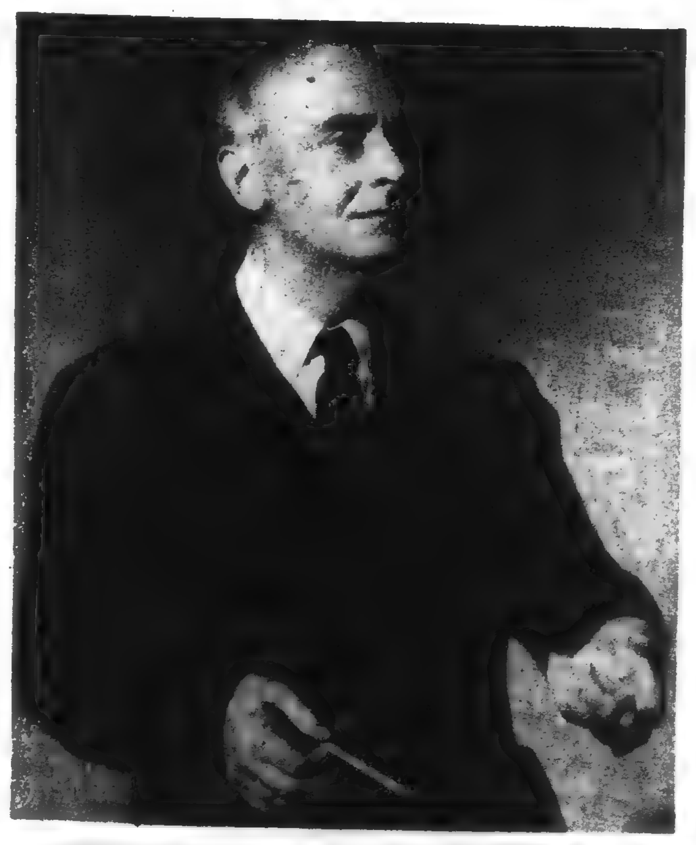
Hudson N.Y. Daily Star
DEC 19 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY RAISES 10 MILLION BY BOND CONCERT

BOSTON, Dec. 18—A capacity audience of 13,500 people paid $9,959,122 for war bonds to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra give its Sixth War Loan symphony concert in Boston Garden.

The event was sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, in co-operation with the United States Treasury Department.

Retail trade officials said the figure was the largest amount ever to be raised by a single indoor orchestral performance in this country.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston Garden, Thursday evening, in the interests of the 6th War Loan. Tickets to this War Bond Symphony concert are issued free to buyers of War Bonds in Boston retail stores.
Herald Dec 16 (Alfredo Valente)

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
DEC 17 1944

Genius of Koussevitzky Recorded by Orchestra

By FREDERICK KOUNTZ

WHEREVER a symphony orchestra plays there is always more comment about the conducting than there is about the playing of the orchestra. The fact which apparently is never remembered is simply this: In concert only the orchestra speaks. The conductor's big job must be done some time before the orchestra appears publicly.

When the Boston orchestra was in Toledo I had the great pleasure of listening to Mr. Koussevitzky talk about his orchestra. What he had to say was extremely interesting. Inferentially he was talking more about what a conductor has to do with an orchestra than about the group itself. He might have, although he did not, set himself as a model.

The first task of the conductor is not conducting. Rather it is the picking and training of the orchestra. In addition the man who begins the work must stay with it. He must obtain and keep as much power over the group as is possible. If he is physically and mentally capable of carrying the whole load, he must have no guest conductors at all. He must know the orchestra and the orchestra must know him thoroughly.

The case of the New York orchestra of a few years ago is a splendid example of the manner in which a very capable organization can deteriorate under a variety of leaders. The players in that ensemble are expert. And there have been few changes in personnel over a long period. But there were too many conductors of varying degrees of ability. There were too many differing ideas in these conductors of the work they had to do with the orchestra. The results were all bad. Through 20 years or more the Boston Orchestra has had a minimum of guest conductors. It has reached and remained in its present excellent state simply because it has been ruled almost entirely by one extremely able man.

Expert Conductor

The expert conductor does not merely raise the standards of his own group. In pre-war times orchestras travelled extensively. Radio and recordings have brought orchestral music to thousands of people who had scarcely known it existed. And I think fortunately, the orchestra business is highly competitive. It would be folly to deny that Mr. Koussevitzky has in large measure been responsible for the higher orchestral standards throughout the country. He has kept his own orchestra on a high plane. The others have had to follow. We should appreciate constantly the fact that he by the excellence of his work, has done more than anyone else to assure the death of the star conductor system to which I referred in the case of the New York orchestra.

A composer whose music is never played is helpless. He can give nothing because none can hear what he has to give. The task of presenting new music to public judgment is wholy on the playing organizations. It is only necessary to read the programs of the Boston orchestra, to recognize what Mr. Koussevitzky has done in this regard. Whether all the new works he has played have been worthy is beside the point. What is important is that he has given many composers a chance to be heard. In the measure that he has performed new music he has made possible the continued broadening of musical thought.

Raises Standards

The influence of a conductor on the musical world should have some permanence. When he has left off active conducting he should have given to the world something of lasting value. As I have said Mr. Koussevitzky has already done a great deal toward raising orchestral playing standards. He has given a large number of young composers a chance to be heard. But he will leave us something more. There are recordings by the Boston orchestra which are masterpieces. We can expect to enjoy them as long as we live. And there is The Berkshire School. The ideas behind his work in the Berkshires have been widely publicized. If they can be realized in the years after the war, they will be a continuous livening influence on music throughout the world.

I have said that Mr. Koussevitzky did not set himself up as a model I have tried to explain how he has become a model for conductors almost entirely by doing, scarcely ever by talking.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES
16 1944

SYMPHONY CONFUSES CABBY.

As Crowd Leaves Boston Garden He Asks Who Won.

BOSTON, Dec. 15.(AP)—The appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in Boston Garden, where hockey players and boxers usually perform, was a little too much for at least one taxi driver.

As F. W. Denio, chairman of the Massachusetts War Finance committee, emerged from the building and entered a cab after the war bond concert, the driver asked: "Who won?"

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 17 1944

on the Aisle

by Claudia Cassidy

How Times—and Orchestras—Change in Five Years

HOW times change! Back in 1939, when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra appeared in Auditorium concert, our own Chicago Symphony orchestra with Frederick Stock appeared the next night at Orchestra hall, and it was not outclassed. Mr. Stock had Fritz Kreisler for the Beethoven Concerto, and he gave Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony what my scrapbook calls "a towering performance marked by great beauty of tone and the long, reanimated line of splendor that gives the symphony its chief claim to greatness."

Nor was that all. It seems I went right on, like this, "There has been so much talk about the relative superiority of orchestras lately that I must get in my two cents worth. Take it week in and week out, 28 weeks a season, I wouldn't trade Mr. Stock and the Chicago Symphony orchestra for any other conductor and orchestra it has been my privilege to hear."

But that was in 1939. This season, when Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra returned for those two unforgettable concerts, both times and orchestras had changed. Where our orchestra has deteriorated, Boston's has reached a dazzling state of perfection which certain pessimistic prophets seem to consider as impermanent as the glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome. Be that as it may, it exists right now, and when I heard Boston's orchestra by comparison with ours, I felt like emulating Bing Crosby in the days when he spent his jukebox riches on the sport of kings. Bing, you may remember, was pretty sad about his stable of also rans. So he hung up a picture of Whirlaway where his horses could see it, and underneath that picture he wrote, not without a trace of wistfulness, "See what I mean?"

But derogatory comparisons are odious, you may tell me, and so am I. That man who says he is Mr. Morton may telephone again and warn me if they can't stop me one way they will another. Who "they" are I don't know, and I don't even know Mr. Morton, assuming that is his right name. Right or otherwise, it tempts me almost beyond resistance to quote the Ashton Stevens' paraphrase, "He never talks but he bores."

But even tho I couldn't do that, I can quote the charming lady who sat near me the night Koussevitzky played that magnificent "Eroica" at Orchestra hall. One of our orchestra's better friends, financially and otherwise for many a year, she was a little upset at hearing Beethoven's Third Symphony twice in one day, because as you know, Désiré Defauw had conducted it with the Chicago Symphony that very afternoon. She said she was tired of Beethoven, that it was played too much, that people didn't keep on reading Dickens, and that she would like a change. But that was before the performance. Afterward? Why afterward she smiled ruefully and admitted gently, "It seems I just hadn't heard the 'Eroica' in quite a long time."

Monitor

London Music Conducted By Mitropoulos

Dec 23

Of greater consequence than a couple of items introduced into the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon under the guest conductorship of Dimitri Mitropoulos, was the four-movement study by Vaughan Williams bearing title of A London Symphony. Written back in a time when the awakening of cities from sleep, advancing into the business of the day and at length quieting down again, had a peculiar appeal to the imagination of the musical public, the work was taken in the 20's as something on the tone-poem order, and something representative of painting in sound.

A pictorial notion of the sort may be as valid at present as formerly with many listeners, and no harm if that is so. But just the same, this effort of a British composer who goes, like César Franck, by his whole name, stands a symphony of completely classic outline; and under the leading of such a zealous interpreter as Dr. Mitropoulos it proves its right to a place among masterworks. Attention-holding from first note to last because of its logical construction, and agreeable to listen to because of its skillfully manipulated and varied sonorities, it seems landed in the orchestral library to stay.

Somehow the great sweeping passages in any symphony are taken for granted. They belong there, so why stop to think about them? Contrarily, details carry the quality of originality and give an instrumental cycle its stamp. Take the solo for the alto voice of the viola in the slow movement of A London Symphony. True enough, it is a strain of but a phrase or two—"plangent," "nostalgic," any of the good old adjectives answer for description—the little air is softly announced and a couple of times quietly repeated. Not much, but enough; and it is what we leave the hall with.

The Symphony closed the day and was a program by itself. Earlier proceedings brought to notice a brilliant exercise of conducting and playing in the Overture to "The Magic Flute," by Mozart. Exciting pauses in the brief episode for brasses half way through; the count of beats electrically precise. Then, a novelty for the Symphony Concerts, Variations on a North Carolina Folk Song, "I Wonder as I Wander," op. 94, by Ernst Křenek (composer in attendance and appearing on the platform to bow to applause). The man who can write such a beautiful and appropriate solo passage for trumpet as Mr. Křenek provides in one of the Variations deserves admission to the big company without election. Composers rarely do what he achieves here, though no telling how much he was assisted by the Boston Symphony's first trumpet. The effect was something to call the composition back for another turn some day.

A second novelty was a resuscitation—Schubert's Symphony No. 2 in B flat major. The house had causes to thank Dr. Mitropoulos for rehearsing the piece for Bostonians. Plenty of Schubertian charm about it; a string of song pearls; the composer of the Symphony in C and the "Unfinished" Symphony making up his mind about something. W. P. T.

Dmitri Mitropoulos, or A Mighty Man Is He

Herald - Dec. 11
17

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Dmitri Mitropoulos comes to his [illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible] old gray flannel trous[illegible] a shirt open at the neck and an [illegible] He weaves his [illegible] the conductor's stand in his [illegible] bouncing gait, jumps up on [illegible] and waves for attention. [illegible] and silence descends over [illegible] as he does so. "Gen[illegible]" he says, "we will begin at [illegible]

[illegible] turns to "M" but Mr. [illegible] who has no score be[illegible]. A good many conductors [illegible] do not use scores during [illegible] but so prodigious is Mr. [illegible] memory he doesn't [illegible] at rehearsals, even to [illegible] point of notation [illegible]. He discovered [illegible] errors, they say, in [illegible] used by the Boston Sym[illegible] Mendelssohn's "Scottish" [illegible]. He commits the scores [illegible] so completely to [illegible] as if he could see, in [illegible] the entire score in [illegible] details and, what [illegible] remarkable, he can [illegible] section of it in an in[illegible] his hand over his [illegible]

[illegible] musicians a couple of [illegible] find their places, Mr. [illegible] gathers himself to[illegible] stalking a deer, [illegible] humming the [illegible] music leading up to [illegible] he unleashes the most [illegible] force ever con[illegible] would seem in the body [illegible] being. From then un[illegible] the orchestra, which [illegible] ten bars or may be at [illegible] end, he is the per[illegible] of music itself.

"[illegible] me," he says to the musi[illegible] "I will give you everything." [illegible] means is that he will not [illegible] with his right hand while [illegible] phrases decorously with [illegible]. It means he will live every [illegible] personally direct the entrance [illegible] voice, shape and focus [illegible] phrase, build up every climax, [illegible] every rhythm and blend [illegible] music together in [illegible] concord—not with [illegible] or with his arms, but [illegible] himself. In short, it means he [illegible] simultaneously choreograph the [illegible] the four square feet which [illegible] conductor's stand, using every [illegible] his body from his shocking[illegible] head to his feet, and every[illegible] who sees him knows precisely [illegible] he means.

He certainly holds the standing high jump among conductors. I [illegible] I saw him spring four feet [illegible] up into the air without [illegible] his knees first and he is [illegible] the only man on earth [illegible] can give you the impression he [illegible] completely around with[illegible] moving his feet. The move[illegible] of his shoulders and his arms [illegible] incomparably expressive, while [illegible] crouch prior to driving home a [illegible] climax is not less than hair raising. [illegible] Mr. Mitropoulos conduct [illegible] one of the most astonish[illegible] demonstrations of physical vi[illegible] endurance and ingenuity it is [illegible] to imagine.

[illegible] established in his first [illegible] the general strategy of his [illegible] he goes over it in de[illegible] "A" he will say, "the vio[illegible] remember it is diminuendo. [illegible] C, okay: D—oh, at D [illegible] I must have more balance. [illegible] Let's do it, gentle[illegible] from six bars before D." And he picks it up as though the entire passage were scored out for him on a blackboard. All the while he talks and sings and stamps on the stand and claps his hands and exhorts ever greater brilliance from his musicians. It is a feat of memory and musicianship which all but staggers the veteran musicians before him, and he is held in awe by every one of them. Indeed, so warm and infectious is his personality, so genuine his friendliness and so sympathetic and unassuming his attitude that he is universally loved by the musicians who work under him. Yet his authority is complete and his rehearsals efficient and businesslike. There is no musical problem he does not master; he knows precisely what he wants and he knows how to get what he wants.

And so, while you can disagree with him profoundly from the viewpoint of esthetic or artistic approach (it is possible to build quite a case against his Blitzkrieg and Quivering Ganglion school of conducting) you cannot, to watch and hear him conduct a rehearsal, come away without the realization that here is one of the most honest, most overpowering and most sensational men of music of this or any generation. He is about as irresistible as Vesuvius' lava and, so to speak, just as hot.

KATINA PAXINOU, celebrated stage and screen actress, who plays the lead in "Sophie," the new comedy of present day American life, which starts a week's engagement Monday at the Plymouth.

CHRISTMAS MUSIC

Not to change the subject or anything, but may I point out four very attractive musical events taking place today which reflect the very finest in Christmas music? Handel's "Messiah" will be given tonight and tomorrow night in Symphony Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society; Melville Smith with chorus and orchestra is doing an exquisite program of seasonal music at the Mount Vernon Church; Carl McKinley and assisting artists are doing Bach's miraculous "Christmas Oratorio" at the Old South Church; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society are to sing a charming program of carols at the Gardner Museum, and Daniel Pinkham with orchestra and soloists are giving rare Christmas music at Christ Church, Cambridge.

Music and Democracy

Herald Dec 16

No thoughtful person could have looked down on the Boston Garden as Dr. Koussevitzky raised his baton Thursday night without sensing the hushed expectancy of the 13,500 who filled the great auditorium. And no one there could help being moved by the clear demonstration of mass enjoyment of music. The Symphony Orchestra, the Retail Trade Board and the Massachusetts War Finance Committee produced 13,500 banquets of happiness.

There is mounting evidence that the appeal of what we call, for want of a better term, "good music," is spreading through all classes. We see the rapt attention of the thousands who attend the Esplanade Concerts. The lecturers in the music courses of the University Extension attest to an increasingly intelligent interest. The sale of records grows "by leaps and bounds." And the radio, in its more classic manifestations, still gives more to Bach than to Offenbach.

This being so, is there not something we ought to do about it? Should not this hunger of the people receive full attention?

It is true that the Symphony even now reaches a considerable audience. In its 240 events last year (one every 38 hours), 875,000 were present, and the radio carried the concerts to several million besides. In addition a million records were sold. But if 13,500 could attend each concert, instead of the 2637 accommodated in Symphony Hall, the rich opportunity would be well appreciated. Of course, this is now only a dream, for the size of Symphony Hall and its acoustic qualities are in themselves important.

The Garden gave far better results than were expected. With the pie-shaped arrangement of the orchestra in the center two-thirds of the audience were as close to it, on the average, as the audiences are at the Symphony, and a light amplification aided the rest. The auditorium at Ann Arbor, seating 5000, the hall at Milwaukee holding 6500, the Chicago Opera House with 3400, and the Shed at Tanglewood with 6004 and as many more outside, all compare well in acoustical perfection with Symphony Hall. So it is quite possible to design a new building which would more nearly meet Boston's needs, without loss of quality. Is this a chart for a war memorial?

There is a question, too, whether there is not room here for a radio station which, like WQXR in New York, could give daylong programs of "good music." Certainly the Garden turnout proves there is a public for it.

Herald

MUSIC

Dec 28, 44

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, gave the 10th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The following program was given:

Overture to "The Majic Flute"....Mozart
Variations on "I Wonder as I Wander,"
Op. 94.........................Krenek
Symphony No. 2 in B flat Major..Schubert
A London Symphony...Vaughan Williams

In his variations on the Amcrican folksong "I Wonder as I Wander," Ernst Krenek has composed a remarkable piece of music. It—and Schubert's Second Symphony (in, of all things, its first performance in Boston)—were the especial delights of Mr. Mitropoulos' second tour of duty with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, while he himself remained perhaps the biggest news of all.

Mr. Krenek couldn't have come across a more uniquely American melody than the one he chose, nor could he have found one which more evocatively captures the naive poignancy of the lyrics themselves. It came from John Jacob Niles' collection of "Songs of the Hill-Folk," and in setting it in variation form in his own special idiom, which in this case is a development of but a departure from the 12-tone technic with which he has long been associated, Mr. Krenek has created a musical abstractions that seems to set every facet and mood of the melody and its lyrics in high relief.

Technically, as esthetically, it is an intellectual accomplishment of the first order. Mr. Krenek has all but liberated each voice of the orchstra of its dependence on the other voices (much as Bartok has in his Orchestral Concerto), and the result is an almost astral transparency of texture. There are moments of fine harmonic tension as the voices come into grating conflict with one another; there are moments of warm lyric emphasis and there are always exhilerating technical surprises. But most of all, it seems to convey the precise feeling of the song itself. It is, in short, a gem; a small one, but one nonetheless, and it won for its composer a most cordial reception on the stage.

The Schubert Symphony offered an amazing contrast in orchestral texture. After the Krenek its first movement seemed actually turgid, even awkward, but in it, as in all four of its movements, there shone through the incomparable lyric grace and the spontaneity which is Schubert. It is indeed a youthful work, but as Mr. Burk points out in his particularly interesting notes on the work in the program, by no means the work of a novice. Mr. Mitropoulos' touch here, as in everything else, was magical, and the performance of the andante must remain a monument to his flair for catching the inner spirit of the music he essays until he returns to us again.

The last time th eVaughan Williams Symphony was done here, London was taking it good and hard, and the music took on an emotional significance it doesn't prove to have when the feeling is one of nostalgia rather than symphony or compassion. It it good, yes, but it is sometimes tiresome. Yet the slow movement is really beautiful and there are passages of great eloquence throughout. So on the whole it must be said to have proved well worth the rehearing animated, as it was, by the conductor's ardor, and accomplished, as it was, by the orchestra's great virtuosity.

NOTES OR NO NOTES

Post
Dec. 23

In Music, It Seems to Make Some Difference, Mr. Smith Points Out

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A WHILE ago Dame Myra Hess, who might be called the Clara Schumann of our day, occasioned considerable comment by using her notes in a performance of Beethoven's Fifth or "Emperor" Piano Concerto that took place in London's Albert Hall. Some 112 years earlier the original Clara, then Clara Wieck and a highly gifted miss just entering upon her teens, disturbed the good people of her native Leipzig by playing without her notes, a "foreign" custom that she had picked up during her recent sojourn in Paris.

It was not until fairly late in the 19th century that this playing "by heart," that we now take quite for granted, became universal with pianists, whether in solo performance or when appearing with orchestra. Accompanists and performers in chamber music still use their notes, though departures from this custom are increasingly met with, particularly in song recitals. The advantages in playing from memory are obvious; you have only to watch the keyboard, you don't have to bother with turning pages or, as is more usual, enlisting the services of a page-turner, to the eye a distracting non-participant in the musical performance. The disadvantages are the initial burden of memorizing, more of a chore for some than for others, and the ever-present possibility that your memory will play you false.

Certain pianists, like the late Rafael Joseffy, are always afflicted with memory stage fright. That was the excuse offered when Ethel Leginska failed to materialize at a recital in New York's Carnegie Hall and made newspaper headlines all over the country. She made the headlines another time by reproving the hackers and snufflers. It was in Jordan Hall in January, 1925, and the victims of Boston's unsalubrious winter weather goaded her to the following outburst: "If you knew how difficult it is to memorize. A pianist is a human being, not a machine. We have no souffleur to help us if anything goes wrong. I must ask, I must insist, that these tactics stop immediately."

Today eyes still pop when a conductor gets along without a score, although Toscanini has never used one, even in the opera house. The custom was apparently started by Hans von Buelow, who is often quoted as saying that there were two kinds of conductors, those who had their heads in the score and those who had the score in their heads. Hans Richter also conducted from memory occasionally and so did Arthur Nikisch, who thereby stirred up adverse comment in his first season with the Boston Symphony, that of 1889-90. None of his successors have followed his example and the first guest to do so was Sir Thomas Beecham, at a pair of concerts in 1928. His example was followed eight and again nine years later by Dimtri Mitropoulos, whose remarkable memory has lately been the talk of the town. Those who attended rehearsals were even more impressed, since Dr. Mitropoulos knows every note, every expression mark and every rehearsal number or letter, as the case may be, and stops and starts the orchestra at will.

Toscanini's memory is of the photographic variety, and it is said that he has only to read a score over a few times to make it completely his own. Dr. Mitropoulos disclaims any such facility. He remarked the other day that what he has accomplished in this respect is the result of hard work alone and if he deserves credit for anything it is for his perseverance. The standard repertory he has already learned, and a half hour's study, will bring any item in it back to mind, so only the new pieces require extended study. Krenek's complicated variations on the North Carolina folk song, "I Wonder as I Wander," occupied him for a month, but now he has that piece down pat, as was amply proven week before last. There are those who claim that such effort in the case of new and possibly ephemeral music is just a waste of time. The Greek conductor feels differently. You may call it quixotism but you can hardly withhold your admiration for such an expenditure of time and energy in the pursuit of an ideal.

MUSIC

Globe Dec

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The second Friday appearance of Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos, during his present visit as guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was just as remarkable as his first. The concert at Symphony Hall yesterday was another marvel of eloquent interpretation and glorious tone. Everything was precise and eloquent, dominated by the emotional nature of the Greek artist, and brought into being by a command of music and of orchestra which is true genius.

As before, Dr. Mitropoulos conducted without a stick in his hand or a printed score before him. His memory is phenomenal; all is exact and planned, nothing left to a general knowledge of a score or dependent upon inspiration of the moment.

Four pieces made the program: the Overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute"; Ernst Krenek's Variations on a North Carolina Folksong, "I wonder as I Wander" (first time in Boston); the Second Symphony of Schubert, and the "London" Symphony by Vaughan Williams.

Dr. Mitropoulos did not reduce the number of strings for either Mozart or Schubert, yet his keen ear kept strings and woodwinds balanced, and not one detail was exaggerated. In "The Magic Flute" Overture fortes were real "Mozart fortes," and other dynamic shades were scaled accordingly.

There is no proof that the Schubert Second Symphony had ever been played in Boston before; certainly it was new to these concerts. The work is thoroughly charming and lyrical, beginning as pure Haydn and, as if to show the emergence of Schubert's own voice, becoming characteristically Schubertian as it progresses.

One would prefer to write of Mr. Krenek's Variations after not one but several hearings. Cast partly under the intellectual rigors of the 12-tone system, this is infinitely detailed music that cannot fully be absorbed at once. The dissonance is not fierce, nor is the idiom forbidding, however.

One's first (and perhaps unreliable) impression is of labored counterpoint that smothers melody, of a style that wanders far from the simplicity of the touching Carolina hymn tune, and of occasional touches of instrumental fantasy. Alban Berg managed to write expressively under the 12-tone system but, unless I am mistaken, the system generally has the effect of cramping imagination. There was cordial applause as Mr. Krenek appeared on the stage.

The pictorial qualities of the "London" Symphony were unmistakable in the superlative performance of Dr. Mitropoulos, who used the composer's last revision of the score, wherein the second half of the Westminster Chimes are heard from the harp at the end. Here, as in all that went before, the orchestra sounded rich and healthy.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, or, A Mighty Man Is He (2)

Herald Dec 24

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

[illegible] with Dimitri Mitropoulos [illegible] exhilarating experi[illegible] watching him rehearse [illegible] orchestra. He can't keep [illegible] you get the im[illegible] conducting the con[illegible] even though he is [illegible] with all the routine [illegible] reporters have to ask [illegible] "how do you like B[illegible] which he replies "it's [illegible], that he is as ab[illegible]—and you—as he [illegible] conducting a Mahler [illegible]. This is the best way [illegible] to make friends and influ[illegible] people, and the result is [illegible] is Mr. Mitropoulos' [illegible] nobody can withstand [illegible].

[illegible] glance his prominently [illegible] his severe jaw and [illegible] head framed monk-like [illegible] narrow fringe of graying hair, [illegible] him the austere appearance [illegible] image of an Egyptian king. But these forbidding qualities are an illusion, for at close range his [illegible] and you are disarmed [illegible] blueness of his eyes and [illegible] warmth and geniality of [illegible]. Seeing him walk [illegible] street bundled up in his [illegible] overcoat with his old [illegible] jammed over his eyes [illegible] mistake him for a [illegible] character from an Eric Ambler thriller, but the minute he [illegible] off and looks at you [illegible] personality begins to radiate like an electric sunbowl, and you [illegible] realize how it feels to be [illegible].

He will talk about anything you choose and prove, within seven seconds, that he knows more about the subject of your choice than you [illegible]. Of course, if you want to talk about the graphic arts, of Greece, [illegible] music, it is much the best thing [illegible] get him started and let him do the talking. You couldn't call his [illegible] Greek; it simply seems European and there are overtones of [illegible], German, Russian and English in it. His voice is soft and pleasant, and he modulates it very [illegible] in the fashion of those who know what they're talking about, like to hear themselves talk, recognize the fact that conversation is both a necessity and a grace, refrain from giving you the impression they're thinking of what to say while you're talking, and listen to what you say as if you were giving them instructions on how to make one million dollars in three minutes.

He loves to tell stories and he tells them charmingly, characterizing every episode and all the dialogue while adding frank and witty asides. He finds the greatest delight in the witticisms, the gayeties and the frivolities of music, yet his approach to serious music is sober, even humble. This quality of humility, indeed, pervades his character in every way, and he talks to waiters with the same warmth, the same friendliness and the same interest that he talks to university presidents. (I can't think of any more of a tribute to a man, either, than that he is beloved by waiters).

There is no point that I can see in setting forth a resume of what he did say. You couldn't do it justice outside a large brochure. But he did make one point which revealed one of the foundations of his musical stature. A conductor, he said (and I'll not try to reproduce his words), is a universal catalytic agency in music. He may have his personal tastes in music, obviously, and he may have his personal convictions and preferences. But he must bear his responsibility as the interpreter of all music, and he must range the widest possible extent of the repertoire to give all worthy music its chance and all composers their hour no matter how much he may dislike the music himself. And in giving this music, he must approach every composition for what it is, not what he would like it to be, in the fullest realization of its historical, its artistic, its esthetic position in time and space.

"To say that so and so does Mozart well but Schoenberg badly, or to say that so and so does Beethoven but fails with Wagner is—or at least in the ideal sense should be—impossible. It is perhaps too much to ask that one man integrate all the artistic forces of centuries of music and bring them forth in a perfect reading. But it is not too much to expect a conductor to study and work and study some more to find the secret to the music he is playing. Nor is it too much to ask him to present that music with the utmost love and devotion and conviction while he is on the conductor's stand.

"He is being paid in money and recognition or his work and he must give full value; he cannot conduct with reservations, for while he may be aware what he is doing is not good music and that others may realize this too, he must remember that if there are those in the audience who do like it, they must have it precisely as the composer intended them to have it. The conductor, thus, is servant, not master, and can be worthy only in direct ratio to his willingness to serve his master, which is music itself."

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

DEC 24 1944

Mitropoulos Hailed in East

THE following are excerpts from press reviews of Dimitri Mitropoulos' performances as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra:

RUDOLPH ELIE, JR., in Boston Herald: "We are face to face, in Mitropoulos' case as in Koussevitzky's, with musical genius of the very first rank. They differ profoundly, it is true, on almost every point except their utter mastery of orchestral technic, and comparison is out of the question.

"Thus it can be no reproach to the man who has made our orchestra to say that a 'revelation' took place yesterday. On the contrary, it is a compliment that another man could step in and with but two rehearsals make so vivid an impression as Mr. Mitropoulos did."

* * *

WARREN STOREY SMITH in Boston Post: "Mitropoulos conducted without score, playing freely and unhampered upon the band as though it were some mighty instrument, moulding the melodic line, modelling the orchestral tone, vitalizing the rhythm and missing not one iota of musical meaning or of musical effect."

CYRUS DURGIN in Boston Globe: "Everything about the concert was dynamic, for that is the nature of Mr. Mitropoulos. But this was dynamism without distortion and robust sounds that kept away from noise, apart from a stressing of the tympani in the 'Scottish' symphony.

"When Mr. Mitropoulos first appeared here in 1936, his profound artistry was immediately apparent; now, after an absence of nearly eight years, the outer surfaces of his talents seem to have been refined."

* * *

Mr. Elie, in describing one of Mitropoulos' rehearsals with the orchestra, wrote as follows: "Giving the musicians a couple of seconds to find their places, Mr. Mitropoulos gathers himself like a cougar stalking a deer and, passionately humming the melody, he unleashes the most amazing physical force ever contained (it would seem) in the body of a human being . . .

"'Watch me,' he says to the musicians, 'I will give you everything.' What this means is that he will not beat time with his right hand while moulding phrases decorously with his left. It means he will live every part, personally direct the entrance of every voice, shape and focus every phrase, build up every climax—not with his hands or with his arms, but with himself . . .

"He certainly holds the standing jump among conductors. I swear I saw him spring four feet straight up into the air without bending his knees first . . ."

Post Dec 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The only familiar item in this week's pair of Symphony Concerts, again conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, is Mozart's Overteure to "The Magic Flute," which yesterday received a most admirably proportioned performance. The next two numbers, one of them new, the other old, are being heard here for the first time. They are Ernst Krenek's Variations on the North Carolina Folk Song, "I Wonder as I Wander" and the Second Symphony of Schubert. The final piece, a semi-occasional visitor to Symphony Hall, is Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony."

"I have attempted," explains Mr. Krenek in the programme notes, "to unfold the feelings of tragic loneliness and passionate devotion by which the solitary wanderer 'under the sky' is animated." Sometimes this mood is tellingly expressed in the music. Elsewhere Mr. Krenek, by precept and practice an atonalist in the manner of Schoenberg, seems more concerned with the infinitely ingenious manipulations of his time. You can find the work fascinating, and, coming upon it unprepared you might find it perplexing. Yesterday's audience received it politely and the composer cordially, when the conductor escorted him to the platform.

The B-flat major Symphony, so belatedly brought to our attention, is a youthful creation, genuinely Schubertian only in the gay finale and, to a less degree, in the Minuet. The first two movements variously suggest Mozart and Haydn. But as a whole it is charming and it was no less delightfully performed. To Dr. Mitropoulos our thanks and gratitude.

A true cosmopolitan, the Greek conductor revealed the very soul of the "London" Symphony, itself an almost unbelievable felicitous picture of the great city. From the misty opening to the magical close, this is the music of London and of nowhere else. Perhaps if some helpful commentator had not called our attention to Bloomsbury, to the Strand of a Saturday night, and to other local and picturesque details, we would not hear all of these things in the music. Yet despite the composer's disinclination to avow a programme, they are both by intention and in fact. From a tonal standpoint the performance was often of great beauty, and at the end no one wished to be the first to break the spell.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR-JOURNAL

DEC 29 1944

'Dr. Mitropoulos' Returns From Boston to Conduct Home Concert

In Boston to conduct the famed Boston Symphony orchestra, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, became "Dr. Mitropoulos"—as is his right.

Critics and columnists took advantage of the fact the Minneapolis conductor has an honorary doctorate in music from the University of Minnesota and from two other educational institutions in the northwest.

Dr. Mitropoulos returned to his duties with the local orchestra for the concert tonight with the laconic statement: "They were very nice to me in Boston." He added merely that they had a lot of nice things for him to do, so many that "he got his only real relaxation in his music."

* * *

The fact is, he was "lionized" and made the guest of honor at a number of events. He was greeted too by critics as one of the most important figures in the world of music today and hailed as a "true genius." The enthusiasm went not only for his first concerts his initial week of conducting but grew even more marked with the second concerts last week.

Cyrus Durgin, critic for the Boston Globe, set the tone for the reviewers when he said:

"The second appearance of Dr. Dimitri Mitropoulos was just as remarkable as his first. The concert at Symphony hall yesterday was another marvel of eloquent interpretation and glorious tone. Everything was precise and eloquent, dominated by the emotional nature of the Greek artist, and brought into being by a command of music and of orchestra which is true genius."

Rudolf Elie, Jr., critic for the Boston Herald, declared: "Dr. Mitropoulos' touch here (the Schubert Second Symphony) as in everything else, was magical, and the performance of the andante must remain a monument to his flair for catching the inner spirit of the music he essays until he returns to us again."

For his homecoming concert in Northrop auditorium tonight, Mr. Mitropoulos has chosen this varied program:

Concerto for Orchestra in D major .... C. P. E. Bach
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
Symphony No. 5 ("Reformation Symphony"), in D minor, Op. 107 .... Mendelssohn
"Appalachian Mountains," an American Folk Rhapsody .... Charles Miller
Adagietto for Strings and Harp, from Symphony No. 5 .... Mahler
Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" .. Rimsky-Korsakow

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

[illegible] 5 1944

Music in the Air

Schubert's Second and Krenek Variations

By John Rosenfield

[illegible] Mozart's Magic Flute Overture and the Mozartean second [illegible] (B-Flat Major) by the 18-year-old Franz Schubert were [illegible] adorably by Dimitri Mitroupolos in his second concert [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Greek conductor [illegible] the rhythms and devised many an impish skirl for [illegible] winds. The Schu[illegible] its [illegible] vogue [illegible] in 1938. [illegible] conduc[illegible] with [illegible] tedly [illegible] that [illegible] south [illegible] and [illegible] in [illegible]. The [illegible] suffici[illegible] of all [illegible] on [illegible] a [illegible] fi[illegible] unbe[illegible] and [illegible] one [illegible] ever [illegible] phrased.

[illegible] as I [illegible] inspired [illegible] expatri[illegible] at [illegible] Paul. Mi[illegible] the res[illegible] neighboring [illegible]. The theme [illegible] trumpet solo, [illegible] dire rum[illegible]. The varia[illegible] represent [illegible] and gift for bi[illegible] characterization [illegible] Krenek is known.

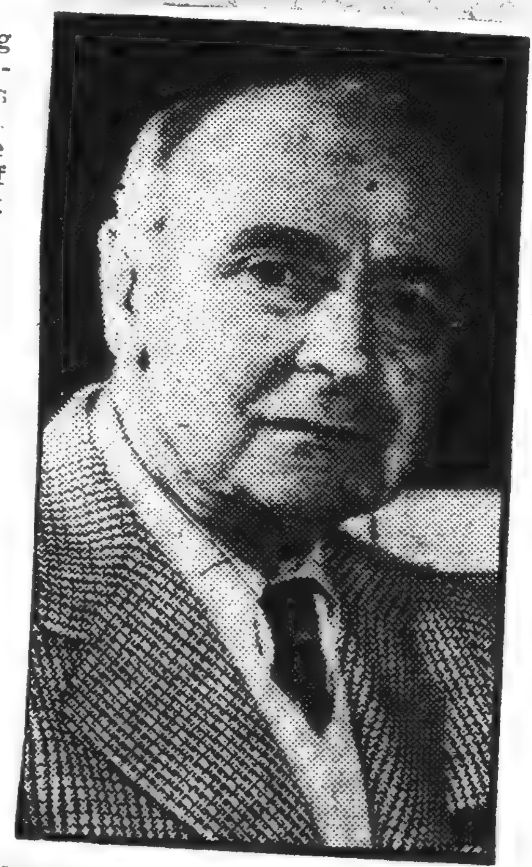
[illegible] apparently is no mer[illegible] tour de force by [illegible] competent and so[illegible] composers. Mr. Krenek [illegible] did Brahms [illegible], Eastern critics, however, insist on reading a program into the Krenek Variations, inasmuch as the theme is called a North Carolina folk song. They keep their ears open for the camp meeting and other sounds of hill-billy reverence. Since the work really coruscates in Middle European dissonance, the audience is disappointed. This state of mind comes, we think, from a misunderstanding. I Wonder as I Wander was found in the hills of North Carolina, but actually is traced to Tudor England. The curious modality is further proof; in fact, it is the chief musical interest. The point is that I Wonder as I Wander is a theme of great antiquity and is fair game for any sort of orchestral treatment. It is not indigenous to America's benighted Appalachians or even suggestive of Tobacco Road. The Krenek Variations, therefore, should be taken merely as concert music and relieved of nationalistic or sectional responsibilities.

About 5,000 Dallasites heard I Wonder as I Wander in its original form from Gladys Swarthout, when the mezzo-soprano [illegible] Dec. 14, for the War Loan Concert.

(WBAP Network through KGKO, 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. Saturday.)

ELKHART, IND.
TRUTH

DEC 28 1944



REGULARLY ON WTRC. With the Dec. 23 broadcast, the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (above), began its second year under the sponsorship of Allis-Chalmers, Milwaukee. The orchestra is heard on the Blue network and radio station WTRC at 7:30 p. m. each Saturday.

BRUNSWICK, GA.
NEWS

DEC 3[illegible]

"Who won?" asked a taxi driver after Koussevitsky and his symphony orchestra played in Boston's Sports Garden which ordinarily houses hockey games and hockey matches. It's a good question, and the answer may be, "Mendelssohn."

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

DEC 29 1944

PREVIEW By NORMAN C. HOUK

Mitropoulos Offers 'Premiere' Tonight

SOMETHING of the happiness of a family reunion will suffuse tonight's concert of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, with Dimitri Mitropoulos returning to the podium after his stay in the east as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The enraptured whoops and handsprings of the Boston music critics have renewed our appreciation of our good fortune in having Mitropoulos as conductor here, and with musical palates refreshed by three weeks of varied musical fare at Northrop auditorium, the second lap of the symphony season opens auspiciously indeed.

Herald

MUSIC

Dec. 30

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 11th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

"A Night on Bald Mountain" .... Moussorgsky
Concerto for Orchestra .... Bartok
Symphony No. 1 in C minor (Op. 68) .... Brahms

It is good to have Dr. Koussevitzky back, there's no denying it. There is a quality, a distinction, a lofty-minded propriety about his conducting which must be considered—as indeed it is—one of the most notable things in orchestral conducting today.

Yesterday all these qualities in addition to his fabled orchestral technic and the warm, rich texture of sound that only he seems quite able to command, were much in evidence throughout the program. The program itself, however, was notable chiefly for the second performance within the month of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

A combination of great simplicity and extreme contemporary complexity, the Concerto deserved if anything ever did the repeat performance. It is impossible to absorb so difficult a work at one hearing; even two hardly suffice to gauge the caliber of this exceptional composition. And if I am not gravely mistaken, even two hearings were not enough to convince yesterday's audience that Bartok has the slightest interest in diverting or reaching it through sensuous sounds and long-flowing melodies.

As a matter of fact, Bartok has no intention to create music of diversion or sensation. His Concerto is more popular, perhaps, than most of his music, but it is nonetheless at the very forefront of musical art; few if any of us are in a position to assay its emotional significance although its intellectual foundation may be perceived. One thing at least is clear; it is highly personal music of a most poetical nature, and its austere beauties are not displayed on its sleeve. So no one should be discouraged if he finds it hard going; Bartok is hard going, but those who are willing to stay with him find he speaks with singular effect.

The performance of the work yesterday was not short of miraculous. Last time its inordinate difficulties for the orchestra were evident and this created a certain tension or excitement in the performance that was not there yesterday when all the rough edges had been polished and all the technical difficulties mastered. This may have diminished to some extent the feeling of brilliance in the performance, but it liberated the music itself and revealed it to be even more intimate than it seemed first time around. No doubt about it, it is a masterwork, and certainly Bartok's masterpiece.

Brahms' First Symphony is a yearly event—and a sure-fire one at that—but Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" hadn't been done here since 1938, and it sounded fine in Dr. Koussevitzky's striking conception of it. The conductor was given a warm welcome on his return, and the orchestra, on its mettle, played splendidly all the way through.

Monitor

Koussevitzky With Bartók And Brahms

Dec. 30

"Symphony," as a technical term, wants wider definition than it has hitherto carried, to judge by two titles named on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon, one dating well back in the nineteenth century and the other of the present year. Brahms and Bartók are the composers concerned, the first being represented by his Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68, and the other by a work that does not catalogue as a symphony but nevertheless is one—Concerto for Orchestra.

It is the determination of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony conductor, returning this week after a fortnight out, that the town shall be kept up with the times orchestrally; and if composers' methods take on a change, he will keep his audiences informed about it. He brought the Bartók Concerto to its first hearing in Symphony Hall only four weeks ago; but that was scarcely more than a trial and a dress rehearsal of the piece. He had his players yesterday somewhere near in proper acquaintance with the music for a performance. Again, he had his listeners familiar enough with Bartók's procedures for a fair and considered judgment.

Now it can hardly be disputed that the Bartók Concerto (presented, along with Moussorgsky's "Bald Mountain," early in the afternoon) and the Brahms Symphony (presented late) belong to the same category of artistic creations. They are both orchestral cycles in four-movement form. The Concerto, true enough, runs on a five-movement design, but the third movement and the fourth, designated Elegy and Intermezzo, are practically one, on the so-called "slow" order. These external differences are of no consequence whatever. What makes the Concerto a novelty in form and structure is the handling of the melodies and the distribution of the moods. As for a Bartók melody, it is by no means the same thing as a Brahms theme, which is subjected to elaborate and patterned development. Nor is it allowed to dominate the situation longer than enough to convey a certain feeling, perhaps joyous, perhaps sad, or perhaps ruminative.

All sorts of moods are expressed, indeed, though never in a measured and blocked-off order. We do not settle down now for a period of sentiment and now for one of fun. Matters run lightly and gaily and without notice turn to melancholy and meditation; but more important than that, the whole work is an air and a refrain, stanzas and a burden, a succession of musical verse. Somewhat the same idea is carried out in the symphonic poem of Liszt and Strauss. But that always has a descriptive, narrative, or pictorial basis. The sound paints or portrays something. With Bartók, the sound simply maintains rhythm and metrical progress, all idea of specific word or illustration being left out.

The achievement of Dr. Koussevitzky in the interpretation of the Concerto was that he found, at this second showing, its unity and its over-all song. Some overtone, or whatever it be, holds through the music, binding all the notes together from first to last. He, as his task as conductor called him to do, found it and made it heard.

W. P. T.

Post Dec. 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT

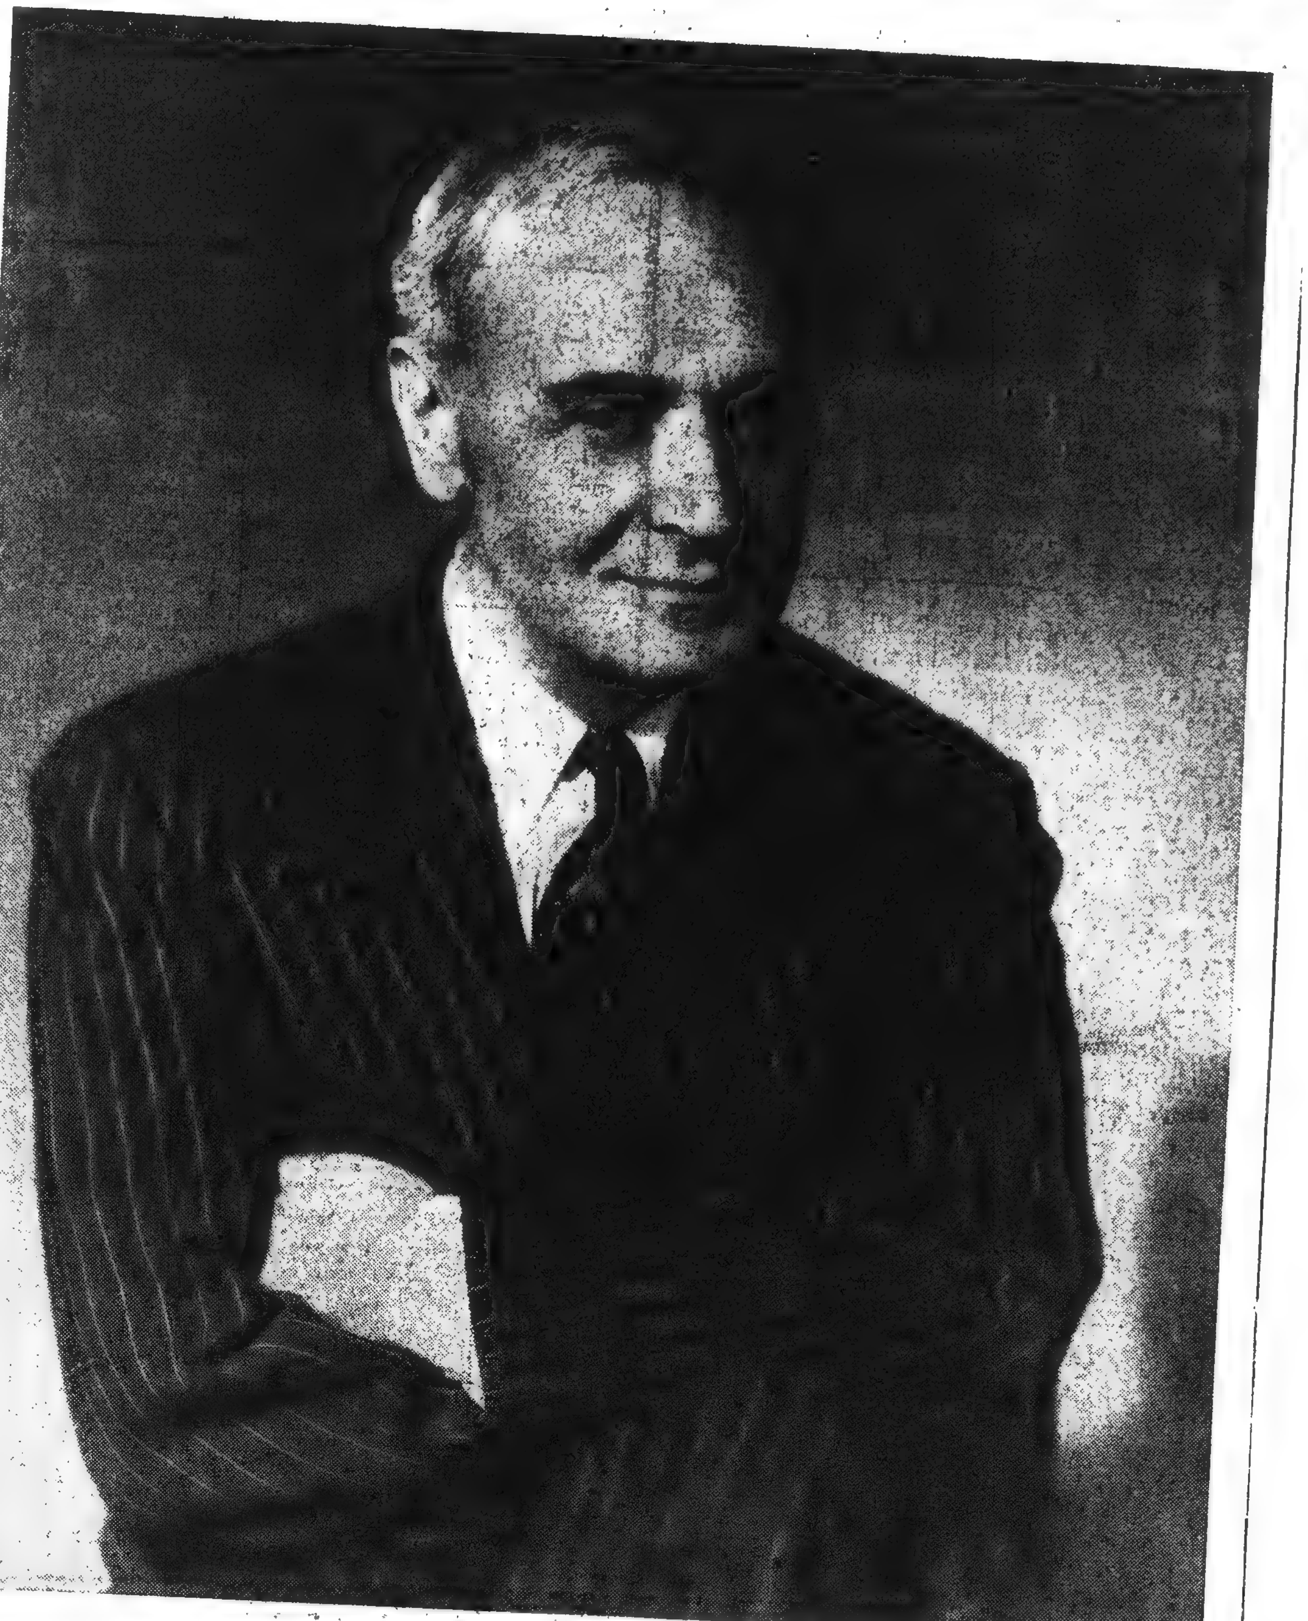
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Having been on a bit of a bender for two weeks, the Symphony Concerts have come home and settled down. For the 11th programme of the season Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, which had its world premiere at Symphony Hall four weeks ago, and that hardly perennial, Brahms' First Symphony.

For some reason Bartok's Concerto seemed a less striking, less exciting, even less important piece than it did before. Possibly yesterday's performance had less zip and zest to it than the original one. But there may be another explanation.

In Schoenberg's Variations and in this Concerto of Bartok we have lately heard two pieces from composers renowned for their uncompromising modernity that have shocked us by their relative conventionality. The initial surprise in finding Schoenberg straightforward instead of abstruse, and in discovering that Bartok can be romantic, light of touch and exhilarating might easily lead one into overvaluing the compositions in which these disclosures were made. A third hearing of Schoenberg brought only disappointment. There is much more to Bartok's piece, and whatever the individual reaction yesterday, it still seems a work entitled to a place in the regular repertory.

"A Night on Bald Mountain" which, like "Boris Godounov," cost Rimsky-Korsakov as much trouble as it did its composer, is a painful reminder that nothing in music ages as quickly as deviltry. The new shudders can always make the old ones sound tame. Compare Moussorgsky's diableries with those of Stravinsky and Prokofieff and you will get the point. Of course there is still the finale of "Don Giovanni" to refute this contention, but Mozart is above all the rules.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

International Musician

Serge Koussevitzky

Jan 1945

By Cecil Johns

(Fifteenth in a series of articles on the conductors of our great symphony orchestras.)

Conquering the insuperable is almost a daily occurrence for Serge Koussevitzky—and he has been at it for at least fifty-five of his seventy years. His first bout with the invincible came when as a lad of fourteen he ran away from his home in Tver with only three rubles in his pocket and made his way to Moscow. Once in Moscow he applied for a scholarship in conducting at the famous Moscow Conservatoire but was flatly refused, an ultimatum which served only to strengthen his determination. Making his way past the barricade of officials, he got into the director's study where he found that dignitary alone, playing the piano. The interview was brief but fruitful.

"What are you doing here? I am busy. Go away!" the director looked up without even interrupting his playing.

"You must let me study here."

"There are no vacancies. Go away!"

"I will study here", the young Serge was stamping and yelling.

The director stopped playing, came over to him and said, "All right, my boy, all right. Don't get excited. Come tomorrow morning and we shall see what we can do."

What they did was give Koussevitzky a scholarship, the only one open, which happened to be for that most cumbersome of instruments, the double-bass.

FATE MEETS HER MATCH

But again Koussevitzky chose to translate an obstacle into a stimulus. Accepting the scholarship avidly, he covered a five-year course in double-bass in five months, became leading double-bass at the Imperial Opera in Moscow, later teacher of double-bass in the very school that had all but rejected him and finally a virtuoso on the instrument, the greatest of his day. As such he concertized throughout Europe.

All this while he had by no means relinquished his determination to conduct. Opportunity for practice offered when Joachim put the Berlin Hochschule orchestra at his disposal. Then Fate made a truly lavish gesture. His future father-in-law—he was engaged to marry Natalie Oushkoff whom he had met several years before at one of his double-bass concerts—gave him as a wedding gift a symphony orchestra! This consisted of seventy-five musicians of Koussevitzky's own choosing. It goes without saying they were among the finest of Russia.

SYMPHONIC SAGA

Followed an episode which foreshadowed Koussevitzky's later zeal for music and musicians in America: he chartered a steamer and toured the Volga for 2,300 miles taking the best in symphonic fare to the Russian peasants. Thus musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns were treated to their first symphonic fare in concerts, held in their public squares or town halls, which presented works by Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Brahms and other of the "greats". Among these hard laboring, much bedevilled people his name became almost legendary, with mothers telling their children, as they would relate fairy tales, of the musical wonders in store for them when Spring broke the ice and made the river passable.

Serge Koussevitzky

(Continued from Page One)

After the Revolution, Koussevitzky, now a resident of Paris, founded his own orchestra once again and the "Concerts Koussevitzky" became for many a citizen of that metropolis the opening door for a vast world of Russian musical literature—Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Miaskovsky, Prokofieff, Stravinsky. Then, in 1924, came the invitation to become conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's achievements in the twenty years of his conductorship of the Boston ensemble are too numerous to describe in the course of this article. But one of his endeavors is of such significance that no sketch of his career, however brief, dare omit mention of it. That is his championship, consistent and forthright, zealous and persistent, of the American composer. Nor does his furtherance consist of mere word-of-mouth praise. Scores of American composers have Koussevitzky to thank for being launched on their careers. Premiere performance has been granted hundreds of compositions that never would have been written but for his encouragement. He does this, as he explains, because he has not only the individual composer's but all America's musical future at heart: "The ground for a great musical genius is prepared by hundreds of composers. The soil itself must consist of the national culture of the people. If we in American want to produce as great a genius as Beethoven, we must give to the great body of people the elements of musical education."

To honor this their protagonist, American composers tendered Dr. Koussevitzky a testimonial dinner on May 24, 1944, on the occasion of his completion of twenty years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No shining medals passed from hand to hand on this memorable evening; no resounding titles were bestowed. The testimonial, simple yet far more effective than these, consisted in a list of American compositions—printed on the dinner card in place of a menu—which Koussevitzky had made known to the public. One hundred and fifty compositions by Americans performed between that time and September, 1939, is no small amount, reckoned from any point of view, and when it is considered that sixty-three of these were performed by him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere the extent of his contribution to our national culture may be imagined. Dr. Koussevitzky had reason to be gratified by this demonstration of affection. For, besides being a token of the immense affection in which he is held by American musicians, it was proof that once again against great odds—America's own erstwhile indifference to her music, composers' inertia, lack of facilities—he nevertheless had accepted Fate's challenge and, after years of struggle, had won.

Herald Dec. 3

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 11th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

"A Night on Bald Mountain" .... Moussorgsky
Concerto for Orchestra .... Bartok
Symphony No. 1 in C minor (Op. 68) .... Brahms

It is good to have Dr. Koussevitzky back, there's no denying it. There is a quality, a distinction, a lofty-minded propriety about his conducting which must be considered—as indeed it is—one of the most notable things in orchestral conducting today.

Yesterday all these qualities in addition to his fabled orchestral technic and the warm, rich texture of sound that only he seems quite able to command, were much in evidence throughout the program. The program itself, however, was notable chiefly for the second performance within the month of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

A combination of great simplicity and extreme contemporary complexity, the Concerto deserved if anything ever did the repeat performance. It is impossible to absorb so difficult a work at one hearing; even two hardly suffice to gauge the caliber of this exceptional composition. And if I am not gravely mistaken, even two hearings were not enough to convince yesterday's audience that Bartok has the slightest interest in diverting or reaching it through sensuous sounds and long-flowing melodies.

As a matter of fact, Bartok has no intention to create music of diversion or sensation. His Concerto is more popular, perhaps, than most of his music, but it is nonetheless at the very forefront of musical art; few if any of us are in a position to assay its emotional significance although its intellectual foundation may be perceived. One thing at least is clear; it is highly personal music of a most poetical nature, and its austere beauties are not displayed on its sleeve. So no one should be discouraged if he finds it hard going; Bartok is hard going, but those who are willing to stay with him find he speaks with singular effect.

The performance of the work yesterday was not short of miraculous. Last time its inordinate difficulties for the orchestra were evident and this created a certain tension or excitement in the performance that was not there yesterday when all the rough edges had been polished and all the technical difficulties mastered. This may have diminished to some extent the feeling of brilliance in the performance, but it liberated the music itself and revealed it to be even more intimate than it seemed first time around. No doubt about it, it is a masterwork, and certainly Bartok's masterpiece.

Brahms' First Symphony is a yearly event—and a sure-fire one at that—but Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" hadn't been done here since 1938, and it sounded fine in Dr. Koussevitzky's striking conception of it. The conductor was given a warm welcome on his return, and the orchestra, on its mettle, played splendidly all the way through.

Monitor Dec. 30

Koussevitzky With Bartók And Brahms

"Symphony," as a technical term, wants wider definition than it has hitherto carried, to judge by two titles named on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon, one dating well back in the nineteenth century and the other of the present year. Brahms and Bartók are the composers concerned, the first being represented by his Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68, and the other by a work that does not catalogue as a symphony but nevertheless is one—Concerto for Orchestra.

It is the determination of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony conductor, returning this week after a fortnight out, that the town shall be kept up with the times orchestrally; and if composers' methods take on a change, he will keep his audiences informed about it. He brought the Bartók Concerto to its first hearing in Symphony Hall only four weeks ago; but that was scarcely more than a trial and a dress rehearsal of the piece. He had his players yesterday somewhere near in proper acquaintance with the music for a performance. Again, he had his listeners familiar enough with Bartók's procedures for a fair and considered judgment.

Now it can hardly be disputed that the Bartók Concerto (presented, along with Moussorgsky's "Bald Mountain," early in the afternoon) and the Brahms Symphony (presented late) belong to the same category of artistic creations. They are, both orchestral cycles in four-movement form. The Concerto, true enough, runs on a five-movement design, but the third movement and the fourth, designated Elegy and Intermezzo, are practically one, on the so-called "slow" order. These external differences are of no consequence whatever. What makes the Concerto a novelty in form and structure is the handling of the melodies and the distribution of the moods. As for a Bartók melody, it is by no means the same thing as a Brahms theme, which is subjected to elaborate and patterned development. Nor is it allowed to dominate the situation longer than enough to convey a certain feeling, perhaps joyous, perhaps sad, or perhaps ruminative.

All sorts of moods are expressed, indeed, though never in a measured and blocked-off order. We do not settle down now for a period of sentiment and now for one of fun. Matters run lightly and gaily and without notice turn to melancholy and meditation; but more important than that, the whole work is an air and a refrain, stanzas and a burden, a succession of musical verse. Somewhat the same idea is carried out in the symphonic poem of Liszt and Strauss. But that always has a descriptive, narrative, or pictorial basis. The sound paints or portrays something. With Bartók, the sound simply maintains rhythm and metrical progress, all idea of specific word or illustration being left out.

The achievement of Dr. Koussevitzky in the interpretation of the Concerto was that he found, at this second showing, its unity and its over-all sense. Some overtone, or whatever it be, holds through the music, binding all the notes together from first to last. He, as his task as conductor called him to do, found it and made it heard.

W. P. T.

Post Dec. 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT

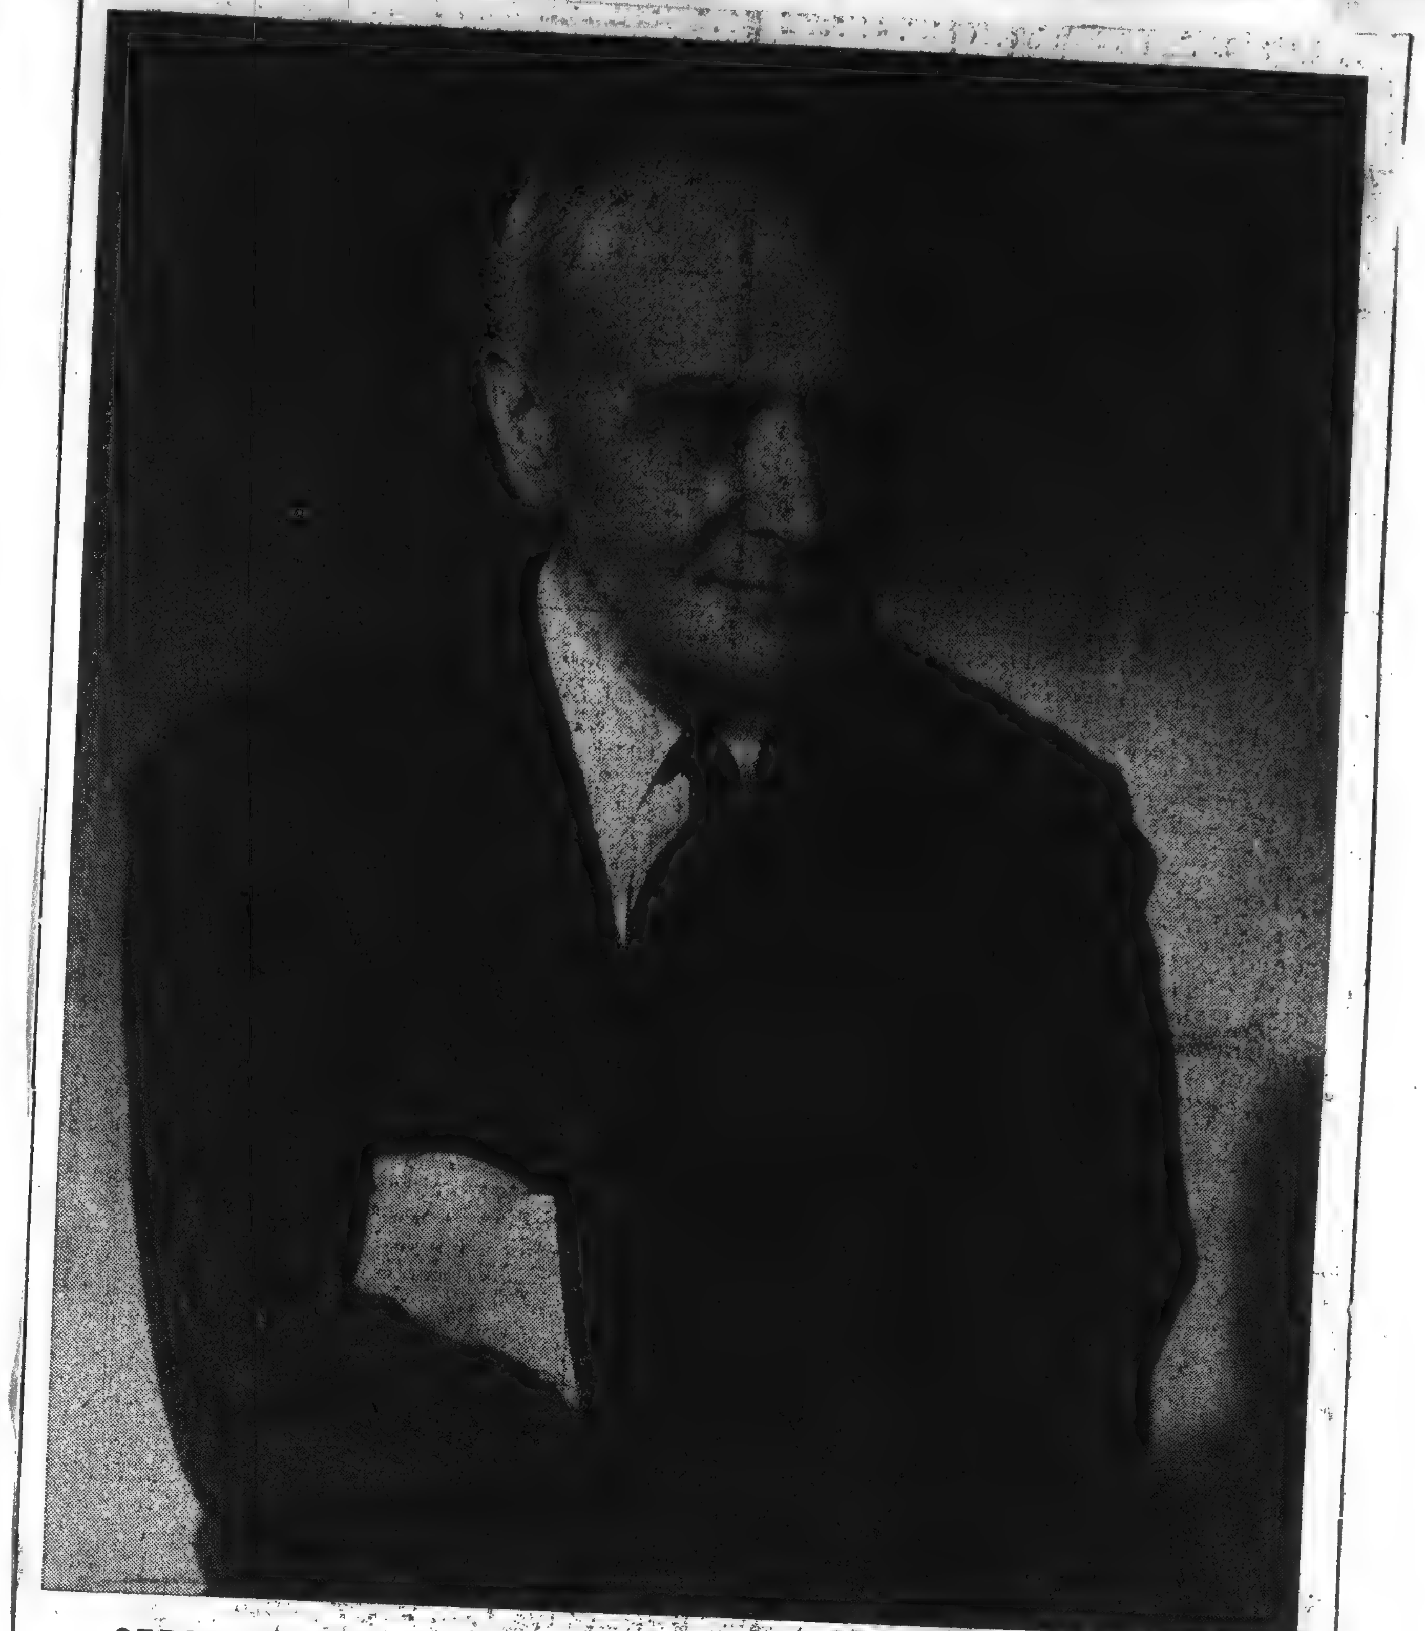
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Having been on a bit of a bender for two weeks, the Symphony Concerts have come home and settled down. For the 11th programme of the season Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, which had its world premiere at Symphony Hall four weeks ago, and that hardly perennial, Brahms' First Symphony.

For some reason Bartok's Concerto seemed a less striking, less exciting, even less important piece than it did before. Possibly yesterday's performance had less zip and zest to it than the original one. But there may be another explanation.

In Schoenberg's Variations and in this Concerto of Bartok we have lately heard two pieces from composers renowned for their uncompromising modernity that have shocked us by their relative conventionality. The initial surprise in finding Schoenberg straightforward instead of abstruse, and in discovering that Bartok can be romantic, light of touch and exhilarating might easily lead one into overvaluing the compositions in which these disclosures were made. A third hearing of Schoenberg brought only disappointment. There is much more to Bartok's piece, and whatever the individual reaction yesterday, it still seems a work entitled to a place in the regular repertory.

"A Night on Bald Mountain" which, like "Boris Godounov," cost Rimsky-Korsakov as much trouble as it did its composer, is a painful reminder that nothing in music ages as quickly as deviltry. The new shudders can always make the old ones sound tame. Compare Moussorgsky's diableries with those of Stravinsky and Prokofieff and you will get the point. Of course there is still the finale of "Don Giovanni" to refute this contention, but Mozart is above all the rules.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

International Musician

Serge Koussevitzky

Jan 1945

By CECIL JOHNS

(Fifteenth in a series of articles on the conductors of our great symphony orchestras.)

Conquering the insuperable is almost a daily occurrence for Serge Koussevitzky—and he has been at it for at least fifty-five of his seventy years. His first bout with the invincible came when as a lad of fourteen he ran away from his home in Tver with only three rubles in his pocket and made his way to Moscow. Once in Moscow he applied for a scholarship in conducting at the famous Moscow Conservatoire but was flatly refused, an ultimatum which served only to strengthen his determination. Making his way past the barricade of officials, he got into the director's study where he found that dignitary alone, playing the piano. The interview was brief but fruitful.

"What are you doing here? I am busy. Go away!" the director looked up without even interrupting his playing.

"You must let me study here."

"There are no vacancies. Go away!"

"I will study here", the young Serge was stamping and yelling.

The director stopped playing, came over to him and said, "All right, my boy, all right. Don't get excited. Come tomorrow morning and we shall see what we can do."

What they did was give Koussevitzky a scholarship, the only one open, which happened to be for that most cumbersome of instruments, the double-bass.

FATE MEETS HER MATCH

But again Koussevitzky chose to translate an obstacle into a stimulus. Accepting the scholarship avidly, he covered a five-year course in double-bass in five months, became leading double-bass at the Imperial Opera in Moscow, later teacher of double-bass in the very school that had all but rejected him and finally a virtuoso on the instrument, the greatest of his day. As such he concertized throughout Europe.

All this while he had by no means relinquished his determination to conduct. Opportunity for practice offered when Joachim put the Berlin Hochschule orchestra at his disposal. Then Fate made a truly lavish gesture. His future father-in-law—he was engaged to marry Natalie Oushkoff whom he had met several years before at one of his double-bass concerts—gave him as a wedding gift a symphony orchestra! This consisted of seventy-five musicians of Koussevitzky's own choosing. It goes without saying they were among the finest of Russia.

SYMPHONIC SAGA

Followed an episode which foreshadowed Koussevitzky's later zeal for music and musicians in America: he chartered a steamer and toured the Volga for 2,300 miles taking the best in symphonic fare to the Russian peasants. Thus musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns were treated to their first symphonic fare in concerts, held in their public squares or town halls, which presented works by Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Brahms and other of the "greats". Among these hard laboring, much bedevilled people his name became almost legendary, with mothers telling their children, as they would relate fairy tales, of the musical wonders in store for them when Spring broke the ice and made the river passable.

Serge Koussevitzky

(Continued from Page One)

After the Revolution, Koussevitzky, now a resident of Paris, founded his own orchestra once again and the "Concerts Koussevitzky" became for many a citizen of that metropolis the opening door for a vast world of Russian musical literature—Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Miaskovsky, Prokofieff, Stravinsky. Then, in 1924, came the invitation to become conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's achievements in the twenty years of his conductorship of the Boston ensemble are too numerous to describe in the course of this article. But one of his endeavors is of such significance that no sketch of his career, however brief, dare omit mention of it. That is his championship, consistent and forthright, zealous and persistent, of the American composer. Nor does his furtherance consist of mere word-of-mouth praise. Scores of American composers have Koussevitzky to thank for being launched on their careers. Premiere performance has been granted hundreds of compositions that never would have been written but for his encouragement. He does this, as he explains, because he has not only the individual composer's but all America's musical future at heart: "The ground for a great musical genius is prepared by hundreds of composers. The soil itself must consist of the national culture of the people. If we in American want to produce as great a genius as Beethoven, we must give to the great body of people the elements of musical education."

To honor this their protagonist, American composers tendered Dr. Koussevitzky a testimonial dinner on May 24, 1944, on the occasion of his completion of twenty years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No shining medals passed from hand to hand on this memorable evening; no resounding titles were bestowed. The testimonial, simple yet far more effective than these, consisted in a list of American compositions—printed on the dinner card in place of a menu—which Koussevitzky had made known to the public. One hundred and fifty compositions by Americans performed between that time and September, 1939, is no small amount, reckoned from any point of view, and when it is considered that sixty-three of these were performed by him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere the extent of his contribution to our national culture may be imagined. Dr. Koussevitzky had reason to be gratified by this demonstration of affection. For, besides being a token of the immense affection in which he is held by American musicians, it was proof that once again against great odds—America's own erstwhile indifference to her music, composers' inertia, lack of facilities—he nevertheless had accepted Fate's challenge and, after years of struggle, had won.

Herald Jan. 6

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 12th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was [illegible] Vishnevska, soprano, and members of the Harvard Glee Club and the [illegible] Choral Society (G. Wallace [illegible], conductor) assisted in the [illegible]. The program follows:

Divertimento in B flat major ....Mozart

[illegible] The Feast During the Plague ....Lourie

Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Sibelius

Having reached the half-way mark of its 64th season with a full head of steam, the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday observed the occasion with one of the finest performances its audiences have had the privilege to hear, ever. Of course in parts of the Lourie you couldn't tell whether it was well played or not, but all things considered the orchestra's technical facility and tonal felicity was never so overwhelmingly demonstrated as it was yesterday.

The Mozart Divertimento, for example. Here is a composition of an unbelievably luminous and romantic quality; there isn't a second's hesitancy in the flow of its intention. It moves as inevitably forward as a mountain stream, now dashing icily over rocks and now eddying quietly in dark but never dank pools. You can't conceive how anything could be so clear, so crystalline, so animated and yet so relaxed all at the same time, but there it is. And that's the way it was conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky and performed by the string orchestra yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Lourie's "The Feast During the Plague" is one of the more curious products of the season, if not the decade. I think, as a matter of fact, it is a much better composition than it seems to be, and that justice cannot be done the composer on the basis of this suite from a larger and obviously (from these few excerpts), remarkable work. What we heard was a series of fragments: of brief, elusive but often exceedingly beautiful melodies, of subtle harmonies and of audacious sonorities and orchestral tensions. Here they reminded you of this, and here of that, true enough; but frequently they reminded you of nothing whatever on this earth.

I got the impression indeed, throughout the six episodes, that what the composer had in his head and what he managed to communicate to us were two entirely different things, and I don't think his intentions were perfectly realized despite the really magnificent efforts of the conductor, the orchestra and the chorus. It is not any too clear then that his intentions could be realized by anyone, either. The music did not give, as it were, and proved halting, tentative, even frustrating.

Yet I would not hesitate to say, on the hearing of this precis, that a fully mounted performance of "The Feast During the Plague" with mise-en-scene in a theater might prove to be one of the most remarkable experiences an informed musical audience could have—if it may be presumed that in performance the full swing of the emotional sensibilities of the literary musico-dramatic concept could be realized. The Suite fails to do this, and remains merely an interesting curiousity.

As I say, I think it was well performed. The orchestra was certainly good, and especial credit must be given the entire brass section and to Mr. Szulc, whose work at the timpani was extraordinary (as indeed it always is). The chorus—and no chorus ever faced a sterner task—labored heroically and about as successfully as any chorus could under the circumstances, while Valentina Vishnevska, singing the solo soprano role, did as well as anyone could with so difficult a tessitura and with such little support in pitch as the orchestra provides for her solo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

Bartok's Concerto To Have Premiere

Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra will be given its New York premiere by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall next Wednesday night. The work will be repeated next Saturday afternoon. It was composed in 1943 on a commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The Wednesday program will open with the Preiude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" and close with Brahms's First Symphony. Works by Corelli and Sibelius will be heard Saturday.

Globe Jan 6

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

In a literal sense the Boston Symphony concerts this week begin with Mozart's B-flat Divertimento (K. 287) and end on the rousing plagal cadence of the Second Symphony of Sibelius. In a figurative sense that may also be true, although there is an intervening score, the Symphonic Suite drawn by Arthur Lourie from his unproduced opera, "The Plague During the Feast."

This work of Mr. Lourie presents no formidable difficulties of intellectuality or of idiom, but it does pose the question of what the opera would be like in the theatre. The Suite is decidedly unoperatic, it is amazingly eclectic, and the best that may be said is that it offers piquant, if unrelated, and pleasant, if undramatic, orchestral effects throughout the half-dozen movements. But of continuity, originality or cohesive style there is practically none.

The opera has a mixed ancestry, coming from an early 19th century verse play about the London plague of the 1600s by the Scottish John Wilson, by way of Pushkin's Russian translation. In the suite are two marches, a chorus for mixed voices, a soprano solo, "The Little Concert" (?) and a symphonic finale.

The chorus, on a Latin text of Petrarch, is a dismal dialogue to trumpet and trombone accompaniment, strongly reminiscent of Stravinsky but sour and needlessly difficult for the singers. The soprano solo, "Mary Gray's Song" about the horrid silence of a plague-decimated village, is a wandering affair that sounds a lot like Mahler.

The choristers from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, and soprano Valentina Vishnevska, must be given high credit for their devoted and valiant efforts. Miss Vishnevska has a slender, clear and agreeable voice.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of the Suite with his customary devotion, ardor and imaginative intensity.

Though the high strings went a hair off the pitch in some of the Mozart, the Divertimento for a brace of horns and strings was again a thoroughly delightful interlude. The adagio is no less than supernal.

More than two years had passed since Mr. Koussevitzky had offered us that Sibelian masterpiece and Koussevitzkyan battle steed, the D major Symphony. Once again the Boston Symphony went to town with it, revealing all of its lyrical melodic flow, its rugged grandeurs, its myriad colors and its up-surging drama. Those who have heard the Koussevitzky reading of this Symphony have something to tell their grandchildren.

New Work by Arthur Lourié Presented by Koussevitzky

Monitor

By L. A. Sloper Jan. 6

Yesterday's Symphony concert, the twelfth Friday reunion of the season, opened with a delightful performance of Mozart's Divertimento in B flat, for strings and two horns. The orchestra was at the peak of its form, and Dr. Koussevitzky was in a classical mood. The delicacy, variety and charm of the score were realized with amazing dexterity and admirable taste. Only in the ritard at the end of the Adagio was there evident the tendency to interpretive exaggeration which marred the performance of this work at Tanglewood last summer. The audience responded with exceptional warmth to this notable musical revelation.

Dr. Koussevitzky continued the program with a first performance of Arthur Lourié's Symphonic Suite, "The Feast During the Plague," in which the orchestra was assisted by Valentina Vishnevska, soprano, and a small chorus of Mr. Woodworth's singers from Harvard and Radcliffe.

This Suite has had an interesting history. Inspired by a "Dramatic Scene" of Pushkin, it was first composed as an opera whose scheduled production at the Paris Opéra was cancelled by the German invasion. Mr. Lourié has now revised it as a symphonic work with soloist and chorus.

The history of Pushkin's "Dramatic Scene" is even more remarkable. His work is based on a single episode from a play called "The City of the Plague," by John Wilson, a Scottish professor of moral philosophy in the early nineteenth century. The Pushkin text has been reinforced by Mr. Lourié with lines from Petrarch. The theme is revelry in the midst of catastrophe.

Coming after the Mozart, this contemporary composition sounded old-fashioned. Possibly it would be more impressive in its original design for the lyric theater. In its present form it is repetitious and monotonous, lacking in invention, variety, and rhythmic life. There is too much use of march time, and the devices employed for dramatic effect are over-familiar. The "Little Concert" movement is trivial.

Miss Vishnevska, a newcomer, is the possessor of a typically Russian soprano voice, which she submitted with good will and with creditable effect to the exacting demands of the composer. The chorus strove valiantly with Mr. Lourié's setting of the Latin verses, but they seemed to be a little insecure. There was cordial applause for all concerned.

The final item on the program was the Sibelius Second Symphony.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN 7 1945

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra, which will give a program in Constitution Hall Thursday.

Boston Symphony Comes for Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be presented by C. C. Cappel in concert on Thursday night at 8:30 o'clock in Constitution Hall. This will be the first visit of the orchestra to this city since 1935 except for a Russian war relef benefit program in 1942.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is now conducting his twenty-first season as head of the organization, announces the following program: Haydn's "Symphony in G Major, No. 88"; Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's second suite, "Daphnis and Chloe," and Shostakovich's "Fifth Symphony."

Post Jan. 6

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

What is likely to be the most variously appraised novelty of the current Symphony season, Arthur Lourie's "The Feast During the Plague" Symphonic Suite (after Pushkin), had its world premiere at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. As an opera ballet, based on the Dramatic Scene which the Russian poet derived from John Wilson's "The City of the Plague," Lourie's work was to have been produced at the Paris Opera and was being rehearsed when the war forced that theatre to close. From this music Mr. Lourie has made a Suite of six movements, one of them choral and one a soprano solo. A small chorus drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society wrestled with almost insuperable difficulties in the former, and a singer new in Boston, Valentina Vishnevska, helped to make the latter the most striking feature of the whole.

Some listeners professed to be greatly pleased with Mr. Lourie's music. Some found it an example of monumental incompetence. Boston has now heard four works by this Russian, who is also the author of "Serge Koussevitzky and His Epoch": a "Sonate Liturgique," a "Sinfonia Dialectica," the Symphony, "Kormtchaia" and the present piece. A suspicion of dilettantism informs them all. Mr. Lourie appears to theorize first and compose afterwards. He also reminds you a little of Boito: a literary man determined to be a composer, and despite a powerful imagination, considerable inventiveness and a certain degree of craftsmanship, not quite getting the hang of it.

Aside from its highly sophisticated instrumental dress, much of the Suite is disarmingly simple and direct, and it might easily register in the opera house. The dissonant chorus, a setting of Petrarch's "Dialogue of the Two Fortunes," that sounds like Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" gone wrong, is wholly different from the rest. The soprano solo, "Mary's Song," suggests early Italian opera in the odd treatment of the "huge guitar" accompaniment formula. The final section, an eerie sort of march, had a familiar ring, but you could not put your finger on the resemblance. Mr. Lourie was brought to the stage, and together with Miss Vishnevska and Dr. Koussevitsky, was warmly applauded. Mozart's delightful Divertimento in B-flat for strings and two horns (K. 287) began the concert and Sibelius' familiar Second Symphony brought it to a resounding close.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 9 1945

Leads Symphony Tonight

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, dean o the conductors of ~~the~~ Bushnel Symphony Series, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tonight in the third event of the series.

Owing to hotel and transportation problems which the orchestra could solve on no other way, tonight's concert has been scheduled to begin at 7:45 o'clock sharp, a half-hour earlier than usual. This will permit a normal length concert with normal intermission.

Tonight's program includes: "Unfinished Symphony," by Schubert; "Daphnis and Chloe, Suite No. 2" by Ravel and "Symphony No. 5" by Shostakovich.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1945

A new work by Béla Bartók, the 63-year-old Hungarian composer, will be presented by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concert at Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening. Despite somewhat symphonic character, the work is called a Concerto for Orchestra because, according to the composer, it treats single instruments or instrument groups in a "soloistic manner." Written for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, the score is dated Oct. 8, 1943, and was first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last month. It is scored for a large orchestra, including quadruple woodwinds and a large percussion section.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

1945

Music

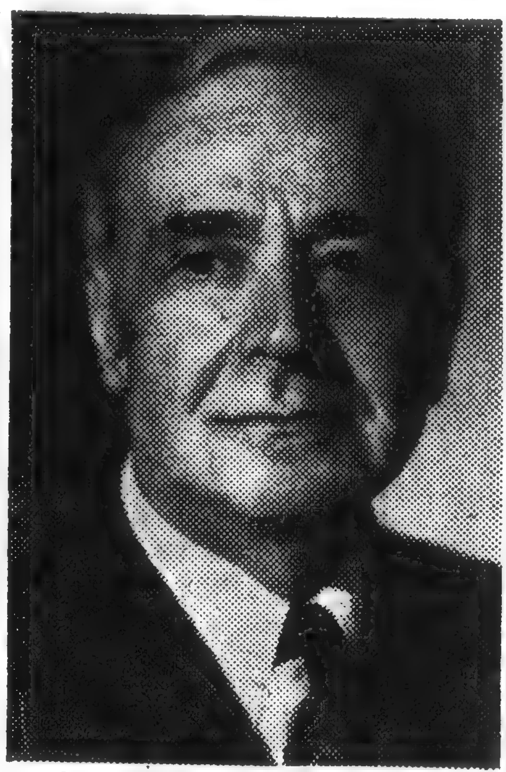
Our Boston Orchestra

Lone Concert Here Tuesday, but There Used to Be More

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

WE are on the eve of the Boston Symphony's only concert here this season. Complications in arranging a schedule deprived us of a second date, but transportation being what it is we are lucky to have this one.

Certainly when the war is over it should not be forgotten that there are unusual ties which bind this orchestra to Hartford. In the rather distant past it played here three and four times each season under the auspices of the Connecticut Teachers' Guild. Those were the days of Gericke, Paur and Muck. Nikisch never conducted here.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Bostonians have had other than palmy days but their best periods have been long ones and the lapses from peak have been few and brief. It is doubtful that even the fondest sentimentalist would pretend that the orchestra was ever better than it is today. Its technical perfection is such that a New York critic thinks that is the only thing the matter with it. Perhaps he finds the erratic brilliance of the Philharmonic more exciting because it is unpredictable and capable of acutely disappointing even its most violent partisans.

* * *

BUT this is Koussevitzky's day; it is the golden age of the world's most famous orchestra. And they come here only once. (Time out for un furtiva lagrima!) Nothing can be done about it, of course, but there was a time—

Half a dozen years ago there was a feeling that the Boston Orchestra should be thought of as a New England orchestra. This never reached the state of a concrete proposal, but the notion was not entertained here with any degree of cordiality mainly because at that time our own Hartford orchestra was trying to get its feet on the ground. With tact and politeness our Boston friends bowed themselves out.

Now where's our orchestra?

* * *

MAYBE this is a good time to suggest that when war's exigencies are ended we seriously consider binding ourselves a little closer to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has been more or less accepted that Hartford's appetite for symphonic music is satisfied with six concerts a season. That these six should be played by different orchestras savors a bit of dilettantism. The experience has been broadening, of course, but there have been drawbacks. Most of the programs we have heard have been on-tour programs comprising such material as required a minimum of rehearsal.

Or perhaps we have outgrown six concerts per year. In that case the present galaxy could be retained with the addition of as many concerts as Boston could give us.

The time has gone by, however, when the BSO needs to look for dates. It is about the only orchestra in the country which has so tight a schedule that it plays virtually the year around.

* * *

THE appeal of War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes that nonessential travel such as to conventions be ended beginning Febuary 1 will undoubtedly have the effect of cancelling two of the biggest music gatherings in the land, the Music Teachers' National Association and the National Association of Schools of Music.

These were to have been held in succession during February 13 to 17 in Detroit, the first a three-day meeting, the second lasting two. The teachers' organization is the oldest in America, being now in its 69th year, and this will probably be the first interruption in its history.

The rightness of Byrnes' decision cannot come into question. Music yields willingly; a great many less important conventions should have yielded long ago.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 11 1945

Notables to Hear Boston Symphony

The Ambassador of Czechoslovakia and Mme. Hurban, the Minister of Australia, Sir Frederic Eggleston, and the French Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet are among those who have taken boxes for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert this evening in Constitution Hall.

Others who will entertain guests in their boxes are Justice and Mrs. Owen Roberts, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Anne Archbold, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. James Clement Dunn, Mr. and Mrs. John M. Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. George Hewitt Myers and Mrs. Frederick A. Keep.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 10 1945

Well-Bathed Shostakovitch.

Several seasons ago when Shostakovitch was novelty in this country and Mr. Koussevitzky was his prophet, the latter declared he would play the Russian's music until people liked it. He came nearer to making a Hartford audience like it last night than he ever has before, but the virtue is his and only to a lesser degree the composer's. For Mr. Koussevitzky, consciously or unconsciously has come to the point of going at Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony from the orthodox, traditional, point of view, and except for a few idiomatic passages here and there, the work now gives the general impression of having been written by say Schubert or Franck or Berlioz or some combination of these or other standard brands.

Mr. Koussevitzky has made Shostakovitch sound grown-up, mature by playing the best parts of his work in an enriched manner, and he has found means to gloss over what is childish or childishly defiant in the composer. Dollars to doughnuts the Russians would be indignant to hear such bourgeois effects railroaded into their symphonic comrade's compositions, but dollars to doughnuts, too, if Shostakovitch becomes a hit-parader in this country, it will be because conductors like Mr. Koussevitzky have run a comb through his hair and given him a little savoir-faire.

However, to lose a revolutionary and gain a composer, is more than a fair exchange. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra certainly bent their brains and backs to make a masterpiece out of Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony last night. They have always given it a handsome performance. This time they made it sound like a reasonable piece of music, too.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 8 1945

Boston Symphony Program Features Old and New Works

Concert Starts At 7:45 Sharp

Classic and modern are nicely balanced in the program in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow night.

This, the third event of the Bushnell Symphony Series, is scheduled to begin at 7:45 p. m. sharp. The 30-minute earlier starting time was made necessary by the orchestra's transportation and hotel problems, which could be solved in no other way.

The Schubert "Unfinished Symphony," Ravel's "Daphnis & Chloe" (Second Suite), and the "Fifth Symphony" by Shostakovich make up the Boston program.

Olin Downes in an article in The New York Times Magazine of July 23, 1944, explains the present supremacy of the Boston Symphony in its field as the result of "sheer knowledge and hard, unremitting labor with the men—the effectiveness of a conductor who really knows what he wants and exactly how to get it from the players. The basis is the wonderful string tone, but throughout the orchestra there is the same sensitivity. it is in a measure the result e development of orchestral players and ensembles in America."

He then quotes Dr. Koussevitsky: "It is no longer necessary to go to Europe for the best players. The best players are here and in abundance. They are young and have abundant technique. They are living as well as playing on their own soil. They are America, which has developed so incredibly in music in the las quarter-century.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 10 1945

Koussevitzky Directs Fine Concert Here

Boston Conductor and Symphony Heard at Bushnell Memorial Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky was presented in the Bushnell Series at the memorial auditorium Tuesday night. The program,

Unfinished Symphony	Schubert
Daphnis And Chloe, Second Suite	Ravel
Symphony No. 5	Shostakovitch

Mr. Koussevitzky seems to have nothing but rare moods these days. Last night again he was in matchless form. His desire to make music was pressed down and running over and all during the concert he accompanied his orchestra with the one-man choir effects which mean that the spell is especially upon him. He whipped up his players with crimson energy and he calmed them down to such seraphic quietude that had a smal halo begun to glow around his head, few in the audience would probably have been surprised. What makes Mr. Koussevitzky's music the greatest thing in symphony is that it now offers the most magnificent blend of rapture and showiness to be heard anywhere.

It appeared to be the consensus last evening that the Schubert symphony had never been played here before with such hushed beauty. There has been growing in Mr. Koussevitzky's readings of late a peculiarly meditative quality and it was here heard at its most seizing, and in some ways most surprising manifestation. Mr. Koussevitzky has himself played it many times before, many times more vividly, but he has never brought from it such almost religious beauty, such depth or implication as he did this time with such tender means.

Glitter, Glitter.

Probably not since the days of Rimsky-Korsakoff, when orchestration first rose to really glittering heights, has there been a conductor who has understood so brilliantly or so creatively the orchestrational possibilities of concertmaking. Give Mr. Koussevitsky the most outre effects of Stravinsky or Hindemith, or in last night's case, of Ravel and he can be counted on to out-dazzle, out-startle or out-swoon the composer's intentions two-to-one. The Boston maestro has worked at refining, polishing, coloring and probably even re-inventing the remarkable effects of the "Daphnis And Chloe" Suite for a couple of decades. He has seldom made them sound so thoroughly astonishing as he did on this occasion. Many of them defied aural analysis. The whole thing was a bang-up ravishment, the complete and completely exciting tour de force.

Or it was as far as Mr. Koussevitsky could make it. For although the orchestra had played the opening Schubert with ineffable effect and poise, and although many of the most fantastic passages of the Ravel were negotiated with brilliance, in such elemental matters as ensemble, time and pitch, they gave the impression of being able to do with considerable more rehearsal [illegible] the Suite.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 10 1945

Full House Greets Boston Symphony

Koussevitsky Peerless In Bushnell Concert

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Serge Koussevitsky is the topmost peak of our symphonic landscape. He combines the fastidiousness and passion of a Toscanini with the hedonism of a Stokowski but unlike the latter, his taste is unassailable.

From the summit of his artistry to which a capacity audience was lifted in the Boston Symphony's concert last night beginning at the early hour of 7:45, we were initiated into an apocalyptic fellowship with the inspired but ordinarily uncompanionable Shostakovich of the Fifth, enjoyed a sunny view over the Elysian, flower-flecked meadows of the Symphony which Schubert had no need to finish, and were returned to sea-level atmosphere again about 9:30 after having been vaccinated with the dionysiac fevers of Ravel's most pagan and perfect score, the Daphnis and Chloe second suite.

There is never any tautness in his conducting. Even in such frenzied climaxes as Ravel's classic rout he drives hard but is relaxed; no other conductor makes his emotional impact at so little cost. His veiled imperiousness is felt by his listeners when he turns upon them to lead their singing of the national anthem. As a batonist his technique is ambiguous but his stick has no need of explicit design for his wishes, like his sense of rhythm, are an emanation. There is no perceptible signal for a sforzando in the Schubert symphony but the accent comes about as naturally as a heart-throb.

It is impossible to disassociate Koussevitsky and his men. As he stands there before the risen orchestra to receive the plaudits of an audience which has not yet shaken off the enchantment of the moment one cannot decide between master and musicians for theirs is a communal magic. The purring of nine basses in the opening phrase of the B minor Symphonic is a technical beauty, as is the poniard of violin tone which dramatically pierces the orchestral web in later pages and the melting horn timbres, but they are Koussevitsky-fashioned too.

Only a great and simple man can give us such an Unfinished Symphony—which is not a symphony at all, but the rarest song of the sweetest singer of songs the world has ever known. It took simplicity and greatness too for so lucid and acceptable an interpretation of Shostakovich who, for all his quince-like personality, is no more afraid to speak his heart than his mind.

The Daphnis and Chloe suite, one might say, is as much Koussevitzky as Ravel. It is the most dazzling score in the repertory of a conductor who is, if there were no more to be said of him, a peerless virtuoso.

It was an adroit program—the succession, Schubert to Ravel to Shostakovich conspiring to distil the essence of each. Here was bucolic loveliness as seen through the Viennese mind and the Parisian; here was French Basque exquisiteness in which the calculated, jewelled character of every tone was concealed by the flooding urgency of the music itself, posed against the importunate loquacity of an impassioned Russian for whom the message was more important than the terms. And canny Dr. Koussevitzky knew how well this various language made sound and sense together.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 11 1945

BARTOK CONCERTO INTRODUCED HERE

Boston Symphony, Directed by Koussevitzky, Plays New Work at Carnegie Hall

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky, on occasion, is a bold but by no means tactless program maker. He introduced a new "Concerto for Orchestra" in the modern vein by Bela Bartok at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. He prefaced this more or less problematic score by the folklike simplicities of the little prelude with which Mussorgsky prefaced the opening scene of his opera, "Khovantchina," and he followed it with the familiar and justly popular epic of Brahms, the C minor symphony.

The Concerto, given its première in Boston last Dec. 1, was written for the Koussevitzky Foundation, established in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky. Cushioned between Mussorgsky and Brahms, it had a very cordial reception.

This was due in the first place to the fact that the score is by no means the nut to crack that other of Bartok's late works have offered. It is a wide departure from its author's harsher and more cerebral style. There might even be the suspicion, with an artist of less sincerity than this one, that he had adopted a simpler and more melodic manner with the intention of an appeal to a wider public.

A Courageous Composer

But that would not be Mr. Bartok's motive. Nor would the emotional sequence of this music, and the care with which it has evidently been fashioned, support such an assumption. What is evident is the courage, which this composer never has lacked, with which he is striking out, in his late years, in new directions. The style is less involved and ingrowing than we have thought much of Bartok's late music to be, and it escapes in a large measure the pale cast of isolated thought which has brooded over so many of his pages.

In sum, as he himself has stated, it is an emergence from the pessimism which might pardonably have engulfed him, as it has so many leading artists of today, especially those of European schools. And of all things courage is the most praiseworthy.

The score is called a "Concerto," meaning a work cast in the eighteenth rather than the nineteenth century mold, with, of course, contemporaneous idioms. This is not a piece for soloist and orchestra. It is a series of movements in terms of instrumental parts that form an ensemble. There are also elements of the classic symphony in the structure. Only two of its parts have musical relation to each other. Each is individually complete and different in form from the others; all are subjective in feeling.

Character of Music

The important point is the character of the music. It begins with a somber prelude, the theme in the low strings, several times repeated, with a sort of miragelike reflection of itself in harmonies of the upper strings. Mr. Bartok says that the second movement, scherzolike, is a jest—though one would say a bitter one—and the third a lamentation. There are references in the fourth movement to the first and then, as a brilliant and entertaining contrast, a joyous, whirling finale in Hungarian style. Often there is the suggestion of dance rhythms and of the singsong of folk strains—a "happy" and resolute ending.

Is this a temporary divagation from the road Bartok so consistently has traveled? Is the tendency more than skin deep, or its fruits of lasting value? The audience showed that it enjoyed the music, taking to it more readily than anything Bartok has recently written. Mr. Koussevitzky did him a notable service by his performance, which was of extraordinary spirit and virtuosity. There were places where the whole string choir had to be so many Heifetzes; when the whole orchestra, singly and en masse, did feats of derring-do. Repeatedly Dr. Koussevitzky led Mr. Bartok from the wings, and finally left him alone on the stage with the applauding audience. After the Brahms symphony there was also a demonstration.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MUSIC

By Robert Bagar

Boston Symphony Plays New Bartok Concerto

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Time was when the veteran concert-goer complained about the lack of new music. This season, perhaps more than any other of recent years, has brought with it already a wealth of new music. And, to judge by the signs, as well as the announcements, there is more to come. Obviously there is nothing left to do but wait for the day when one can complain about too much new music.

Anyway, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky at the helm, rewarded its welcomers in Carnegie Hall last evening with an excellent local novelty, the Concerto for Orchestra, by Bela Bartok. The piece was written in October, 1943, for the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation, as a tribute to the memory of the conductor's wife Natalie.

Old World Folk Sources.

In this work Bartok treats various sections of the orchestra as solo groups, carrying out the idea quite extensively. So—Concerto for Orchestra. This, of course, is rather a departure from the concerto grosso form—that is, the featuring of one special group of instruments.

As you might expect, the composer's researches into Hungarian (and adjacent) folk music have stood him in good stead. The listener not too conversant with such idioms yet senses their presence, their forceful earthiness and kinetic rhythms.

Bartok has done a splendid job of combining the fleshly—or the muscular, if you prefer—with the spiritual and intellectual, and the result is a composition of great breadth, strongly contrasting moods and appealing melody.

The Concerto for Orchestra is divided into five sections. In some respects it is a symphony in five movements, and sonata form it possesses aplenty. There seems to be no connective tissue between the several parts. Naturally, such a virtuoso-type work requires a virtuoso exposition. That it received, for the Bostonians gave it a masterly reading from start to finish. The number made quite a favorable impression on the listeners.

Other Music.

Companioning the Bartok item on the program were the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Kovanstchina" and the First Symphony of Brahms. The Russian composer is no mystery either to Dr. Koussevitzky or to his men. Consequently the performance rang a few bells.

The opening measures of the Brahms, however, left practically nothing to be desired. Then came other measures and, regrettably, wishful thinking was in order. For the music became lethargic, instead of going on under its own momentum. The notes were played, and accurately. But the feeling, the color and shape of the Brahmsian idiom were not to be had last night. At least, not in the first movement they weren't.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

BARTOK CONCERTO INTRODUCED HERE

Boston Symphony, Directed by Koussevitzky, Plays New Work at Carnegie Hall

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky, on occasion, is a bold but by no means tactless program maker. He introduced a new "Concerto for Orchestra" in the modern vein by Bela Bartok at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. He prefaced this more or less problematic score by the folklike simplicities of the little prelude with which Mussorgsky prefaced the opening scene of his opera, "Khovantchina," and he followed it with the familiar and justly popular epic of Brahms, the C minor symphony.

The Concerto, given its première in Boston last Dec. 1, was written for the Koussevitzky Foundation, established in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky. Cushioned between Mussorgsky and Brahms, it had a very cordial reception.

This was due in the first place to the fact that the score is by no means the nut to crack that other of Bartok's late works have offered. It is a wide departure from its author's harsher and more cerebral style. There might even be the suspicion, with an artist of less sincerity than this one, that he had adopted a simpler and more melodic manner with the intention of an appeal to a wider public.

A Courageous Composer

But that would not be Mr. Bartok's motive. Nor would the emotional sequence of this music, and the care with which it has evidently been fashioned, support such an assumption. What is evident is the courage, which this composer never has lacked, with which he is striking out, in his late years, in new directions. The style is less involved and ingrowing than we have thought much of Bartok's late music to be, and it escapes in a large measure the pale cast of isolated thought which has brooded over so many of his pages.

In sum, as he himself has stated, it is an emergence from the pessimism which might pardonably have engulfed him, as it has so many leading artists of today, especially those of European schools. And of all things courage is the most praiseworthy.

The score is called a "Concerto," meaning a work cast in the eighteenth rather than the nineteenth century mold, with, of course, contemporaneous idioms. This is not a piece for soloist and orchestra. It is a series of movements in terms of instrumental parts that form an ensemble. There are also elements of the classic symphony in the structure. Only two of its parts have musical relation to each other. Each is individually complete and different in form from the others; all are subjective in feeling.

Character of Music

The important point is the character of the music. It begins with a somber prelude, the theme in the low strings, several times repeated, with a sort of miragelike reflection of itself in harmonies of the upper strings. Mr. Bartok says that the second movement, scherzolike, is a jest—though one would say a bitter one—and the third a lamentation. There are references in the fourth movement to the first and then, as a brilliant and entertaining contrast, a joyous, whirling finale in Hungarian style. Often there is the suggestion of dance rhythms and of the singsong of folk strains—a "happy" and resolute ending.

Is this a temporary divagation from the road Bartok so consistently has traveled? Is the tendency more than skin deep, or its fruits of lasting value? The audience showed that it enjoyed the music, taking to it more readily than anything Bartok has recently written. Mr. Koussevitzky did him a notable service by his performance, which was of extraordinary spirit and virtuosity. There were places where the whole string choir had to be so many Heifetzes; when the whole orchestra, singly and en masse, did feats of derring-do. Repeatedly Dr. Koussevitzky led Mr. Bartok from the wings, and finally left him alone on the stage with the applauding audience. After the Brahms symphony there was also a demonstration.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
JAN 11 1945

Words and Music

Bostonians Play Premiere Of Bartok's 'Concerto'

By Harriett Johnson

Bela Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra" is provocative even though less challenging to the ears than some of his other recently composed music. There are even a few easy-to-hear tunes as in the "Intermezzo interrotto," and the Finale.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony played the New York premiere of the work last night at Carnegie Hall. It is composed in memory of Mr. Koussevitsky's late wife, Natalie, and was commissioned by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation.

Because the composition emphasizes solo possibilities of single instruments, and groups of instruments, Mr. Bartok chooses to call his score a concerto rather than a symphony. One of its interesting features is the inventiveness of its various musical ideas. The work overflows with imagination both in content and orchestral scoring Mr. Bartok's style is inclined toward starkness and frequently this quality seems right for his kind of music. But last night I kept wishing for a more rounded and extensive treatment—a less disjointed architecture.

He often begins to develop a melody but in the middle its progress stops abruptly, then something else begins. In spite of this, however, the work is engrossing. Its five movements include a moving "Elegy," and "Allegro scherzando" and an "Allegro vivace." Mr. Koussevitsky had a tense, vivid conception of the Prelude to Act I of Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina." But the Brahms First Symphony was subjected to a weighty, ponderous and over deliberate reading.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 12 1945

Packed House Rises to Cheer Koussevitsky and the Boston

By ALICE EVERSMAN.

The return of the Boston Symphony after a long absence for a major concert in Constitution Hall and the remarkable playing of the group under Serge Koussevitsky's direction brought forth a demonstration of such magnitude as has not been heard here before. The ovation given the conductor and his men at the beginning of the program mounted in strength to a frenzy of applause and cheers at the end. Listening in rapt pleasure, the audience, which packed the auditorium to the limit, broke the spell at the conclusion of each number with its spontaneous enthusiasm.

The program held nothing new or unfamiliar and, at first glance, no special interest. But hearing it interpreted from Dr. Koussevitsky's artistic insight was a new and enriching experience. It was a study in analytical precision, in scholarly research, in musical sensitiveness and in rich and projective sentiment. With Haydn's "Symphony in G Major, No. 88"; Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faun," Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Shostakovich's "Fifth Symphony," there was every opportunity to reveal the special style and the sure musicianship of the conductor to the fullest.

Dr. Koussevitsky's conception of the orchestra as an interpretive medium is in itself unique. Under his direction it is an ensemble only at intervals, the importance of its component parts being supreme. It is as though the massed tone is laid wide open so that each of its structural factors becomes the more audible. They are drawn to the foreground to the complete expression of their individual phrase with the next voice carrying on and complementing with its tonal color what preceded. In unison, the volume is rich and vibrant, but again, a tone that has many inflections but no domination of one section over the other.

The conductor's appreciation of the time element is also individual. There is no feeling of hurry at any time but a great respect for the proper fulfillment of a measure. Slowly but with infinite repose, a phrase is unfolded, the tempo quickened slightly and allowed to fall back for another careful development. The result is a magnificent play of light and shade as well as a complete revelation of the pattern of the music.

The climax was reached in the Shostakovich symphony, which has rarely had so sensitive a reading. It acquired a loftiness and poetry that banished its disharmony, brought clarity out of confusion and dignity to its rather blatant exterior. Its dimensions were enlarged and its sincerity made more obvious. The members of the orchestra bent all their artistry to as fine a delineation of the work as could be desired and the result was not only persuasive but electrifying.

Ravel's second suite, arranged from his ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," offered another instance of the plasticity of the orchestra and the vision of the conductor. Not only was it a creation of mystical beauty as in the opening section, "Lever du jour," but a blossoming of passionate feeling that gathered the power of the orchestra for magnificent tonal effects. The building up of its structure was made through a range of dynamics that were achieved with minutest care.

Contrast was given these numbers by the Haydn symphony and the delicate impressionism of Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faun." Here, again, Dr. Koussevitsky's command of style was heightened by the artistic stress on detail. If the Haydn in its major portions was a trifle too robust, the largo was so arrestingly beautiful as to outshine the other movements.

The conductor was recalled again and again and a like ovation was given the members of the orchestra when asked to share the honors by the conductor.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
JAN 12 1945

Shouts of 'Bravo' Follow Boston Symphony Concert

By BETSY WINTER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which to many now living in Washington has meant merely a Saturday night broadcast, last night became a reality in Constitution Hall while to others it was the renewing of old acquaintance.

After an absence of many years, Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians received a spontaneous welcome which increased in enthusiastic tempo as the evening progressed. At the end of the concert a roar of bravos and demands for more music greeted the conductor and people waited hopefully long after he had made his final appearance.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave to the reading of the Haydn G Major Symphony, No. 88, an instrumental precision combined with rich tonal quality and sparkling humor which brought out its full beauty. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" on the other hand, contained an ethereal delicacy which had been so refined that only the essence was left. Excerpts from Ravel's Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" proved a favorite. This music has seldom had a warm welcome in the theater, but continues a hardy career in the concert hall.

Climax of the program was Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, a work which grows on the listener with each new interpretation. One could feel the tension of the audience increasing with the development of the movement, until the last note, when it relaxed with an audible sigh.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 11 1945

BOSTONIANS PLAY BARTOK CONCERTO

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony last night proffered an audience in Carnegie Hall a hard nut to crack. It was Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, written for the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation in memory of the conductor's wife, and already twice performed in Boston. Mr. Bartok was present and appeared on the platform several times to bow.

The composer has written very clearly about the concerto. The general mood, he says, apart from a jesting second movement, represents a gradual transition from the sternness of the first movement and the lugubrious death-song of the third to the life-assertion of the last one. There are five movements. Their progress from the somber to the animated may be regarded as being in some way connected with his own convalescence from a serious illness.

The structure, too, is analyzed in a note by Mr. Bartok that makes good sense. The first and fifth movements are more or less in the sonata form. The second and third are less traditional, the second consisting of a chain of independent short sections. The fourth movement is also chain-like, its three themes appearing successively. The last movement introduces a perpetuum mobile-like statement of its principal theme.

For the listener's further aid it is pointed out that the form of the fourth movement—"Intermezzo interrotto" or interrupted intermezzo—could be rendered by letter symbols "ABA—interruption—BA." And the work as a whole is styled a concerto, instead of a symphony, because of its tendency to treat the single instruments or instrumental groups in a "concertant" or soloistic manner.

Mr. Bartok's music is eminently and earnestly sincere. But after a promising beginning it resolves itself into a prodigious flood of notes. No doubt he would say, as Mozart did when such an assertion was made about his music, "but not a note too many." He has composed with complete assurance—the assurance of one who knows what he is about and how to achieve his ends. Some of the score may even be said to be recognizably melodious—particularly the fourth movement and the perpetuum mobile of the last. In the writing for the instruments all is clear and vital. But there is much that eludes, perplexes and mystifies the listener. He is confronted with a clutter of ideas that do not seem significant. The themes, in their multiplicity, tend to pass him by. Yet the spirit of Bartok is in this music. The listener feels it, and it leaves him troubled.

What will be the future of this concerto? It is a brash soul that attempts to say. What, indeed, is the future of any of Bartok's major works?

Mr. Koussevitzky led the Bostonians in a performance of fervor and conviction. The program began with a warmly detailed presentation of Mussorgsky's "Dawn Over Moscow" prelude, from "Khovantchina," and concluded with a virtuoso performance of Brahms's First Symphony.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
JAN 13 1945

Concluding a series of three broadcasts on NBC, the Indianapolis Symphony (WFAA, 2 p.m.) under the baton of Fabien Sevitzky will play Schubert's Symphony No. 8 in B Minor, better known as the Unfinished Symphony, the Kreisler-Sevitzky Praeludium and Allegro, Liadov's Baba-Yaga and Glazounov's Suite from The Middle Ages.

Conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony ~~(KOKO,~~ 7:30 p.m.) Saturday will be heard in performances of Jan Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43, and Hector Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture.

As soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra over CBS, Isaac Stern, violinist, will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in E Minor, Op. 64. The orchestra, under Pierre Monteux's direction, will play Beethoven's Egmont Overture, Op. 84, and the First Suite from Stravinsky's The Fire Bird.

[39]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Bartok Work Is Played Here By Bostonians

His Concerto for Orchestra and Brahms's First Are Offered by Koussevitzky

By Jerome D. Bohm

[illegible] SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge [illegible] Carnegie [illegible]

A[illegible] listened to the [illegible] experimental and [illegible] of Bela Bartok [illegible] it is a pleasure [illegible] the distinguished [illegible] composer has turned [illegible] able masterpiece in Concerto Grosso for Orchestra [illegible] Koussevitzky unfolded [illegible] time in New York with [illegible] Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night.

Completed in October, 1943, after a period of serious illness, [illegible] five-movement Concerto, [illegible] the composer tells us he has [illegible] symphony because of [illegible] and virtuosic manner in which the instrumental groups [illegible] therein, is remarkable [illegible] intrinsic value of its [illegible] and for its mastery of [illegible] and instrumentation.

The composer has not revealed [illegible] thematic material [illegible] from genuine Hungarian [illegible] much of it is suggest[illegible] autochthonous sources [illegible] treatment accorded it is [illegible].

[illegible] Bartok has written that "the [illegible] mood of the work represents [illegible] from the jesting second movement, a gradual transition from the sternness of the first movement and the lugubrious death-song of the third, to the life-assertion of the last one." This is a concise description of a work which not only keeps the hearer fascinated by its resourceful and kaleidoscopically shifting orchestral effects but by its direct and unashamed appeal to the heart.

Both the opening movement and especially the Elegy, with its affectingly plangent contents and luminously flickering scoring, are among the most poignant pages in present-day music and moved me more than anything I have heard since Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," although the two works have of course nothing in common stylistically regarded.

The "Intermezzo interotto," which constitutes the Concerto's fourth movement, is a delicious bit of foolery with a melody as alluring as a Tchaikovsky ballet tune. The Allegro scherzando, the work's second movemnt, in which a Bach-like chorale makes an unexpected, brief entrance, is utterly [illegible], and the perpetual-motion-like finale brings the Concerto to a brilliantly satisfying [illegible].

It was disheartening that the [illegible] received this [illegible] composition with a coolness which [illegible] merely to polite applause [illegible] the composer appeared on the platform. One hopes that Mr. Koussevitzky and his great orchestra, which discoursed the Concerto with matchless virtuosity and ex[illegible], will not be discouraged by the tepid reception and [illegible] in addition to the performance scheduled for tomorrow afternoon [illegible] accord this Concerto a [illegible] place in its repertoire.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 12 1945

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Heifetz Plays Beethoven Concerto With Philharmonic and Rodzinski

Jascha Heifetz carried off the honors at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night. He played the Beethoven Concerto in his inimitable style and drew forth an unusual number of bravos from an otherwise undemonstrative audience. There was nothing new about his performance; his highly polished, suave playing was a model of purity of tone and of technique. If anything, the playing was almost too finedrawn, but it was classic to the core.

Douglas Moore's "In Memoriam" was given its first New York performance. It is dedicated "to those who die young and speaks of the bitterness of youth cut down in its prime." Utterly sincere in purpose and in content, the dirgelike characteristics of the music envelop the work in unrelieved melancholy. Its good workmanship conveys little of depth or of mobility, thus checking its inspiration at the start. It received faint applause.

Rodzinski's chief offering was the Rachmaninoff Second Symphony, a work full of lyricism and steeped in the romantic tradition. Its frank espousal of melody is now its life blood, and the surge of its rich melodic flow kindled feelings of appreciation in the listener. Here the composer succeeded in getting across his personal feelings. Coming as it did right after the Moore piece, the opening Largo at once created more mood than the newer work ever achieved. It was indeed a pleasure to hear the music again.

The performance was an animated one, though it worked out as more a reading of the notes than as inspired interpretation. Strangely enough, it needed incisiveness to point up its dramatic elements and sharpen its long phrases and usually Rodzinski can be depended upon for that kind of treatment of a score. The strings sang beautifully in the lyric portions.

Koussevitzky Introduces New Bartok Concerto

Aside from such standard Koussevitzky items as Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" and the Brahms First Symphony, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday night was highlighted by the first New York performance of Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. The composer was present to take bows, receiving more applause for being present than for having written this particular work. Yet with this concerto and his Violin Concerto Bartok should come into his own with the general music public.

There is much more ingratiating music in the most recent works of this Hungarian composer. He has mellowed in so many ways. No longer is there the uncompromising dissonance, no longer the completely cerebral manifestations, no longer the repellant austerity so characteristic of a greater part of his music. Melody has crept in; mood has asserted itself more graciously; simplification has clarified intentions. The work makes good listening.

Bartok himself notes the general mood as one in transition from sternness to life assertion during the course of five movements. While he is still rhapsodic and given to abrupt changes and endings, the music is more firmly knit for general consumption than before. Right at the start, he creates atmosphere and spins an easily discernible melody. His second idea is clearly rhythmic. The ensuing woodwind solos and inevitable counterpoint can be followed with pleasure. A playful second movement has its instrumental fascination. An Elegy is rhetorical rather than deeply felt. Both the Intermezzo and Finale derive from folk origins, giving charm to the whole work.

Perhaps extensive listening to Richard Strauss and Shostakovich has put this critic into a more receptive mood. They may have even influenced the composer himself unconsciously. This work indicates a consolidation in musical expression that is most interesting. Out of the confusion of the past there may finally be a definite style emerging. Certainly Bartok has finally given us music that we can appreciate more readily than before and even like.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
HERALD

JAN 15 1945

William E. Walter, Musician, Dies

NEW YORK (INS)—William E. Walter, prominent a generation ago as a music critic and symphony orchestra manager, died shortly after he was found unconscious Saturday night in his New York apartment. He was 75 years old.

Death was tentatively ascribed by police to a stroke, but contents of letters in Walter's handwriting, found in the apartment, caused detectives to open an investigation. An autopsy will be performed.

Detective Frank Farrell said one of the notes instructed that a funeral parlor and a doctor be notified. Sealed letters were found addressed to Edward Ziegler, general manager of the Metropolitan opera house, Mrs. Henry Ladd, a niece, and Mrs. Charles Gleaves. The detective added that Walter was a member of the University club.

Walter, a graduate of the University of Michigan, was director of publicity for the Boston Symphony orchestra at the ~~turn of the century, had~~ worked with the YMCA during World War I and had been a secretary of Ignace Paderewski.

In 1920, he was manager of the National Symphony orchestra in New York. Two years later he became manager of the Detroit symphony, relinquished that post a few years later to assume the directorship of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. Prior to his orchestral affiliations he was on the staff of the New York Sun and later was music critic of the New York Globe. He was a native of Cleveland.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 12 1945

Postlude

By Ray C. B[illegible]

C. C. Cappel present[illegible] Boston Orchestra, conducted by Sergei Koussevitzki, on Thursday night in Constitution Hall. Program: Symphony in G major, No. 8 (Haydn), "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" (Debussy), Suite No. 2 from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Ravel), Symphony No. 5 Op. 47 (Shostakovich).

One of the rare visits of th Boston Orchestra was welcome last evening by a capacity audienc in Constitution Hall which resounded with enthusiastic an prolonged demonstrations of delight and admiration. The 20-yea association between Sergei Koussevitzki and his players has cemented an entente musicale which is an extraordinary fusion of finesse and virtuosity. Seldom does one hear an orchestra that is so patently consentient with its conductor in every detail of performance and in every nuance of interpretation. The effect of this unanimity upon the listener is that of the profoundest satisfaction.

Readings by this dynamic and sensitized band would beautify the most banal program, and they disclosed last night new meanings in compositions that were by no means unfamiliar. As an example, the second movement of Haydn's "Paris" symphony in G major wa handled by Koussevitzki with a consideration that made it a true largo in pace and emotion, and revealed the source from which Beethoven derived the mysterious dignity of his slow movements. In fact, it sounded at times very like Beethoven and suggested the spiritual connection between Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—a connection deeper than their accidental relation in time.

Debussy's shimmering prelude to Mallarme's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" spread its hues in a perfect representation of tonal impressionism and made one sigh that so ideal a depiction should be so evanescent. Sheer virtuosity of performance reached its height in the second suite from "Daphnis et Chloe" in which Ravel exercised his scoring skill for that very purpose. Shostakovich can thank Koussevitzki for the insight that detected the eloquence beneath the rhetoric, the sincerity behind the bombast in his fifth symphony, and made this work sound convincing and even more important than it may really be.

DAYTON, OHIO
SUNDAY JOURNAL HERALD

JAN 14 1945

New York Philharmonic Plays Well Under Monteux

By PIERRE KEY

NEW YORK, Jan. 14.

Peculiar things about orchestras: They will play so much better for certain conductors than for others. There is New York's Philharmonic, for one. Under Pierre Monteux it was at its best . . . and that means better than I have ever heard it play for anyone since its reorganization two years ago by its now permanent leader, Artur Rodzinski. Monteux brought out certain excellences which only a few of us suspected it had.

Last Tuesday evening the Philadelphia orchestra played a concert in Carnegie Hall—also under Monteux, and it shone brilliantly. This distinguished conductor is the finest France ever sent to us. It is he who fashioned the present Boston Symphony. He ought to be down at the Metropolitan Opera . . . then we would have some of the French operas led as they should be led. Wilfred Pelletier falls short of the mark which the Metropolitan ought to have.

It was a splendid program Monteux conducted: the overlengthy Bach-Respighi Passacaglia and Fugue in C-minor, Mozart's compact symphony in D-major, the "Romeo and Juliet" ballet suite of Prokofieff, Ravel's first suite, "Daphnis et Chloe,' and the Firebird ballet suite of Stravinsky. Monteux's interpretation of French works, as well as the classics, is something. He has grown tremendously since he was head of the Boston Symphony, and one of the Metropolitan Opera conductors.

At the Metropolitan

If Giulio Gatti-Casazza were back at the Metropolitan today he would be happy over the public's response to the operas of Mozart. Gatti tried them, without any warm respons on the part of the public of tha period. Now, however, a Mozar representation seems to go over 1 times out of 10.

A few evenings ago "The Magi Flute" was given for the first tim this season, with a cast pretty muc what it has been in recent season . . . with the exception of an American coloratura: Mimi Benzell. Her was a pleasant surprise . . . smooth voice, clear and accurat high notes, and the Queen of th Night aria very well done. Th rest of the cast was as of other seasons, with James Melton makin his first appearance at the Metropolitan this year.

Another season "first" wa Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," als with a cast so familiar that comment seems not to be needed.

Repetition Operas

The Metropolitan has so muc patronage these days that it is no possible to accommodate all wh would like to increase it. Neve has business been so good, whic makes everybody happy from th officers and directors on down. Th performances are "spotty." Som are fine, others fair, and more tha we would like to report of a qualit which the Metropolitan never use to put on.

There is difficulty, naturally, in getting certain first-rate principal singers . . . because of wartime conditions. But the trouble lies not entirely in that direction. Still, as long as patronage continues to be as it now is there isn't much likelihood of esthetic improvement.

What the Metropolitan needs is competition . . . which I don't see in the near future. For, the fact remains, that when one has a monoply it does not tend for special effort.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

JAN 14 1945 84

Most Beloved Conductor

Serge Koussevitzsgy, conductor of the Boston Symphony, i held in high esteem by the many American composers whose musi he has introduced to the public. Among his proteges is Leonar Bernstein, who appeared in Parkersburg last fall as guest leader o the Cincinnati Symphony.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 14 1945

Szell and Posselt Symphony Guests

Noted Conductor and Woman Violinist to Appear with Boston Orchestra in Concert Here Tuesday.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with George Szell as guest conductor and Ruth Posselt, violinist, as soloist, will return for its third concert of the season Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock in the Metropolitan Theater. John B. Archer will give a free public lecture on the program in Marston Hall, Brown University, this afternoon at 4 o'clock.

Also free to the public this week are a concert by the Brown-Pembroke Orchestra and a recital by E. Power Biggs, noted organist. The latter will play the annual Edgar John Lownes Memory Day recital in Alumnae Hall, Brown University, Thursday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

[40]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS AN OVATION

Koussevitzky's Readings of Corelli Excerpts, Sibelius' Work Receive Praise

At its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony performed two works which had not been presented on its program last Wednesday night in the same auditorium. These were the Second symphony of Sibelius and Ettore Pinelli's arrangement for string orchestra of a Sarabande, a Gigue and a Badinerie chosen from the violin sonatas forming the Opus 5 of Corelli. The list was completed by a repetition of Béla Bartók Concerto for Orchestra, which received its New York première at the previous concert.

In the Corelli excerpts the strings played with their incomparable beauty and ductility of tone, and thereby enhanced to the utmost the inherent melodic charm of the three delightful pieces, each of which was highly contrasted with the others and yet never overstepped the bounds of classic restraint.

The brooding Sarabande was delivered in tones of remarkable silkiness and purity of texture and was a constant joy to the ear from the delicately moulded phrases at the start to the richly resonant climax at the close, being filled with deftly treated nuances throughout and the subtlest of carefully built-up crescendos. The Gigue was projected in full-bodied, resonant tones, with all the rhythmic allure and vitality needed to evoke its exuberant content. By way of sharp differentiation came the happy-spirited Badinerie, in which the ingratiating melody of the violins and the pizzicato accompaniment of the rest of the strings were handled in surpassingly delicate fashion.

The same perfection reached in the Corelli excerpts by the strings was evidenced by all of the sections of the orchestra in the performance of the Second symphony of Sibelius, accorded a reading that brought on a protracted ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and his men by its pronounced eloquence and intensity.

It was played in all of the four movements with the opulence of sound and wealth of prismatic hues needed to lend the music its essential quality. Dr. Koussevitzky's masterly interpretation of the symphony is too familiar to require detailed account. The finale, however, was taken at a somewhat more deliberate pace than the conductor has sometimes employed for this division of the work, resulting in a particularly noble and imposing propulsion of the movement. If any fault could be found with the presentation, it was that there were passages for the pizzicato lower strings in the Andante which were not clearly audible in the wide spaces of the auditorium, and this was again true of the repeated B flats for the tympani leading to the trio of the scherzo.

Mr. Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, previously reviewed in these columns, met with a demonstration of approval that necessitated many bows from the composer.

N. S.

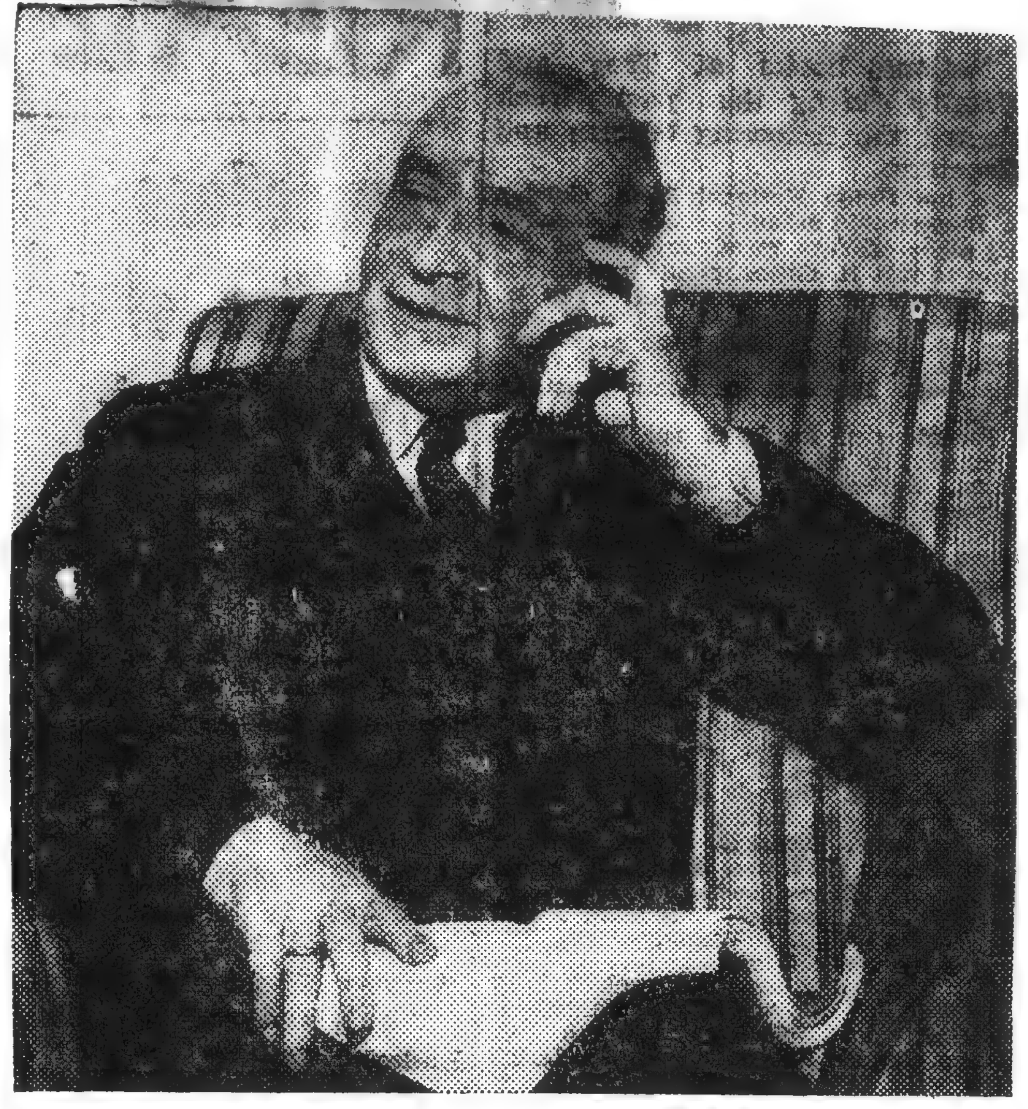
COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JAN 19 1945

Conductor George Szell becomes the fourth guest conductor to be chosen by Serge Koussevitzky to appear with the Boston Symphony. Program aired Saturday eves over the BLUE Network.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

JAN 14 1945



Conductor Serge Koussevitzky on one of his many trips to New York prepares to direct the Boston Symphony in the auditorium of Hunter College. Koussevitzky has had a number of guest conductors, the next will be conductor George Szell, of the Metropolitan Opera.

George Szell Discourses On Technique of the Baton

Monitor Jan. 18

By Winthrop P. Tryon

George Szell, in reply to a query about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pointed up in the air. Obvious meaning, unuttered:

"The orchestra represents the . . ."

But he was assured that the purpose of the question was something else than to elicit praise for the town's pet musical establishment.

Mr. Szell was in the conductor's room at Symphony Hall, pulling himself together after a morning's rehearsal; for he is serving a brief term for Serge Koussevitzky, in the role of "guest" conductor. He offers at this week's concerts a piece new to Boston—Still's "In Memoriam: The Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy;" also Lalo's violin concerto known as the Spanish Symphony, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; and besides these, a small work by Smetana and the Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor. Really, a program in the regular routine, and one by no means designed to give the visitor the aspect of an exhibitionist.

* * *

A man of the sort needs no glamour bestowed on him; nor does he, in turn, need to hand compliments to the community that is his host. The finger in air made an eloquent reply to what was asked of him, except that, for the moment, he misconstrued the question. This, accordingly, was somewhat expanded and put a second time:

"Where did you find yourself when you took your place before the players of the Boston Symphony, to direct them? Where, speaking of artistic tradition and the train of musical history, did you feel that you stood?"

The answer was immediate:

"In Vienna."

Mr. Szell went on to tell of European orchestras with which he has had experience as conductor. He talked them all over, noting the particular social conditions of the locality where each one performs, remarking upon their various standards and their methods, and discussing the character and disposition of one city and another. He declared, in the end, that the handed-down orchestral style of Vienna was the most refined, consistent, and influential of any.

"The first time I heard the Boston Symphony," he explained. "I was impressed with its Viennese traits, especially in the strings. I could observe other characteristics, too—French and Russian, for example: but fundamentally I recognized a quality that seemed something of long standing, something persisting through whatever changes of policy and membership may have occurred. Was not the orchestra, a few years after first being set up, rehabilitated by a prevailing personnel from Vienna? Well, what was introduced then has continued. Such a force can last, and it can remain recognizable through every shift of time."

The question, itself in the conventional line of interview, got a free and an enthusiastic response; and the meeting had closed there, but that it was later, when the conductor had made ready for leaving the hall, renewed. This time, interrogation took a somewhat off-the-track slant, though reply came in by no means off-the-record terms. Now Mr. Szell, as a conductor on the roster of the Metropolitan Opera Association in New York, might be supposed sensitive to depreciative remark about his organization, as implied in such a query as the following:

"Mr. Szell, why does the Metropolitan Opera Company endure such a poor orchestra as it does?"

* * *

It has been well enough known that the opera orchestra for a long period was on the border line of second class, critical silence on the subject notwithstanding. Even the most renowned conductors could seldom secure results that listeners should in reason expect. Very well, too, perhaps, while the Metropolitan wore the shape of a private social institution. But it has now become more like a national concern. Prompt and fiery reply from Mr. Szell:

"That has been stopped," he said. "You will find it true no more."

Thereupon he pointed out that the orchestra for many years was an inside clique, its members taken from such talent as was available on Broadway; a circle of friends interested in the matter as a job.

George Szell

Who will conduct the weekend Symphony concerts.

"It has been broken up," averred Mr. Szell. "The players are now first-class musicians, and there has been a thorough reform. You may not observe a great difference right away; but improvement will come, and the Metropolitan's orchestra will stand with the best of them."

Further, by way of technical questioning and answering:

"You use a stick?"

"Yes, yes."

"What about your left hand?"

"Shading, phrasing, keeping the different components together; never using it for beating time."

"Do you conduct from book or from memory?"

"By the time I have mastered a score, the book becomes of more bother than use. However, I keep it by me, and I never force myself to memorize music."

"How long do you want to study a new score before trying it in rehearsal?"

"I got up a recent work of Hindemith in four or five days."

"How did you prepare it?"

"At the piano—for I am a pianist—and reading it over like any book."

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH

JAN 19 1945

LEONARD LYONS:

Stage Fright

Moritz Rosenthal, the venerable pianist, was the teacher of Elly Kassman, whose father has been with the Boston Symphony for many years. Miss Kassman makes her Town Hall debut next Tuesday . . . She confessed to Rosenthal that she would suffer from stage fright . . . "My dear Elly," said the veteran pianist who gave countless concerts all over the world, "after all these years I've learned this: stage fright is the sanest moment in an artist's life."

BUFFALO, N.Y.
JEWISH REVIEW
1/19/45

"Serge Koussevitsky Music Library" Being Organized by Palestine Orchestra

JERUSALEM, (JTA)—The first shipment of scores which will comprise the "Koussevitsky Musical Library" of the Palestine Orchestra is en route here, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced in a cable received last week by Prof. Leo Kestenberg, conductor of the Palestine Symphony Orchestra. Additional shipments will be dispatched in the near future.

[4]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 17 1945

MUSIC

George Szell Conducts Boston Symphony in 3rd Concert Here

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with George Szell as guest conductor, gave the third concert of its season here in Metropolitan Theater last night. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was soloist.

Snow and cold did not keep many persons at home. Those who attended heard and enjoyed a program worth the arctic expedition necessary to get to it, provided one [illegible] not demand for such effort a[illegible] perishable memory.

Mr. Szell conducts without score. His readings gave one unspectacular satisfaction; they were careful, authoritative, clear, but they generated little heat. Sometimes he used scarcely any gestures, which was restful. When he did begin fencing in earnest, he still kept within bounds. He commanded a clear tone at all times and attended to details with experienced ease.

The poetic Unfinished Symphony of Schubert is nice to hear on a Winter night, or any night. Mr. Szell took the andante faster than some, and perhaps lost a bit of the magic of it, but, in all, it was a pleasant renewing of acquaintance with one of the most familiar and yet least faded friends in the symphonic library.

Miss Posselt played four movements of the Symphonie Espagnole by Lalo. It is difficult to concur with Von Bulow in his opinion that the work shows "genius in every way," but the music is pleasant. Miss Posselt sang it with a tone of fine texture and warmth, an expressive tone, though not large. The andante was particularly suited to her style; it soothed the ear. She disposed of the technical tests suavely. She seemed lacking chiefly in the finale, where her utterance was perfect but on a small scale. The audience brought her back to the stage several times.

The fourth symphony by Brahms received a workmanlike reading, the second movement making an exceptionally impressive effect. The performance in general suffered slightly from moments of uncertainty that probably are inevitable when an orchestra has many conductors in one season.

PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 18 1945

Famous Singer Here on Feb. 7

Tickets are on sale in the YM-YWHA library for the next concert which takes place on Feb. 7, at Eastside High School, at which time Dorothy Maynor, whose beautiful voice has received the praise of musicians, critics and music lovers, will appear.

DOROTHY MAYNO

Miss Maynor, the sensational new Negro soprano, is a graduate of Hampton Institute, and a member of the Westminister Choir School in Princeton. The daughter of a Norfolk Virginia minister, she became a sensation overnight when she appeared at the Berkshire Festival and sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Berge Koussevitzky.

Wherever she has sung, enraptured audiences have agreed with Oline Downes, leading critic of a New York newspaper who wrote: "She has virtually everything needed by a great artist; the superb voice, one of the finest the public can hear today, exceptional musicianship and accuracy of intonation; emotional intensity, communicative power. She should be able to reach almost any height as one of the leading concert singers of her generation."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 14 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS AN OVATION

Koussevitzky's Readings of Corelli Excerpts, Sibelius' Work Receive Praise

At its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony performed two works which had not been presented on its program last Wednesday night in the same auditorium. These were the Second symphony of Sibelius and Ettore Pinelli's arrangement for string orchestra of a Sarabande, a Gigue and a Badinerie chosen from the violin sonatas forming the Opus 5 of Corelli. The list was completed by a repetition of Béla Bartók Concerto for Orchestra, which received its New York première at the previous concert.

In the Corelli excerpts the strings played with their incomparable beauty and ductility of tone, and thereby enhanced to the utmost the inherent melodic charm of the three delightful pieces, each of which was highly contrasted with the others and yet never overstepped the bounds of classic restraint.

The brooding Sarabande was delivered in tones of remarkable silkiness and purity of texture and was a constant joy to the ear from the delicately moulded phrases at the start to the richly resonant climax at the close, being filled with deftly treated nuances throughout and the subtlest of carefully built-up crescendos. The Gigue was projected in full-bodied, resonant tones, with all the rhythmic allure and vitality needed to evoke its exuberant content. By way of sharp differentiation came the happy-spirited Badinerie, in which the ingratiating melody of the violins and the pizzicato accompaniment of the rest of the strings were handled in surpassingly delicate fashion.

The same perfection reached in the Corelli excerpts by the strings was evidenced by all of the sections of the orchestra in the performance of the Second symphony of Sibelius, accorded a reading that brought on a protracted ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and his men by its pronounced eloquence and intensity.

It was played in all of the four movements with the opulence of sound and wealth of prismatic hues needed to lend the music its essential quality. Dr. Koussevitzky's masterly interpretation of the symphony is too familiar to require detailed account. The finale, however, was taken at a somewhat more deliberate pace than the conductor has sometimes employed for this division of the work, resulting in a particularly noble and imposing propulsion of the movement. If any fault could be found with the presentation, it was that there were passages for the pizzicato lower strings in the Andante which were not clearly audible in the wide spaces of the auditorium, and this was again true of the repeated B flats for the tympani leading to the trio of the scherzo.

Mr. Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, previously reviewed in these columns, met with a demonstration of approval that necessitated many bows from the composer.

N. S.

COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JAN 19 1945

Conductor George Szell becomes the fourth guest conductor to be chosen by Serge Koussevitzky to appear with the Boston Symphony. Program aired Saturday [illegible]

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

JAN 14 1945

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky on one of his many trips to New York prepares to direct the Boston Symphony in the auditorium of Hunter College. Koussevitzky has had a number of guest conductors, the next will be conductor George Szell, of the Metropolitan Opera.

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH

JAN 19 1945

LEONARD LYONS:

Stage Fright

Moritz Rosenthal, the venerable pianist, was the teacher of Elly Kassman, whose father has been with the Boston Symphony for many years. Miss Kassman makes her Town Hall debut next Tuesday . . . She confessed to Rosenthal that she would suffer from stage fright . . . "My dear Elly," said the veteran pianist who gave countless concerts all over the world, "after all these years I've learned this: stage fright is the sanest moment in an artist's life."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC

George Szell Conducts Boston Symphony in 3rd Concert Here

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with George Szell as guest conductor, gave the third concert of its season here in Metropolitan Theater last night. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was soloist.

Snow and cold did not keep many persons at home. Those who attended heard and enjoyed a program worth the arctic expedition necessary to get to it, provided one did not demand for such effort an imperishable memory.

Mr. Szell conducts without score. His readings gave one unspectacular satisfaction; they were careful, authoritative, clear, but they generated little heat. Sometimes he used scarcely any gestures, which was restful. When he did begin fencing in earnest, he still kept within bounds. He commanded a clear tone at all times and attended to details with experienced ease.

The poetic Unfinished Symphony of Schubert is nice to hear on a Winter night, or any night. Mr. Szell took the andante faster than some and perhaps lost a bit of the magic of it, but, in all, it was a pleasant renewing of acquaintance with one of the most familiar and yet least faded friends in the symphonic library.

Miss Posselt played four movements of the Symphonie Espagnole by Lalo. It is difficult to concur with Von Bulow in his opinion that the work shows "genius in every way," but the music is pleasant. Miss Posselt sang it with a tone of fine texture and warmth, an expressive tone, though not large. The andante was particularly suited to her style; it soothed the ear. She disposed of the technical tests suavely. She seemed lacking chiefly in the finale, where her utterance was perfect but on a small scale. The audience brought her back to the stage several times.

The fourth symphony by Brahms received a workmanlike reading, the second movement making an exceptionally impressive effect. The performance in general suffered slightly from moments of uncertainty that probably are inevitable when an orchestra has many conductors in one season.

George Szell Discourses On Technique of the Baton

Monitor Jan. 18

By Winthrop P. Tryon

George Szell

Who will conduct the week-end Symphony concerts.

George Szell, in reply to a query about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pointed up in the air. Obvious meaning, unuttered:

"The orchestra represents the . . ."

But he was assured that the purpose of the question was something else than to elicit praise for the town's pet musical establishment.

Mr. Szell was in the conductor's room at Symphony Hall, pulling himself together after a morning's rehearsal; for he is serving a brief term for Serge Koussevitzky, in the role of "guest" conductor. He offers at this week's concerts a piece new to Boston—Still's "In Memoriam: The Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy;" also Lalo's violin concerto known as the Spanish Symphony, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; and besides these, a small work by Smetana and the Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor. Really, a program in the regular routine, and one by no means designed to give the visitor the aspect of an exhibitionist.

⁂

A man of the sort needs no glamour bestowed on him; nor does he, in turn, need to hand compliments to the community that is his host. The finger in air made an eloquent reply to what was asked of him, except that, for the moment, he misconstrued the question. This, accordingly, was somewhat expanded and put a second time:

"Where did you find yourself when you took your place before the players of the Boston Symphony, to direct them? Where, speaking of artistic tradition and the train of musical history, did you feel that you stood?"

The answer was immediate:

"In Vienna."

Mr. Szell went on to tell of European orchestras with which he has had experience as conductor. He talked them all over, noting the particular social conditions of the locality where each one performs, remarking upon their various standards and their methods, and discussing the character and disposition of one city and another. He declared, in the end, that the handed-down orchestral style of Vienna was the most refined, consistent, and influential of any.

"The first time I heard the Boston Symphony," he explained, "I was impressed with its Viennese traits, especially in the strings. I could observe other characteristics, too—French and Russian, for example; but fundamentally I recognized a quality that seemed something of long standing, something persisting through whatever changes of policy and membership may have occurred. Was not the orchestra, a few years after first being set up, rehabilitated by a prevailing personnel from Vienna? Well, what was introduced then has continued. Such a force can last, and it can remain recognizable through every shift of time."

The question, itself in the conventional line of interview, got a free and an enthusiastic response; and the meeting had closed there, but that it was later, when the conductor had made ready for leaving the hall, renewed. This time, interrogation took a somewhat off-the-track slant, though reply came in by no means off-the-record terms. Now Mr. Szell, as a conductor on the roster of the Metropolitan Opera Association in New York, might be supposed sensitive to depreciative remark about his organization, as implied in such a query as the following:

"Mr. Szell, why does the Metropolitan Opera Company endure such a poor orchestra as it does?"

⁂

It has been well enough known that the opera orchestra for a long period was on the border line of second class, critical silence on the subject notwithstanding. Even the most renowned conductors could seldom secure results that listeners should in reason expect. Very well, too, perhaps, while the Metropolitan wore the shape of a private social institution. But it has now become more like a national concern. Prompt and fiery reply from Mr. Szell:

"That has been stopped," he said. "You will find it true no more."

Thereupon he pointed out that the orchestra for many years was an inside clique, its members taken from such talent as was available on Broadway; a circle of friends interested in the matter as a job.

"It has been broken up," averred Mr. Szell. "The players are now first-class musicians, and there has been a thorough reform. You may not observe a great difference right away; but improvement will come, and the Metropolitan's orchestra will stand with the best of them."

Further, by way of technical questioning and answering:

"You use a stick?"

"Yes, yes."

"What about your left hand?"

"Shading, phrasing, keeping the different components together; never using it for beating time."

"Do you conduct from book or from memory?"

"By the time I have mastered a score, the book becomes of more bother than use. However, I keep it by me, and I never force myself to memorize music."

"How long do you want to study a new score before trying it in rehearsal?"

"I got up a recent work of Hindemith in four or five days."

"How did you prepare it?"

"At the piano—for I am a pianist—and reading it over like any book."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
JEWISH REVIEW
1/19/45

"Serge Koussevitsky Music Library" Being Organized by Palestine Orchestra

JERUSALEM, (JTA)—The first shipment of scores which will comprise the "Koussevitsky Musical Library" of the Palestine Orchestra is en route here, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced in a cable received last week by Prof. Leo Kestenberg, conductor of the Palestine Symphony Orchestra. Additional shipments will be dispatched in the near future.

[41]

PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 18 1945

Famous Singer Here on Feb. 7

Tickets are on sale in the YM-YWHA library for the next concert which takes place on Feb. 7, at Eastside High School, at which time Dorothy Maynor, whose beautiful voice has received the praise of musicians, critics and music lovers, will appear.

DOROTHY MAYNO

Miss Maynor, the sensational new Negro soprano, is a graduate of Hampton Institute, and a member of the Westminister Choir School in Princeton. The daughter of a Norfolk Virginia minister, she became a sensation overnight when she appeared at the Berkshire Festival and sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Berge Koussevitzky.

Wherever she has sung, enraptured audiences have agreed with Oline Downes, leading critic of a New York newspaper who wrote: "She has virtually everything needed by a great artist; the superb voice, one of the finest the public can hear today, exceptional musicianship and accuracy of intonation; emotional intensity, communicative power. She should be able to reach almost any height as one of the leading concert singers of her generation."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS AN OVATION

Koussevitzky's Readings of Corelli Excerpts, Sibelius' Work Receive Praise

At its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony performed two works which had not been presented on its program last Wednesday night in the same auditorium. These were the Second symphony of Sibelius and Ettore Pinelli's arrangement for string orchestra of a Sarabande, a Gigue and a Badinerie chosen from the violin sonatas forming the Opus 5 of Corelli. The list was completed by a repetition of Béla Bartók Concerto for Orchestra, which received its New York première at the previous concert.

In the Corelli excerpts the strings played with their incomparable beauty and ductility of tone, and thereby enhanced to the utmost the inherent melodic charm of the three delightful pieces, each of which was highly contrasted with the others and yet never overstepped the bounds of classic restraint.

The brooding Sarabande was delivered in tones of remarkable silkiness and purity of texture and was a constant joy to the ear from the delicately moulded phrases at the start to the richly resonant climax at the close, being filled with deftly treated nuances throughout and the subtlest of carefully built-up crescendos. The Gigue was projected in full-bodied, resonant tones, with all the rhythmic allure and vitality needed to evoke its exuberant content. By way of sharp differentiation came the happy-spirited Badinerie, in which the ingratiating melody of the violins and the pizzicato accompaniment of the rest of the strings were handled in surpassingly delicate fashion.

The same perfection reached in the Corelli excerpts by the strings was evidenced by all of the sections of the orchestra in the performance of the Second symphony of Sibelius, accorded a reading that brought on a protracted ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and his men by its pronounced eloquence and intensity.

It was played in all of the four movements with the opulence of sound and wealth of prismatic hues needed to lend the music its essential quality. Dr. Koussevitzky's masterly interpretation of the symphony is too familiar to require detailed account. The finale, however, was taken at a somewhat more deliberate pace than the conductor has sometimes employed for this division of the work, resulting in a particularly noble and imposing propulsion of the movement. If any fault could be found with the presentation, it was that there were passages for the pizzicato lower strings in the Andante which were not clearly audible in the wide spaces of the auditorium, and this was again true of the repeated B flats for the tympani leading to the trio of the scherzo.

Mr. Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, previously reviewed in these columns, met with a demonstration of approval that necessitated many bows from the composer.

N. S.

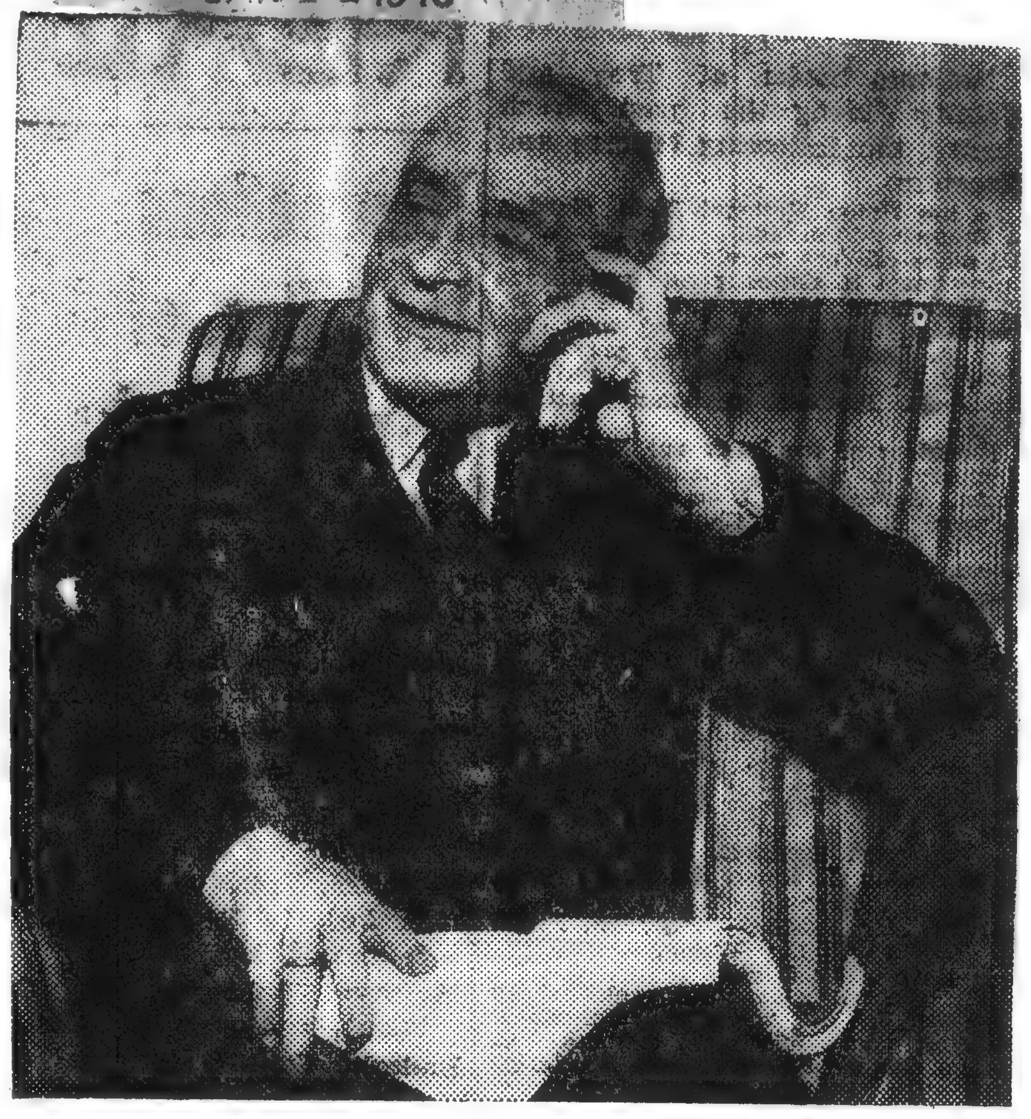
COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JAN 19 1945

Conductor George Szell becomes the fourth guest conductor to be chosen by Serge Koussevitzky to appear with the Boston Symphony. Program aired Saturday eves over the BLUE Network.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

JAN 14 1945



Conductor Serge Koussevitzky on one of his many trips to New York prepares to direct the Boston Symphony in the auditorium of Hunter College. Koussevitzky has had a number of guest conductors, the next will be conductor George Szell, of the Metropolitan Opera.

George Szell Discourses On Technique of the Baton

Monitor

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Jan. 18

George Szell, in reply to a query about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pointed up in the air. Obvious meaning, unuttered:

"The orchestra represents the . . ."

But he was assured that the purpose of the question was something else than to elicit praise for the town's pet musical establishment.

Mr. Szell was in the conductor's room at Symphony Hall, pulling himself together after a morning's rehearsal; for he is serving a brief term for Serge Koussevitzky, in the role of "guest" conductor. He offers at this week's concerts a piece new to Boston—Still's "In Memoriam: The Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy;" also Lalo's violin concerto known as the Spanish Symphony, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; and besides these, a small work by Smetana and the Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor. Really, a program in the regular routine, and one by no means designed to give the visitor the aspect of an exhibitionist.

⁂

A man of the sort needs no glamour bestowed on him; nor does he, in turn, need to hand compliments to the community that is his host. The finger in air made an eloquent reply to what was asked of him, except that, for the moment, he misconstrued the question. This, accordingly, was somewhat expanded and put a second time:

"Where did you find yourself when you took your place before the players of the Boston Symphony, to direct them? Where, speaking of artistic tradition and the train of musical history, did you feel that you stood?"

The answer was immediate:

"In Vienna."

Mr. Szell went on to tell of European orchestras with which he has had experience as conductor. He talked them all over, noting the particular social conditions of the locality where each one performs, remarking upon their various standards and their methods, and discussing the character and disposition of one city and another. He declared, in the end, that the handed-down orchestral style of Vienna was the most refined, consistent, and influential of any.

"The first time I heard the Boston Symphony," he explained, "I was impressed with its Viennese traits, especially in the strings. I could observe other characteristics, too—French and Russian, for example; but fundamentally I recognized a quality that seemed something of long standing, something persisting through whatever changes of policy and membership may have occurred. Was not the orchestra, a few years after first being set up, rehabilitated by a prevailing personnel from Vienna? Well, what was introduced then has continued. Such a force can last, and it can remain recognizable through every shift of time."

The question, itself in the conventional line of interview, got a free and an enthusiastic response; and the meeting had closed there, but that it was later, when the conductor had made ready for leaving the hall, renewed. This time, interrogation took a somewhat off-the-track slant, though reply came in by no means off-the-record terms. Now Mr. Szell, as a conductor on the roster of the Metropolitan Opera Association in New York, might be supposed sensitive to depreciative remark about his organization, as implied in such a query as the following:

"Mr. Szell, why does the Metropolitan Opera Company endure such a poor orchestra as it does?"

⁂

It has been well enough known that the opera orchestra for a long period was on the border line of second class, critical silence on the subject notwithstanding. Even the most renowned conductors could seldom secure results that listeners should in reason expect. Very well, too, perhaps, while the Metropolitan wore the shape of a private social institution. But it has now become more like a national concern. Prompt and fiery reply from Mr. Szell:

"That has been stopped," he said. "You will find it true no more."

Thereupon he pointed out that the orchestra for many years was an inside clique, its members taken from such talent as was available on Broadway; a circle of friends interested in the matter as a job.

George Szell

Who will conduct the weekend Symphony concerts.

"It has been broken up," averred Mr. Szell. "The players are now first-class musicians, and there has been a thorough reform. You may not observe a great difference right away; but improvement will come, and the Metropolitan's orchestra will stand with the best of them."

Further, by way of technical questioning and answering:

"You use a stick?"

"Yes, yes."

"What about your left hand?"

"Shading, phrasing, keeping the different components together; never using it for beating time."

"Do you conduct from book or from memory?"

"By the time I have mastered a score, the book becomes of more bother than use. However, I keep it by me, and I never force myself to memorize music."

"How long do you want to study a new score before trying it in rehearsal?"

"I got up a recent work of Hindemith in four or five days."

"How did you prepare it?"

"At the piano—for I am a pianist—and reading it over like any book."

BUFFALO, N.Y.
JEWISH REVIEW
1/19/45

"Serge Koussevitsky Music Library" Being Organized by Palestine Orchestra

JERUSALEM, (JTA)—The first shipment of scores which will comprise the "Koussevitsky Musical Library" of the Palestine Orchestra is en route here, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced in a cable received last week by Prof. Leo Kestenberg, conductor of the Palestine Symphony Orchestra. Additional shipments will be dispatched in the near future.

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH

JAN 19 1945

LEONARD LYONS:

Stage Fright

Moritz Rosenthal, the venerable pianist, was the teacher of Elly Kassman, whose father has been with the Boston Symphony for many years. Miss Kassman makes her Town Hall debut next Tuesday . . . She confessed to Rosenthal that she would suffer from stage fright . . . "My dear Elly," said the veteran pianist who gave countless concerts all over the world, "after all these years I've learned this: stage fright is the sanest moment in an artist's life."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 17 1945

MUSIC

George Szell Conducts Boston Symphony in 3rd Concert Here

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with George Szell as guest conductor, gave the third concert of its season here in Metropolitan Theater last night. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was soloist.

Snow and cold did not keep many persons at home. Those who attended heard and enjoyed a program worth the arctic expedition necessary to get to it, provided one does not demand for such effort an imperishable memory.

Mr. Szell conducts without score. His readings gave one unspectacular satisfaction; they were careful, authoritative, clear, but they generated little heat. Sometimes he used scarcely any gestures, which was restful. When he did begin fencing in earnest, he still kept within bounds. He commanded a clear tone at all times and attended to details with experienced ease.

The poetic Unfinished Symphony of Schubert is nice to hear on a Winter night, or any night. Mr. Szell took the andante faster than some, and perhaps lost a bit of the magic of it, but, in all, it was a pleasant renewing of acquaintance with one of the most familiar and yet least faded friends in the symphonic library.

Miss Posselt played four movements of the Symphonie Espagnole by Lalo. It is difficult to concur with Von Bulow in his opinion that the work shows "genius in every way," but the music is pleasant. Miss Posselt sang it with a tone of fine texture and warmth, an expressive tone, though not large. The andante was particularly suited to her style; it soothed the ear. She disposed of the technical tests suavely. She seemed lacking chiefly in the finale, where her utterance was perfect but on a small scale. The audience brought her back to the stage several times.

The fourth symphony by Brahms received a workmanlike reading, the second movement making an exceptionally impressive effect. The performance in general suffered slightly from moments of uncertainty that probably are inevitable when an orchestra has many conductors in one season.

PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 18 1945

Famous Singer Here on Feb. 7

Tickets are on sale in the YM-YWHA library for the next concert which takes place on Feb. 7, at Eastside High School, at which time Dorothy Maynor, whose beautiful voice has received the praise of musicians, critics and music lovers, will appear.

DOROTHY MAYNO

Miss Maynor, the sensational new Negro soprano, is a graduate of Hampton Institute, and a member of the Westminister Choir School in Princeton. The daughter of a Norfolk Virginia minister, she became a sensation overnight when she appeared at the Berkshire Festival and sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Berge Koussevitzky.

Wherever she has sung, enraptured audiences have agreed with Oline Downes, leading critic of a New York newspaper who wrote: "She has virtually everything needed by a great artist: the superb voice, one of the finest the public can hear today, exceptional musicianship and accuracy of intonation; emotional intensity, communicative power. She should be able to reach almost any height as one of the leading concert singers of her generation."

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ENTERTAINS VETERANS—Twenty-nine musicians participate in volunteer concert at Cushing General Hospital, Framingham.

Globe Jan. 19

Symphony Artist Hides Own Sorrow to Play for Vets

By LEONORA ROSS

The father of a boy who died heroically in France last August sat with his fellow-members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the auditorium at Cushing General Hospital, and played, with tear-dimmed eyes, music to gladden the day for the boys who came back.

Abdon Laus, of Newton, couldn't bring himself to walk through the wards after the concert to see whether the boys felt that Haydn could compete with Bing Crosby when it came to musical entertainment. The thought of his own son, Lt Andre Laus, was too much with him.

"But if my boy had been there in one of those beds instead of dead in France where he was born, I know he'd have wanted me to be one of those who asked to come here today," Laus said.

Even those members of the orchestra who had no personal reason for giving their services to bring music to the wounded men who couldn't hear them at Symphony Hall understood something of the way the middle-aged bassoon player felt when they volunteered to spend an afternoon playing for the boys.

Why Orchestra Volunteered

"It is one way that we can perhaps make some of them know that we are proud of them," Rosario Mazzeo, personnel manager of the orchestra and organizer of the group, explained in telling how the concert plan came about.

"Just now I can only say we hope this is only the first of many concerts we may give here," Mazzeo said. "It is my hope that some few of us can come each week to play request selections in the wards, and that at least once a month we can give a concert of the music the men prefer. The audience today was, to us, a most appreciative once. Not a man left before the concert was ended, and they were most quiet while the numbers were played. But I think thy liked best the "Light Cavalry Overture" and the tango number, "Jealousy," which we included. After all, they are boys who once listened to popular music only, so it is gratifying that they were not bored by anything symphonic, such as the one Haydn number."

One boy in the audience was deeply appreciative of the chance to hear symphonic music.

"I wrote that sort of music once," he said shyly. "I can't write anything now, of course," he explained, indicating the injured arm that ended his career as a pianist," but I did a pretty fair job once on a quartet—perhaps someone will think so, anyhow, and let me hear a real orchestra like this play it some day."

The men who could hobble on crutches or propel themselves in wheel chairs, as well as the ones with bandaged heads and hands and minor injuries, listened to the concert in the recreation hall, laying crutches in the wide aisle after they had stood at attention through the playing of the national anthem.

Those who couldn't walk—and some who couldn't even move in their beds—listened to the music through loudspeakers of the public address system. The handsome boyish face of the young officer who had been shot down in his 13th raid over Berlin brightened visibly when the music of Victor Herbert's "Little Gypsy Sweetheart" came through the loudspeaker, and for the moment he seemed to forget that his right leg was stretched helplessly above the bed in one of those complicated frames used in orthopedic treatment.

Another man hummed the melody of one of the Herbert songs with such high spirts that one had to look twice to realize it was the fellow in the hip-to-shoulder plaster cast.

"That's dance music if I was in dancing shape," he grinned.

"But don't let my plaster girdle fool you—I can walk around in this barrel, and I've only got to wear this one three months more."

Two rhythm fans across the aisle kept time to the music with their unbandaged legs while they rested in amazingly awkward positions in splints suspended from the frames above their beds. One, indicating the boy in the bed next to him, commented, "That's his type of music, Miss, but it takes fellows like that one to eat up symphonic stuff. He really goes for that highbrow diet." In the next bed he had indicated a serious Negro boy listening to the Herbert number.

"Sure, that's pretty," the colored soldier commented, "but what I want to know is when do we get some symphony music. That's what this boy's been waitin' for."

"We tried not to make this first program too heavy," Mazzeo explained, "but when we find boys who really want pure symphonic programs we'll be only too glad to play them."

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 19 1945

Symphony Orchestra Sends Players Here for Concert

Thirty Gifted Musicians Find GI's At Cushing Hospital Enjoy Program

Five hundred Purple Heart heroes whose ears a few short months ago were accustomed te the bitter discords of machine gun bursts and the strident screaming of exploding shells, sat motionless in rapt attention yesterday afternoon in the patients' recreation hall at Cushing General hospital as they were carried through magic casements on to a stream of golden melody by 30 gifted musicians from Boston's famed Symphony orchestra.

Exploding the theory that GIs want only jive and boogie-woogie on their musical diet, a good part of Cushing's wounded sat silently in the darkened hall their eyes trained on the lighted stage where Louis Speyer, soloist on the English horn, took a turn at conducting his fellow orchestra members in such works as the first movement of Haydn's London Symphony and Suppe's Light Cavalry Overture. There was no conversation in the hall even during the intervals between selections as the musicians tuned their instruments.

Vociferous appreciation expressed by whistles and enthusiastic handclapping may be something new to the Symphony artists but no one could doubt the heartfelt sincerity of the applause given by the soldiers as they responded to the delicate tracery of Bolzoni's Minuet or the lilting magic of a medley of Perennial Victor Herbert favorites.

Have Sons in Service

Not all the gratitude was on the side of the GIs either. The Symphony musicians many of whom have sons on European and South[illegible] Pacific battlefronts, are eager to play for the wounded men. This feeling was put into words by Abdon Laus, bassoon player, whose hero son Lt. Andre Laus fought [illegible] the Sicilian invasion, the [illegible] battle of Salerno and the hazardous Normandy landing only to be killed in his native France on Aug 29. Lt Laus who was married and the father of a two-year-old [illegible] was decorated with the Silver Star for gallantry in action and will be posthumously awarded another medal for his last act in battle.

His father, speaking in a pleasant French accent, said simply, "You see, Andre was a child of the [illegible]. Everyone in the orchestra knew him. I have been with the Boston Symphony for 27 years. I especially like to play for the boys because of him. He was a good soldier."

Another soldier who grew up with the symphony, Andre Speyer, the son of Louis Speyer, home on furlough from Fort Hamilton, Brooklyn, N. Y., had a chance to play the French horn under his father's baton yesterday. Young Speyer is stationed with the 378th Army Service Force band at Fort Hamilton.

The elder Speyer has been with the Symphony for 26 years, having come to this country in 1918 with the French Military band to play at camp and military shows of that other war. He came here only for a visit but stayed on when he was invited to play for the Boston Symphony and has been with it ever since.

Another Concert Next Week

Yesterday's program which opened with the National Anthem and concluded with the Victor Herbert medley, was the first of a series planned by the symphony players who offer their services freely and play on their own time. Other music afternoons will be presented at both Cushing General hospital and Chelsea Naval hospital. It is planned at next week's concert to invite any talented GIs who play an instrument to join with the Boston artists.

It was a far cry from the horrors of jungle growth, muddy ditches and death to the molten silver of Strauss' Blue Danube Waltzes and the zest and life of Brahms' Fifth Hungarian Dance but the GI's roaring applause showed they welcomed the change.

Other selections included Sousa's stirring Washington Post March and Scott's Toy Trumpet with Marcel LaFosse doing a delightful piece of work as trumpet soloist in the latter. Among the encores was Gade's tango, Jalousie. The musicians' visit was arranged through the Cushing General hospital Public Relations and Special Service offices under the direction of Capt. Eugene Flynn and Capt. W. F. MacWilliams.

EVERETT, MASS.
NEWS GAZETTE

JAN 18 1945

Famed Musicians To Appear At Church Concert

On January 31, the First Congregational church will present a concert, featuring two noted artists of the Boston Symphony orchesta, ~~Einar Hansen and Alan~~ Hovaness. They will appear through the courtesy of Mr. George Kumple who is sponsoring the concert.

The proceeds of the entertainment are to be used for the purchase of new hymnals and anyone purchasing a ticket and desiring it will have his name inscribed in a hymnal. The tickets are now available to all the public, since the date set for exclusively for members has expired.

Einar Hansen, famous Danish violinist, gave his first performance at the age of ten and continued his studies in Germany with the best masters, among them Prof. Henry Marteau and Jean Gesterkamp, and also studying Chamber Music under Max Fiedler. He became the most popular young soloist of his time, appearing before royal families of Sweden, Denmark, Germany and Greece. Einar Hansen was the first concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Bremen and Dresden during the season of 1922-1925. Max Fiedler, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra says: "Einar Hansen has an extraordinary talent; his beautiful tone is combined with real musicianship and technical mastery."

Alan Hovaness, born in Somerville, made his debut at the age of ten in a recital which not only included Bach and Beethoven but also his own compositions, which he made attempts to compose when he was four. While going to school in Arlington he wrote two operas which were performed with tremendous success. After receiving a scholarship in his first year in high school, Hovaness went directly to the New England Conservatory of Music as a pupil of Frederick S. Converse, noted American composer. He also studied piano with Heinrick Gebhard. In 1934 the Bostonian composer sailed to visit Jean Sibelius and had the honor of playing the Sibelius pianoforte Sonata on his piano in Jarvenpaa. Hovaness has played for the Musical Guild, Boston; the Institute for Advanced Education, Roerich Museum, New York, the Museum of Fine Arts Boston, Jordan Hall, Boston and many others. His music has been played by symphony orchestras all over the world.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 27 1945

MUSIC

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with George Szell as guest conductor, gave the third concert of its season here in Metropolitan Theater last night. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was soloist.

Snow and cold did not keep many persons at home. Those who attended heard and enjoyed a program worth the arctic expedition necessary to get to it, provided one does not demand for such effort an imperishable memory.

Mr. Szell conducts without score. His readings gave one unspectacular satisfaction; they were careful, authoritative, clear, but they generated little heat. Sometimes he used scarcely any gestures, which was restful. When he did begin fencing in earnest, he still kept within bounds. He commanded a clear tone at all times and attended to details with experienced ease.

The poetic Unfinished Symphony of Schubert is nice to hear on a Winter night, or any night. Mr. Szell took the andante faster than some, and perhaps lost a bit of the magic of it, but, in all, it was a pleasant renewing of acquaintance with one of the most familiar and yet least faded friends in the symphonic library.

Miss Posselt played four movements of the Symphonie Espagnole by Lalo. It is difficult to concur with Von Bulow in his opinion that the work shows "genius in every way," but the music is pleasant. Miss Posselt sang it with a tone of fine texture and warmth, an expressive tone, though not large. The andante was particularly suited to her style; it soothed the ear. She disposed of the technical tests suavely. She seemed lacking chiefly in the finale, where her utterance was perfect but on a small scale. The audience brought her back to the stage several times.

The fourth symphony by Brahms received a workmanlike reading, the second movement making an exceptionally impressive effect. The performance in general suffered slightly from moments of uncertainty that probably are inevitable when an orchestra has many conductors in one season.

PATERSON, N. J.
CALL

JAN 19 1945

Dorothy Maynor To Sing At E.H.S. Feb. 7

DOROTHY MAYNOR

Tickets are on sale in the "Y" library for the next concert which takes place on Feb. 7 at Eastside High School, at which time Dorothy Maynor, whose beautiful voice has received the praise of musicians, critics and music lovers, will appear.

Miss Maynor, the sensational new Negro soprano, is a graduate of Hampton Institute, and a member of the Westminster Choir School in Princeton. The daughter of a Norfolk, Va., minister, she became a sensation overnight when she appeared at the Berkshire Festival and sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Wherever she has sung, enraptured audiences have agreed with Olin Downes, leading critic, who wrote: "She has virtually everything needed by a great artist; the superb voice, one of the finest the public can hear today, exceptional musicianship and accuracy of intonation; emotional intensity, communicative power. She should be able to reach almost any height as one of the leading concert singers of her generation."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 20 1945

Danton Walker

(Copyright, 1945)

Broadway Roundup

This Wacky World: Some Army officers on the staff that is now running Montgomery Ward for the Government worked for Sears Roebuck in their civilian days . . . The Harvard Faculty Club of Cambridge, Mass., consumes 100 pounds of horsemeat smothered in onions each week and likes it . . . Boys aboard the S. S. Santa Rita, too long deprived of feminine society, have formed a society for the abolition of the sex theme in modern novels . . . Leading a recent list of hit records is one by Louis Prima entitled "Hitsum-Kitsum-Bumpity-Itsum" and "What's the Matter Marie?" . . . Beulah, the maid on the Fibber McGee and Molly show, is played by a male actor, Marlin Hurt.

* * *

Now that Lauren Bacall's run-of-the-mill contract is about to run out, all major studios are bidding for her at fancy figures. Meantime, Jack Warner declined a $10,000 radio deal for her services . . . M-G-M has quietly released Ginny Simms, who used to be Louis B. Mayer's favorite dancing partner in the Hollywood cafes . . . Mickey Rooney's letters to his wife tell her, in no uncertain terms, that he is against her launching a film career after the stork arrives . . . Sidney Skolsky, the pint-sized columnist, has eased himself into a producer's berth in Hollywood . . . There's talk of Phil Harris leaving the Jack Benny show to team up with his wife, Alice Faye, on their own radio-musical show . . . Also talk that Virginia Weidler may be Eddie Bracken's leading lady on his new air series.

* * *

Judith Evelyn, the tortured heroine of "Angel Street," will have another pathological role in the new John Golden-Rachel Crothers drama co-starring Victor Jory . . . John Emery, Tallulah's ex-husband, declined to play opposite her in "Foolish Notion." . . . Dick Lasalle inherits the band of the late Neil Bondshu . . . By War Department order, the Army Air Forces orchestra formerly led by Captain Glenn Miller will henceforth be known as Glenn Miller's Band of the A.E.F. . . . Woody Herman, with six polls citing him as the bandleader of the year, will stay another three weeks at the Paramount.

* * *

Ella Winters (Mrs. Donald Ogden Stewart) writes, "I am not feuding with the OWI; on the contrary, I'm working with them very closely on the friendliest terms, as I did in Moscow." . . . Moss Hart is about to depart on a USO tour, his Bucks county neighbors hear . . . One Broadway actress observes that, with USO entertainers absolved from the draft, there'll be two actors for every soldier from now on . . . Holt will publish Katherine Dunham's autobiography . . . Promoters of the Esquire Magazine's jazz contest are hard put to explain why Count Basie, who won the silver award, wasn't invited to appear on the air ceremonies.

* * *

Heitor Villa-Lobos, Mexico's famous composer, will conduct the Boston Symphony in two concerts, in Boston and at Harvard. . . . The pianist at the Beverly Hills Tropics Club is William Friml, Rudolf Friml's son . . . The Wesson Brothers, bowing in at the Pierre's Cotillion Room Feb. 1, will satirize their night club contemporaries . . . The musical score for Le Martinique's next show, by Hughie Price and Dick Rodgers, will kid the columnists . . . J. Wesley, free-lance announcer, was picked over all the big name announcers to handle the Bob Hope show from the East . . . The Monte Carlo is in a dither over newspaper notices advertising for sale the effects of the "Famous Monte Carlo restaurant." That's Louise's Monte Carlo on W. 48th st. that is being sold for taxes, not the 54th st. glamor spot.

Miss Posselt for Soloist, Mr. Szell as Guest Leader

Jan. 20

Monitor

By L. A. Sloper

Returning for a second visit as guest conductor, George Szell presented yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, as the thirteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, these works: Still—"In Memoriam: The Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy"; Smetana—"From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests"; Lalo—Spanish Symphony (Ruth Posselt, soloist); Brahms—Fourth Symphony.

William Grant Still's work was heard for the first time in Boston, and indeed this was the first time he had been represented at these concerts, although his compositions have been played by other orchestras. "In Memoriam" is one of a number of short works, written by invitation of the League of Composers, and commemorative of the present war.

Mr. Still, who is known as an accomplished composer, has here written with obvious sincerity and feeling a tribute to those members of his race who have fallen in action. He has avoided anything that might draw attention to himself by its striking originality, and has relied rather on characteristic racial melody treated simply but with appropriate solemnity.

The Symphonie Espagnole had not been heard at these concerts since 1924, according to the program notes. Of course, it has been played repeatedly at recitals, but it was hard to realize that it had been so long absent from the Symphony programs. Miss Posselt, who is an artist well liked by the musical public, gave a performance marked by her familiar technical proficiency, lyrical feeling and rhythmic suppleness. Her tone was sweet though not broad and her intonation secure, but she had some difficulty in keeping up her end in the matter of volume. Miss Posselt and her collaborators received an ovation.

Mr. Szell, besides doing well by Mr. Still and Lalo, gave the music of his fellow countryman, Smetana, a sympathetic reading, playing its simple peasant melodies without attempting to embellish them or their orchestral dress in performance.

His way with Brahms recalled his approach to Schubert when he directed the C major Symphony here two years ago. He again made it evident that he knows precisely what he wants from the orchestra and has the technique and the authority to realize his own ideas of interpretation. And again those ideas involved individual treatment which was not always a kindness to the composer. Slow passages were dragged, dynamic contrasts were sudden and violent, attacks were not always clean, balance of choirs was sometimes sacrificed, and the orchestral design was often obscured. In view of these things, the symphony was, of course, not soundly built architecturally, and its melos was largely lost. Nevertheless, the performance was not without effectiveness and it was well received.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 20 1945

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

FOSS MUSIC PLAYED BY PHILHARMONIC

'The Prairie' Is Performed Impressively—Brailowsky in Beethoven Concerto

By OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by Dr. Rodzinski and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall offered Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto with Alexander Brailowsky as soloist, and the first performance by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of Lukas Foss' cantata for chorus, solo voices and orchestra, "The Prairie," after the poetry of Carl Sandburg.

This latter work was given its premiére last May 15 by the Collegiate Chorale under the direction of Robert Shaw. It then made a considerable impression. That impression was strengthened last night, and in some ways that were unexpected, for passages which had not driven home in the smaller hall drove home on this occasion, while other places to which, perhaps, more significance had been given than they deserved, receded into minor or negligible perspectives.

This is comparative. The impression was confirmed of music fresh in quality and feeling, technically expert, sophisticated and modern idiom, yet wholly sincere and unaffected in its expressive purpose. It is not music in the folk style, or of a character that one would designate as Sandburgian. Mr. Foss makes no attempt to put an American label on his composition, though his sympathy with the scences evoked by Sandburg's poetry is evident and unmistakable.

This is natural because of his approach and esthetic background. Mr. Foss, now 22 years of age, and since his fifth year a student successively at the Curtis Institute and at the Berkshire Music Center under Koussevitzky, was born in Berlin. Precociously talented, he studied four years in Paris before reaching the United States. But his style is logically international and contemporaneous, the result of European heredity and early environment. Yet it is imaginatively reflective of Sandburg's sentiment and scenery.

He has not only a modern composer's technique but a fluency which a composer of lesser purpose might have unscrupulously employed for superficial effect. As a matter of fact, he would have gained if he had not been so meticulous in following to the syllable the wordy periods. The verbiage could have been given more frequently than is the case—a simpler and broader musical line, where the recitation of Whitmanesque detail is concerned. This applies to the vocal line, not to the instrumental commentary, which is economical and imaginative in most places.

But we are not engaged here in a dissection, bit by bit, of a score that shows unmistakable talent and invention. The sum of it is a score that makes its mark with pronounced effect. The use of the chorus by itself and with the solo voices is very skillful and imaginative. When there is occasion to evoke vistas of the great plain, of waters, sunsets, the passing of the ages, the fierce power of the new civilization rising from the earth, and emotions of semi-barbaric homage to that earth, the music rings true.

That is a great deal to say. What Mr. Foss can do when he has a lyrical opportunity is shown by the two solo songs, "O Prairie Girl" and "Songs Hidden in Eggs." These are simple and beautiful, contrasting with the great choruses.

The Westminster Choir sang with its wonted finish, sonority and distinct enunciation. There was a well-chosen quartet, consisting of Dorothy Kirsten, soprano; Nan Merriman, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Todd Duncan, baritone, whose diction was exemplary.

Mr. Brailowsky's performance of the Beethoven concerto was nobly conceived and in every way representative of the musician and virtuoso of his international reputation.

Throughout the evening the orchestral playing was of a very high order, and of special value to Mr. Foss in the elucidation of his score.

Globe Jan. 20

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The gifted and dynamic George Szell has returned to Boston to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the two weeks of Serge Koussevitzky's mid-season vacation. At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon Mr. Szell renewed the highly favorable impression he had made upon his first appearances two years ago, both as technician and interpreter.

The interesting program covered all three of those desirable points in program-making: something new—William Grant Still's "In Memoriam: the Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy;" something old but rarely heard: Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests" and the Spanish Symphony by Lalo; a standard classic—Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

Mr. Still's elegiac and ably-written music was new to Boston. This was also the first time the composer had been represented on a Boston Symphony program. "In Memoriam" is hardly remarkable for invention or originality, but the composer's intention is plain and his sincerity evident. "In Memoriam" is melodic and the harmonies are lush. Mr. Still's grasp of instrumentation is more than competent.

Two years ago Mr. Szell gave us the second symphonic poem, "The Moldau," from the cycle of six musical vistas that Smetana called "My Country." "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests," which is No. 4, has been more neglected even than "The Moldau," the last Boston performance having been in 1915. Why? This is gloriously descriptive and ingratiating, full of warmth and sun and peasant dances, abounding in tunes and irresistible rhythms. The performance was brilliant.

Ruth Posselt was soloist in Lalo's Spanish Symphony, once popular but unheard at these concerts since 1924. Apart from some uncertainties of pitch—mostly on the G string—Miss Posselt played with all of her accustomed technical virtuosity and the excellent musicianship that have brought her to the forefront of contemporary violinists. The Spanish Symphony seems a little tame now, and just such a violinist as Miss Posselt is required to restore its glitter.

Mr. Szell is an exacting but not a showy conductor who spares neither himself nor his orchestra. He insists upon impeccable attacks and a bright, clear and balanced tone. His own ear is very keen and in consequence you hear all of the musical texture. An inner voice may be no more than a wisp, but it is there and you hear it.

Mr. Szell's graceful and imaginative Brahms was quite remarkable, for in a Symphony often made to seem almost harshly grandiose, he stressed melodic contours, he softened some of the Brahmsian angles and gave the score a certain warmth you do not invariably find in it. In view of such excellences, the untidiness of certain orchestral details in the scherzo and finale were almost forgotten.

Post Jan. 20

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert, conducted by the Metropolitan's George Szell, had two things to recommend it: a most agreeable program and the Czech maestro's masterly, musicianly, discerning and sympathetic direction. The combination sent you away with the feeling of an afternoon most pleasantly and profitably spent.

To the above delights there should be added one more, the highly accomplished and exceedingly persuasive violin playing of Boston's Ruth Posselt, who appeared as soloist in the "Spanish Symphony" of Lalo, a work played to death by recitalists but unheard at the Symphony Concerts since 1924. The orchestra, as we were reminded yesterday, is a big help. With its assistance the Symphony is still fresh and vital.

For the first time in Boston Mr. Szell presented William Grant Still's "In Memorian: The Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy." We had already made the acquaintance of Mr. Still at the Pops, through portions of his "Afro-American" Symphony. The present piece is sincere, straightforward and affecting music, skillfully made. It has a certain kinship with the spirituals but there are no disturbing quotations.

Between Still and Lalo came a welcome revival, after 30 years, of Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests," one of the six symphonic poems composing the cycle, "My Country." The musical idiom is direct and folksy. There is the inevitable polka and the brilliant orchestration. A work, this, that came from the heart of the composer and warms that of the listener. Such should not be allowed to gather dust on the library shelf.

By way of conclusion, Mr. Szell offered Brahms' Fourth Symphony, played here no longer ago than last April, yet nevertheless a new and stimulating experience. Mr. Szell's tempi seemed infallibly right, every structural detail was properly in place, and some that are occasionally overlooked were brought to light. There were no false heroics, no inappropriate emotionalism, yet the performance was anything but inexpressive. Here and elsewhere Mr. Szell used no score, though he does not disdain the baton, which he handles with consummate skill. A conductor accustomed to command, he works his will with a gratifying absence of fuss and feathers.

the cycle, "My Coun-l idiom is direct and the inevitable polka t orchestration. A ame from the heart and warms that of should not be al-dust on the library

nclusion, Mr. Szell Fourth Symphony,
onger ago than last theless a new and rience. Mr. Szell's fallibly right, every was properly in place,
re occasionally over-ght to light. There ics, no inappropriate
the performance was pressive. Here and all used no score,
ot disdain the baton.
s with consummate accustomed to comis will with a gratiuss and feathers.

Herald

MUSIC

Jan. 20

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra, George Szell conducting, gave the 13th concert of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

"In Memoriam: The Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy" .... Still
"From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests" Smetana
Spanish Symphony, Op. 21 .... Lalo
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

The return to Boston of George Szell serves to prove anew that he must be reckoned with as a formidable man of music. He is, in fact, one of the most reassuring [illegible] conductors in contemporary music for he represents a school, now near extinct, of the great Germanic tradition in orchestral technique, a tradition in which dignity and austerity are combined with—as St. Thomas Aquinas put it—wholeness, symmetry and radiance. Yet the austerity is not that of a Nikisch; there is in Mr. Szell's style just enough of the current trend to sensation, to virtuosity, even to showmanship, to suit the times. The point is, he never cheapens either his music or himself to achieve a striking but frequently meretricious effect. He is sound.

Proof of his distinguished approach to music may be observed in his use of the stick or baton. He has understood its reason-for-being and perceived its function, and he has given that instrument its true meaning and stature again. It is true that delicate effects may be achieved without the baton, but the melodic arcs and stresses, the tempi, the dynamics and all the modifications of these things cannot, I am convinced, be obtained by the greatest of conductors from musicians who cannot see—without conscious effort—where the beat lies. Mr. Szell uses the baton as a means of liberating the musicians from technical preoccupation, which means that he wants nothing between him and them which could possibly distort or diminish the musical values as he conceives them. In any case, no guest conductor achieves such perfection of attack and release as Mr. Szell does and few indeed achieve such real distinction of phrase.

Having sat so long with this point I'm afraid I can't do the other notable aspects of the concert full justice. William Grant Still's tribute to the Negro soldiers who have given their lives for democracy is a beautiful and touching composition, one of utmost sincerity and certainly well worth the hearing, while Smetana's seldom-played "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests" is time well spent. But it was Ruth Posselt's really delightful performance of Lalo's Spanish Symphony, and the traversal of Brahms' Fourth Symphony by conductor and orchestra that lifted the concert into the one-of-the-best-possible class.

For her part, Miss Posselt never achieved such grace of line and such clarity and poise of tone as she did in the second and third movements of the Lalo. Indeed, she made what is fundamentally fairly trivial musical diversion a joy to listen to, while the orchestral accompaniment matched her own spirit.

PASSAIC, N. J.
SUNDAY EAGLE

AN 21 1945

nductor Serge Koussevitzky on one of his many trips to New ork prepares to direct the Boston Symphony in the auditorium of unter College. Koussevitzky has had a number of guest conductors, e next will be conductor George Szell, of the Metropolitan Opera.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

JAN 20 1945

RADIO STAR BEAMS

Philadelphia Orchestra: Artur Rubinstein, renowned pianist, will be soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" over CBS-KTRH at 4 p.m. Eugene Ormandy also will conduct the orchestra in Martinu's Second Symphony and the overture to "Der Freischutz" by Weber.

* * *

Meet Your Navy: Warrant Officer George Tweed, the "ghost of Guam," who for 31 months lived as a fugitive behind the Jap lines, will describe his adventures on Meet Your Navy, 6:30, BNC-KXYZ.

* * *

The FBI in Peace and War: Extortion forms the basis for the FBI drama, "Nemesis in the Sky," on FBI in Peace and War, 7:30 p.m., CBS-KTRH.

* * *

Boston Symphony: Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony conducted by George Szell, in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" at 7:30 p.m., BNC-KXYZ. The orchestra will play Still's "In Memoriam," Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forest," and an excerpt from "My Country."

MAMARONECK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 22 1945

Local Artists To Perform For Kentucky Women's Club

Mrs. Henry Watson Boteler of 99 North Chatsworth Avenue, Larchmont, will serve as chairman of the day tomorrow afternoon at the meeting of the New York Society of Kentucky Women, at the Vanderbilt Hotel in New York.

The afternoon's program will feature Gertrude A. Hepworth, of Larchmont, monologist, and Miss Fiona McCleary, formerly of Mamaroneck, pianist. Mrs. John Henry Trent, president, will preside.

Larchmont members of the society planning to attend include Mrs. Mary Erkins, Mrs. Hunter Holding, Mrs. Richard C. Murphy and Mrs. Muir Weissinger. Mrs. Boteler's guest will be Mrs. Allen Boteler of Shelby County, Kr.

Fiona McCleary is a former pupil of Myra Hess and of Arnold Bax and Vaughn Williams, leading British composers. Miss McCleary has played in concerts in England, Switzerland and Germany as well as in the United States.

A composer herself, having started at the age of 15, her music has been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as over the leading radio stations of New York. She has written for orchestra, string ensemble, voice, piano, violin and ballet. Among the compositions she will play will be works of Chopin, Debussy, Rachmaninov and three of her own compositions.

Mrs. Hepworth, a graduate of the Boardman School of Art, London, England, received the highest award in the Welsh Annual Contest and was listed for a command performance before she sailed for Japan where she lived for 15 years. She has broadcast with the British Broadcasting Company as actress and director or radio programs.

Tomorrow the members of the Society will hear a special monologue dedicated to them, called, "Kentucky Snapshots." She will repeat Cameo moments, another of her own scripts, as well as two other groups of monologues.

[44]

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
POST

JAN 20 1945

Highlighting What's On The Air Tonight

6:30 p. m. WAPI—America in the Air will pay tribute to men of the U. S. Air Forces in a dramatization of an authentic story of aerial combat.

6:45 p. m. WSGN—— Signs that isolationist thinking is growing again in America are revealed by Washington Columnist Barnet Nover and his special guest, Sen. Warren R. Austin, Vermont, in a discussion and interview on Nover's News, Views and Interviews.

7 p. m. WAPI—Danny Kaye will pop his comedy on his own show, assisted by Harry James and his Music Makers, Eve Arden and Lionel Stander.

7 p. m. WSGN—Full flavor of an evening of dancing as the forefathers of present-day Americans knew and loved it is recaptured in the broadcast of the early American dance orchestra.

7:30 p. m. WSGN—Works by the American composer, William Grant Still, Smetana, and Lalo will be featured during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 16th broadcast. George Szell, Metropolitan Opera conductor, will be the fourth of five guest conductors. Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be soloist.

8 p. m. WAPI—Lawrence Tibbett, Joan Edwards, the Hit Paraders, and Mark Warnow's orchestra bring the 10 top tunes on Your Hit Parade.

8:45 p. m. WAPI—Favorites by Jerome Kern and Cole Porter will be included in the Saturday Night Serenade. Jessica Draggonette will sing "The Touch of Your Hand," from Kern's operetta "Roberta," and Lara's "You Belong to My Heart." The orchestra will do a special arrangement of "Is It the Girl " from Porter's "Seven Lively Arts" score.

9:30 p. m. WAPI—Included in the Most Beloved Melodies quarter hour concert time will be Jarnefelt's "Prelude;" "Barcarolle" from "Tales of Hoffman," by Offenbach; and the Waltz from Guonod's opera "Faust." As an added attraction Paul Robeson will sing the popular "Water Boy," by Avery-Robins.

10:30 p. m. WSGN—Warrant Officer George Ray Tweed, the "Ghost of Guam," who for 31 months lived as a fugitive behind the Jap lines on Guam, will be featured on the Meet Your Navy program.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

JAN 21 1945

"The Prairie," the work of 22-year-old Lukas Foss, will be performed by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Artur Rodzinski over CBS-KRLD at 2 p. m. Sunday. Soloists will include Dorothy Kirsten, Nan Merriman, William Hain, and Todd Duncan who appeared here in the presentation of "Porgy and Bess" last year.

Works of Haydn and Hindemith will highlight the Boston Symphony Orchestra's broadcast Saturday over Blue-KGKO at 7:30 p. m. George Szell, Met conductor, will make his second guest appearance.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 21 1945

IN THE MAILBAG

To the Radio Editor:

ALL four leading symphony orchestras of the country are now being broadcast regularly on the networks. The Philadelphia Orchestra appears as a sustaining feature on CBS, and its broadcasts are, accordingly, well constructed and managed without the compromises usually imposed by a sponsor. The NBC Symphony Orchestra program, although sponsored by General Motors and therefore interrupted by a lengthy "message" from the sponsor, is nevertheless a well-made radio package. The Philharmonic-Symphony has the considerable advantage of having an additional half-hour at its disposal.

The broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, musically the most colorful of the four, comes off poorest in several respects. Far too much of the hour is devoted to the sales-talk of a sponsor who keeps assuring the listener that he not only doesn't want to sell him anything but couldn't even if he would. And after many months that have elapsed since the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to the air, the transmission remains irregular and uncertain in quality, sometimes very good, sometimes poor.

The last fact is understandable when the broadcasts originate from a strange hall on the road. But most of them come from Symphony Hall, an acoustical medium of the same liveness, brilliance and dependability as Carnegie Hall, home of the Philharmonic, or the Philadelphia Orchestra's Academy of Music, and much superior to NBC's Studio 8-H. I know of no reason, aside from sloth or ignorance, why the Boston Symphony broadcasts cannot regularly be on a high level of technical excellence.

MOSES SMITH.

Brookline, Mass.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

JAN 22 1945

Teen-Age Girl Is Sensation At Metropolitan

New Coloratura Stirs Controversy In Opera Circles

By Helen Havener

There is probably no figure in the music world today about whom such a storm of controversy rages as young Patricia Munsell, the 'teen-age coloratura at the Metropolitan. Not that anyone—even the most caustic critic—denies that she has exceptional gifts. The question seems to be whether youthful talent is being exploited when Miss Munsell assumes roles in the opera that in other days were the sacred property of such stars as Tettrazini and Sembrich; whether her phenomenally high voice will stand the strain constantly imposed upon it; and whether she can convincingly act the tragic roles which are in the minds of most opera-goers ineradicably identified with mature artists.

Your reviewer does not pretend to be qualified to answer any of those questions with authority, but of one thing she is sure, on the basis of an experience not yet 96-hours old. Whatever the critics think, the public is completely Munsell-minded, entirely satisfied to have a prima donna slim, svelte, youthful, with charm of both face and figure, interpret the roles made famous by the great stars of the past. My profession—and my pleasures—have taken me often to the Metropolitan in recent years, but I have seldom seen such unbridled enthusiasm as greeted Miss Munsell last Friday evening after she had essayed the "mad scene" and other of the moving arias from Donizetti's tragic opera based on Sir Walter Scott's tale of The Bride of Lammermoor.

Young Pianist Impresses

Youth was certainly distinctly to the fore in the metropolis this week. Young Lukas Foss, the 22-year-old pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also heard the thunder of applause swelling to tidal wave proportions to greet the impressive performance of his cantata, The Prairie, given at Carnegie Hall by the New York - Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Artur Rodzinski conducting, with the Westminster Choir and four distinguished soloists. The work, a musical setting to Carl Sandburg's poem of the same name, was originally heard in New York at Town Hall last year in a presentation by the Collegiate Choral, Robert Shaw conducting, but at that time the accompaniment was provided by a chamber orchestra. It is far more impressive with an orchestra of full symphony proportions.

There are those who like—and those who do not like so well—music in the ultra-modern vein. But regardless of whether one leans to the classic or the current mode, The Prairie is a phenomenal achievement for a boy of 22 and the audience in toto obviously subscribed to that truism, as attested by the uproar which greeted the young composer at the finale. Coming out almost bashfully, in his informal brown tweeds, to acknowledge the salvos of an audience dressed in its best bib and tucker and an orchestra in formal evening clothes, Mr. Foss gave an impression of youth and modesty which view with that created the succeeding evening by Miss Munsell.

Leopold Stokowski, always Young America's friend, also introduced a new youth experiment during the week. The Young People's Concerts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society have been so heavily subscribed for many years that although everyone is welcome who can possibly manage to squeeze into Carnegie Hall for these six outstanding seasonal events, there is not room for the vast army of public school children who either love music or should have their musical tastes educated.

Youth Concerts Popular

In a series of popular concerts for youth audiences which started in midweek at the City Center, Mr. Stokowski is catering to this very special group. Some of them were more vociferous in their expressions of approval than the children carefully chaperoned by their parents who attend the Carnegie Hall concerts. But in any event their response indicated that here, too, is a youth audience to whom one can feed such musical chef d'oeuvres as Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde and Bruch's G Minor Concerto without giving them musical indigestion.

Incidentally, it was a 13-year-old violinist who rendered the Bruch in such a spirited way as to bring the galleries upstanding—not to mention the parquet.

Apropos of Mt. Stokowski, one of the outstanding items of music news of the week was the announcement that he has signed a three-year contract with the Hollywood Bowl Association to conduct its Symphonies under the Stars. The arrangement begins with the summer series of 1945. In addition to conducting the Los Angeles Philharmonic at the Bowl, Mr. Stokowski will supervise all the Bowl's recordings and radio and motion picture appearances.

Bruno Walter has at last been coaxed out of his retirement. The sabattical which he had planned to take this year will not be a sabbatical in entirety. He will emerge from his self-imposed seclusion to conduct the Pension Fund Concert of the New York Philharmonic on March 7, and four performances of Bach's St. Matthew Passion, beginning March 29. He will also conduct some opera performances at the Metropolitan in the Spring.

SAULT STE. MARIE, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 22 1945

"One of Great Ones of Present Age" Say Critics of Laderoute's Voice

Joseph Victor Laderoute, who will appear in concert here Thursday night, has become known throughout the United States and Canada as "that rare phenomenon of a brilliant boy soprano developing into a great tenor."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of ~~the Boston Symphony~~ orchestra, is among the outstanding musicians and conductors who have accaimed his voice as one of the great ones of the present age and he has been pronounced by critics as among the top flight of present-day tenors. When Dr. Koussevitzky heard Laderoute in audition, he immediately engaged him for two performances with the Boston Symphony.

Laderoute has appeared as guest soloist with several of the renowned symphony organizations in the United States and Canada; with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the late Frederick Stock; the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under Victor Kolar and Howard Barlow; the Toronto Symphony under Sir Ernest MacMillan and the Cincinnati Symphony under Eugene Goossens.

"There is no height in the opera or concert field that Mr. Laderoute cannot reach," Director Leon Rothier wrote of him and a metropolitan reviewer declared:

"Laderoute has one of the great tenor equipments of the day: range, uniform quality, extreme expression, a gift of tongues and an excellent authority which is the fruit of sounder musical education than most singers possess. He is a French-Canadian, big and brawny and splendidly gifted. He has obviously had excellent training and his singing was completely in the tradition."

His early training was received in this city under the tutelage of Mrs. Louis H. McPike. He was heard here frequently as soloist in various churches and began to sing professionally at the age of five. As a boy soprano he made a tour of the entire United States as guest soloist with the Paulist Choristers under the famous Father William J. Finn.

No young American singer has made such a constant and rapid development in recent years as Laderoute, critics declare. He is said to have a phenomenal repertoire ready to sing at a moment's notice. He knows nearly 40 works to sing in choral and orchestral concerts and he has nine of the better known French and Italian lyric tenor opera roles available.

Thursday night's concert here will be for the benefit of the Kiwanis milk fund and is scheduled to begin at 8:15.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 24 1945

The Detroit Symphony, with Marjorie Lawrence as soprano soloist, will present an all-Wagner program over WICC-MBS Saturday night at 8:30. Karl Krueger will conduct the Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Bruennhilde's Immolation Scene from "The Twilight of the Gods," the Magic Fire Music from "Die Walkure" and the Finale of "Das Rheingold."

George Szell will conduct the Boston ~~Symphony over~~ WNAB-Blue Saturday night at 8:30 in Haydn's C major Symphony No. 97 and Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of themes by Weber.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
HERALD

JAN 21 19

Know Your Symphony

. . . . . By Carroll C. Davidson

We should like to digress temporarily from the usual procedure adopted in these articles. Instead of discussing the music for the next concert of the Grand Rapids Symphony we intend spending a little time with the individuals who make that music possible. We are thinking particularly of Dr. Malko, who now is in his third year as conductor of the orchestra.

Dr. Malko's taking over of the orchestra has been more than fortunate for Grand Rapids. Fortunate is not too exact an expression inasmuch as the Symphony society exercised more than a little good judgment in the matter. But the choice of Dr. Malko for conductor has been an exceedingly happy one and one on which the organization can be congratulated.

Mr. Davidson

Since coming to this country some four years ago, Dr. Malko has given ample evidence of the qualities which had made him one of the foremost conductors of Europe. He has been guest conductor with the Boston symphony, the NBC symphony, ~~at the Ravinia~~ concerts in Chicago, and with many other organizations throughout the country. His success in all appearances has been outstanding and critics have been enthusiastic in praise of his work.

✦ ✦ ✦

There is no need to reiterate here the superlatives which critics have used to describe his concerts in other cities. Suffice to say that they acknowledge him to be one of the leading conductors of the country. Nor would it be possible in a few words to attempt any analysis of the characteristics of his conducting which have been the basis of his success. Those who have followed the course of the symphony for the past few years will be aware of the many talents which Dr. Malko has brought to this organization, his superb knowledge of the orchestra, his deep understanding of the scores, and his ability to transmit his own consciousness into the playing of the musicians under him.

But there is one aspect of Dr. Malko's association with our orchestra which deserves special mention. Without it even his magnificent talents would encounter difficulties. It is a characteristic intrinsic to Dr. Malko's approach to the orchestra and yet which isn't a part of his musical equipment. We refer to his ability to understand the personnel problems which confront such an organization as the Grand Rapids symphony and adapt himself to them.

✦ ✦ ✦

In a semi-professional group such as this the conductor must be as much a teacher as a conductor. He must have patience while maintaining a high ideal and understanding to deal with the many degrees of capability and experience in the musicians under him. In the players of the orchestra he will not find, as in the major symphonies, the complete physical mastery over the scores which make his role one of finesse in orchestral unity and interpretation.

Dr. Malko has met this added burden to the conductor's difficulties completely. It is well to note that he has received international recognition as a teacher of conducting. And the same traits, the same abilities, which have made that achievement possible are working to the advantage of our own orchestra.

ADVERTISING AGE
CHICAGO, ILL.

JAN 22 1945

George Callos Honored as '44 Industrial Adman

THE WINNER—Chosen by Industrial Marketing's "Copy Chasers" as Industrial Adman of the Year, George Callos, left, advertising and public relations manager of Allis-Chalmers, receives the certificate of award from Lane Witt, managing editor of Industrial Marketing.

Milwaukee, Jan. 16.—George J. Callos, advertising and public relations manager of Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Company, on Jan. 11 received a certificate citing him as Industrial Adman of 1944, annual award of Industrial Marketing for outstanding industrial advertising.

The award was presented by W. Lane Witt, managing editor of the publication, at a meeting of the Milwaukee Industrial Advertisers Association, local NIAA chapter.

Mr. Witt presented the award in the name of the "Copy Chasers," anonymous critics of industrial advertising who for the past eight years have commented on advertising in IM's "OK As Inserted" column. Hundreds of industrial ads were reviewed before the "Copy Chasers" selected Mr. Callos for the award.

Although the award in this instance was made largely on the advertising job done in industrial, business and trade publications, Allis-Chalmers is also an important user of radio, general magazine and newspaper space.

Mr. Callos, a native Milwaukeean, 35 years old, is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin. After college he worked on a weekly newspaper and in the personnel department of a utility company before joining the Allis-Chalmers advertising department as a copywriter in 1935.

At that time the department consisted of only six people. Mr. Callos soon was placed in charge of all advertising of electrical equipment, and was appointed department manager within two years. He has expanded the department to a staff of 60 people who are required to handle the large volume of advertising material prepared each year.

The company's business and trade advertising amounts to about 1,200 insertions in some 40 publications annually. It has launched an institutional campaign in six national magazines; sponsors Boston Symphony concerts on the Blue Network Saturday afternoons, and has engaged in an extensive public relations program within the home community.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JAN 22 1945

Marsh Recalls Concert Glories

Mementos, Including Caruso Tickets, Bring Flood of Memories

In the accumulated material resulting from the 30 years of advertising and concert promotion career of Edward H. Marsh are four tickets for a concert by Enrico Caruso, dated May 22, 1919, still waiting to be called for by a Hartford patron. They are one big reason for Mr. Marsh's disbelief in the system of holding concert tickets. The mementoes also remind Mr. Marsh of what he believes to be the greatest concert ever given in Springfield. For the 13 selections he sang, the great Italian tenor received the sum of $8000. Terming him "just a big hearted boy," Marsh said, that he had to labor for two years to make the Caruso concert possible.

Office Full of Souvenirs

But the four carefully salvaged tickets are only a small part of the souvenirs and business records which completely cover the two desks and countless odd filing cases, cabinets and tables which fill his office. Pictures of the great stars he has met, many of them, time and time again, line the walls, with Jeanette MacDonald being one of his favorites, judging from the frequency of her photograph.

Mr. Marsh, who used to handle publicity for the Springfield Music Festival Association, began his concert work back in 1915 under the guidance of Charles Ellis of Boston, who aided artists like Fritz Kreisler to get to the top, and acted as manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years. "I believe he was the greatest champion of the concert artist this country has ever known," Mr. Marsh said. Ellis requested the local man to take over the Ellis concert series in Springfield, which he did for a number of years. The series came to a sudden end during World War I when the city government refused to allow a performance of the Boston Symphony because several of the musicians were German, and Ellis canceled the concert, thus terminating the series. "That man has never had an equal," Mr. Marsh continued.

Recalls Whims of Artists

Noting that many concert stars have certain whims and ideas which must be followed, he said that the pianist Paderewski insisted on a pail of hot water for his hands immediately before playing, and would not perform unless the concert hall was at its very darkest. If necessary, he would wait for all the lights to be dimmed. Jeanette MacDonald requested use of a lighted dressing table, while Meliza Korjus was willing to walk right on to the stage without the usual prinking, Marsh said.

He said it was always pleasant to meet persons like Dr. Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony, who was very enthusiastic about his Springfield audience and did not hesitate to say so. He is expected to return for another engagement next season.

Mr. Marsh is now in his eighth Wagner concert series, sponsored by Charles L. Wagner of Boston. Mr. Wagner is accredited with promoting the tenor John McCormack up to the four million dollar mark, an unequalled record. He supplies artists for concerts all over the country, and is frequently in Springfield for the series here. As concert agent, Mr. Marsh said that his greatest problem is giving patrons their choice of seats.

Choice of Seats Great Problem

"I am supposed to know in which leg a person is lame, or in which ear he is deaf and act accordingly," Marsh said with a smile. Then there are those who refuse to sit next to so and so because he attends a cocktail party prior to the concert, and others who don't like a certain seat because the lady in the row in front is fond of large hats.

Although he is not a musician himself, Mr. Marsh is a music lover and is proud of "never having put on an artist whom he did not like." He has lived in Springfield all of his life and consequently is well equipped to write the column "Forgotten Facts [illegible] Springfield," which appears [illegible] Springfield Shopping News.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

JAN 25 1945

243 Music Scores In Judges' Hands

Two hundred and forty-three scores entered for the prize contest for an American orchestral work, sponsored by Independent Music Publishers, are now in the hands of the judges.

As soon as a decision has been reached, the prize-winning work will be announced. The award carries with it a cash prize of five hundred dollars and publication of the score, including preparation of parts for performance.

The judges who will make the award are: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Nicolai Berezo[illegible] and [illegible] Copland.

SAULT STE. MARIE, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 2 2 1945

"One of Great Ones of Present Age" Say Critics of Laderoute's Voice

Joseph Victor Laderoute, who will appear in concert here Thursday night, has become known throughout the United States and Canada as "that rare phenomenon of a brilliant boy soprano developing into a great tenor."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is among the outstanding musicians and conductors who have accaimed his voice as one of the great ones of the present age and he has been pronounced by critics as among the top flight of present-day tenors. When Dr. Koussevitzky heard Laderoute in audition, he immediately engaged him for two performances with the Boston Symphony.

Laderoute has appeared as guest soloist with several of the renowned symphony organizations in the United States and Canada; with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the late Frederick Stock; the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under Victor Kolar and Howard Barlow; the Toronto Symphony under Sir Ernest MacMillan and the Cincinnati Symphony under Eugene Goossens.

"There is no height in the opera or concert field that Mr. Laderoute cannot reach," Director Leon Rothler wrote of him and a metropolitan reviewer declared:

"Laderoute has one of the great tenor equipments of the day: range, uniform quality, extreme expression, a gift of tongues and an excellent authority which is the fruit of sounder musical education than most singers possess. He is a French-Canadian, big and brawny and splendidly gifted. He has obviously had excellent training and his singing was completely in the tradition."

His early training was received in this city under the tutelage of Mrs. Louis H. McPike. He was heard here frequently as soloist in various churches and began to sing professionally at the age of five. As a boy soprano he made a tour of the entire United States as guest soloist with the Paulist Choristers under the famous Father William J. Finn.

No young American singer has made such a constant and rapid development in recent years as Laderoute, critics declare. He is said to have a phenomenal repertoire ready to sing at a moment's notice. He knows nearly 40 works to sing in choral and orchestral concerts and he has nine of the better known French and Italian lyric tenor opera roles available.

Thursday night's concert here will be for the benefit of the Kiwanis milk fund and is scheduled to begin at 8:15.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 2 4 1945

The Detroit Symphony, with Marjorie Lawrence as soprano soloist, will present an all-Wagner program over WICC-MBS Saturday night at 8:30. Karl Krueger will conduct the Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Bruennhilde's Immolation Scene from "The Twilight of the Gods," the Magic Fire Music from "Die Walkure" and the Finale of "Das Rheingold."

George Szell will conduct the Boston Symphony over WNAB-Blue Saturday night at 8:30 in Haydn's C major Symphony No. 97 and Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of themes by Weber.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
HERALD

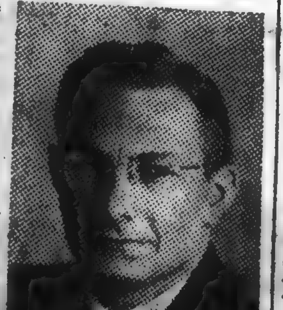
JAN 2 [illegible]

Know Your Symphony

• • • • • By Carroll C. Davidson

We should like to digress temporarily from the usual procedure adopted in these articles. Instead of discussing the music for the next concert of the Grand Rapids Symphony we intend spending a little time with the individuals who make that music possible. We are thinking particularly of Dr. Malko, who now is in his third year as conductor of the orchestra.

Dr. Malko's taking over of the orchestra has been more than fortunate for Grand Rapids. Fortunate is not too exact an expression inasmuch as the Symphony society exercised more than a little good judgment in the matter. But the choice of Dr. Malko for conductor has been an exceedingly happy one and one on which the organization can be congratulated.



Mr. Davidson

Since coming to this country some four years ago, Dr. Malko has given ample evidence of the qualities which had made him one of the foremost conductors of Europe. He has been guest conductor with the Boston symphony, the NBC symphony, the Ravinia concerts in Chicago, and with many other organizations throughout the country. His success in all appearances has been outstanding and critics have been enthusiastic in praise of his work.

✦ ✦ ✦

There is no need to reiterate here the superlatives which critics have used to describe his concerts in other cities. Suffice to say, that they acknowledge him to be one of the leading conductors of the country. Nor would it be possible in a few words to attempt any analysis of the characteristics of his conducting which have been the basis of his success. Those who have followed the course of the symphony for the past few years will be aware of the many talents which Dr. Malko has brought to this organization, his superb knowledge of the orchestra, his deep understanding of the scores and his ability to transmit his own consciousness into the playing of the musicians under him.

But there is one aspect of Dr. Malko's association with our orchestra which deserves special mention. Without it even his magnificent talents would encounter difficulties. It is a characteristic intrinsic to Dr. Malko's approach to the orchestra and yet which isn't a part of his musical equipment. We refer to his ability to understand the personnel problems which confront such an organization as the Grand Rapids symphony and adapt himself to them.

✦ ✦ ✦

In a semi-professional group such as this the conductor must be as much a teacher as a conductor. He must have patience while maintaining a high ideal and understanding to deal with the many degrees of capability and experience in the musicians under him. In the players of the orchestra he will not find, as in the major symphonies, the complete physical mastery over the scores which make his role one of finesse in orchestral unity and interpretation.

Dr. Malko has met this added burden to the conductor's difficulties completely. It is well to note that he has received international recognition as a teacher of conducting. And the same traits, the same abilities, which have made that achievement possible are working to the advantage of our own orchestra.

George Callos Honored as '44 Industrial Adman

Milwaukee, Jan. 16.—George J. Callos, advertising and public relations manager of Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Company, on Jan. 11 received a certificate citing him as Industrial Adman of 1944, annual award of Industrial Marketing for outstanding industrial advertising.

The award was presented by W. Lane Witt, managing editor of the publication, at a meeting of the Milwaukee Industrial Advertisers Association, local NIAA chapter.

Mr. Witt presented the award in the name of the "Copy Chasers," anonymous critics of industrial advertising who for the past eight years have commented on advertising in IM's "OK As Inserted" column. Hundreds of industrial ads were reviewed before the "Copy Chasers" selected Mr. Callos for the award.

Although the award in this instance was made largely on the advertising job done in industrial, business and trade publications, Allis-Chalmers is also an important user of radio, general magazine and newspaper space.

THE WINNER—Chosen by Industrial Marketing's "Copy Chasers" as Industrial Adman of the Year, George Callos, left, advertising and public relations manager of Allis-Chalmers, receives the certificate of award from Lane Witt, managing editor of Industrial Marketing.

Mr. Callos, a native Milwaukeean, 35 years old, is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin. After college he worked on a weekly newspaper and in the personnel department of a utility company before joining the Allis-Chalmers advertising department as a copywriter in 1935.

At that time the department consisted of only six people. Mr. Callos soon was placed in charge of all advertising of electrical equipment, and was appointed department manager within two years. He has expanded the department to a staff of 60 people who are required to handle the large volume of advertising material prepared each year.

The company's business and trade advertising amounts to about 1,200 insertions in some 40 publications annually. It has launched an institutional campaign in six national magazines; sponsors Boston Symphony concerts on the Blue Network Saturday afternoons, and has engaged in an extensive public relations program within the home community.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JAN 22 1945

Marsh Recalls Concert Glories

Mementos, Including Caruso Tickets, Bring Flood of Memories

In the accumulated material resulting from the 30 years of advertising and concert promotion career of Edward H. Marsh are four tickets for a concert by Enrico Caruso, dated May 22, 1919, still waiting to be called for by a Hartford patron. They are one big reason for Mr. Marsh's disbelief in the system of holding concert tickets. The mementoes also remind Mr. Marsh of what he believes to be the greatest concert ever given in Springfield. For the 12 selections he sang, the great Italian tenor received the sum of $8000. Terming him "just a big hearted boy," Marsh said, that he had to labor for two years to make the Caruso concert possible.

Office Full of Souvenirs

But the four carefully salvaged tickets are only a small part of the souvenirs and business records which completely cover the two desks and countless odd filing cases, cabinets and tables—which fill his office. Pictures of the great stars he has met, many of them, time and time again, line the walls, with Jeanette MacDonald being one of his favorites, judging from the frequency of her photograph.

Mr. Marsh, who used to handle publicity for the Springfield Music Festival Association, began his concert work back in 1915 under the guidance of Charles Ellis of Boston, who aided artists like Fritz Kreisler to get to the top, and acted as manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years. "I believe he was the greatest champion of the concert artist this country has ever known," Mr. Marsh said. Ellis requested the local man to take over the Ellis concert series in Springfield, which he did for a number of years. The series came to a sudden end during World War I when the city government refused to allow a performance of the Boston Symphony because several of the musicians were German, and Ellis canceled the concert, thus terminating the series. "That man has never had an equal," Mr. Marsh continued.

Recalls Whims of Artists

Noting that many concert stars have certain whims and ideas which must be followed, he said that the pianist Paderewski insisted on a pail of hot water for his hands immediately before playing, and would not perform unless the concert hall was at its very darkest. If necessary, he would wait for all the lights to be dimmed. Jeanette MacDonald requested use of a lighted dressing table, while Meliza Korjus was willing to walk right on to the stage without the usual prinking, Marsh said.

He said it was always pleasant to meet persons like Dr. Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony, who was very enthusiastic about his Springfield audience and did not hesitate to say so. He is expected to return for another engagement next season.

Mr. Marsh is now in his eighth Wagner concert series, [illegible] Charles L. Wagner of Boston. Mr. Wagner is accredited with promoting the tenor John McCormack up to the four million dollar mark, an unequalled record. He supplies artists for concerts all over the country, and is frequently in Springfield for the series here. As concert agent, Mr. Marsh said that his greatest problem is giving patrons their choice of seats.

Choice of Seats Great Problem

"I am supposed to know in which leg a person is lame, or in which ear he is deaf and act accordingly," Marsh said with a smile. Then there are those who refuse to sit next to so and so because he attends a cocktail party prior to the concert, and others who don't like a certain seat because the lady in the row in front is fond of large hats.

Although he is not a musician himself, Mr. Marsh is a music lover and is proud of "never having put on an artist whom he did not like." He has lived in Springfield all of his life and consequently is well equipped to write the column "Forgotten Facts [illegible] Springfield," which appear[illegible] Springfield Shopping News.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

JAN 25 1945

243 Music Scores In Judges' Hands

Two hundred and forty-three scores entered for the prize contest for an American orchestral work, sponsored by Independent Music Publishers, are now in the hands of the judges.

As soon as a decision has been reached, the prize-winning work will be announced. The award carries with it a cash prize of five hundred dollars and publication of the score, including preparation of parts for performance.

The judges who will make the award are: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Nicol[illegible] Berezo[illegible] Copland.

MUSIC

23

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the second time in two years, George Szell is making January a memorable month in the annals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Conducting a solidly satisfying program of Schubert, Smetana, and Brahms for the third in the Monday evening series of concerts, the Czechoslovakian conductor made many new friends last evening.

Mr. Szell is a painstaking craftsman, looking after the smallest thread of musical detail, yet keeping the ultimate expression of the music within his vision. In Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, for instance, the mature, bittersweet quality of the andante shone through the melodic themes worn [illegible] by repeated hearings. Careful attention to the woodwinds, particularly the bassoons, kept in balance the sentimental outpourings of the strings.

"From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," the fourth in a cycle of six symphonic poems by Smetana, which he called "My Country," proved particularly rewarding at Mr. Szell's hands. The passage for violins alone, gradually reinforced by violas and cellos, carried the excitement of following a thin, steep path up to a clearing and suddenly being able to see for miles around. The dance rhythms were given their full measure of importance by Mr. Szell, who used first an upraised hand, then both hands in a broad sweeping gesture, and finally his shoulders, swinging with the strength of his countrymen.

Any one of the movements of the Brahms Fourth Symphony could prove to be the acid test for a first-rate conductor. One man's reading of the magniloquent score seldom achieves its full potentialities. Mr. Szell develops the frequently neglected more gentle aspects of the symphony without sacrificing its strength. The opening allegro is vigorous but not formidable; the andante is rich with the embroidered pattern of first violins singing above the theme in the cellos; the third movement is dynamic. In the final movement patterned in Passacaglia form with the theme repeated 31 times, Mr. Szell's continuity falters. Slightly snarled, the complexly woven bass gives the movement a static quality, which keeps it from transcending the glories of the first three movements.—P. W.

WINCHESTER, VA.
STAR
JAN 2 2 1945

City Concert Association Selects Artists

750 Persons Join Winchester Community Group

The Winchester Community Concerts Association drive to secure members was brought to a successful close Saturday night with a total of seven-hundred and fifty members.

At the conclusion of the drive the Artists Committee met at the home of Mrs. R. T. Lozier, on Washington Street, to select available artist for this first season.

The selections are as follows, subject, of course, to confirmation by the New York office of Community Concert Service.

Artists Chosen

The Trapp Family Singers, a group of ten persons, will appear here on February 23rd. This is an unusual attraction as the family are natives of Austria and appear in native costumes. Theirs will be a varied program, including many Austrian Folk Songs. Dr. F. Wasner, is the Conductor.

On April 16th, the association will present Sanroma, Pianist. He is Puerto Rican by birth with New England upbringing—Sanoroma is really "American." He has played more times under Koussevitzky than any artist, and is the only pianist to record with the Boston Symphony.

The program scheduled for May 3rd., will be considered the highlight of the season by many music lovers. At that time, Helen Jepson, famous soprano will be presented. She is best known for Violetta in La Travita at Metropolitan. One of the best dressed women in opera, she appeared in the motion picture "Goldwin Follies." She is also a member of the 100.000 Mile Flying Club.

May Secure Ballet

The Artist Committee did not decide on a fourth Concert for the season, as it is their hope to secure a ballet for the early fall.

Officers and directors of the Winchester Community Concert Association were very much pleased with the outcome of the drive and wish to thank the workers and each and every member for their part in making it a success.

No memberships are available until the next drive.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS
JAN 21 1945

Draper, Adler Here Feb. 3

Paul Draper, dancer, and harmonica virtuoso Larry Alder, will bring their diverting entertainment to the Municipal auditorium Feb. 3, under sponsorship of the Symphony Society's non-subscription series.

This will be San Antonio's first chance to see a program that has won pages of comment and pictures in every major American magazine, both of sophisticated and serious categories. Their appearances, which have filled all important concert halls of the nation on three trans-continental tours, also calls out the presence, and the praise, of top music critics.

This fall Draper and Adler had capacity audiences for nine consecutive performances at New York's City Center.

Draper first attained a complete command of classic ballet technique, then created his original interpretations by adding typical "Nijinsky leaps" of Russian origin and that purely American form, "tap." He has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and gives many solo recitals each season.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Jan 23

Last evening's Symphony Concert, conducted by George Szell, offered two numbers from the program of the last pair of regular concerts, Smetana's delightful Symphonic Poem, "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests," recalled to us after 30 years and as much enjoyed on this occasion as it was before, and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. The new piece, so far as Mr. Szell was concerned, was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony.

Two years ago the Czech conductor gave us a performance of Schubert's C Major Symphony that is still gratefully remembered. His version of the "Unfinished" was different, as the music itself is different, but no less felicitous. As with the Brahms' his tempo seemed exactly right, neither too fast nor two slow. With the first movement he is both lyric and dramatic. The movement is full of what since has been known as atmosphere and of this fact he makes you fully aware. The last movement was not dragged, yet none of its beauty was lost. In both divisions there was the clarity, the just balance of tone and the musicianly phrasing that we have already come to associate with Mr. Szell's conducting.

Szell Returns to Conduct His Favorite Boston Symphony

Globe Jan. 19

By CYRUS DURGIN

"Well, have you forgiven me for that New York style clam chowder?" grinned George Szell as he shook hands with this reporter at Symphony Hall yesterday morning. Thereby he proved that his excellent memory is not limited to the notes on printed pages of music.

Two years ago, when Mr. Szell (you pronounce the name "Sell") was making his first appearance as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he told the Globe, during an interview, that he liked to cook and could whip up a good clam chowder, New York style. This reporter had observed mildly that New York style clam chowder was not even discussed in these parts. Although we had not met since, he remembered the interchange of views clearly.

"As a matter of fact, I like the New England style better now," he added yesterday. And that recantation was enough to put him in thoroughly good standing with chowder gourmets.

American Audiences

Now Mr. Szell is back again to conduct for the next two weeks what he said in 1943 was his favorite orchestra. Since 1943, he has guested with American orchestras clear across the country, and has joined the Metropolitan Opera Association. He returns here more firmly convinced than ever that the Boston Symphony is his favorite.

"Not only in the bright, clear tone, but in many other ways the Boston Symphony, to my mind, is the best to work with," affirmed the tall, thick-spectacled Czech, whose austere face is at variance with his fundamental good nature and friendliness.

"Yes, I've conducted what you call a representative cross section of American orchestras, and they are good. But this"—and he waved toward the auditorium from whose stage the musicians were leaving after a morning's rehearsal—"this is the best."

He's also had a chance to gauge the willingness of American audiences to hear new—or at least, unfamiliar—music.

"I think the American public will take more than the European public, which I assure you was very conservative before the war. The Americans may not like certain music, but they listen and content themselves with faint praise instead of noisy disapproval. And, of course, many times they like what is new. I think this all holds true in both the East and West."

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 25 1945

243 SCORES ENTERED IN MUSICAL CONTEST

New York City, Jan. 24—Entered in the contest for an American orchestral work are 343 scores which will be judged by Serge Koussevitzky, Nicolai Berezowsky and Aaron Copland.

The prize-winning work will be announced as soon as the judges reach a decision. Sponsored by Independent Music Publishers, the contest will award $500 as a cash prize and publication of the score, including preparation of parts for performance, by Arrow Music Press, Inc.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 28 1945

BY WAY OF REPLY

To the Radio Editor:

SINCE last Sunday's letter by Moses Smith on the Boston Symphony may lead some readers astray, it might be fitting to point out a few of the grosser errors of fact.

The commercials on the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts run one minute and thirty seconds for the opening and one minute for the closing. The rest is music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "the King of the Orchestras," to quote a TIMES reviewer. There are no intermission features or talks by industrial leaders.

To the charge that the sponsor has nothing to sell to the public, it can be pointed out that the sponsors of the other two orchestras also have nothing to sell. In fact, the sponsors of many other leading shows are equally so engaged in war work that they offer nothing the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Most impartial radio engineers and producers agree that Studio 8H is the best hall yet devised for symphony broadcasts. Boston's Symphony Hall is much too bright for a radio broadcast of a symphony orchestra. In other words it is too alive.

The average listener and some who fancy themselves experts have little conception of the problems which enter into the production of a symphony broadcast. Any competent radio man can find fault with any symphony broadcast. Usually, however, he will realize that the operations men are constantly striving to improve the broadcast and so keeps the cork in his private bottle of critical acid. Why single out the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

AN INTERESTED READER.
New York City.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
JAN 27 1945

George Szell to Conduct Boston Symphony Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of George Szell, Metropolitan Opera conductor, will feature the works of Franz Josef Haydn and Paul Hindemith at 7:30 tonight on WFMJ.

The program will open with Haydn's Major Symphony, No. 97. It will be followed by Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber," a four-movement work comprising an allegro, [illegible], andantino and march.

"Saturday Night Serenade" will present Jessica Dragonette singing [illegible] light opera favorites, including "Kiss Me" from "Bitter-[illegible]" and "Every Time We Say [illegible]" by Cole Porter at 8:45 on WKBN. Tenor Bill Perry's solos will include "I'm Making Believe" and the "Cuban Love Song."

[illegible] Grant, Quartermaster 3/c, [illegible] will relate his experiences while stranded aboard a transport [illegible] days in the Aleutians area [illegible] Your Navy" at 6:30 p. m. WFMJ. Grant will describe how the transport stopped only long enough for repairs and then entered action at Tarawa and the invasion of the Marshalls. Featured on the program will be the All-Bluejacket Choir and the Ship's Concert Orchestra.

Kilocycle reading of key and other network stations:
NBC — WEAF-660, WGY-810, WLW-700.
Blue Network — WJZ-770, WJW-850.
CBS—WCAU - 1210, WHAS-840, WWL-870.
MBS — WCAE-1240, WHK-1420, WGN-720, WOR-710.
Independent stations—WPIC-790, WKST-1280.

News from WFMJ

[illegible] Press and the United Press)
[illegible]ght—6:15, 10, 11, 11:55*,
Sunday—[illegible], 8*, 10, 11*, and 12 [illegible], 12:55*, 3, 6, 8*, 10, 11 [illegible]

Bulletins and special broadcasts will be given whenever events [illegible].

*Blue Network broadcasts.

Other Programs Tonight

6:00—WKBN—The story of a city-wide row over the use of a small amount of paving material almost ruins Lionel Barrymore's reputation as "Mayor of the Town" in "Paved with Good Intentions."

6:30—WTAM—Edgar Barrier portrays the adventurous "Saint" with Ken Christy as his "helper," Hoppy, and John Brown as Police Inspector Fernack in another exciting episode of "The Saint."

7:30 — WKBN — "Merchants of Hate" tells the story of the capture of native seditionists on "The FBI in Peace and War."

8:30 — WFMJ — "The Victory Parade of Spotlight Bands" presents Jan Savitt and his orchestra from Washington, D. C.

9:15—WKBN—Al Pearce, as Elmer Blurt, low-pressure salesman, earns some extra money by becoming a baby "sitter" with humorous consequences.

9:30—WTAM — Becky Barfield brings Pee Wee King's Golden West Cowboys to the "Grand Ole Opry" and yodels an old railroad song, "Freight Train Blues," as Roy Acuff's guest star.

9:30—WFMJ—Herbert Marshall is starred in another exciting adventure as an international detective on "The Man Called X."

11:15—WFMJ—Raymond Massey, stage and screen star, will be the guest of Radio Harris, commentator on affairs in the entertainment world. Massey plays the lead role in the motion picture, "Arsenic and Old Lace."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Jan 31

Yesterday's Symphony Concert, conducted by George Szell, might itself be described as a gigantic symphony in C major, the key of Haydn's No. 97, with which it began, and of Schumann's Second, with which it came to a glorious close. In between came a most engaging novelty, Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber. The strength and sanity, the warmth and fervor and the extraordinary musicianship of Mr. Szell's conducting illuminated everything and the concert was in rare degree inspiring and inspiriting.

Since Haydn wrote 104 symphonies, it is easy to see how even many deserving ones could go long neglected, but No. 97 is one of the 12 written for London and collectively they are Haydn's best. Anyway, we are getting it this week and much thanks to Mr. Szell for the first performance in 21 years. Only in the finale does the interest wane a bit, and the worst you can say of this rondo is that it is not quite so captivatingly pretty as some of the others. In the first movement there are striking foreshadowings of Beethoven and the trio of the Minuet is a veritable gem.

Taking themes from some four-hand piano pieces of Weber, and in the second of the four movements from that composer's incidental music to Schiller's Chinese play, "Turandot" Hindemith has made a sort of symphony of his own. The themes themselves are engaging and Hindemith's harmony, orchestration and general treatment, while by no means Weberish, are far from being inappropriate or unsympathetic. The Chinese Scherzo is a joy and would enliven even a Pop Concert. The cynic might say that Hindemith had to turn to Weber in order to find some good tunes, but find them he has and he has done well by them and with them.

Greatest of the symphonies of Schumann, the broadest, solidest and soundest symphony of the Romantic era, with its firmly-wrought first movement, its exciting Scherzo, its wonderful Adagio and its finale of exultant, full-throated song, the Second has of late received scant respect at Symphony Hall. The only other performance at the regular concerts since 1929 was given eight years ago by Dr. Mitropoulos. Again, our thanks to Mr. Szell. If he played the Scherzo a shade too fast, the whole was memorable and the last two movements superb.

PEOPLE'S WORLD
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
JAN 26 1945

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky on one of his many trips to New York prepares to direct the Boston Symphony in the auditorium of Hunter College. Koussevitzky has had a number of guest conductors, the next will be conductor George Szell, of the Metropolitan Opera.

Globe Jan. 27

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony has been especially fortunate in its guest conductors this season. The latest, and current of these, George Szell, began yesterday afternoon the second half of his engagement. He has brought not only the vitality and distinction of his conducting, but some of the season's most interesting programs as well.

This week he is offering Haydn's C Major Symphony, No. 97, unheard at these concerts since the time of Pierre Monteux more than 20 years ago; Hindemith's piquant and utterly delightful Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber, new to Boston, and C major Symphony of Schumann, last done here by Dimitri Mitropoulos in 1937.

Between conductor, orchestra and program the concerts this week come as near to perfection and enjoyment as you are likely to find in this world.

Take the Haydn, for example, one of the lesser-known symphonies written for Salomon's concerts in London. The work has such inventive power, such capricious charm, such an enchanting slow movement and minuet as to place it among the composer's greatest masterpieces. Exaggerations are not wisely made in print, but I do not think it is exaggeration to say that Mr. Szell's performance yesterday was the finest Haydn I have ever heard.

The texture was clear as spring water; you heard every phrase. At the same time, within the limits of Haydesque style, every measure glowed with vitality and every bit of melody was truly "sung."

Taking thematic material from less familiar works by Carl Maria von Weber, Hindemith created out of them a little four-movement symphony in his own ruggedly individualistic manner. The scoring is full of color and keeps most of the orchestra working practically all the time. The "Chinese" scherzo, built on pentatonic scale tunes from Weber's music to the play "Turandot" by Schiller, is a tour de force of orchestral cleverness, complete with bells and other items of an enlarged percussion section.

How serious was Hindemith in his Metamorphosis? He has not given us a clew to his purpose, but it is possible to find the score a joke upon certain composers of the past and present. Are Mahler and Bruckner, perhaps Stravinsky and others, given a brilliant and amiable kidding? Certainly the march finale suggests the Mahler touch with marches, of which he was very fond. At any rate, the symphonic metamorphosis is a minor masterpiece and deserves a niche in the permanent repertory.

Perhaps the most important aspect of Mr. Szell as interpreter is that of simplicity, and yet it is likely to be overlooked because his readings are technically and tonally so brilliant. He plays the Schumann Symphony with just the right emotional simplicity, particularly that supernal adagio. When the performance is finished you have the feeling that all in the music has been revealed.

P. Feb 3

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Credit Richard Burgin both as program-maker and conductor with giving us yesterday one of the most agreeable Symphony concerts of the present season. Credit also his colleagues John Bedetti and Jean Lefranc for their splendid contribution as solo 'cello and solo viola in the final number, Strauss' "Don Quixote." And don't forget Witold Malcuzynski, who made his first appearance in Symphony Hall as pianist in the Second Concerto of Chopin. To quote one veteran observer, Mr. Malcuzynski's playing combined the delicacy of de Pachmann with the poetry of Paderewski. There could hardly be higher praise, and it was fully deserved.

When Mr. Malcuzynski made his Boston debut at Jordan Hall last season he displayed these same qualities but he also was guilty of a frenzied and ferocious pounding that very nearly set his good deeds at naught. There is no pretext for pounding in this Concerto, though a pianist might still exhibit dynamic intemperance. Mr. Malcuzynski didn't even do that. Once in evidence all the time, the two Chopin Concertos have almost dropped from the repertory. To be sure, they are not of the mature, the greater Chopin, but their lyric charm and grace, their elegance and euphony, their flattering employment of the piano and rather agreeably discreet orchestration give them a unique flavor. As yesterday's performance proved, they can add mightily to the pleasure of a symphony concert.

Two years ago Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti, Lefranc and the orchestra gave us the admirable version of "Don Quixote" that we heard again yesterday. To adopt a visual image, we have seen this extraordinary score painted in brighter colors, but the drawing in this performance is true, and with a work in which the graphic element is so important, that is what counts most. And to invoke yet another art, we heard once more a moving drama in tone.

The first number, and in retrospect the least rewarding was Brahms' familiar Variations on a Theme by Haydn. For some reason, to this listener anyway, the work sounded unusually smug, stuffy and academic. It could even be argued that the Variations are more effective in their two-piano form, in which we lately heard them from Luboshutz and Nemenoff: their rather drab orchestra dress merely weighs them down.

Herald Jan. 27

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, George Szell conducting, gave the 14th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Symphony in C major, No. 97 ...... Haydn
Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber .... Hindemith
Symphony No. 2 in C major, Op. 61 ... Schumann

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Paul Hindemith's "Metamorphosis of Themes by CarlMaria von Weber" unquestionably ranks as one of the major esthetic faux pas of the new year. Fortunately, it was sandwiched between two really beautiful and noble compositions, and all were equally beautifully played by the orchestra under Mr. Szell's authoritative direction, so the concert was by no means a dead loss.

If ever I've heard one, Mr. Hindemith's "metamorphosis" is a conceit, a sophistication and an arrogance. From a musician's point of view, which is to say as a technical contrivance of extreme cleverness, subtlety and skill, it is very impressive. From the listener's point of view it is quite dashing, by no means difficult or obscure, and certainly effective. From the artistic or esthetic standpoint, however, it is a bitter, ironic joke; its humor is cruel and unnecessary and its tone a vanity.

There are innumerable points of evidence in the score to support this opinion but the most devastating from a non-technical point of view is an observation in the program taken from the Philharmonic program book which reads: "None of these fragments, in Hindemith's opinion, represents Weber at his best. Consequently, he has made alterations to suit his requirements. And what are his requirements"? They are obviously to show us what a droll fellow he himself is. If he sought to do honor to Weber—and few composers deserve it more—he could not have plucked these silly tunes from his work and mocked them as he does. It may be—as someone has observed—that physicians and music critics are remembered for their mistakes, but composers are remembered for their best works, as indeed Mr. Hindemith himself certainly must hope to be. It may be he thought only to entertain the masses and titivate the musical intellectuals with this "funny" work, but it is he who comes off second best, not Carl Maria von Weber.

More pleasant matters were certainly the Haydn and the Schumann symphonies. It is impossible, on every hearing of a Haydn symphony, not to be staggered by the originality and the musical depths of the man. Everything is a surprise and a delight (consider the magical effect of the sudden pizzicato chord in the finale), and everything is inevitable. Schumann's C major Symphony, long neglected, is perhaps not his best, but it is still very grateful music, and it was conceived with great clarity by Mr. Szell, who sustains, with every appearance here, the impression that he is one of the day's most authentic musicians.

FAIRMOUNT, W. VA.
WEST VIRGINIAN

FEB 2 - 1945

* * *

Argentinita, Pilar Lopez and ensemble also will interrupt a coast-to-coast tour when they return to Carnegie Hall on February 13. Argentinita and her Spanish dancers and guitarists have been to the Pacific Coast and back since their appearances at the Metropolitan Opera House last October, and will continue their tour in the east after the Carnegie Hall appearance.

* * *

Heitor Villa-Lobos, Brazilian composer, will conduct his own works at concerts with the New York Philharmonic - Symphony at Carnegie Hall on February 8 and 9, when he will share the podium with Artur Rodzinski, musical director of the Philharmonic. Villa-Lobos will present Nos. 8 and 9 of his "Choros," the latter to be heard for the first time in North America.

Villa-Lobos will conduct portions of two programs to be given by Leopold Stokowski and the New York City Symphony on February 12 and 13 and on February 21, 23 and 24 will conduct the ~~Boston Sym~~phony at Harvard university and ~~Boston's~~ Symphony Hall at the invitation of Serge Koussevitzky.

NEWARK, N.J.
HERALD NEWS
2/3/45

Boston Symphony Ork At Mosque

We owe the availability of some of our favorite musical masterpieces to the foresightedness and propadgandist energies of men who now belong to the past of music's history. It was Liszt who advanced the cause of Wagner in his time of need. An ardent essay published by Schumann raised Brahms from obscurity. There are not a few other historic examples. But we do not have to survey figures of the past to discover the source of our indebtedness for familiarity with composers and compositions acsepted today as fixtures in the orchestral world. We need look no farther than Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will bring his arganization to the Mosque on Thursday evening, February 15th under sponsorship of the Griffith Music Foundation.

When the history of the past quarter century of musical progress is completely assembled, assayed, and recorded, the name of Koussevitzky will loom large in it.

When Debussy was none too firmly established in the musical world at large, it was Koussevitzky who gave him an invaluable impetus to his name and fame by inviting him to appear in Moscow as guest conductor of Koussevitzky's own orchestra, in an entirely Debussyan programme.

Surely there is no difficulty today in accepting Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" as a perfectly enjoyable composition.

It is a striking fact that compositions which Koussevitzky had the prophetic vision to see as permanent additions to the orchestral repertory have become so. Works which he abandoned after a fair period of trail have failed to gain permanence. He has sought, not the merely new, but the new and good.

Globe Feb 2

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The novelties and glitter of guest conductors are temporarily past at the Boston Symphony concerts, although Serge Koussevitzky has not yet returned to bring matters entirely back to the comfortable routine of familiarity.

This week the concerts are ably conducted by Richard Burgin, and at them Witold Malcuzynski, the Polish pianist, makes his first appearances as soloist with this orchestra, in the F minor Concerto of Chopin. The rest of the program is devoted to variations, those of Brahms on the "St. Antoni" chorale by Haydn, and those which make the spreading tapestry of Strauss' "Don Quixote."

Mr. Malcuzynski's performance of the Chopin Concerto was truly superb as technic, poetry and recreative imagination. The style was broad yet precise, the articulation clear, and piano and orchestral part were as nicely adjusted as they could be. Those in yesterday's audience will not forget the dynamic effect of the fast movements or the mounting and enveloping reverie of the larghetto.

This was all quite different from the heavy pedaling and the old-fashioned pounding delivered by Mr. Malcuzynski at his Boston debut recital last March. Then he seemed mostly technic and little of a poet. Now his technic is at the service of his musicianship and that brings a far different result.

Soloist, conductor and orchestra all received due recognition in the notably cordial applause — with some stamping—that followed the Concerto. It was evident that the Friday subscribers had found a new personality whose tall, well-tailored elegance and shiny dark hair certainly did not detract from their enjoyment of the music. Mr. Burgin accompanied Mr. Malcuzynski extremely well.

Jean Bedetti took the cello voice of Don Quixote and Jean Lefranc the viola garrulities of Sancho Panza in Richard Strauss' condensation of what happens in "Don Quixote." As they have shown before, both musicians have a virtuoso mastery of their parts and once again they unfolded them eloquently and with rich tone.

"Don Quixote" is for conductors a virtuoso piece, and it requires the utmost polish of detail, interpretive planning and a sense of story-telling in music. Mr. Burgin's reading came off very well, though it did lack that ultimate glow, intensity and general showmanship of the Koussevitzky interpretation. As for Brahms' Variations, they, as usual, were as relaxing as pipe and slippers—but not so stimulating as a cocktail—after a hard day at the office.

Feb. 3

SYMPHONY HALL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting and Witold Malcuzynski, pianist, as soloist, presents Chopin's F minor concerto, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Strauss' "Don Quixote; 8:30 P. M.

Audience Gives Koussevitzky Rousing Ovation

Times - Herald Jan. 12

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Dr. Gunn

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony were greeted with more enthusiasm last night in Constitution Hall than has been manifested by any Washington audience during the last seven years.

For weeks the hall had been sold out for this visit of the Boston musicians; but that circumstance did not prevent many hundreds of would-be listeners from seeking admission. These disappointed people milled around the building, blocking the entrances and delaying the concert by as much as 15 minutes.

Audience Rises in Greeting

When Dr. Koussevitzky made his appearance the public rose to greet him, though this gesture may have resulted from a misunderstanding. The Boston players rise for the playing of the National Anthem before the conductor makes his entrance, and remain standing until its conclusion. The public thought this was a possible tribute to the eminent Russian artist, and rose also. Having gotten to their feet, they applauded with great vigor, and the concert was further delayed while the conductor acknowledged these tributes.

Thenceforward the evening resolved itself into a series of such demonstrations, which mounted in intensity to the ovations that marked the conclusion of the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite and the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony. Koussevitzky chose a program devoted to the music of Slavic and Gallic composers, quoting the Croatian master Joseph Haydn's Eighty-eighth Symphony, Debussy's Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the Ravel and Shostakovich works already mentioned.

Unexpected Highlights

There were some who felt that Koussevitzky traveled far to play a well known Haydn Symphony which had been presented within the fortnight by the Philadelphia Orchestra and has been a frequent item in the programs of the National Symphony. It had been hoped that this conductor, who has been conspicuous over the years for his championship of native music, would play something from the Boston Symphony's extensive American repertoire. The crystalline clarity of the ancient Haydn score under his baton, the unexpected highlights that lifted its several moments of genuine inspiration into flawlessly proportioned relief, consoled these malcontents.

These qualities also convinced the public, long before this venerable work was ended that the Boston Symphony is a superbly brilliant and efficient ensemble, as fine as any which the nation has known since we began to cultivate the art.

Unmatched Versatility

To turn from the simplicity of Haydn to the elusive acoustic vapors of Debussy's exquisite tone-poem or to the amazing orchestral virtuosity which set forth the drama of the Ravel score proved a versatility not matched at present among the major orchestras.

There was magic, too, in the Shostakovich performance. This is a curiosily self-illuminated score with many strangely framed acoustic windows open to the light and the winds of heaven. It is a work of great eloquence and the name of Koussevitzky is inseparably associated with its popularity in this country.

Now that the multitude has hailed the Boston orchestra and its conductor with such overwhelming enthusiasm, it is to be hoped that their visits may become more frequent. We could absorb several each season.

[47]

Globe MUSIC Jan. 27

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony has been especially fortunate in its guest conductors this season. The latest, and current of these, George Szell, began yesterday afternoon the second half of his engagement. He has brought not only the vitality and distinction of his conducting, but some of the season's most interesting programs as well.

This week he is offering Haydn's C Major Symphony, No. 97, unheard at these concerts since the time of Pierre Monteux more than 20 years ago; Hindemith's piquant and utterly delightful Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber, new to Boston, and C major Symphony of Schumann, last done here by Dimitri Mitropoulos in 1937.

Between conductor, orchestra and program the concerts this week come as near to perfection and enjoyment as you are likely to find in this world.

Take the Haydn, for example, one of the lesser-known symphonies written for Salomon's concerts in London. The work has such inventive power, such capricious charm, such an enchanting slow movement and minuet as to place it among the composer's greatest masterpieces. Exaggerations are not wisely made in print, but I do not think it is exaggeration to say that Mr. Szell's performance yesterday was the finest Haydn I have ever heard.

The texture was clear as spring water; you heard every phrase. At the same time, within the limits of Haydesque style, every measure glowed with vitality and every bit of melody was truly "sung."

Taking thematic material from less familiar works by Carl Maria von Weber, Hindemith created out of them a little four-movement symphony in his own ruggedly individualistic manner. The scoring is full of color and keeps most of the orchestra working practically all the time. The "Chinese" scherzo, built on pentatonic scale tunes from Weber's music to the play "Turandot" by Schiller, is a tour de force of orchestral cleverness, complete with bells and other items of an enlarged percussion section.

How serious was Hindemith in his Metamorphosis? He has not given us a clew to his purpose, but it is possible to find the score a joke upon certain composers of the past and present. Are Mahler and Bruckner, perhaps Stravinsky and others, given a brilliant and amiable kidding? Certainly the march finale suggests the Mahler touch with marches, of which he was very fond. At any rate, the symphonic metamorphosis is a minor masterpiece and deserves a niche in the permanent repertory.

Perhaps the most important aspect of Mr. Szell as interpreter is that of simplicity, and yet it is likely to be overlooked because his readings are technically and tonally so brilliant. He plays the Schumann Symphony with just the right emotional simplicity, particularly that supernal adagio. When the performance is finished you have the feeling that all in the music has been revealed.

P SYMPHONY CONCERT Feb 3

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Credit Richard Burgin both as program-maker and conductor with giving us yesterday one of the most agreeable Symphony concerts of the present season. Credit also his colleagues John Bedetti and Jean Lefranc for their splendid contribution as solo 'cello and solo viola in the final number, Strauss' "Don Quixote." And don't forget Witold Malcuzynski, who made his first appearance in Symphony Hall as pianist in the Second Concerto of Chopin. To quote one veteran observer, Mr. Malcuzynski's playing combined the delicacy of de Pachmann with the poetry of Paderewski. There could hardly be higher praise, and it was fully deserved.

When Mr. Malcuzynski made his Boston debut at Jordan Hall last season he displayed these same qualities but he also was guilty of a frenzied and ferocious pounding that very nearly set his good deeds at naught. There is no pretext for pounding in this Concerto, though a pianist might still exhibit dynamic intemperance. Mr. Malcuzynski didn't even do that. Once in evidence all the time, the two Chopin Concertos have almost dropped from the repertory. To be sure, they are not of the mature, the greater Chopin, but their lyric charm and grace, their elegance and euphony, their flattering employment of the piano and rather agreeably discreet orchestration give them a unique flavor. As yesterday's performance proved, they can add mightily to the pleasure of a symphony concert.

Two years ago Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti, Lefranc and the orchestra gave us the admirable version of "Don Quixote" that we heard again yesterday. To adopt a visual image, we have seen this extraordinary score painted in brighter colors, but the drawing in this performance is true, and with a work in which the graphic element is so important, that is what counts most. And to invoke yet another art, we heard once more a moving drama in tone.

The first number, and in retrospect the least rewarding was Brahms' familiar Variations on a Theme by Haydn. For some reason, to this listener anyway, the work sounded unusually smug, stuffy and academic. It could even be argued that the Variations are more effective in their two-piano form, in which we lately heard them from Luboshutz and Nemenoff: their rather drab orchestra dress merely weighs them down.

Herald MUSIC Jan. 27

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, George Szell conducting, gave the 14th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Symphony in C major, No. 97......Haydn
Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber .... Hindemith
Symphony No. 2 in C major, Op. 61 Schumann

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Paul Hindemith's "Metamorphosis of Themes by CarlMaria von Weber" unquestionably ranks as one of the major esthetic faux pas of the new year. Fortunately, it was sandwiched between two really beautiful and noble compositions, and all were equally beautifully played by the orchestra under Mr. Szell's authoritative direction, so the concert was by no means a dead loss.

If ever I've heard one, Mr. Hindemith's "metamorphosis" is a conceit, a sophistication and an arrogance. From a musician's point of view, which is to say as a technical contrivance of extreme cleverness, subtlety and skill, it is very impressive. From the listener's point of view it is quite dashing, by no means difficult or obscure, and certainly effective. From the artistic or esthetic standpoint, however, it is a bitter, ironic joke; its humor is cruel and unnecessary and its tone a vanity.

There are innumerable points of evidence in the score to support this opinion but the most devastating from a non-technical point of view is an observation in the program taken from the Philharmonic program book which reads: "None of these fragments, in Hindemith's opinion, represents Weber at his best. Consequently, he has made alterations to suit his requirements. And what are his requirements"? They are obviously to show us what a droll fellow he himself is. If he sought to do honor to Weber—and few composers deserve it more—he could not have plucked these silly tunes from his work and mocked them as he does. It may be—as someone has observed—that physicians and music critics are remembered for their mistakes, but composers are remembered for their best works, as indeed Mr. Hindemith himself certainly must hope to be. It may be he thought only to entertain the masses and titivate the musical intellectuals with this "funny" work, but it is he who comes off second best, not Carl Maria von Weber.

More pleasant matters were certainly the Haydn and the Schumann symphonies. It is impossible, on every hearing of a Haydn symphony, not to be staggered by the originality and the musical depths of the man. Everything is a surprise and a delight (consider the magical effect of the sudden pizzicato chord in the finale), and everything is inevitable. Schumann's C major Symphony, long neglected, is perhaps not his best, but it is still very grateful music, and it was conceived with great clarity by Mr. Szell, who sustains, with every appearance here, the impression that he is one of the day's most authentic musicians.

FAIRMOUNT, W. VA.
WEST VIRGINIAN

FEB 2 - 1945

Argentinita, Pilar Lopez and ensemble also will interrupt a coast-to-coast tour when they return to Carnegie Hall on February 13. Argentinita and her Spanish dancers and guitarists have been to the Pacific Coast and back since their appearances at the Metropolitan Opera House last October, and will continue their tour in the east after the Carnegie Hall appearance.

* * *

Heitor Villa-Lobos, Brazilian composer, will conduct his own works at concerts with the New York Philharmonic - Symphony at Carnegie Hall on February 8 and 9, when he will share the podium with Artur Rodzinski, musical director of the Philharmonic. Villa-Lobos will present Nos. 8 and 9 of his "Choros," the latter to be heard for the first time in North America.

Villa-Lobos will conduct portions of two programs to be given by Leopold ~~Stokowski~~ and the New York City Symphony on February 12 and 13 and on February 21, 23 and 24 will conduct the ~~Boston Sym-~~phony at Harvard university and ~~Boston's~~ Symphony Hall at the invitation of Serge Koussevitzky.

NEWARK, N.J.
HERALD NEWS
2/3/45

Boston Symphony Ork At Mosque

We owe the availability of some of our favorite musical masterpieces to the foresightedness and propadgandist energies of men who now belong to the past of music's history. It was Liszt who advaneced the cause of Wagner in his time of need. An ardent essay published by Schumann raised Brahms from obscurity. There are not a few other historic examples. But we do not have to survey figures of the past to discover the source of our indebtedness for familiarity with composers and compositions acsepted today as fixtures in the orchestral world. We need look no farther than Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will bring his arganization to the Mosque on Thursday evening, February 15th under sponsorship of the Griffith Music Foundation.

When the history of the past quarter century of musical progress is completely assembled, assayed, and recorded, the name of Koussevitzky will loom large in it.

When Debussy was none too firmly established in the musical world at large, it was Koussevitzky who gave him an invaluable impetus to his name and fame by inviting him to appear in Moscow as guest conductor of Koussevitzky's own orchestra, in an entirely Debussyan programme.

Surely there is no difficulty today in accepting Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" as a perfectly enjoyable composition.

It is a striking fact that compositions which Koussevitzky had the prophetic visiion to see as permanent additions to the orchestral repertory have become so. Works which he abandoned after a fair period of trail have failed to gain permanence. He has sought, not the merely new, but the new and good.

Globe MUSIC Feb 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The novelties and glitter of guest conductors are temporarily past at the Boston Symphony concerts, although Serge Koussevitzky has not yet returned to bring matters entirely back to the comfortable routine of familiarity.

This week the concerts are ably conducted by Richard Burgin, and at them Witold Malcuzynski, the Polish pianist, makes his first appearances as soloist with this orchestra, in the F minor Concerto of Chopin. The rest of the program is devoted to variations, those of Brahms on the "St. Antoni" chorale by Haydn, and those which make the spreading tapestry of Strauss' "Don Quixote."

Mr. Malcuzynski's performance of the Chopin Concerto was truly superb as technic, poetry and recreative imagination. The style was broad yet precise, the articulation clear, and piano and orchestral part were as nicely adjusted as they could be. Those in yesterday's audience will not forget the dynamic effect of the fast movements or the mounting and enveloping reverie of the larghetto.

This was all quite different from the heavy pedaling and the old-fashioned pounding delivered by Mr. Malcuzynski at his Boston debut recital last March. Then he seemed mostly technic and little of a poet. Now his technic is at the service of his musicianship and that brings a far different result.

Soloist, conductor and orchestra all received due recognition in the notably cordial applause — with some stamping—that followed the Concerto. It was evident that the Friday subscribers had found a new personality whose tall, well-tailored elegance and shiny dark hair certainly did not detract from their enjoyment of the music. Mr. Burgin accompanied Mr. Malcuzynski extremely well.

Jean Bedetti took the cello voice of Don Quixote and Jean Lefranc the viola garrulities of Sancho Panza in Richard Strauss' condensation of what happens in "Don Quixote." As they have shown before, both musicians have a virtuoso mastery of their parts and once again they unfolded them eloquently and with rich tone.

"Don Quixote" is for conductors a virtuoso piece, and it requires the utmost polish of detail, interpretive planning and a sense of story-telling in music. Mr. Burgin's reading came off very well, though it did lack that ultimate glow, intensity and general showmanship of the Koussevitzky interpretation. As for Brahms' Variations, they, as usual, were as relaxing as pipe and slippers—but not so stimulating as a cocktail—after a hard day at the office.

Feb. 3

SYMPHONY HALL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting and Witold Malcuzynski, pianist, as soloist, presents Chopin's F minor concerto, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Strauss' "Don Quixote; 8:30 P. M.

Audience Gives Koussevitzky Rousing Ovation

Times - Herald Jan. 12

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony were greeted with more enthusiasm last night in Constitution Hall than has been manifested by any Washington audience during the last seven years.

Dr. Gunn

For weeks the hall had been sold out for this visit of the Boston musicians; but that circumstance did not prevent many hundreds of would-be listeners from seeking admission. These disappointed people milled around the building, blocking the entrances and delaying the concert by as much as 15 minutes.

Audience Rises in Greeting

When Dr. Koussevitzky made his appearance the public rose to greet him, though this gesture may have resulted from a misunderstanding. The Boston players rise for the playing of the National Anthem before the conductor makes his entrance, and remain standing until its conclusion. The public thought this was a possible tribute to the eminent Russian artist, and rose also. Having gotten to their feet, they applauded with great vigor, and the concert was further delayed while the conductor acknowledged these tributes.

Thenceforward the evening resolved itself into a series of such demonstrations, which mounted in intensity to the ovations that marked the conclusion of the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite and the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony. Koussevitzky chose a program devoted to the music of Slavic and Gallic composers, quoting the Croatian master Joseph Haydn's Eighty-eighth Symphony, Debussy's Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the Ravel and Shostakovich works already mentioned.

Unexpected Highlights

There were some who felt that Koussevitzky traveled far to play a well known Haydn Symphony which had been presented within the fortnight by the Philadelphia Orchestra and has been a frequent item in the programs of the National Symphony. It had been hoped that this conductor, who has been conspicuous over the years for his championship of native music, would play something from the Boston Symphony's extensive American repertoire. The crystalline clarity of the ancient Haydn score under his baton, the unexpected highlights that lifted its several moments of genuine inspiration into flawlessly proportioned relief, consoled these malcontents.

These qualities also convinced the public, long before this venerable work was ended that the Boston Symphony is a superbly brilliant and efficient ensemble, as fine as any which the nation has known since we began to cultivate the art.

Unmatched Versatility

To turn from the simplicity of Haydn to the elusive acoustic vapors of Debussy's exquisite tone-poem or to the amazing orchestral virtuosity which set forth the drama of the Ravel score proved a versatility not matched at present among the major orchestras.

There was magic, too, in the Shostakovich performance. This is a curiosly self-illuminated score with many strangely framed acoustic windows open to the light and the winds of heaven. It is a work of great eloquence and the name of Koussevitzky is inseparably associated with its popularity in this country.

Now that the multitude has hailed the Boston orchestra and its conductor with such overwhelming enthusiasm, it is to be hoped that their visits may become more frequent. We could absorb several each season.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL

FEB 4 - 1945

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of the most beloved of conductors, takes a little time out to relax before working with the Boston symphony. The next broadcast of this popular series will be heard on KSCJ next Saturday night at 7:30.

Herald

MUSIC

Feb 3

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 15th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Witold Malcuzynski, pianist; Jean Bedetti, cellist and Jean Lefranc, violist. The program:

Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56A .... Brahms
Concerto No. 2 in F minor, Op. 21 .. Chopin
"Don Quixote," Op. 35 .... Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

About once a year a new pianist appears with the orchestra who reveals such indisputable stature as a musician and an artist it is a pleasure to toss as many hats into the air as come to hand. Last year it was William Kapell; this year—and, I rather suspect, for some years to come—it is Witold Malcuzynski.

Actually, Mr. Malcuzynski made his debut in Boston last March in a solo Jordan Hall recital which ranked, to my way of looking at it, as one of the more notable piano recitals of the year. At that time he disclosed a very powerful but most poetical and sensitive approach to the pianoforte (I even seem to have thrown all caution to the birds and said that his virtuosity was "little short of stupefying"). Yesterday, however, these first impressions were more than corroborated. He is, there can be little doubt, a distinguished musical personality as well, for he realized Chopin's F minor Concerto as it seldom is realized, and this despite a very unsatisfactory accompaniment by the orchestra.

The trouble was that nobody seemed to be very much interested in playing the tiresome orchestral part. It was obviously a chore, and the result was a lack-luster, even a routine and sometimes faulty performance. True, there's nothing in it to keep 110 superb musicians alert; it is orchestral child's play. Yet it is by no means as bad as many "experts" make it out to be, and certainly not as pallid as it sounded yesterday. In view of this Mr. Malcuzynski's great poise, his utter clarity of line, his poetical yet virile phrasing and his ability to let us hear every note without a single pedal smudge, must be considered a very real personal triumph.

Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Haydn went well, the woodwind textures being especially attractively set forth, but here too there was little real vitality in the orchestral conception of the work.

Strauss' "Don Quixote," its solo cello and viola roles again admirably set forth by Jean Bedetti and Jean Lafranc, proved effective as always. Mr. Bedetti, who characterizes the good Don with sufficient conviction to persuade the audience that he is indeed the personification of his voice, has seldom been in better form or achieved a more beautiful tone quality on his instrument. I don't think anybody can do what he does—for pure sentiment of phrase—with the "Vision of Dulcinea" variation or with the closing pages when the Don, before he expires, has his moment of peaceful sanity.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

FEB 3 - 1945

Week-End Listening For Music Lovers

Saturday

WSUN, 8:30 to 9:30 p.m., Richard Burgin, associate conductor leads the Boston Symphony in "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" by Brahms, and Witold Malcuzynsky, piano soloist, in Chopin's "Concerto No. 2 in F Minor."

LIFE
CHICAGO, ILL.

BOS

[illegible]

NILES, OHIO
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1945

News of Hollywood

BY LOUELLA PARSONS

Cukor Will Make Screen Version Of "Carmen"

HOLLYWOOD — I met George Cukor on the M-G-M lot and asked him if it were true that he plans to direct "Carmen." He said, yes, but not the opera. He will use Prosper Merimee's book, which is much more brilliant than the Bizet opera. A sentimental version of the original story with gorgeous music. "However," said George, "I would want to use the beautiful vocal numbers in some way, with an outside operatic singer presenting them."

George thinks Paulette Goddard would be perfect, or possibly Lana Turner, as the vivacious Carmen, the siren who worked in a cigaret factory. The Merimee novel is in public domain, so there are no restrictions on George directing it or M-G-M producing it.

LEO McCAREY'S PERCENTAGE of "Going My Way," has netted him enuogh good old American dollars to follow any hobby he chooses. He has wanted, for a long time, to direct a stage play and now he will do a comedy for Al Rosen in the fall. He will rehearse the cast here and go as far as San Francisco. Rosen is one of the producers of "Goodnight Ladies," the Skeets Gallagher show, which played in Chicago two years and is now in New York. Speaking of McCarey he is arranging to borrow that delightful child actress, Elizabeth Taylor, for "Bells of St. Mary's," starring Bing Crosby and Ingrid Bergman.

Seeks Bernstein

If Sol Lesser is successful in snagging Leonard Bernstein in New York, he'll be responsible for bringing one of the country's youngest musical geniuses to the screen. Bernstein, 26 years old, has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it was from his original ballet, "Fancy Free," that Broadway's new hit, "On the Town" drew its inspiration. In spite of his musical record, Bernstein has never given the movies a tumble. Sol has offered him two jobs—the complete scoring of "Crazy to Dance" and an ultra ballet composition for "Paris Canteen." "On the Town" 'tis whispered has been bought by M-G-M.

TWENTY - ONE - YEAR - OLD LOUIS NEGRO, who saw 27 months service in the Pacific Pacific, is an excited and happy boy. He was at the Hollywood Canteen and asked permission to sing with the band. "You won't be ashamed of me," he promised Ida Koverman. So, the good-looking guy in the Navy uniform got up and sang and the boys okayed him so loudly that Joe Pasternak gave him a test. As soon as he is out of the Navy he'll make a picture at M-G-M under the new name of Louis Noble.

'Tree' Wins Praise

There should be a special Academy Award for Peggy Ann Garner in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." The child is marvelous as "Francie," the little girl who knows all the sorrows and heartaches of the very poor. Twentieth Century-Fox has really done an outstanding job on Betty Smith's popular novel. Dorothy McGuire as poor, tired "Katie Nolan," ignorant but ambitious for her children, is something very special. Joan Blondell is "Aunt Cissy" right out of the book, and Jimmy Dunn might be "Johnny Nolan" come to life. Seldom has a picture been so beautifully cast, produced and directed.

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

FEB 7 - 1945

FEIDLER, GIVES UP MUSIC PRIVILEGE TO SO. AMERICAN

Boston, Feb. 7, (AP)—A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston Symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston Symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on Feb. 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 - 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over. Learning how Feidler had bowed out, America de Galvao-Bueno, Brazilian consul, wrote the management, "This was a noble gesture on Mr. Fieldler's part".

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

7 - 1945

FIEDLER STEPS ASIDE FOR BRAZILIAN GUEST

BOSTON (AP)—A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston symphony management that Heitor Villa Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on Feb 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season, as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conductor of the Boston symphony pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 and 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over. Learning how Fiedler had bowed out, Americo de Galvao-Bueno, Brazilian consul, wrote the management "this was a noble gesture on Mr. Fiedler's part."

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

FEB 7 - 1945

Fiedler Proves Himself Good Neighbor

BOSTON, (AP) — A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston Symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston Symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on February 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season, as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conducttor of the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 and 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 7 - 1945

Koussevitzky Urges Postwar Symphony for Each of States

Boston, Feb. 7.—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 States would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

Just back from his annual mid-Winter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each State must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that Government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES

FEB 7 - 1945

Famed Conductor Says Music Will Provide 'Spiritual Food'

Dr. Koussevitzky, Leader of Boston Symphony, Advocates 48-State Program in Postwar Period

By ESTELLE BOND
United Press Staff Correspondent

BOSTON, Feb. 7.—(UP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 States would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

The energetic, 70-year-old maestro, who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston orchestra, told the United Press in an interview that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Just back from his annual midwinter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each State must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

With ambitious symphonic groups being formed in all parts of the nation, the future is limitless for youthful American musical hopefuls, Dr. Koussevitzky asserted.

"Twenty years ago, I could not have made such a statement," the gray-haired conductor recalled. "In those days, it was very difficult for a leader to have an American as first player of any instrument."

"We had to import Europeans to make up the personnel of our symphony orchestras then," he continued. "But in the meantime, new American conservatories blossomed and, through their influence, changed the whole history of modern American musical performance."

Naturalized in 1941, the Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky is a staunch defender of American musical talents. Coupled with his assertion that the nation never again will have to comb Europe for musicians, he declared:

"An artist is an international character, and a musical gift is universal. In their attitude toward life, Americans may be different from Europeans. But in their attitude toward music, in their sensitivity and fire, there is no difference."

Himself a onetime orchestra player who later became the greatest virtuoso of the double bass, Dr. Koussevitzky understands the problems attending both sides of the podium.

His first postwar act, he said, will be to reinstate into the nation's second-oldest symphony orchestra its six players who were called into military service.

"We'll welcome them back gladly," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "They can't come back too soon."

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL

FEB 4 - 1945

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of the most beloved of conductors, takes a little time out to relax before working with the Boston symphony. The next broadcast of this popular series will be heard on KSCJ next Saturday night at 7:30.

Herald

MUSIC

Feb 3

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 15th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Witold Malcuzynski, pianist; Jean Bedetti, cellist and Jean Lefranc, violist. The program:

Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56A ....Brahms
Concerto No. 2 in F minor, Op. 21..Chopin
"Don Quixote." Op. 35..........Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

About once a year a new pianist appears with the orchestra who reveals such indisputable stature as a musician and an artist it is a pleasure to toss as many hats into the air as come to hand. Last year it was William Kapell; this year—and, I rather suspect, for some years to come—it is Witold Malcuzynski.

Actually, Mr. Malcuzynski made his debut in Boston last March in a solo Jordan Hall recital which ranked, to my way of looking at it, as one of the more notable piano recitals of the year. At that time he disclosed a very powerful but most poetical and sensitive approach to the pianoforte (I even seem to have thrown all caution to the birds and said that his virtuosity was "little short of stupefying"). Yesterday, however, these first impressions were more than corroborated. (He is, there can be little doubt, a distinguished musical personality as well, for he realized Chopin's F minor Concerto as it seldom is realized, and this despite a very unsatisfactory accompaniment by the orchestra.

The trouble was that nobody seemed to be very much interested in playing the tiresome orchestral part. It was obviously a chore, and the result was a lack-luster, even a routine and sometimes faulty performance. True, there's nothing in it to keep 110 superb musicians alert; it is orchestral child's play. Yet it is by no means as bad as many "experts" make it out to be, and certainly not as pallid as it sounded yesterday. In view of this Mr. Malcuzynski's great poise, his utter clarity of line, his poetical yet virile phrasing and his ability to let us hear every note without a single pedal smudge, must be considered a very real personal triumph.

Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Haydn went well, the woodwind textures being especially attractively set forth, but here too there was little real vitality in the orchestral conception of the work.

Strauss' "Don Quixote," its solo cello and viola roles again admirably set forth by Jean Bedetti and Jean Lafranc, proved effective as always. Mr. Bedetti, who characterizes the good Don with sufficient conviction to persuade the audience that he is indeed the personification of his voice, has seldom been in better form or achieved a more beautiful tone quality on his instrument. I don't think anybody can do what he does—for pure sentiment of phrase—with the "Vision of Dulcinea" variation or with the closing pages when the Don, before he expires, has his moment of peaceful sanity.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

FEB 3 - 1945

Week-End Listening For Music Lovers

Saturday

WSUN, 8:30 to 9:30 p.m., Richard Burgin, associate conductor leads the Boston Symphony in "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" by Brahms, and Witold Malcuzynsky, piano soloist, in Chopin's "Concerto No. 2 in F Minor."

LIFE
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 5 [illegible]

BOSTON

Sirs:

As a true Bostonian I could not help but feel chagrined that you would publish an article such as "Boston—An Old City Looks Ahead" (LIFE Jan 15). It was true as far as it went [illegible] told the tr[illegible] in such a way as to [illegible] any outsider a completely erroneous picture of the pl[illegible] such a man as Oliver Wendell Holmes called the "hub of the universe." Yes, we have slums but they [illegible] not representative of Boston. Boston is also known for its Boston Symphony Orchestra and we also have [illegible] legitimate theaters.

We have [illegible] major-league baseball teams, a major- and a minor-league hockey team, football games during the season representing the colleges, Suffolk Downs race track, Wonderland dog track and many more.

These are only a few things an out-of-towner should know about Boston, but maybe they will show that between South Boston and Beacon Hill there are thousands of us middle-class Americans who, after touring many other parts of the U. S. and Canada, have decided that Boston is a grand city and not the miserable, dirty hovel it is represented as being in LIFE.

DOROTHY ALBERTSON
Somerville, Mass.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 7 - 1945

Koussevitzky Urges Postwar Symphony for Each of States

Boston, Feb. 7.—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 States would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

Just back from his annual mid-Winter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each State must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that Government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

News of Hollywood

BY LOUELLA PARSONS

Cukor Will Make Screen Version Of "Carmen"

HOLLYWOOD — I met George Cukor on the M-G-M lot and asked him if it were true that he plans to direct "Carmen." He said, yes, but not the opera. He will use Prosper Merimee's book, which is much more brilliant than the Bizet opera. A sentimental version of the original story with gorgeous music. "However," said George, "I would want to use the beautiful vocal numbers in some way, with an outside operatic singer presenting them."

George thinks Paulette Goddard would be perfect, or possibly Lana Turner, as the vivacious Carmen, the siren who worked in a cigaret factory. The Merimee novel is in public domain, so there are no restrictions on George directing it or M-G-M producing it.

LEO McCAREY'S PERCENTAGE of "Going My Way," has netted him enuogh good old American dollars to follow any hobby he chooses. He has wanted, for a long time, to direct a stage play and now he will do a comedy for Al Rosen in the fall. He will rehearse the cast here and go as far as San Francisco. Rosen is one of the producers of "Goodnight Ladies," the Skeets Gallagher show, which played in Chicago two years and is now in New York. Speaking of McCarey he is arranging to borrow that delightful child actress, Elizabeth Taylor, for "Bells of St. Mary's," starring Bing Crosby and Ingrid Bergman.

Seeks Bernstein

If Sol Lesser is successful in snagging Leonard Bernstein in New York, he'll be responsible for bringing one of the country's youngest musical geniuses to the screen. Bernstein, 26 years old, has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it was from his original ballet, "Fancy Free," that Broadway's new hit, "On the Town" drew its inspiration. In spite of his musical record, Bernstein has never given the movies a tumble. Sol has offered him two jobs—the complete scoring of "Crazy to Dance" and an ultra ballet composition for "Paris Canteen." "On the Town" 'tis whispered has been bought by M-G-M.

TWENTY - ONE - YEAR - OLD LOUIS NEGRO, who saw 27 months service in the Pacific Pacific, is an excited and happy boy. He was at the Hollywood Canteen and asked permission to sing with the band. "You won't be ashamed of me," he promised Ida Koverman. So the good-looking guy in the Navy uniform got up and sang and the boys okayed him so loudly that Joe Pasternak gave him a test. As soon as he is out of the Navy he'll make a picture at M-G-M under the new name of Louis Noble.

'Tree' Wins Praise

There should be a special Academy Award for Peggy Ann Garner in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." The child is marvelous as "Francie," the little girl who knows all the sorrows and heartaches of the very poor. Twentieth Century-Fox has really done an outstanding job on Betty Smith's popular novel. Dorothy McGuire as poor, tired "Katie Nolan," ignorant but ambitious for her children, is something very special. Joan Blondell is "Aunt Cissy" right out of the book, and Jimmy Dunn might be "Johnny Nolan" come to life. Seldom has a picture been so beautifully cast, produced and directed.

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

FEB 7 - 1945

FEIDLER, GIVES UP MUSIC PRIVILEGE TO SO. AMERICAN

Boston, Feb. 7, (AP)—A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston Symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston Symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on Feb. 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 - 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over. Learning how Feidler had bowed out, America de Galvao-Bueno, Brazilian consul, wrote the management, "This was a noble gesture on Mr. Fieldler's part".

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

FEB 7 - 1945

Fiedler Proves Himself Good Neighbor

BOSTON, (AP) — A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston Symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston Symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on February 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season, as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conducttor of the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 and 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over.

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

7 - 1945

FIEDLER STEPS ASIDE FOR BRAZILIAN GUEST

BOSTON (AP)—A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on Feb 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season, as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conductor of the Boston symphony pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 and 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over. Learning how Fiedler had bowed out, Americo de Galvao-Bueno, Brazilian consul, wrote the management "this was a noble gesture on Mr. Fiedler's part."

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES

FEB 7 - 1945

Famed Conductor Says Music Will Provide 'Spiritual Food'

Dr. Koussevitsky, Leader of Boston Symphony, Advocates 48-State Program in Postwar Period

By ESTELLE BOND
United Press Staff Correspondent

BOSTON, Feb. 7.—(UP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 States would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

The energetic, 70-year-old maestro, who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston orchestra, told the United Press in an interview that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Just back from his annual mid-winter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each State must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

With ambitious symphonic groups being formed in all parts of the nation, the future is limitless for youthful American musical hopefuls, Dr. Koussevitzky asserted.

"Twenty years ago, I could not have made such a statement," the gray-haired conductor recalled. "In those days, it was very difficult for a leader to have an American as first player of any instrument."

"We had to import Europeans to make up the personnel of our symphony orchestras then," he continued. "But in the meantime, new American conservatories blossomed and, through their influence, changed the whole history of modern American musical performance."

Naturalized in 1941, the Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky is a staunch defender of American musical talents. Coupled with his assertion that the nation never again will have to comb Europe for musicians, he declared:

"An artist is an international character, and a musical gift is universal. In their attitude toward life, Americans may be different from Europeans. But in their attitude toward music, in their sensitivity and fire, there is no difference."

Himself a onetime orchestra player who later became the greatest virtuoso of the double bass, Dr. Koussevitzky understands the problems attending both sides of the podium.

His first postwar act, he said, will be to reinstate into the nation's second-oldest symphony orchestra its six players who were called into military service.

"We'll welcome them back gladly," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "They can't come back too soon."

[48]

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
FEB 7 - 1945

Dr. Koussevitzky Envisions Orchestra For Every State

Great Future Opening For Musicians, Boston Symphony Conductor Claims

By Estelle Bond

BOSTON, Feb. 7 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

In 21st Season

The energetic, 70-year-old maestro, who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston orchestra, told the United Press in an interview that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Just back from his annual midwinter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each State must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that Government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

With ambitious symphonic groups being formed in all parts of the Natin, the future is limitless for youthful American musical hopefuls, Dr. Koussevitzky asserted.

"Twenty years ago, I could not have made such a statement," the gray-haired conductor recalled. "In those days, it was very difficult for a leader to have an American as first player of any instrument."

"We had to import Europeans to make up the personnel of our symphony orchestras then," he continued. "But in the meantime, new American conservatories blossomed and, through their influence changed the whole history of modern American musical performance."

Naturalized in 1941, the Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky is a staunch defender of American musical talents. Coupled with his assertion that the Nation never again will have to comb Europe for musicians, he declared:

"An artist is an international character, and a musical gift is universal. In their attitude toward life, Americans may be different from Europeans. But in their attitude toward music, in their sensitivity and fire, there is no difference."

Himself a one-time orchestra player who later became the greatest virtuoso of the double bass, Dr. Koussevitzky understands the problems attending both sides of the podium.

His first postwar act, he said, will be to reinstate into the Nation's second-oldest symphony orchestra its six players who were called into military service.

"We'll welcome them back gladly," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "They can't come back too soon."

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
FEB 7 - 1945

Koussevitsky Favors Symphony Orchestras In All 48 U.S. States

By Estelle Bond
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

BOSTON, Feb. 7 (U.P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiriiual food for its residents."

The energetic, 70-year-old maestro, who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston orch stra, told the United Press in an interview that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Just back from his annual mid-winter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra and that each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government official will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

With ambitious symphonic groups being formed in all parts of the nation, the future is limitless for youthful American musical hopefuls, Dr. Koussevitzky asserted.

"Twenty years ago, I could not have made such a statement," the gray-haired conductor recalled. "In those days, it was very difficult for a leader to have an American as first player of any instrument."

"We had to import Europeans to make up the personel of our symphony orchestras then," he continued. "But in the meantime, new American conservatories blossomed and, through their influence, changed the whole history of American modern music."

Naturalized in 1941, the Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky is a staunch defender of American musical talents. Coupled with his assertion that the the nation never again will have to comb Europe for musicians, he declared:

"An artist is an international character, and a musical gift is universal. In their attitude toward life, Americans may be different from Europeans. But in their attitude toward music, in their sensitivity and fire, there is no difference."

Himself a onetime orchestra player who later became the greatest virtuoso of the double bass, Dr. Koussevitzky understands the problems attending both sides of the podium.

His first post-war act, he said, will be to reinstate into the nation's second-oldest symphony orchestra its six players who were called into military service.

"We'll welcome them back gladly," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "They can't come back too soon."

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 7 - 1945

Fiedler Gives Up Coveted Podium

Yields Boston Symphony Baton To Brazilian In 'Noble Gesture'

BOSTON (AP)—A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston Symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston Symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on Feb. 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season, as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Bostn-born and Boston educated musician to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 and 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over. Learning how Fiedler had bowed out, Americo de Galvao-Bueno, Brazilian consul, wrote the management, "This was a noble gesture on Mr. Fiedler's part."

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
FEB 7 - 1945

ASKS ORCHESTRAS FOR EVERY STATE

Koussevitzky Advocates Postwar Symphony Program

Boston, Feb. 7 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

The energetic, 70 year old maestro, who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston orchestra, told the United Press in an interview that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Just back from his annual midwinter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officals will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

Times Have Changed

With ambitious symphonic groups being formed in all parts of the nation, the future is limitless for youthful American musical hopefuls, Dr. Koussevitzky asserted.

"Twenty years ago, I could not have made such a statement," the gray-haired conductor recalled. "In those days, it was very difficult for a leader to have an American as first player of any instrument."

"We had to import Europeans to make up the personnel of our symphony orchestras then," he continued. "But in the meantime, new American conservatories blossomed and, through their influence, changed the whole history of modern American musical performance."

Naturalized in 1941, the Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky is a staunch defender of American musical talents. Coupled with his assertion that the nation never again will have to comb Europe for musicians, he declared:

Understands Problems

"An artist is an international character, and a musical gift is universal. In their attitude toward life, Americans may be different from Europeans. But in their attitude toward music, in their sensitivity and fire, there is no difference."

Himself a one-time orchestra player who later became the greatest virtuoso of the double bass, Dr. Koussevitzky understands the problems attending both sides of the podium.

His first postwar act, he said, will be to reinstate into the nation's second-oldest symphony orchestra its six players who were called into military service.

"We'll welocme them back gladly," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "They can't come back too soon."

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
FEB 7 - 1945

Brazilian Composer To Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 7 (UP)—Heitor Villa-Lobos, the Brazilian composer, will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a program of his own music Feb. 23-24, it was announced today.

Villa-Lobos was invited to Boston by Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the orchestra. The Brazilian will give the first performance of his Choros No. 12 and the first performance in the United States of his Toccata and Fugue from "Bachianas Brasilieras" No. 7.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, was to have substituted for Koussevitzky but stepped aside when Villa-Lobos accepted Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation

---

SYMPHONY HALL—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will perform Beethoven's D major Violin Concerto, Jascha Heifetz soloist; and Tchaikovsky's Pathetique Symphony; 8:30 P. M.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
FEB 7 - 1945

Musical Postwar Program Favored

By ESTELLE BOND

Boston, Feb. 7—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

The energetic, 70-year-old maestro, who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston orchestra, told the United Press in an interview that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Just back from his annual midwinter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

With ambitious symphonic groups being formed in all parts of the nation, the future is limitless for youthful American musical hopefuls, Dr. Koussevitzky asserted.

"Twenty years ago, I could not have made such a statement," the gray-haired conductor recalled. "In those days, it was very difficult for a leader to have an American as first player of any instrument."

"We had to import Europeans to make up the personnel of our symphony orchestras then," he continued. "But in the meantime, new American conservatories blossomed and, through their influence, changed the whole history of modern American musical performance."

Naturalized in 1941, the Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky is a staunch defender of American musical talents. Coupled with his assertion that the nation never again will have to comb Europe for musicians, he declared:

"An artist is an international character, and a musical gift is universal. In their attitude toward life, Americans may be different from Europeans. But in their attitude toward music, in their sensitivity and fire, there is no difference."

Himself a one time orchestra player who later became the greatest virtuoso of the double bass, Dr. Koussevitzky understands the problems attending both sides of the podium.

His first postwar act, he said, will be to reinstate into the nation's second-oldest symphony orchestra its six players who were called into military service.

"We'll welcome them back gladly," Dr. Koussevitkzy said. "They can't come back too soon."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
FEB 7 - 1945

EACH STATE IS URGED TO FINANCE ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Feb. 7.—(UP) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today advocated a musical postwar program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

The energetic, 70-year-old maestro, who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston orchestra, told the United Press in an interview that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Just back from his annual midwinter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
FEB 7 - 1945

Gives Up Chance To Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Feb 7 (AP) — Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston Symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on February 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season, as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb 23 and 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over. Learning how Fiedler had bowed out, Americo de Galvao-Bueno, Brazilian consul, wrote the management, "this was a noble gesture on Mr Fiedler's part."

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.
PANTAGRAPH
FEB 7 - 1945

Koussevitzky Urges State Symphonies

BOSTON. — (U.P.) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Wednesday proposed a postwar program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor a symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

Koussevitzky told the United Press that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians." Koussevitzky, 70, said each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

DUNKIRK, N. Y.
OBSERVER
FEB 7 - 19

KOUSSEVITZKY ASKS EACH STATE HAVE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston, Feb. 7 — (UP — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today proposed a postwar program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor a symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

The 70-year-old conductor who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston orchestra, told the United Press in an interview that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

Globe MUSIC Feb. 10

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Apart from its purely musical aspects, the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was one of the most enjoyable of this season. Serge Koussevitzky, returning after a [illegible] was welcomed home with that especial cordiality which seems to be reserved for him by the musical public. And Jascha Heifetz, returning as soloist after two years, likewise received a [illegible] testimonial of how well he stands in these parts.

There were only two pieces on the program: Tchaikovsky's "Pahetic" Symphony and the Violin Concerto of Beethoven. As it happened, the final symphonic essay of the gifted and physically tortured Russian had not been heard at this series in more than three years. Following that length of time, the work was bound to have regained some of its freshness. And so it had.

For many years the "Pathetic" has been a Koussevitsky specialty, a sort of emotional warehouse upon which he always rides to spectacular success. He interprets it with an irrisistible blend of racial flavor and personal intensity, insisting upon the hottest and most colorful tone the orchestra can muster. Since the music is extremely personal, a detailed outpouring of woes and fears, this is precisely the way to do it.

As time goes on, the last movement becomes for this listener the finest. Somehow it seems to have less of that neurotic—even psychotic—nature which, seen beneath the surface of the first and third movements, is unpleasant and unhealthy. Yesterday's performance was incandescent but not the best, technically, Mr. Koussevitzky has given us. He forced the tone of the strings, the woodwinds now and again were out of tune, and fast episodes became a gallop and a gabble. Yet withal, this was a highly impressive "Pathetic".

In many respects, Mr. Heifetz is my favorite soloist for the Beethoven Concerto. Others make it more austere, more Teutonic, others manage to intellectualize it. But for sheer beauty of tone, a tone that is bright as sunlight and just as warming; for absolute technical accuracy and a general spirit of lyrical joy, Mr. Heifetz is unique.

Everything seemed to go perfectly. The soloist was at his best and from first measure to finaly chord all was beautifully articulated and proportioned. The orchestra played better than it had in the Tchaikovsky, and between soloist and ensemble there was complete cooperation. Mr. Koussevitzky also was in his best vein for Beethoven, and the sum total was a reading of unflawed satisfaction. The audience seemed to think so, too, for they cut loose with a real demonstration.

SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL

FEB 8 - 1945

CONDUCTOR URGES EACH STATE TO HAVE ITS OWN SYMPHONY

By ESTELLE BOND

BOSTON, Feb. 8.—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, advocated today a musical post-war program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor its own symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

The energetic, 70-year-old maestro, who now is in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, told the United Press in an interview that "a great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Just back from his annual mid-winter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky declared that more cities than ever before want their own orchestra and that each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for prosperous citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

With ambitious symphonic groups being formed in all parts of the nation, the future is limitless for youthful American musical hopefuls, Dr. Koussevitzky asserted.

"Twenty years ago, I could not have made such a statement," the gray-haired conductor recalled. "In those days, it was very difficult for a leader to have an American as first player of any instrument."

"We had to import Europeans to make up the personnel of our symphony orchestras then," he continued. "But in the meantime, new American conservatories blossomed and, through their influence, changed the whole history of modern American musical performance."

Naturalized in 1941, the Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky is a staunch defender of American musical talents. Coupled with his assertion that the nation never again will have to comb Europe for musicians, he declared:

"An artist is an international character, and a musical gift is universal. In their attitude toward life, Americans may be different from Europeans. But in their attitude toward music, in their sensitivity and fire, there is no difference."

Himself a one-time orchestra player who later became the greatest virtuoso of the double bass, Dr. Koussevitzky understands the problems attending both sides of the podium.

His first postwar act, he said, will be to reinstate into the nation's second-oldest symphony orchestra its six players who were called into military service.

"We'll welcome them back gladly," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "They can't come back too soon."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 8 - 1945

Music

By Louis Biancolli

Villa-Lobos Will Put Anything to Music

Heitor Villa-Lobos, leading Brazilian composer, who conducts two of his own works on the Philharmonic-Symphony program tonight, doesn't like being told his music sounds like anybody else's.

"When I write music, it is in the style of Heitor Villa-Lobos," he said in French in an interview at the Waldorf-Astoria. "In my music there are no so-called influences. I follow no style or fashion. He who does becomes a prisoner of his models."

The dynamic little Brazilian whose "Choros No. 8" on the Philharmonic program was dubbed "Le Fou Huitieme"—The Mad Eighth—by Parisian friends, said that he believed in only one doctrine of art—"absolute freedom," and only one kind of "inspiration"—"biological necessity."

"I write music because I cannot help it," he said. "Because it is one of the functions of my system. I could no more give it up than I could give up breathing or eating or talking."

Other Projects.

Mr. Villa-Lobos hasn't been wasting his time in his hotel suite. Already completed are a new "Fantasia for Cello and Orchestra," dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky; a "Bachiana No. 9," dedicated to Aaron Copland, and a "Concerto for Harmonica and Orchestra."

"I adore the harmonica," he said, sampling a few phrases on one of the chromatic specials used by Larry Adler, ace virtuoso of the reeds. "I am a great devotee of Mr. Adler's playing."

A short time ago Mr. Villa-Lobos wrote out a "New York Skyline" number which was featured on a recent CBS broadcast. A friend gave him a rough idea in pencil of a corner of the city's silhouette.

"It was like this," said the composer, tracing the "skyline" in pencil and showing in the manuscript score how he carried out the tracery in the melodic line. "You see how the shape corresponds?" I think I saw.

Right now the restless Brazilian is intent on a good neighborly gesture—picturing the mountains of America, Catskills included—in his next "Symphony No. 7." His "Sixth Symphony" grew out of a composite picture of photographs of the Brazilian highlands.

"If you have any photos of your mountains I can use them in planning my new symphony," he said.

Prolific Composer.

So, if you want to hear your favorite American mountains in Allegro maestoso style, send in any available snapshots. Senhor Villa-Lobos will oblige by finding a spot for it in his symphonic album.

Wherever concert music means anything Villa-Lobos is another word for Brazil. The man's fiery style is vitally stamped on Brazilian music and even more on Brazil's musical system of education, which he organized on a mass scale.

Compositions from his pen run to over a thousand, including works in dozens of different forms and moods. A few years ago Mr. Villa-Lobos took a trip on a bumpy little trolley in Sao Paolo. At the end of the line he already had a Toccata worked out, based on the theme of the rotating wheels.

Tonight the fiery-eyed genius from Rio will run off two weirdly exotic scores called Choros. Look for everything but the kitchen sink in the native percussion instruments being employed. La liberte absolute! That's Heitor Villa-Lobos.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NEWS

FEB 8 - 1945

48 State Symphony Orchestras Proposed As 'Spiritual Food'

BOSTON, Feb. 8.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday proposed a post-war program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor a symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

Mr. Koussevitzky said a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Mr. Koussevitzky declared each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that Government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

WILLIAMSPORT, PA.
SUN

FEB 8 - 1945

STATE MUSIC GROUPS PART OF PROGRAMS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Director for Postwar Efforts.

BOSTON — (UP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today proposed a postwar program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor a symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

Now in his 21st season as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, Koussevitzky told the United Press that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Koussevitzky, 70 said each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

With ambitious symphonic groups being formed in all parts of the nation, the future is limitless for youthful American musical hopefuls, Koussevitzky said.

Herald MUSIC Feb 10

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 16th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Jascha Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist. The program:

Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74 (Pathetique) — Tchaikovsky

Concerto for Violin in D major, Op. 61 — Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

It is to be doubted if any concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season so far gave so many people so much pleasure as yesterday's. Everybody loved every minute of it; everybody, that is, but those who made the music and those who had to write about it. Indeed, from the professional music critic's point of view, yesterday's concert was just the worst that could ever come along: what in heaven's name can anyone say about such a combination of musical superlatives as Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra with Jascha Heifetz performing a program consisting of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony and Beethoven's Violin Concerto?

It is ridiculous, of course, to assume that the last word on any one of these subjects has been uttered. You could develop the theme that Dr. Koussevitzky, when he reads Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, is the Sixth Symphony. In it, as in nothing else, he reveals himself. His personality, his innermost being, even his life story, you might say, is contained in his realization of this one work. In it, too, he displays every single aspect of his orchestral art, an art which encompasses everything from the utmost severity of classical feeling to a supercharged emotionality that carries everything before it. A sensitive biographer could, I think, conceive an amazingly accurate portrait of Serge Koussevitzky the man and the artist from his performance of Tchaikovsky's Pathetique Symphony.

As for the symphony itself, you could develop the theme that it is 1. a colossal masterpiece of music; 2. a positive musical menace, or 3. any one or all of a thousand gradations of quality in between. The same could be said of Beethoven's D major Violin Concerto, but in a more careful way, for here you would be up against the Beethoven cult which would cut you to excelsior if you dared breathe the thought that the master might have omitted a few dozen of those D major chords to advantage.

You could easily devote several columns to the orchestra, touching on its extreme range of tone color, its staggering flexibility and its marvelous expressiveness, as well as its surprising occasional technical errors. And with Jascha Heifetz, you could fill almost as much space merely describing the subtlety of his bowing, or of the proportion, the musicality, the distinction and the persuasion of his phrasing. You might well prove, in fact, that Mr. Heifetz' violin playing is a perfect musical act merely on the evidence he supplied in his conception of the slow movement of the concerto.

But to do any of these things would be to slight the others, and in such a concert as that given yesterday, the existence of the whole could not be established without the sum of its parts. So it must suffice, I think, to repeat that yesterday's concert was all things to all people; the perfect concert. And as final, crushing evidence to the fact, you merely have to add that Symphony Hall was absolutely sold out even though many in the audience must have feared—with blizzard transportation what it is—that they might have to stay there all night.

Post Feb 10

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An orchestra, like a restaurant, may have its specialty of the house: not "tournedoes Rossini" or "eggs Meyerbeer" (just to make it musical) but this or the other symphony. Such a "specialite de maison" at Symphony Hall is Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," at least since Dr. Koussevitzky came to give us his inimitable version of it. It didn't seem that long, but we hadn't heard it in a little over three years when it turned up yesterday afternoon. To revert to the gastronomic metaphor, Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the other number, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, was, after this highly spiced dish, a bit akin to plain boiled beef. Dr. Koussevitzky generally builds his programs more cleverly.

As for the "Pathetique" itself, lucky is he who, having once thrilled to this morbid, melodramatic, mortuary music, can continue to do so year after year, even when it is played by Koussevitzy and the Boston Symphony. Yet if the shivers and the gooseflesh fail to arrive you may still admire the masterly construction of the first movement, with the dramatic return of the chief theme coming as a sort of climax to the development and the extraordinary heightening of the effect of the recapitulated second subject by that ascending pizzicato in the basses. And the finale is not easily resisted. Here is the ultimate expression in music of the dread of death and dissolution. And what bitter irony does the briefly consoling second theme become in the end the very voice of despair! Some will have it that applause is not in place here, yet you could hardly argue that tribute, as justly deserved as it was yesterday, should be witheld.

It is not only that Beethoven's orchestral palette is so pale beside that of the melancholy, hysterical Russian. His Violin Concerto is, in itself, a tedious, repetitious work, the over-all monotony of which is but little alleviated by the tender, musing Larghetto. Mr. Heifetz brought his portion to coolly perfect performance, save for an unexpected shrillness and edge in certain upper tones, combined with just a suspicion of false intonation. And from Heifetz, of all people!

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

FEB 7 - 1945

Brazilian to Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 7 (AP)—A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston Symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston Symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on Feb. 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season, as guest conductor. Fielder is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops Orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's Esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 and 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular Symphony season performance.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 7 - 1945

Brazilian To Conduct Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — A Boston-born musician now risen to eminence and at last accorded the honor of conducting the world-famous Boston Symphony in two of its regular season concerts, has relinquished the opportunity, it was disclosed today, in honor of a Brazilian composer-conductor.

The story came out with the announcement by the Boston Symphony management that Heitor Villa-Lobos, outstanding and characteristically South American composer, would conduct two concerts featuring his own compositions on Feb. 23 and 24.

Those were the dates that had been assigned Arthur Fiedler at the beginning of the season, as guest conductor. Fiedler is the only Boston-born and Boston educated musician to become conductor of the Boston symphony pops orchestra. He is the founder and conductor of Boston's esplanade concerts. The programs Feb. 23 and 24 were to constitute his first opportunity to lead the great Boston orchestra in a regular symphony season performance.

Word came that Heitor Villa-Lobos would be in this part of the United States. Fiedler relinquished his long-cherished ambition so that the Brazilian could take over. Learning how Fiedler had bowed out, Americo de Galvao-Bueno, Brazilian consul, wrote the management, "This was a noble gesture on Mr. Fiedler's part."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 8 - 1945

STATE SYMPHONIES URGED

Koussevitzky Proposes Huge Post-War Music Program

BOSTON, Feb. 7 (U.P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today proposed a post-war program in which each of the forty-eight States would sponsor a symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

The conductor, who is now in his twenty-first season of conducting the Boston orchestra, said in an interview that a great future was opening for American orchestral musicians.

SEATTLE, WASH.
STAR

FEB 8 - 1945

State-Sponsored Orchestras Urged

BOSTON — (UP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today had proposed a post-war program in which each of the 48 states would sponsor a symphony orchestra as "spiritual food for its residents."

Koussevitzky told the United Press that a "great future is opening for American orchestral musicians."

Koussevitzky, 70, said each state must finance its own group instead of waiting for citizens to supply private funds.

"I hope that government officials will consider a symphony orchestra just as necessary as a new bridge or an improved road," he said. "Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY

FEB 1 4 1945

Boston Symphony Again Thrills Capacity Audience

By ARTHUR R. QUIMBY
Head Conn. College Music Dept.

Once again the Boston Symphony orchestra came to town, playing for an audience which packed the Palmer auditorium to the doors, in spite of adverse weather conditions; and once again it demonstrated its claim to a place among the great orchestras of all time. And why not? Here is an organization with a record of 64 years of unbroken service to the cause of music, generously endowed by its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, and generously supported at home and on tour by multitudes of music lovers. Very important, too, has been the fact that during the past 21 years conditions have been such that it has been possible to keep this great body of seasoned musicians intact almost to a man, so that their team characteristics have been developed to a superlative degree.

But in the last analysis the credit for the success of this orchestra as we hear it today must go to its director, Serge Koussevitzky. Dr. Koussevitzky brings to his position a veritable catalogue of qualifications, a 21 year period of service with this orchestra backed by long European experience, a mature unde standing, a sensitive musicianship, catholic taste in the selection of program material, a vitality which communicates to orchestra and audience alike, and above all an unflagging devotion to his art.

Nor is his contribution limited to conducting. How much service he has rendered by his publishing activities; how many young composers have been given their first hearings by him; how many young conductors have been trained under him; and how generously he gives of himself in conversation, especially with young people in whom he has unbounded faith! Yes, some of us are wont to eulogize the "great days" of the past; but here is a cause for eulogy in our day—the Boston orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

The program last night opened with a Divertimento in B flat major by Mozart, written originally for four strings and two horns and played with a reduced string section, the better to realize its chamber music quality. Ingratiating and impressive by turns, always original, and so witty at times that one wonders how the audience could keep so straight a face. How Mozart must have revelled in playing that first violin part, and what a tour de force as the first violin section realized it last night.

The Petrouchka Suite by Stravinsky must always be especially beloved by Koussevitzky because it was he who, in spite of the objections of his jury of musicians, dared publish it when Stravinsky was still an unknown composer. The work was brilliantly performed last night, and especially noteworthy was the performance of the piano part by Lukas Foss, a young man who is excelling in the triple capacity of composer, conductor and pianist. One's only regret is that the entire ballet is not performed in the concert version because so much of the humor and pathos is lost when the third tableau and final section is omitted. (And since when has a chalumeau been a hand organ!)

Of the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which concluded the program, one can scarcely find anything except words of praise. Termed by Wagner as the Apotheosis of the Dance, it is fundamentally a symphony of action, its themes a study in contrasting rhythms. There are of course differences of opinion as to certain tempi in this work, but as we heard it last night one felt that here was a performance which had grown from a long and searching study of the score, plus a complete understanding between orchestra and conductor. The intoxicating drive of the last movement brought salvos of applause from the audience which was a testimony not only to its pleasure in this music but also to its deep admiration for the Boston orchestra and for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS

B 8 – 1945

Symphony Group in Concert at Cushing

A typical pops concert was given by 33 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra under [redacted]dler in the patients recreation hall at Cushing General hospital yesterday for the men recovering there.

The hall was well-filled with patients as the fine musicians appeared in the third of their series. The program included Knightsbridge March (from London Suite) by Coates, Overture to Mignon by Thomas. Two movements from Eine Kleine Nachtmusik by Mozart, Andante Cantabile (from 5th Symphony) by Tchaikovsky, The Skaters Waltz by Waldteufel and the Dance of the Hours (from La Gioconda) by Ponchielli.

The enthusiastically received program was completed with the following encores: The Clarinet Polka by Manuel Valerio, Jazz Pizzacato by LeRoy Anderson, and Flight of the Bumble Bee by Rimsky-Korsakov.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 13 1945

Koussevitzky W
50-Cents-a-Year to Give Music to A

Brookline, Mass., Feb. 13.—(AP) Pay 50 cents a year on your income tax and enjoy state-supported music.

Serge Koussevitzky, for 21 years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, considers New England an ideal proving ground for all-year-round music for the price of one concert.

"There are about 3½ million taxpayers in New England," he said today. "If each were to add half a dollar to his State income tax bill we could have several symphony orchestras, as well as operas, chamber music and conservatories."

Slim and ruddy-cheeked at 70, the noted conductor glanced about the many-windowed study of his modernistic house and at the snowy woods surrounding it.

"A project like that also would give jobs to musicians returning from the fighting fronts," he mused.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 1[illegible] 1945

Boston Symphony Gives Concert in Carnegie Hall

Koussevitzky Leads Orchestra in the 'Pathetique'

The first half of Mr. Koussevitzky's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night was a sheer delight from every aspect. The two works performed, Mozart's Divertimento in B flat (K. 287) and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," are both first-rate products and were accorded interpretations which did complete justice to the intentions of both composers.

All five movements of the Mozart Divertimento are replete with endearing melodies, especially fine being the wistfully serene adagio and the finale with its dramatic introductory recitative, which unexpectedly appears again before the close of the effervescent allegro molto.

The orchestra's virtuosity was appositely exploited in "Petrouchka" and less appositely in the third movement of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, which occupied the second half of the program. Here the pacing was much too fast to permit sufficiently weighty treatment of the heavy accents of the march-like theme. In fact, Mr. Koussevitzky's tempi throughout this work were open to question. Especially disturbing was his sudden slowing of the music's flow in the middle section of the movement in five-quarter time. Tonally, of course, the performance was, as always, a sumptuous one.

J. D. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 1 4 1945

Koussevitzky Suggests Tax to Finance Music

Asks 50 Cent Income Levy for Year-Round Concerts

BROOKLINE, Mass., Feb. 13 (AP).—Pay 50 cents on your income tax and enjoy state-supported music. A Russian-born American citizen who watched a similar idea work out in his native land is convinced that it would be a success here.

Serge Koussevitsky, for twenty-one years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, considers New England an ideal proving ground for all-year-round music for the price of one concert.

"There are about 3,500,000 taxpayers in New England," he said today. "If each were to add half a dollar to his state income tax bill we could have several symphony orchestras as well as operas, chamber music and conservatories."

"A project like that also would give jobs to musicians returning from the fighting fronts," he mused.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 1 5 1945

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Deals in Contrasts, Programming a Mozart 'Novelty'

Koussevitzky made the music of Mozart news by playing the Divertimento in B-Flat (K. 287) at the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony last night. The juxtaposition of this fine example of 18th Century music and Stravinsky's Orchestra Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka" made an interesting study in contrasts. Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony completed the program.

That the Mozart should have been the novelty of the evening is not surprising, for this music is infrequently played. Written in the year he came of age, the Divertimento calls for string quartet and two horns. It is an "occasional" piece, having been commissioned for private consumption. Like so many of its type, this finds Mozart giving of his best even though he had no assurance of its fate. The result is an exquisite suite of six movements (five played last night with strings and horns), a model of design and of craftsmanship. Hearing it is sheer delight from every point of view. Incidentally, it opens the program of the orchestra at the Academy of Music tomorrow night.

All was not at its best in the performance of the Mozart. Both the strings and the horns had their bad moments. Also, Koussevitzky's straightforward approach checked the grace and elegance sufficiently to allow for a more understanding interpretation.

The Stravinsky found the orchestra in top form. Because of the striking contrast of this music with that of Mozart, it is worth noting how readily this 20th century "revolutionary" work has become accepted, how tame it has become in the 34 years of its existence because we have accustomed our ears to the "new" style. Of its superior character there is no doubt, and it remains one of the real achievements of Stravinsky's creative activity. Indeed, we almost welcome it now as an old favorite, reveling in the orchestral color and its general brilliance. Lukas Foss played the piano part, his first official appearance with the orchestra in his capacity as its pianist.

On the Tchaikowsky there is no need to comment, for it is a Koussevitzky warhorse. He programs it with a regularity that is alarming, apparently having little regard for variation in his limited number of New York programs. It may greatly please his audience but its constant repetition certainly narrows their horizon.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

FEB 1 5 1945

Words and Music

Lunch With Dr. Sargent— And the Boston Symphony

By Harriett Johnson

What has happened to England's music during the war was a question which Dr. Malcolm Sargent answered with enthusiasm yesterday at a luncheon given in his honor in the Wedgwood Room of the Waldorf-Astoria. The distinguished English conductor, here for a four-week conducting engagement with the "General Motors Symphony of the Air," proved himself a happy speechmaker as well as a musician.

In 1939 at the outbreak of the war, according to Dr. Sargent, all concerts were canceled because of existing conditions. Not for long, however. Soon he, with others, was touring England's music halls giving concerts not only in the big cities but in the provinces and hamlets as well. "I helped wipe off incendiaries from the roof of Manchester's Concert Hall before the concert, but the concert went on," he said.

"Before the war many people thought good music was only for the highbrows. Now they realize it belongs to everybody. The people told us in one town our only rival in popularity was a first-class comedian. Then we knew we were good.

"One fellow standing in front of the building where we had given a concert said to me when I questioned him, 'I've discovered tonight I'm a bloody highbrow.' That gave us a thrill."

Dr. Sargent defined an aristocrat as a "person who likes the best things." He made a point of emphasizing that the day when the word stood for distinctions in class and background was past. But in the sense of his definition, he said that the war, by bringing good music to more people, was helping to make everyone employ their leisure hours to more advantage, and therefore making many more "aristocrats."

Boston Symphony

In the puppet world, Stravinsky's Petrouchka is among the immortals. The Russian composer in his ballet of the same name gave Petrouchka a most appealing personality.

He also surrounded him with a plethora of musical inspiration and orchestral brilliance. But in performance, Stravinsky's score does not always live as it did last night played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

The orchestra sounded as if it were geared to a high pitch of excitement which overflowed at the point of the Stravinsky. There was a freedom and spontaneity which were not present in the performance of the Mozart "Divertimento in B Flat Major for Strings and Two Horns" that opened the program. The orchestral ensemble in the Mozart, however, was a study in perfection of orchestral precision and balance.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony (No. 6) glowed with beauty of color and sound, but the slow tempos, especially in the last movement, were too soporific in their effect. They also made the movement appear too much in parts and not enough of one piece.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 1 5 1945

Bostonians At Carnegie

By GRENA BENNETT

The announcement of another visit of the Boston Symphony means a rush for tickets to the box office of Carnegie Hall and last night's concert by the famous Massachusetts band was given to the usual capacity audience.

The accomplished and always interesting Serge Koussevitzky conducted, and while seasoned concert patrons might have considered the program as hackneyed, this was balanced by their regard for lofty and compelling interpretations.

The orchestra responded superbly to the conductor's mood and indications, and poured out a wealth of tonal fullness and unfailing precision of attack in the performance of Tschaikovsky's popular "Pathetic" symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB [illegible]

PROGRAM IS LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By ARTHUR V. BERGER.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his Boston Symphony last night at Carnegie Hall in a program which, according to normal standards, was unusually long. But the experience of length is curiously relative, and even in the final peroration of the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tschaikovsky, as 11 o'clock approached, the concert still managed to avoid giving an impression of lengthiness. For, except for some minor mishaps of the French horn, the orchestra was in superb form, and it was occupied with three very fine, contrasting works.

Finest of all was the opening Divertimento in B-flat major, K. 287, of Mozart, for strings and two horns. The beauty and breadth of this work were all the more astonishing since it is so rarely heard. The part of the first violins, covering a pitch range that is remarkable for Mozart's day, demands a virtuosity that would be taxing even for a solo performer. Under their very exacting leader, the instrumentalists dispatched these difficulties with extraordinary unanimity. The five movements are ingeniously varied. There is the powerful development of the first, the intriguing rhythms of the figurations of the second, the expansive and serene themes of the third, and the prophetic recitative, recalling Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in the last.

Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, in a crystalline performance, followed the Mozart. The sane diatonic basis which Stravinsky restored to music with this work enables it to hold its own even in the company of the purest Mozart. Regarded in this light, Stravinsky's music of the "Petrouchka" epoch is not so far from his most recent epoch as some would have us believe. Lukas Foss gave a distinguished performance of the piano part.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Tschaikovsky made its many stirring moments remarkably clear, but there was a tendency to draw out and overstate some of the more moderately paced sections.

[51]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB [illegible] 1945

STRIKING PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra Contrasts Mozart Divertimento With Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction opened its concert last night in Carnegie Hall with the most finished performance imaginable of a very simple and very difficult score —the Divertimento in B flat of Mozart for strings and two horns. This required virtuosity and style from each individual player to match the taste and finesse of the conductor's conception. And this was accomplished, to the vast edification of the audience which is the most discerning and exacting one that gathers for any orchestral concerts given in this city.

Then came the strongest imaginable contrast—the excerpts from Stravinsky's "Petruchka" music and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. The effect, coming after the very modest proportions and the strict classicism of Mozart's score, an effect planned with much astuteness, would in any case have been striking. But it is seldom in the history of Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant performances in this city that the orchestra has played with such color and intrepidity. And how different is this "Petruchka" music to the antiquated products of Stravinsky's late period. What genius, genius of the soil as well as of the individualistic composer, is in this score!

Girls Danced Down Aisle

There was an occasion when Koussevitzky played the "Petrouchka" arrangement to an audience in a town on the Volga and two peasant girls rose from their seats and danced down the aisle at the passage called the "coachmen's dance" in the score. Admonished to sit down, they said in astonishment, "But isn't that our dance?" It is a tribute of which the composer could well be proud, though he has now abandoned completely his "nationalistic" or "folkloristic" vein as exemplified in this work. Let those who remember the legend of the giant Anteus consider the results.

How many times Koussevitzky has played the "Pathetic" symphony here one does not remember at the moment. Nor how many times we have been told, since we were fifteen, that this hysterical, sentimental, self-pitying, "uncontrolled" music of Tchaikovsky would not last, could not last, or ever command the respect of cultured listeners, because of its obviousness, its emotionalism and lack of form—that also is beyond calculation.

Performance Dramatic

If the intensely dramatic performance of last night, which so deeply impressed the audience, had done nothing else, it would have served to remind listeners how wide of the mark and at variance with the plain evidence of history is this prejudice. Of course, we know that Tchaikovsky is just too, too raw for our more refined and sophisticated souls to endure. But the allegation that his symphonies are formless is simply unfounded, as also that they are uncontrolled.

This is not opinion. It is the fact contained in the score. When he arrived at his Sixth Symphony Tchaikovsky was mastering form in his own way. If there is one weakness of form in the first movement there are also enormous and exceptional distinction in this direction. The form of each of the last three movements is unique as it is balanced and proportioned in the statement of the idea. Control is nowhere more in evidence than in the evolution and the gigantic building up of the wild earth-shaking march, or the noble anguish of the finale. It is really time that Tchaikovskian dissenters should square their arguments with the facts. But the public does not need them.

At the end, and throughout the evening, there were demonstrations for orchestra and conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 1[illegible] 1945

Music

By Louis Biancolli

Koussevitzky Finds Stravinsky's Greatness

The power that was Igor Stravinsky surged through Carnegie Hall last night, when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony ran off a ballet suite from "Petrouchka," with young Lukas Foss, gifted pianist-composer, adding extra dynamism in the keyboard sequences.

"Petrouchka" will probably remain as Stravinsky's middle name. In the 30-odd years since its Paris premiere, the ballet has flashed the good word of Stravinsky's genius to the world. Wherever people thrill to great ballet and greater music, the man's memory will stay fresh.

Of course, Stravinsky strides ahead toward new idiom and rhythm. Few geniuses stand still for long. This man just happened to toss off a sheaf of masterpieces in his youth. Fairly or unfairly, what followed has risked eclipse by the early works. Whether he likes it or not, Stravinsky is "Petrouchka" to most people.

Twice Transcendent.

And you can't blame them. Listening to Mr. Koussevitzky's rousing reading, you felt again the fierce impact of this early score. Neither time nor rehearing dims its varicolored web. The throb of life, of huge forces, hurtle through it. Stravinsky caught a kind of cosmic beat here and in "Sacre du Printemps." Then he quieted down.

Mr. Koussevitzky's rendering was the kind that doesn't need choreography to go with it. Petrouchka's puppet world leaped to life in the stark play of orchestral color. In fact, no corps de ballet could match the fiddles, woodwinds and brasses in imaging the misfit manikin's tussle with a heartless world. And Mr. Foss' pianism rang out in sardonic brilliance.

A Mozart Gem.

Also billed last night were Mozart's B-flat major Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony.

The Mozart item was a real gem. Composers will come and go, as Rossini said, but there is only Mozart. Few concertgoers know this Divertimento music. The standard Mozart items crowd out so much of the Salzburg genius' output, little masterpieces like this go almost unheeded.

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony is, of course, a Boston special. Say what you want about Mr. Koussevitzky's slow tempi and slushy tone-masses, the man almost gives this music the power of speech. If ever a composer wore his heart on a symphonic score it was Tschaikowsky in this brooding masterpiece, and Mr. Koussevitzky always sees to it that it remains in the right place.

• • •

Novotna as Melisande.

Jarmila Novotna, Czech-American soprano of the Metropolitan's glamour wing, took over the role of Melisande for the first time last night in the current revival of Debussy's impressionist opera, "Pelleas et Melisande."

Add the role to the singer's gallery of appealing portraits. Subtly spun style blended with beauty of person and gesture in Mme. Novotna's version of the woodland mystery-woman. Vocally there were some tight spots; otherwise, the phrases ran off smoothly. Diction was as clear as day, from the early "Ne me touche pas!" to the tragic fade-out.

Also in the cast were Margaret Harshaw, Lillian Raymondi, Martial Singher, Lawrence Tibbett, Nicola Moscona and Lorenzo Alvary. Emil Cooper again conducted.

VOGUE
GREENWICH, CONN.

FEB 15 1945

HEITOR VILLA-LOBOS, the notable Brazilian composer, is a guest conductor these days with Stokowski's City Orchestra, with Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony. A small, crumpled, greyish man, who, like Brahms, smokes a cigar even while playing the piano, Villa-Lobos' musical fame rests on his striking use of the Brazilian folk songs in his Choros and his Serestas. His recent Bachianas Brasileiras is, he says, like all his music, brutal.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

FEB 17 1945

Koussevitzsk Stirs Mosque Audience

(Reprinted from yesterday's late edition)

The peak of a brilliant Griffith Music Foundation season—its seventh—was reached last nigh when Dr. ~~Serge Koussevitzsky~~ and his Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a record crowd of music lovers to the Mosque Theater to listen to an intriguing three-par program of strongly contrasted works, highlighted by a scintillating performance of Igor Stravinsky's descriptive orchestral suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

The proceedings opened conventionally enough with the familiar B Minor "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert. But here seemingly effortless direction on the part of the 72-year-old maestro and superb tonal teamwork by the orchestra lent rich color and life to the two movements of a work which in lesser hands migh seem hackneyed and threadbare.

Then came the glowing new life of the Stravinsky ballet in which the musicians responded nobly to Koussevitzsky's rousing reading of the impish score in which all the folk dancing and bucolic funmaking of Petrouchka's puppet world seemed created anew without benefit of pirouetting performers or scenery. It proved an altogether too short but brilliantly conceived orchestral tour de force, and the audience which applauded warmly at its finish would like to have had it repeated had Dr. Koussevitzsky permit the orchestra to play the work over again.

Brilliant pianism by Lukas Foss in the piano part was another feature of the Stravinsky number which added to the beguiling quality of an outstanding performance.

The last part of the program was devoted to the Brahms towering Symphony No. 1 in C. Minor. Here other contrasted facets of the virtuosity and style of both the conductor and orchestra were revealed. The passages of beauty in the opening movements, and the melodic sweep of the third and the final part with its horn solo and tremulo of muted strings, were all rendered with distinction and in a manner worthy of the traditions of a great musical organization.

Boston Radiocaster Is a Musician, Too

Feb. 17

By Albert D. Hughes
Radio Editor of The Christian Science Monitor

Woe be to be first person who, in discussing the Boston Symphony Orchestra radiocasts, quotes the recently reported charge by Sir Thomas Beecham that radiocasters are a "bunch of technicians who know nothing about music." For Oliver Daniel, who produces the Saturday radiocast B. S. O. concerts for the Blue Network, will be very liable to hurl the assertion right back.

Mr. Daniel is, in fact, a concert pianist and, thus, in this instance, is a refutation of Sir Thomas's claim that radiocasters are trying to ruin good music.

It is fortunate for radio listeners that Mr. Daniel holds such strong opinions about the really fine pickups of good music that the radio networks are performing every day and that his own capabilities in music give the contra side to Sir. Thomas. For listeners who tune into Blue Network stations on Saturdays at 8:30 p. m. are thereby assured the finest pickups and handling possible of the music of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Station WHDH is the local outlet for the concerts which are radiocast under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company.

Score Proves Point

The miniature score of the Tchaikovsky Sixth Symphony lying open on the bench in the little radio booth on the second floor backstage in Symphony Hall was an immediate indication that radiocasters know their job. Mr. Daniel follows this score very carefully, indicating to the engineer in charge of the controls when he should raise and lower his pickup volume levels.

Mr. Daniel explained, furthermore, that it is the responsibility of the modern radiocast engineer to anticipate volume peaks in the music not with the idea of cutting them down but rather of assuring that the radio channel is wide enough to carry them. This, he asserted, is the essential difference between modern and old-time radiocasting methods.

The radio channels, he explained, are capable of carrying music within certain minimum and maximum degrees of decibels or units of electrical sound. These limits are much greater now than they were in the past and hence provide a much wider range in between for the engineer to work with, he said.

Handling Volume Change

To demonstrate his point, Mr. Daniel indicated a section of the first movement of the "Pathetique" where, under Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, the music departs abruptly from a low volume level to a very high one. The modern radio channel is capable of assimilating this high volume level, but in order not to make the peak too distressing and too sudden for the listener, Mr. Daniel explained that the control engineer begins to open his channel quite a few measures before the music peak so that when the moment arrives the radio path is ample to handle it.

In the hands of a less experienced engineer such a peak would "jam" the channel if the controls were set lower and cause a thin, strained type of reception which engineers call "blasting," he continued.

Another indication of care in radiocasting the Boston Symphony was the fact that the occasion which we were permitted to watch was a Friday afternoon concert. Mr. Daniel uses the matinee performance to "time" the performance of the first portion of the concert which is radiocast on Saturday.

The reader may well ask, "Why is the Boston Symphony radio concert 'produced'? It is played anyway, isn't it?" Producing in the radio sense means timing a program so that the various opening and closing announcements, program notes, and other data of the concert may carefully be fitted in.

In Boston, for instance, timing involves many unpredictable factors, but ones which constant concert-goers will recognize and appreciate. The radio engineers, for instance, Mr. Daniel said, have to take into account such factors as the length of time it takes Dr. Koussevitzky to walk from the back stage door to the podium in front, how much applause he receives. Last week, for instance, the opening round of applause was lengthier because Dr. Koussevitzky had been missing from the podium for several weeks while on vacation and the audience was showing its appreciation at his return.

Wait For Late Comer

Again, Mr. Daniel pointed out, there is Dr. Koussevitzky's customary wait during the first and second movement of a symphony, for instance, so that late comers may find their seats. Last week on Friday afternoon, for example, he waited one minute and 45 seconds. On Saturday evening the wait was two minutes. These waits mean little to the audience but to the radio engineers up in the backstage booth it means seconds ticking way on the sweep hands of their watches.

One comes to realize, therefore, that the pickups of the Boston orchestra are perhaps an outstanding example of the compromise between the split-second art of radio and the classical presentation of orchestral music.

The radiocast engineers who pick up the Boston concerts, recognize, Mr. Daniel said, that they are "invited guests" at the concert. The rules of courtesy imposed by that fact demand, therefore, that while one may converse with his host, it is not fashionable to instruct him.

But there have been some concessions made to the radio concerts. Formerly the radio engineers looked out on the stage below through a slit in the wall. Now a soundproof booth has been built backstage with a small window overlooking the stage.

It was truly a remarkable vantage point to watch the expressive facial and hand gestures of Dr. Koussevitzky as he led his musicians through the "Pathetique."

Mr. Daniel, who has been with the Blue Network only a few months, disclosed that he is a pianist and showed press clippings of recitals in Boston's Jordan Hall, for instance. He has also done some conducting.

He was formerly connected with the Columbia Broadcasting System where he worked as an engineer in charge of such top network musical shows as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and "Invitation to Music."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 15 1945

STRIKING PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra Contrasts Mozart Divertimento With Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction opened its concert last night in Carnegie Hall with the most finished performance imaginable of a very simple and very difficult score—the Divertimento in B flat of Mozart for strings and two horns. This required virtuosity and style from each individual player to match the taste and finesse of the conductor's conception. And this was accomplished, to the vast edification of the audience which is the most discerning and exacting one that gathers for any orchestral concerts given in this city.

Then came the strongest imaginable contrast—the excerpts from Stravinsky's "Petruchka" music and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. The effect, coming after the very modest proportions and the strict classicism of Mozart's score, an effect planned with much astuteness, would in any case have been striking. But it is seldom in the history of Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant performances in this city that the orchestra has played with such color and intrepidity. And how different is this "Petruchka" music to the antiquated products of Stravinsky's late period. What genius, genius of the soil as well as of the individualistic composer, is in this score!

Girls Danced Down Aisle

There was an occasion when Koussevitzky played the "Petrouchka" arrangement to an audience in a town on the Volga and two peasant girls rose from their seats and danced down the aisle at the passage called the "coachmen's dance" in the score. Admonished to sit down, they said in astonishment, "But isn't that our dance?" It is a tribute of which the composer could well be proud, though he has now abandoned completely his "nationalistic" or "folkloristic" vein as exemplified in this work. Let those who remember the legend of the giant Anteus consider the results.

How many times Koussevitzky has played the "Pathetic" symphony here one does not remember at the moment. Nor how many times we have been told, since we were fifteen, that this hysterical, sentimental, self-pitying, "uncontrolled" music of Tchaikovsky would not last, could not last, or ever command the respect of cultured listeners, because of its obviousness, its emotionalism and lack of form—that also is beyond calculation.

Performance Dramatic

If the intensely dramatic performance of last night, which so deeply impressed the audience, had done nothing else, it would have served to remind listeners how wide of the mark and at variance with the plain evidence of history is this prejudice. Of course, we know that Tchaikovsky is just too, too raw for our more refined and sophisticated souls to endure. But the allegation that his symphonies are formless is simply unfounded, as also that they are uncontrolled.

This is not opinion. It is the fact contained in the score. When he arrived at his Sixth Symphony Tchaikovsky was mastering form in his own way. If there is one weakness of form in the first movement there are also enormous and exceptional distinction in this direction. The form of each of the last three movements is unique as it is balanced and proportioned in the statement of the idea. Control is nowhere more in evidence than in the evolution and the gigantic building up of the wild earth-shaking march, or the noble anguish of the finale. It is really time that Tchaikovskian dissenters should square their arguments with the facts. But the public does not need them.

At the end, and throughout the evening, there were demonstrations for orchestra and conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB

Music

By Louis Biancolli

Koussevitzky Finds Stravinsky's Greatness

The power that was Igor Stravinsky surged through Carnegie Hall last night, when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony ran off a ballet suite from "Petrouchka," with young Lukas Foss, gifted pianist-composer, adding extra dynamism in the keyboard sequences.

"Petrouchka" will probably remain as Stravinsky's middle name. In the 30-odd years since its Paris premiere, the ballet has flashed the good word of Stravinsky's genius to the world. Wherever people thrill to great ballet and greater music, the man's memory will stay fresh.

Of course, Stravinsky strides ahead toward new idiom and rhythm. Few geniuses stand still for long. This man just happened to toss off a sheaf of masterpieces in his youth. Fairly or unfairly, what followed has risked eclipse by the early works. Whether he likes it or not, Stravinsky is "Petrouchka" to most people.

Twice Transcendent.

And you can't blame them. Listening to Mr. Koussevitzky's rousing reading, you felt again the fierce impact of this early score. Neither time nor rehearing dims its varicolored web. The throb of life, of huge forces, hurtle through it. Stravinsky caught a kind of cosmic beat here and in "Sacre du Printemps." Then he quieted down.

Mr. Koussevitzky's rendering was the kind that doesn't need choreography to go with it. Petrouchka's puppet world leaped to life in the stark play of orchestral color. In fact, no corps de ballet could match the fiddles, woodwinds and brasses in imaging the misfit manikin's tussle with a heartless world. And Mr. Foss' pianism rang out in sardonic brilliance.

A Mozart Gem.

Also billed last night were Mozart's B-flat major Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony.

The Mozart item was a real gem. Composers will come and go, as Rossini said, but there is only Mozart. Few concertgoers know this Divertimento music. The standard Mozart items crowd out so much of the Salzburg genius' output, little masterpieces like this go almost unheeded.

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony is, of course, a Boston special. Say what you want about Mr. Koussevitzky's slow tempi and slushy tone-masses, the man almost gives this music the power of speech. If ever a composer wore his heart on a symphonic score it was Tschaikowsky in this brooding masterpiece, and Mr. Koussevitzky always sees to it that it remains in the right place.

* * *

Novotna as Melisande.

Jarmila Novotna, Czech-American soprano of the Metropolitan's glamour wing, took over the role of Melisande for the first time last night in the current revival of Debussy's impressionist opera, "Pelleas et Melisande."

Add the role to the singer's gallery of appealing portraits. Subtly spun style blended with beauty of person and gesture in Mme. Novotna's version of the woodland mystery-woman. Vocally there were some tight spots; otherwise, the phrases ran off smoothly. Diction was as clear as day, from the early "Ne me touche pas!" to the tragic fade-out.

Also in the cast were Margaret Harshaw, Lillian Raymondi, Martial Singher, Lawrence Tibbett, Nicola Moscona and Lorenzo Alvary. Emil Cooper again conducted.

VOGUE
GREENWICH, CONN.
FEB 15 1945

HEITOR VILLA-LOBOS, the notable Brazilian composer, is a guest conductor these days with Stokowski's City Orchestra, with Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony. A small, crumpled, greyish man, who, like Brahms, smokes a cigar even while playing the piano, Villa-Lobos' musical fame rests on his striking use of the Brazilian folk songs in his Choros and his Serestas. His recent Bachianas Brasileiras is, he says, like all his music, brutal.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
FEB 17 1945

Koussevitzsk Stirs Mosque Audience

(Reprinted from yesterday's late edition)

The peak of a brilliant Griffith Music Foundation season—it seventh—was reached last nigh when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky an his Boston Symphony Orchestr brought a record crowd of musi lovers to the Mosque Theater t listen to an intriguing three-par program of strongly contraste works, highlighted by a scintillating performance of Igor Stravinsky's descriptive orchestral suit from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

The proceedings opened conventionally enough with th familiar B Minor "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert. But her seemingly effortless direction o the part of the 72-year-old maestro and superb tonal teamwork b the orchestra lent rich color an life to the two movements of work which in lesser hands migh seem hackneyed and threadbare.

Then came the glowing new lif of the Stravinsky ballet in whic the musicians responded nobly t Koussevitzsky's rousing reading o the impish score in which all th folk dancing and bucolic funmaking of Petrouchka's puppet worl seemed created anew withou benefit of pirouetting performer or scenery. It proved an altogether too short but brilliantly conceived orchestral tour de force, and the audience which applaude warmly at its finish would like to have had it repeated had Dr. Koussevitzsky permit the orchestra to play the work over again.

Brilliant pianism by Lukas Foss in the piano part was another feature of the Stravinsky number which added to the beguiling quality of an outstanding performance.

The last part of the program was devoted to the Brahms towering Symphony No. 1 in C. Minor. Here other contrasted facets of the virtuosity and style of both the conductor and orchestra were revealed. The passages of beauty in the opening movements, and the melodic sweep of the third and the final part with its horn solo and tremulo of muted strings were all rendered with distinction and in a manner worthy of the traditions of a great musical organization.

Boston Radiocaster Is a Musician, Too

Feb. 17

By Albert D. Hughes
Radio Editor of The Christian Science Monitor

Woe be to be first person who, in discussing the Boston Symphony Orchestra radiocasts, quotes the recently reported charge by Sir Thomas Beecham that radiocasters are a "bunch of technicians who know nothing about music." For Oliver Daniel, who produces the Saturday radiocast B. S. O. concerts for the Blue Network, will be very liable to hurl the assertion right back.

Mr. Daniel is, in fact, a concert pianist and, thus, in this instance, is a refutation of Sir Thomas's claim that radiocasters are trying to ruin good music.

It is fortunate for radio listeners that Mr. Daniel holds such strong opinions about the really fine pickups of good music that the radio networks are performing every day and that his own capabilities in music give the contra side to Sir. Thomas. For listeners who tune into Blue Network stations on Saturdays at 8:30 p. m. are thereby assured the finest pickups and handling possible of the music of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Station WHDH is the local outlet for the concerts which are radiocast under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company.

Score Proves Point

The miniature score of the Tchaikovsky Sixth Symphony lying open on the bench in the little radio booth on the second floor backstage in Symphony Hall was an immediate indication that radiocasters know their job. Mr. Daniel follows this score very carefully, indicating to the engineer in charge of the controls when he should raise and lower his pickup volume levels.

Mr. Daniel explained, furthermore, that it is the responsibility of the modern radiocast engineer to anticipate volume peaks in the music not with the idea of cutting them down but rather of assuring that the radio channel is wide enough to carry them. This, he asserted, is the essential difference between modern and old-time radiocasting methods.

The radio channels, he explained, are capable of carrying music within certain minimum and maximum degrees of decibels or units of electrical sound. These limits are much greater now than they were in the past and hence provide a much wider range in between for the engineer to work with, he said.

Handling Volume Change

To demonstrate his point, Mr. Daniel indicated a section of the first movement of the "Pathetique" where, under Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, the music departs abruptly from a low volume level to a very high one. The modern radio channel is capable of assimilating this high volume level, but in order not to make the peak too distressing and too sudden for the listener, Mr. Daniel explained that the control engineer begins to open his channel quite a few measures before the music peak so that when the moment arrives the radio path is ample to handle it.

In the hands of a less experienced engineer such a peak would "jam" the channel if the controls were set lower and cause a thin, strained type of reception which engineers call "blasting," he continued.

Another indication of care in radiocasting the Boston Symphony was the fact that the occasion which we were permitted to watch was a Friday afternoon concert. Mr. Daniel uses the matinee performance to "time" the performance of the first portion of the concert which is radiocast on Saturday.

The reader may well ask, "Why is the Boston Symphony radio concert 'produced'? It is played anyway, isn't it?" Producing in the radio sense means timing a program so that the various opening and closing announcements, program notes, and other data of the concert may carefully be fitted in.

In Boston, for instance, timing involves many unpredictable factors, but ones which constant concert-goers will recognize and appreciate. The radio engineers, for instance, Mr. Daniel said, have to take into account such factors as the length of time it takes Dr. Koussevitzky to walk from the back stage door to the podium in front, how much applause he receives. Last week, for instance, the opening round of applause was lengthier because Dr. Koussevitzky had been missing from the podium for several weeks while on vacation and the audience was showing its appreciation at his return.

Wait For Late Comer

Again, Mr. Daniel pointed out, there is Dr. Koussevitzky's customary wait during the first and second movement of a symphony, for instance, so that late comers may find their seats. Last week on Friday afternoon, for example, he waited one minute and 45 seconds. On Saturday evening the wait was two minutes. These waits mean little to the audience but to the radio engineers up in the backstage booth it means seconds ticking way on the sweep hands of their watches.

One comes to realize, therefore, that the pickups of the Boston orchestra are perhaps an outstanding example of the compromise between the split-second art of radio and the classical presentation of orchestral music.

The radiocast engineers who pick up the Boston concerts, recognize, Mr. Daniel said, that they are "invited guests" at the concert. The rules of courtesy imposed by that fact demand, therefore, that while one may converse with his host, it is not fashionable to instruct him.

But there have been some concessions made to the radio concerts. Formerly the radio engineers looked out on the stage below through a slit in the wall. Now a soundproof booth has been built backstage with a small window overlooking the stage.

It was truly a remarkable vantage point to watch the expressive facial and hand gestures of Dr. Koussevitzky as he led his musicians through the "Pathetique."

Mr. Daniel, who has been with the Blue Network only a few months, disclosed that he is a pianist and showed press clippings of recitals in Boston's Jordan Hall, for instance. He has also done some conducting.

He was formerly connected with the Columbia Broadcasting System where he worked as an engineer in charge of such top network musical shows as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and "Invitation to Music."

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 16 1945

Capacity Audience Hears Symphony

Bostonians Get Ovation from 3,500—Award for Mrs. Griffith

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

This wartime Winter of music, which already has surpassed expectations, achieved a new peak of excellence last night at the Mosque when the veteran Boston Symphony Orchestra played before an audience estimated at 3,500, the theater's capacity. Sponsor of the concert, which attracted approximately every musically prominent person in the area, was Griffith Music Foundation. The affair was an indubitable success, musically as well as socially, and its sponsors should have been greatly encouraged to further good deeds.

It would be vain to quarrel with the choice of program, which was nobly performed by the orchestra. An earlier program sent down from Boston had mentioned works by Shostakovich, Debussy and Corelli, which might have been extremely provocative. But the enviable opportunity to hear three masterpieces — Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Brahms's Symphony No. 1 in C Minor and the Suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka"—recompensed for the loss of that first list. At any rate, the more familiar works won storms of applause of a decibel content rarely reached here.

Melodic

The Brahms could readily be called the evening's chief triumph. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this lovely work was cast in broadly melodic terms, unhurried as to pace and leaving room for the production of rich tonal aspects. Once the insistent rhythms of the first movement had stomped relentlessly along, the remaining movements were given over to lyricism of the most exquisite sort.

The slow opening of the finale was exceptionally beautiful, perhaps because here Brahms invented an original form, free of the exigencies of the sonata form, which depicts an Alpine scene with marvelous clarity. The horn and flute solos, the trombone chorale, the shimmering strings were breathtakingly poignant. The marchlike ending provided a sensational conclusion.

Brilliant

Calling for a huge orchestra (imagine the luxury these days of being able to obtain four bassoons, and oboes to match), Stravinsky's brilliant instrumentation elicited a powerful ovation. No longer does "Petrouchka" draw shrieks of horror. Now that it has become more familiar, audiences can appreciate the delicacy, the intricate structure, the acerbic tone of the gigantic tonal scheme. Here again the playing was always masterfully molded by the Russian conductor, who appeared to be in his element.

Followed by such grandiose works as these, Schubert's sad little symphony somehow became dim and shadowy to the recollection. Surprisingly, the players did not treat the work as a hackneyed piece already past its prime. The climaxes could have been given more power and the pace quickened. Nonetheless, there was much solid worth to the experience of hearing Franz's music done so well.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky presents to Mrs. Parker O. Griffith a book containing letters ~~from~~ 100 musicians lauding her activities as president and founder of Griffith Music Foundation, which recently marked its seventh anniversary. The ceremony was held last night in the green room at the Mosque before concert given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In making the presentation the veteran conductor told Mrs. Griffith: "Books will be written about you not only for your contribution to the musical life of your community but also to that of the whole country."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 16 1945

Boston Symphony Gives Concert in Carnegie Hall

~~Koussevitzky~~ Leads Orchestra in the 'Pathetique'

The first half of Mr. Koussevitzky's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night was a sheer delight from every aspect. The two works performed, Mozart's Divertimento in B flat (K. 287) and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," are both first-rate products and were accorded interpretations which did complete justice to the intentions of both composers.

All five movements of the Mozart Divertimento are replete with endearing melodies, especially fine being the wistfully serene adagio and the finale with its dramatic introductory recitative, which unexpectedly appears again before the close of the effervescent allegro molto.

The orchestra's virtuosity was appositely exploited in "Petrouchka" and less appositely in the third movement of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, which occupied the second half of the program. Here the pacing was much too fast to permit sufficiently weighty treatment of the heavy accents of the march-like theme. In fact, Mr. Koussevitzky's tempi throughout this work were open to question. Especially disturbing was his sudden slowing of the music's flow in the middle section of the movement in five-quarter time. Tonally, of course, the performance was, as always, a sumptuous one.

J. D. B.

Feb. 18

MUSIC

N.Y. Herald Tribune

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon with the assistance of a chorus trained by Robert L. Shaw and Valentina Vishnevska, soprano. The program:

Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished"), Schubert
The Feast During the Plague, Symphonic Suite (first New York performance)..Lourie
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92, Beethoven

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday

Original Instrumentation

FORMERLY famed for his devotion to contemporary (including American) composers, Serge Koussevitzky had, till yesterday, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in five Manhattan concerts this season without introducing but one new work and without playing any American pieces at all. At his sixth concert, which took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, he brouhgt forth another, carefully cushioning it between Schubert and Beethoven. It was welcome.

* * *

Arthur Lowrie's "Feast During the Plague," the work in question, is a symphonic suite in six movements drawn from an opera-ballet composed to a text by Pushkin, itself a translation of an early nineteenth-century play entitled "The City of the Plague," by a Scottish writer named John Wilson, who wrote under the pseudonym of "Christopher North." How vivid this music might appear in its full theatrical context one cannot be sure. As a concert work the suite is not without a certain acuity of expression, though the separate pieces are all a little static; and the whole has neither progress nor cohesion.

* * *

The most directly expressive element of it is the instrumentation, which, as always in the writing of this composer, is ingenious, original and, I should guess, pretty accurately imagined. It is transparent scoring, widely spaced and making much use of individualized timbres. These are used with constant reference to gradations of similarly among sounds of different origin. As in the scoring of the Impressionists, all the sounds that all the instruments can make are employed for their separate qualities. Lightness, heaviness, brightness, darkness, thinness, roundness, forward-coming or retreating characteristics are the basis of choice in their usage and in their association.

By individualizing and associating kinds of sound rather than the instruments that are used for producing them, Mr. Lourié gives to all his orchestral music an impersonal efficiency, both of pictorial coloration and of balance, that adds to it a kind of visual depth, or perspective, that is unusual, interesting and valuable as a contribution to the art of composition. I believe this procedure, in fact, this carrying forward, however tentative, of the orchestral methods of Debussy and the other Impressionist masters, to be his chief originality as a composer.

* * *

His melody, though graceful, is a little aimless. His rhythm is tatic, lacking in liveliness; it does not progress. And his harmonic syntax, though adequate enough, lacks tension and hence style. These elements of his music reflect the defects of a restless and sophisticated but esentially undisciplined mind. The music, as a whole, and "The Feast During the Plague," considered as a concert piece, seems to be no nearer to integration than the purely symphonic works, is interesting in detai but always a little unsatisfactory as expression. It is not banal, but it is not quite convincing, either. For all its contemporary intellectual tone, it smells of Borodine, Avensky and Glazounoff. These were good composers, all of them, and distinguished musicians. But their work was interesting far more for its instrumental ingenuities than for any simple, direct or real meaning.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 18 1945

RUSSIAN SYMPHONIST

Tchaikovsky's Mastery of Form as It Is Revealed in Perspective of Time

By OLIN DOWNES

WE constantly hear about the necessity of an open mind in listening to new music. Does it occur to many that an open mind is also a necessity with old music? There is at least an equal distrust of ideas in the one field as the other, and old music, as well as new, is in constant need of re-examination.

This was borne particularly upon us at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Wednesday night when Koussevitzky gave another of the many performances of the Tchaikovsky "Symphonie Pathétiqué which he has given in this city. Be sure that the Doctor, in the course of a very personal interpretation spared no emotional value, no stroke of rhetoric, no detail of the scoring with its sable magnificence. He was freer with his fluctuations of tempo than ever—in some places, we thought, unnecessarily so. The pros and cons of that matter are already forgotten in the face of an interpretation which, as a whole, was of overwhelming emotion and tonal splendor. But this emphasis of the rhapsodic element in the music also drove home the very attribute which it has been the long-accepted convention to deny Tchaikovsky. We mean the wholly exceptional power and originality of his form.

Evidence in Score

This, as the writer took occasion to remark in comment the morning after the performance, is no matter of opinion. It is plainly to be perceived in the documentary evidence of the score. What has no doubt confused pedantic minds, or those so immersed in the German conception of symphonic form that they have been wholly dominated by such tradition is the fact that the form here discovered is not that of Mozart or Beethoven, but Tchaikovsky. As for the symphony's emotional content it is so genuinely Russian that the same type of mind and of criticism which for long years found Russia's greatest moralist and psychologist in letters—Feodor Dostoievsky—merely a bad example of a morbid and undisciplined soul, also finds Tchaikovsky "hysterical," "uncontrolled," weak and deficient in structure. It is not to be wondered at that this antiquated nonsense has been repeated ad infinitum by generations of people satisfied to repeat the sayings of others and prone to be embarrassed by Tchaikovsky's intense humanity and directness of speech. And then there is the tendency, latent in all of us, to find reasons, not for logical conclusions, but for what we want to believe. The partisanship of European culture toward any manifestation outside its own ways of thought and esthetic is particularly manifest in the instance of Russian, and its criticism is parroted by the majority of our academicians and smart intellectuals here. To the cultivated continental mind the conception and there could be wider and freer horizons than those perceived by its own artists is mythical. However, that illumination will come, in fact is on its way today. For the world is irresistibly growing larger, and in its new perspective various composers will stand in different relations to each other than in the past. This may even prove true of Tchaikovsky. Let us consider for a moment certain of his technical problems.

Constant Search

Throughout his creative development, so abruptly and tragically terminated, Tchaikovsky had great difficulty with form. Of this difficulty he was humbly and distressfully aware. One reason for this was the luxuriance of his ideas, so difficult to control and coordinate, particularly with a man of his intensely emotional nature. Another was the fact that such an original genius as his could not accept classic form as he found it. Tchaikovsky was ever seeking that form which should be the logical germination of his individual ideas. As Beethoven before him—Beethoven who was less radical in his innovations—if the mold did not fit the idea, then the mold must be recast in such a way as fully to release and render effective the idea's dynamism. In all the Tchaikovsky's symphonies he is fighting for this clarification and formal logic. In the sixth he has almost completely achieved it, with the result that the passage of time reveals the "Symphonie Pathetique" as exceptional among all modern works of its class for its sweep of line and the astonishing originality of its development.

The work is genuinely symphonic, in a manner which utilizes the methods of composition not only of Beethoven, but of Liszt; and which, within its inborn lyricism and profoundly racial character embodies the quality of synthesis of which the Russian mind has so signally proved itself capable. The relation of the movements, as well as their internal structure, is also symphonic, though they fall neither into the mold of Viennese classicism or that cyclic form which stemmed from Liszt and was adopted by so many of Tchaikovsky contemporaries in Russia—not one of whom, from Rimsky-Korsakoff to Mussorgsky, was capable of Tchaikovsky's architecture. None of the accepted formulas is relied upon for this achievement.

When we come to the interior structure one remarkable idea after another confronts us. The movement nearest symphonic precedent is the first, although it is the one movement with anything of padding or of the tentative and experimental. There are new sequences both in the statement of the themes, their proportions in relation to each other and special processes of development. The spectral introduction of the first theme, that takes form like some tragic ghost in a land of shadows; the transition is the inevitable consequence of the mood, from the slow tempo of the introduction to tempi of the movement proper; the succession of episodes interspersed with the rich development, and the return, in one of the greatest orchestral climaxes to the reprise where, for dramatic as well as structural reasons, the first theme is eliminated, and the contrast of color when the second theme appears—this is not only inspiration, but sheer technical virtuosity.

Masterly Orchestration

The five-four movement is the movement in which the problem of that irregular rhythm is solved more felicitously than in any other composition that we know. The orchestration of the whole symphony is so masterly that it would be folly to begin particularizing with the famous drum-beat and its reinforcements while over it the strings wail their tragedy.

The scherzo is replaced by the terrible march with its scheme of a triple against a duple rhythm. The way in which the triplets first dominate the scene, the gradual emergence of the duple rhythm of the march, the absorption of the triplet figure by that march, ever expanding, growing irresistibly in its power—not only does an immortal master but a colossal nation speak here, and this under an iron control. If Hitler's men had known this symphony they might well have hesitated as that music unfolded. It has a parallel in the extent of Russia's battle line, the tread of her hosts, the accumulated fury of her people. What of the unique finale?

No formalist would have more ably contrasted its two themes than Tchaikovsky. Who else would have followed the battle-drunk processional with the final elegy which is a lament for nothing less than humanity and its end? That too is Russian, as his compassion, in which the supercilious find only self-pity, is equally of Tchaikovsky and his nation. What might we not have expected of the man who at 53 created the "Pathetic" symphony.

Help for Aged More Needed Than Music, Says Tax Expert

Globe — Feb. 18

BY GEORGE DAWSON

"Oh, it's a good idea," said Norman MacDonald of the Massachusetts Federation of Taxpayers, referring to Dr. Koussevitzky's proposal suggesting that a half dollar be added to the income tax of all New Englanders so that they may enjoy State-supported music. "The only trouble is that it can't work."

"In the first place, only three New England States, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont have State taxes and I doubt if the good doctor's figures are correct in stating that there are 3,500,000 taxpayers in the combined States.

"On the supposition that Dr. Koussevitzky is correct, at a half a buck a throw, the tri-State tax would yield $1,750,000 which would hardly be enough to subsidize several symphony orchestras as the noted leader plans."

Though he personally is in favor of such a musical plan Mr. MacDonald can see numerous other things which could be accomplished with that kind of money. Child health, visual education, crusade against veneral diseases, hot lunches for school children and slum clearance are but a few that came to his mind. He doesn't believe that with the need of all these vital improvements that this is the time for millions of dollars to be spent on music.

"The taxpayer, mind you," said Mr. MacDonald, "wouldn't mind spending the money. He's funny like that. Even in these days when he's socked the limit. As long as he sees what he's getting for the cash he turns in to the State he's pretty easily satisfied."

What seemed to worry Mr. MacDonald was that if a program of this sort could be put across how would it be handled? Suppose some one in the State House didn't go for Beethoven or Bach and demanded the pianist to play like Frankie Karle, oh brother, long hair would be strewn all over Beacon Hill. And after all if the Symphony Orchestra became public property certainly the public should have something to say about the type of music it wants to hear.

There would be the likelihood that orchestras would be requested to play at public functions and for holiday celebrations. Suppose for instance they were called upon to play in South Boston on St. Patrick's Day. Naturally the citizens of Southie would demand music in keeping with the day's celebration. Why not? They are the ones who are paying for it. Why shouldn't they have it?

With 4,000,000 people in Massachusetts alone the symphony orchestras would be called upon to play continuously in every section of the State. The question then arises, are there auditoriums and halls suitably equipped with acoustics so that the music would retain its symphonic qualities? Obviously the answer is, no.

What then would folks say. Surely they have a right to insist upon being entertained in this elegant manner and it shouldn't be expected of them to travel to large cities to hear their favorite and free music.

Music a Food in Russia

It would be impossible to construct new music halls throughout the three New England States with the meager million and three-quarters dollars and still pay the expenses of several orchestras, to say nothing of traveling expenses when the companies go on tour.

In enlarging upon his plan for subsidized symphonies, Dr. Koussevitzky stated that such a project has for years been carried on successfully in Russia, the land of his birth. "Music," he said, "is as much a necessity in Russia as food."

"The Russian government," he continued, "still gives music to the citizens in wartime and they are happy and grateful and fight better."

Maybe so, maybe so, but Mr. MacDonald still wants some more concrete evidence. Perhaps a hot balalaika might spur the Russian soldiers on to greater fighting efforts. Maybe one of the reasons why the Russians are so anxious to get into Germany is because some of the cities there are reputed to have excellent music halls. If music does all that for the Russian army, certainly it is a wonderful thing.

But how can the good Dr. Koussevitzky explain the fact that millions of Ukranians starved to death, when he says "music is food for the Russians." Would a noggin of William Tell's overture have sustained them over the rough period? It would probably set much better on a full stomach.

"Dr. Koussevitzky may have a good idea," says Mr. MacDonald, "but it must take its place in a regular chain of events. There is much to be done in public health, and social security. Better care for the aged is one of the first things which should be attended to.

The Old Folks

"We have thousands of old folks in Massachusetts attempting to subsist on the meager $41 a month which the State government provides. I'd like to see some of those folks who prepare these budgets try to live for a couple of weeks on that shall sum.

"Think of what an additional 50 cents from each taxpayer would mean to those poor and aged men and women. It would most certainly go a long way to make their burden easier to bear. Out of the $41 they receive they must provide their own food, clothing and shelter. No allowance was ever given to them for entertainment or perhaps for a pack of cigarettes. They barely exist on the State's money even though it is one of the highest rates paid in the country.

"There is another angle to think of," continued Mr. MacDonald. "If that money, which totals nearly $2,000,000, could be used to remove a slab of the slums each year and replace it with liveable homes it wouldn't take many years for the slums in all our cities to be wiped out.

"Others might like to have the State acquire famous paintings, outstanding works of art, Chinese ceramics, etc., for the Museum of Fine Arts with the money pouring in from that small tax levy.

"If the State harbors any ideas on subsidizing music for entertainment why not go all the way and subsidize some movie actress? There are a lot of people out in the Berkshires, who would like to take a look at Mae West or some other glamourous lady of stage or screen. And how about subsidizing an entire stage show? Surely thousands outside of the city of Boston would have been glad to have had an opportunity to see Margaret Webster's 'Tempest,' which played here recently.

"Three and one-half million half dollars a year would go a long way in building an opera company equal to the famed Metropolitan. But I wonder how many people would attend the operas if they were offered to them free of charge? How many would attend the symphonies? I don't know the answer to that, Dr. Koussevitzky will have to supply it."

Brookline High vs. Quartets; Also Wagner and His Plumbing

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr. Herald

One of the most regrettable consequences of the [illegible] trend to [illegible] of the sensa-[illegible] and the loud [illegible] be perpetrated by [illegible] jazz bands or [illegible] the neglect of chamber music.

[illegible] the Budapest Quartet [illegible] Jordan Hall on its every [illegible] chamber music [illegible] the country can do the [illegible]. Indeed, so spectacular [illegible] Budapest Quartet in its [illegible] is the failure of [illegible] sound quartets that [illegible] question that fac-[illegible] or notoriety through [illegible] breaks are chiefly responsible for the Budapest's [illegible] record as a going concern.

[illegible] when you think about it, [illegible]. It is agreed by all [illegible] writers on music and all educated musical people that much of the greatest pure music of all composers may be found in their chamber music. It is also agreed that until a music lover comes to know and love this music he is still to all extents and purposes a musical illiterate. But how can those who have any musical feeling at all come to know and love chamber music? For it is admitted that, like a taste for great art, great literature or even great cooking, that taste must be awakened and cultivated and guided. Thus it seems to me that the experiment now being carried out by the Zimbler String Quartet in cooperation with Brookline High School is one of the most important musical experiments in many years.

From the time that somebody asked him how many men he had in his quartet, Josef Zimbler, a cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been crusading in behalf of chamber music. A connoisseur of chamber music and a fine, sincere musician, he realized that such ignorance bespoke an attitude that, carried to its extreme, meant the death of chamber music if something weren't done about it. And so he conceived the idea of presenting chamber music to high school students, not as a free concert in after-school hours, but as a part of the curriculum so the entire student body would come in contact with it perforce. To carry out such a daring idea obviously required the help of a public school with an illuminated musical point of view, and Brookline High School proved to be the one. Moreover, the idea required financial backing, and several public-minded citizens of Brookline stepped forward to sponsor one of the proposed monthly concerts.

So on Feb. 2 the first one took place in the auditorium of Brookline High School, the Zimbler Quartet performing Haydn Quartets before the entire student body. The audience may have been merely courteous (as American audiences are) in it's ovation, I don't know, but it's complete absorption in the music while it was going on can only be interpreted as the real thing. In any case, it was so successful that a complete series is now assured; indeed, several other high schools in Metropolitan Boston have begun a clamor for a similar series of their own. If everything goes right, it may be that the Zimbler Quartet can so instill an appreciation, a taste and a love for chamber music among young people—who are, after all, future audiences — that chamber music may once again achieve its place as the most wonderful of all musical experiences.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LOURIE SUITE

Koussevitzky Conducts 'The Feast During the Plague'—Calls Composer to Stage

By OLIN DOWNES

At the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky presented for the first time in this city Arthur Lourié's composition after Pushkin, for small chorus, solo soprano and orchestra, "The Feast During the Plague." This work was originally cast in the form of a ballet and as such was in rehearsal at the Paris Opera in 1939, just before Hitler's invasion. In New York in 1943 Mr. Lourié arranged the score as a suite, slightly reducing the size of the orchestra required.

"After Pushkin" is no misnomer, except that Pushkin's drama, which is properly not included by publishers of translated editions of his works, was a translation, and a close one, of the drama, "'The City of the Plague" by John Wilson. Wilson's inspiration was in all probability the London plague of the seventeenth century. Pushkin translated the work with a degree of genius impossible to its author, while the plague was raging in Moscow, where the poet's fiancée was quarantined. The second movement of the Lourié suite employs, however, Latin verse of Petrarch of the fourteenth century, and this seems important, because of Mr. Lourié's immersion in late years in Catholicism, so that plain chant and modal style are continually in evidence in this music, characterized by an archaism that might logically be associated in style with fourteenth century music.

Thought Back of the Music

The thought back of the music is that of the revelry of those who try to drown their despair in time of catastrophe. There is no literalism in all this, only musical suggestion of mood and atmosphere—suggested, of course, in the severe and linear manner.

Now the music seldom comes off. It has no very strong invention; it is none too practically scored. Yet it is of interest, if only as the reflection of its author's personality that comes through, despite a prevailing impression of amateurishness.

To the layman it seems most difficult for the virtuoso performer to pass the stage of experiment and amateurishness. It is much harder for the composer to do this. Mr. Lourié appears to us as a man of conflicting mental and emotional currents whose composing has been but one of his many researches. Perhaps this is an unsound thesis. But for us his music has the sincerity and the fresh approach of a man of uncommon attitude, while it falls short in effectiveness largely because it is not sufficiently seasoned by the composer's experience and routine. All the same, the music has a color. Dr. Koussevitzky gave it every possible advantage in his performance. The chorus, trained by Robert Shaw, and the solo soprano, Valentina Vishnevska, gave able cooperation. After the performance Dr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Lourié to the stage.

"Unfinished" Symphony Heard

The concert opened with the unparalleled music of the Schubert B minor symphony— the "Unfinished." The introductory ten notes of 'cellos and double basses are so powerful and profound in meaning that they could herald a tragedy of Aeschylus; yet all is lyricism, all is Schubert's incomparable song. What other composer wrote with the rapt vision, tenderness, the compassion of Schubert in his slow movement? One listens and remembers the line of Whitman, "Whispers of heavenly death."

To begin the concert with this music, and end it with Beethoven's paean of joy, the Seventh Symphony, was an inspiration in program making, and a grateful audience made known its satisfaction.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 21 1945

MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Orchestra Appear at Metropolitan.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made his first visit of the season to Metropolitan Theater with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. A large audience welcomed him with enthusiasm. A change in the routine —the concert began at 8:05 instead of 8:30—resulted in many customers being late, but not so many as might have been feared.

The program was not forward-looking. It was substantial, however, and it was brilliantly done. Haydn's symphony No. 88, in G major, replaced Mozart's divertimento for strings and horns as the opening work. The firm, flexible tone of the strings earned admiration. The reading was suave and vigorous, in Dr. Koussevitzky's finest manner; it was marked by a particularly zestful delivery of the finale.

The exciting scramble for orchestra put together from "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky, followed Haydn with singular effect. It has a sort of orderly disorder and eccentric brilliance that fascinate and please without requiring concentration; one is likely to overlook the great skill and precision required in producing these seemingly random sounds. The suite introduced to Providence the orchestra's new official pianist, Lukas Foss, young composer. Mr. Foss gave a neccessarily limited but very creditable display of his wares. He is of the flung-forelock school of pianists. Dr. Koussevitzky allowed him a couple of solo bows, well deserved.

The B minor (Pathetic) symphony of Tchaikovsky was the heavy work of the program. Its melodies and sonorous climaxes, its harmonies and powerful rhythms, were sounded with all the resources of a virtuoso orchestra. The waves of brass rolled forth, the strings sang. Every note was in its place and every section of the orchestra was clear in the resounding sum. The audience responded with eager applause.

And yet . . . . . and yet . . . . . .

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post — Feb 22

Flanked by the flags of the United States and Brazil, Heitor Villa-Lobos, leading composer of the latter country (or at least the best exploited), conducted the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in a program of his own music. Perhaps music isn't just the word for the tonal farrago and mish-mash entitled Choros No. 12, but it is applicable to the Toccata and Fugue from "Bachianas Brasileiras," No. 7, which began this most extraordinary of Symphony Concerts and even to the "Rudepoema" (Savage Poem), that brought it to a merciful conclusion.

Villa-Lobos is one of the most remarkable figures in contemporary music. Though some of the items apparently exist only in his mind, the list of his works is still very long. He writes melodies by placing New York's skyline or a Brazilian mountain range on the staff and outlining them with notes. His music is a mixture of the sophisticated and the naive, the beautiful and the ugly, the original and the borrowed, the indigenous and the cosmopolitan. This applies to his output as a whole and to the dreadful Choros No. 12 as a unit, if anything so sprawling and inchoate can be called a unit.

This ridiculously over-laden score plays for more than half an hour and might have gone in indefinitely, since it is one of those pieces in which the composer constantly stops what he is doing and begins afresh with something new. There are sentimental and also lively passages along the way which suggest that Mr. V.-L. might do something with a musical comedy. Written in 1929, it was inspired by the composer's visits to the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris. These are the first performances.

The "Bachianas Brasileiras" would combine the "universality of Bach" with the native Brazilian idiom. However, the Toccata sounds more like Ravel in one of his Oriental moods. The fugue after a quiet, genuinely Bach-like beginning, ends up by suggesting a tasteless transcription of one of that master's organ works. The Rudepoema, a transcribed piano piece, is a study in the barbarously exotic. Besides being for the most part over-orchestrated and replete with all kinds of percussion instruments, this music is difficult, at times almost impossible to play. The orchestra, reinforced for the occasion, struggled with it heroically.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 19 1945

Sharps & Flats

Harry Truman got back his family home when he and his brother laid out $20,000 in cash for the 87-acre home site of the 287-acre farm where they were raised in Jackson County, Mo. (His 92-year-old mother, defaulting on some $4,000 interest due on a $35,000 loan, lost the property in a sheriff's sale in 1940.) Three days later, the Vice President dropped around to the National Press Club Canteen in Washington, knocked out impromptu accompaniments for Hollywood's slow-burning sensation, Lauren Bacall, who sang, in true torch style, from a perch atop Truman's piano (see cut).

Tommy Dorsey, bespectacled trombonist-band leader, known to his fans as the "Sentimental Gentleman of Swing," sweated through a practice session with Leopold Stokowski, in preparation for a long-haired debut—a Concerto for Trombone and Orchestra to be played with the New York City Symphony. Said he: "I've never worked so hard in my life. . . . I hope they like it. . . . Now if it were the Arcadia Ball Room or Roseland. . . ."

Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has sponsored more music by contemporary U.S. composers than any other top-rank maestro, proposed that, after the war, each of the 48 states sponsor a symphony orchestra of its own. Predicting a "great future" for U.S. music, Russian-born U.S. Citizen Koussevitzky said: "I hope that Government officials will consider a symphony . . . as necessary as a new bridge or . . . improved road. Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

Help for Aged More Needed Than Music, Says Tax Expert

Globe — Feb. 15

BY GEORGE DAWSON

"Oh, it's a good idea," said Norman MacDonald of the Massachusetts Federation of Taxpayers, referring to Dr. Koussevitzky's proposal suggesting that a half dollar be added to the income tax of all New Englanders so that they may enjoy State-supported music. "The only trouble is that it can't work."

"In the first place, only three New England States, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont have State taxes and I doubt if the good doctor's figures are correct in stating that there are 3,500,000 taxpayers in the combined States.

"On the supposition that Dr. Koussevitzky is correct, at a half a buck a throw, the tri-State tax would yield $1,750,000 which would hardly be enough to subsidize several symphony orchestras as the noted leader plans."

Though he personally is in favor of such a musical plan Mr. MacDonald can see numerous other things which could be accomplished with that kind of money. Child health, visual education, crusade against veneral diseases, hot lunches for school children and slum clearance are but a few that came to his mind. He doesn't believe that with the need of all these vital improvements that this is the time for millions of dollars to be spent on music.

"The taxpayer, mind you," said Mr. MacDonald, "wouldn't mind spending the money. He's funny like that. Even in these days when he's socked the limit. As long as he sees what he's getting for the cash he turns in to the State he's pretty easily satisfied."

What seemed to worry Mr. MacDonald was that if a program of this sort could be put across how would it be handled? Suppose some one in the State House didn't go for Beethoven or Bach and demanded the pianist to play like Frankie Karle, oh brother, long hair would be strewn all over Beacon Hill. And after all if the Symphony Orchestra became public property certainly the public should have something to say about the type of music it wants to hear.

There would be the likelihood that orchestras would be requested to play at public functions and for holiday celebrations. Suppose for instance they were called upon to play in South Boston on St. Patrick's Day. Naturally the citizens of Southie would demand music in keeping with the day's celebration. Why not? They are the ones who are paying for it. Why shouldn't they have it?

With 4,000,000 people in Massachusetts alone the symphony orchestras would be called upon to play continuously in every section of the State. The question then arises, are there auditoriums and halls suitably equipped with acoustics so that the music would retain its symphonic qualities? Obviously the answer is, no.

What then would folks say. Surely they have a right to insist upon being entertained in this elegant manner and it shouldn't be expected of them to travel to large cities to hear their favorite and free music.

Music a Food in Russia

It would be impossible to construct new music halls throughout the three New England States with the meager million and three-quarters dollars and still pay the expenses of several orchestras, to say nothing of traveling expenses when the companies go on tour.

In enlarging upon his plan for subsidized symphonies, Dr. Koussevitzky stated that such a project has for years been carried on successfully in Russia, the land of his birth. "Music," he said, "is as much a necessity in Russia as food."

"The Russian government," he continued, "still gives music to the citizens in wartime and they are happy and grateful and fight better."

Maybe so, maybe so, but Mr. MacDonald still wants some more concrete evidence. Perhaps a hot balalaika might spur the Russian soldiers on to greater fighting efforts. Maybe one of the reasons why the Russians are so anxious to get into Germany is because some of the cities there are reputed to have excellent music halls. If music does all that for the Russian army, certainly it is a wonderful thing.

But how can the good Dr. Koussevitzky explain the fact that millions of Ukranians starved to death, when he says "music is food for the Russians." Would a noggin of William Tell's overture have sustained them over the rough period? It would probably set much better on a full stomach.

"Dr. Koussevitzky may have a good idea," says Mr. MacDonald, "but it must take its place in a regular chain of events. There is much to be done in public health, and social security. Better care for the aged is one of the first things which should be attended to.

The Old Folks

"We have thousands of old folks in Massachusetts attempting to subsist on the meager $41 a month which the State government provides. I'd like to see some of those folks who prepare these budgets try to live for a couple of weeks on that shall sum.

"Think of what an additional 50 cents from each taxpayer would mean to those poor and aged men and women. It would most certainly go a long way to make their burden easier to bear. Out of the $41 they receive they must provide their own food, clothing and shelter. No allowance was ever given to them for entertainment or perhaps for a pack of cigarettes. They barely exist on the State's money even though it is one of the highest rates paid in the country.

"There is another angle to think of," continued Mr. MacDonald. "If that money, which totals nearly $2,000,000, could be used to remove a slab of the slums each year and replace it with liveable homes it wouldn't take many years for the slums in all our cities to be wiped out.

"Others might like to have the State acquire famous paintings, outstanding works of art, Chinese ceramics, etc., for the Museum of Fine Arts with the money pouring in from that small tax levy.

"If the State harbors any ideas on subsidizing music for entertainment why not go all the way and subsidize some movie actress? There are a lot of people out in the Berkshires, who would like to take a look at Mae West or some other glamourous lady of stage or screen. And how about subsidizing an entire stage show? Surely thousands outside of the city of Boston would have been glad to have had an opportunity to see Margaret Webster's 'Tempest,' which played here recently.

"Three and one-half million half dollars a year would go a long way in building an opera company equal to the famed Metropolitan. But I wonder how many people would attend the operas if they were offered to them free of charge? How many would attend the symphonies? I don't know the answer to that, Dr. Koussevitzky will have to supply it."

Brookline High vs. Quartets; Also Wagner and His Plumbing

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr. Herald

One of the most regrettable consequences of the current trend to the over-emphasis of the sensational, the spectacular and the loud in music—whether it be perpetrated by symphony orchestras, jazz bands or choruses—is the neglect of chamber music.

It is true that the Budapest Quartet can fill Jordan Hall on its every visit, but no other chamber music ensemble in the country can do the same today. Indeed, so spectacular is the Budapest Quartet in its success and so dismal is the failure of other equally sound quartets that there can be no question that factors of glamour or notoriety through good publicity breaks are chiefly responsible for the Budapest's amazing record as a going concern.

This is, when you think about it, a tragic thing. It is agreed by all musicians, all writers on music and all educated musical people that much of the greatest pure music of all composers may be found in their chamber music. It is also agreed that until a music lover comes to know and love this music he is still, to all extents and purposes, a musical illiterate. But how can those who have any musical feeling at all come to know and love chamber music? For it is admitted that, like a taste for great art, great literature or even great cooking, that taste must be awakened and cultivated and guided. Thus it seems to me that the experiment now being carried out by the Zimbler String Quartet in association with Brookline High School is one of the most important musical experiments in many years.

From the time that somebody asked him how many men he had in his quartet, Josef Zimbler, a 'cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been crusading in behalf of chamber music. A connoisseur of chamber music and a fine, sincere musician, he realized that such ignorance bespoke an attitude that, carried to its extreme, meant the death of chamber music if something weren't done about it. And so he conceived the idea of presenting chamber music to high school students, not as a free concert in after-school hours, but as a part of the curriculum so the entire student body would come in contact with it perforce. To carry out such a daring idea obviously required the help of a public school with an illuminated musical point of view, and Brookline High School proved to be the one. Moreover, the idea required financial backing, and several public-minded citizens of Brookline stepped forward to sponsor one of the proposed monthly concerts.

So on Feb. 2 the first one took place in the auditorium of Brookline High School, the Zimbler Quartet performing Haydn Quartets before the entire student body. The audience may have been merely courteous (as American audiences are) in its ovation, I don't know, but its complete absorption in the music while it was going on can only be interpreted as the real thing. In any case, it was so successful that a complete series is now assured; indeed, several other high schools in Metropolitan Boston have begun a clamor for a similar series of their own. If everything goes right, it may be that the Zimbler Quartet can so instill an appreciation, a taste and a love for chamber music among young people—who are, after all, future audiences — that chamber music may once again achieve its place as the most wonderful of all musical experiences.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 18 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LOURIE SUITE

Koussevitzky Conducts 'The Feast During the Plague'—Calls Composer to Stage

By OLIN DOWNES

At the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky presented for the first time in this city Arthur Lourié's composition after Pushkin, for small chorus, solo soprano and orchestra, "The Feast During the Plague." This work was originally cast in the form of a ballet and as such was in rehearsal at the Paris Opera in 1939, just before Hitler's invasion. In New York in 1943 Mr. Lourié arranged the score as a suite, slightly reducing the size of the orchestra required.

"After Pushkin" is no misnomer, except that Pushkin's drama, which is properly not included by publishers of translated editions of his works, was a translation, and a close one, of the drama, ""The City of the Plague" by John Wilson. Wilson's inspiration was in all probability the London plague of the seventeenth century. Pushkin translated the work with a degree of genius impossible to its author, while the plague was raging in Moscow, where the poet's fiancée was quarantined. The second movement of the Lourié suite employs, however, Latin verse of Petrarch of the fourteenth century, and this seems important, because of Mr. Lourié's immersion in late years in Catholicism, so that plain chant and modal style are continually in evidence in this music, characterized by an archaism that might logically be associated in style with fourteenth century music.

Thought Back of the Music

The thought back of the music is that of the revelry of those who try to drown their despair in time of catastrophe. There is no literalism in all this, only musical suggestion of mood and atmosphere—suggested, of course, in the severe and linear manner.

Now the music seldom comes off. It has no very strong invention; it is none too practically scored. Yet it is of interest, if only as the reflection of its author's personality that comes through, despite a prevailing impression of amateurishness.

To the layman it seems most difficult for the virtuoso performer to pass the stage of experiment and amateurishness. It is much harder for the composer to do this. Mr. Lourié appears to us as a man of conflicting mental and emotional currents whose composing has been but one of his many researches. Perhaps this is an unsound thesis. But for us his music has the sincerity and the fresh approach of a man of uncommon attitude, while it falls short in effectiveness largely because it is not sufficiently seasoned by the composer's experience and routine. All the same, the music has a color. Dr. Koussevitzky gave it every possible advantage in his performance. The chorus, trained by Robert Shaw, and the solo soprano, Valentina Vishnevska, gave able cooperation. After the performance Dr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Lourié to the stage.

"Unfinished" Symphony Heard

The concert opened with the unparalleled music of the Schubert B minor symphony— the "Unfinished." The introductory ten notes of 'cellos and double basses are so powerful and profound in meaning that they could herald a tragedy of Aeschylus; yet all is lyricism, all is Schubert's incomparable song. What other composer wrote with the rapt vision, tenderness, the compassion of Schubert in his slow movement? One listens and remembers the line of Whitman, "Whispers of heavenly death."

To begin the concert with this music, and end it with Beethoven's paean of joy, the Seventh Symphony, was an inspiration in program making, and a grateful audience made known its satisfaction.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 21 1945

MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Orchestra Appear at Metropolitan.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made his first visit of the season to Metropolitan Theater with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. A large audience welcomed him with enthusiasm. A change in the routine —the concert began at 8:05 instead of 8:30—resulted in many customers being late, but not so many as might have been feared.

The program was not forward-looking. It was substantial, however, and it was brilliantly done. Haydn's symphony No. 88, in G major, replaced Mozart's divertimento for strings and horns as the opening work. The firm, flexible tone of the strings earned admiration. The reading was suave and vigorous, in Dr. Koussevitzky's finest manner; it was marked by a particularly zestful delivery of the finale.

The exciting scramble for orchestra put together from "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky, followed Haydn with singular effect. It has a sort of orderly disorder and eccentric brilliance that fascinate and please without requiring concentration; one is likely to overlook the great skill and precision required in producing these seemingly random sounds. The suite introduced to Providence the orchestra's new official pianist, Lukas Foss, young composer. Mr. Foss gave a neccessarily limited but very creditable display of his wares. He is of the flung-forelock school of pianists. Dr. Koussevitzky allowed him a couple of solo bows, well deserved.

The B minor (Pathetic) symphony of Tchaikovsky was the heavy work of the program. Its melodies and sonorous climaxes, its harmonies and powerful rhythms, were sounded with all the resources of a virtuoso orchestra. The waves of brass rolled forth, the strings sang. Every note was in its place and every section of the orchestra was clear in the resounding sum. The audience responded with eager applause.

And yet. . . . . .and yet. . . . .

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 19 1945

Sharps & Flats

Harry Truman got back his family home when he and his brother laid out $20,000 in cash for the 87-acre home site of the 287-acre farm where they were raised in Jackson County, Mo. (His 92-year-old mother, defaulting on some $4,000 interest due on a $35,000 loan, lost the property in a sheriff's sale in 1940.) Three days later, the Vice President dropped around to the National Press Club Canteen in Washington, knocked out impromptu accompaniments for Hollywood's slow-burning sensation, Lauren Bacall, who sang, in true torch style, from a perch atop Truman's piano (see cut).

Tommy Dorsey, bespectacled trombonist-band leader, known to his fans as the "Sentimental Gentleman of Swing," sweated through a practice session with Leopold Stokowski, in preparation for a long-haired debut—a Concerto for Trombone and Orchestra to be played with the New York City Symphony. Said he: "I've never worked so hard in my life. . . . I hope they like it. . . . Now if it were the Arcadia Ball Room or Roseland. . . ."

Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has sponsored more music by contemporary U.S. composers than any other top-rank maestro, proposed that, after the war, each of the 48 states sponsor a symphony orchestra of its own. Predicting a "great future" for U.S. music, Russian-born U.S. Citizen Koussevitzky said: "I hope that Government officials will consider a symphony . . . as necessary as a new bridge or . . . improved road. Spiritual food is sometimes more important than physical assets."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Feb 22

Flanked by the flags of the United States and Brazil, Heitor Villa-Lobos, leading composer of the latter country (or at least the best exploited), conducted the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in a program of his own music. Perhaps music isn't just the word for the tonal farrago and mish-mash entitled Choros No. 12, but it is applicable to the Toccata and Fugue from "Bachianas Brasileiras," No. 7, which began this most extraordinary of Symphony Concerts and even to the "Rudepoema" (Savage Poem), that brought it to a merciful conclusion.

Villa-Lobos is one of the most remarkable figures in contemporary music. Though some of the items apparently exist only in his mind, the list of his works is still very long. He writes melodies by placing New York's skyline or a Brazilian mountain range on the staff and outlining them with notes. His music is a mixture of the sophisticated and the naive, the beautiful and the ugly, the original and the borrowed, the indigenous and the cosmopolitan. This applies to his output as a whole and to the dreadful Choros No. 12 as a unit, if anything so sprawling and incheate can be called a unit.

This ridiculously over-laden score plays for more than half an hour and might have gone in indefinitely, since it is one of those pieces in which the composer constantly stops what he is doing and begins afresh with something new. There are sentimental and also lively passages along the way which suggest that Mr. V.-L. might do something with a musical comedy. Written in 1929, it was inspired by the composer's visits to the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris. These are the first performances.

The "Bachianas Brasileiras" would combine the "universality of Bach" with the native Brasilian idiom. However, the Toccata sounds more like Ravel in one of his Oriental moods. The fugue after a quiet, genuinely Bach-like beginning, ends up by suggesting a tasteless transcription of one of that master's organ works. The Rudepoema, a transcribed piano piece, is a study in the barbarously exotic. Besides being for the most part over-orchestrated and replete with all kinds of percussion instruments, this music is difficult, at times almost impossible to play. The orchestra, reinforced for the occasion, struggled with it heroically.

Makes Jungle Music for Dr. Koussevitzky

Feb 2

The Brazilian composer, Heitor Villa-Lobos, demonstrates the reco-reco, a notched stick and scraper to Serge Koussevitkzy conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who holds a steel rattle called Chucalcos.

Boston Hears Villa-Lobos Conduct Program of His Own Compositions

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—A week or so ago Dr. Serge Koussevitzky forfeited a brief leave in order to introduce to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Heitor Villa-Lobos whom he described as the greatest composer of the western hemisphere, not a careless distinction coming from a conductor who during the past twenty years has been so sensible of the creative efforts of living American composers one and all.

The musicians responded by playing on Friday afternoon and Saturday night a tremendously difficult program made up entirely of the works of the eminent Rio de Janeiran who happens to be also the commissioner of music education for all Brazil. They even took up new instruments, a violist and a violinist forsaking their fiddles for some of the curious Amazonian percussion devices that go by such names as chocalnos, matraca and reco-reco; a young woman bassoonist transferred to the saxophone.

Audience Restive

The audience was polite but restive. A few seats were vacant after the intermission which had been occupied before it. During the playing of Rudepoêma which, being translated means "Savage Poem," two white-haired ladies were seen to leave the hall. There were repeated recalls for the short, thick-set composer who walked with the greatest deliberation around the corner of the stage where stood the flag of Brazil. He shared all his acclaim with the hard-working orchestra and at length drew attention to Dr. Koussevitzky who was seated in the audience as also was the Brazilian consul, Senhor Americo de Galvao Bueno.

In spite of the amenities the music of Villa-Lobos was not popular with the average listener. Rudepoêma and two excerpts from Bachianas Brasileiras No. 7 had never before been heard in Boston. For Choros No. 12 it was the first performance anywhere. It was freely remarked that this music was long and noisy and monotonous. The Boston critics, with an astonishing unanimity, turned thumbs down, nearly all of them using the word "amorphous" to describe the compositions that they had heard. One of them went so far as to doubt that many of Villo-Lobos' 1,500 compositions existed anywhere except in his own mind. For comparable examples of critical incivility one must turn to the classic cases of Franck and Wagner and Tschaikowsky.

A Long, Complex Work

Choros No. 12 is a long work. An initial feeling of prolixity may grow out of the complete absence of form as we know it. Here is simply an outpouring of inexhaustibly variegated sound. Its melodic fertility is a new thing under the sun. Themes that would have sufficed the classical composer for a whole symphony are spent with a prodigal hand. There are long interludes of voluptuously beautiful tunefulness. Its rhythmic gamut is just as rich and strange. Some sections seem to have choreographic force but not so many as one would except from the combination of Latin and jungle Indian motivation.

What pleases and most arrests the mind is the total disorientation from European patterns and preconceptions. What most inevitably claims respect is that Senhor Villa-Lobos has not needed to invent for himself a new scale system or harmonic philosophy to give living space to the most original, fecund and torrential musical spirit ever to swing across American skies. He has no need of atonality; nor is he afraid of a dissonance. That this twentieth century composer is as prolific as a Bocherini is incomprehensible but we are forced to accept it as a fact just as we accept the short-windedness of most composers of our day.

Master of the Orchestra

Villa-Lobos handles the orchestra with the greatest skill. His is a complex, sonorous orchestra having, for the most part a fine buoyancy although there are times when momentarily it seems to grind into inertia. He employs the brasses freely and seems to be fond of a wind bass.

Downright popular was the fugue in Bachianas Brasileiras. It has the gentlest of themes and is woven into a soft and pleasing fabric modeled on academic lines. The toccata is exotic in temper, although the figuration follows somewhat the Bachian curves.

Rudepoêma was once a piano composition written for Artur Rubinstein. It is now probably a permanent property of the orchestra, just as Moussorgsky's "Pictures" became so, because of the need for bigger sonorities. If Villa-Lobos was ever influenced by the Parisian modernists it was in such a work as this, but to call it derivative would be to ignore its teeming originality and South American flavor.

The composer proved himself an expert and authoritative conductor but decidedly not a spectacular one.

C. E. L.

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series last night was compounded of elegance, drama and romanticism. The Haydn Symphony in G major, No. 88; Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and the second symphony of Sibelius made up the well-balanced diet, conventional in design but memorably executed, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Members of the large audience may not have considered themselves especially privileged, as Haydn's original audience (subscribers to the Concert de la Loge Olympique) in Paris, did after paying handsome fees and mastering proscribed ritual, but by the time the allegro swung into full stride, a sense of general good fortune at being present was inevitable.

The sonorous largo, the suavely patterned trio, and the quick-witted finale were delivered cleanly, despite the lightning-like pace of the conclusion.

The angular sounds of "Petrouchka" came next for contrast. Lukas Foss was the piano soloist, realizing the syncopated rhythms with gusto. The highly descriptive music is gratifying to hear from the puppet's posturings to the ponderous motions of the bear. Played by a full orchestra it adds up to very good fun.

It is not necessary to be a particular admirer of Sibelius to be carried away by Serge Koussevitzky's reading of the second symphony. His fusion of the outpouring of themes gives to the symphony highlights which seem to be newly discovered. Fragments for strings spin in and out of focus, giving way to the horns and claiming the floor again as though there were too much to say at once to bother with protocol, yet there is no sense of confusion. The effective groupings of instruments, the contrasts in color and dynamics are fully realized in Dr. Koussevitzky's Sibelius.

P. W.

Herald MUSIC 2-24

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Heitor Villa-Lobos conducting, gave the 17th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following works of the composer-conductor: Toccata and Fugue from "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 7; Choros No. 12; Rudepoema.

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Of the more than 1400 musical compositions Heitor Villa-Lobos has written during his long and distinguished career as the most eminent South American composer, it is clear that he has written better music than he chose to represent himself with as he made his first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the regular concert series.

Most of us didn't like his music very much yesterday, I fear, not because we didn't get it or because we are insensitive to such highly charged music or because the Brazilian folk element is too strong for us or even because we were not in the mood. On the contrary, most of us agree that Senhor Villa-Lobos is one of the first composers of this era, that his music is not difficult in the sense that Bartok's is, that we like vivid and colorful music as much as anybody, that we recognize the wonders of the Brazilian folk spirit (consider our enthusiasm for the tenth Choros), and that we were good neighbors long before that policy was enunciated. The plain facts of the case are that barring the Toccata and the Fugue of the seventh "Bachianas Brasileiras" the music just wasn't skillfully enough wrought to keep us interested for so long. And by "our" I mean practically everyone at the concert, not myself and three or four intimates.

Speaking for myself, however, the twelfth Choros seemed badly organized, undisciplined, redundant and altogether too long. It has moments of fine and striking effect, even moments of genuine excitement. But for the most part it goes along as I imagine the Amazon, now slithering under exquisite orchids, eddying into exotic jungle glades, sliding past a village while a bad movie was being screened, and dashing over rocks on which alligators are sunning themselves, but always burdened down with the mass of earthy silt it carries. It is, in short, too thickly scored and some of the material isn't worth scoring at all. It is, moreover, too amorphous in structure, consisting of countless fast-loud sections contrasted with soft-slow ones, and all of them sounding more or less alike and conveying a little sense of destination.

The "Rudipoema" is a more literate work than the Choros, but even here the effect is diminished by its length and its fiendish technical difficulties. Its main interest for me was as spectacle; I was fascinated by the dexterity and awed by the endurance of the musicians surmounting its problems — which they did with a good deal more success than could be imagined. The hero of the day, in short, was the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was game, and never has it worked harder, than it did yesterday to realize the music as its composer intended it to be realized.

In fact, Senhor Villa-Lobos proved himself a conductor of very considerable attainment, setting forth the intricate, bar-to-bar tempo changes in every variation of meter with an expert beat and with impressive authority. The only trouble was he didn't bring his best music with him. Had he done so, he would have achieved a very real ovation and one more in line with his eminent position in the musical world. Even as it was, however, [illegible] a gratifying reception [illegible]ce which recognized, [illegible] the moments of in- [illegible] music.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

FEB 21 1945

Conductors Meet in Boston

—Associated Press Wirephoto

Heitor Villa-Lobos of Brazil (right), leading South American composer, demonstrates the reco-reco, a notched stick and scraper, to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Villa-Lobos will lead the symphony in a program of his own music Friday and Saturday. To aid in the interpretation of his fiery music the visiting composer brought along a trunkful of South American instruments including the "xucalhos," steel rattles containing pebbles, which Dr. Koussevitzky smilingly inspects.

Herald MUSIC Feb. 24

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

As these lines are read, musical Boston must be acutely conscious of the orchestral side of Heitor Villa-Lobos. The foremost musician of Brazil, on his first visit to Boston, is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in a program of his own music. By tonight this program will have been heard once in Cambridge and twice at Symphony Hall.

The three pieces are the Toccata ("Challenge") and Fugue ("Conversation") from the "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 7; the Choros No. 12, and "Rudepoema" or "Savage Poem." The first and third are new here; the Choros receives first performance anywhere.

It is hard to describe the art of Villa-Lobos without using a lot of words. It is vast, driving and full of all sorts of influences. In the Toccata and Fugue, with their admiring nod at the great Johann Sebastian, are logic and clarity, Bachian figuration and contrapuntal textures, the whole shot through with exotic Brazilian touches of color and rhythm. They sound both antique and modern, just as orchestrated Bach sounds old and new, because the method of composition is antique and the instrumentation contemporary.

The Choros and "Savage Poem" are altogether different, and while they seem alternately rough, wild, tender, calm and exotic, they are full of passion and "juice." To the full symphonic orchestra Mr. Villa-Lobos adds saxophone and percussion, including Brazilian instruments: the chocalhos (rattle) and reco-reco (notched stick and scraper) for his Choros, and the matraca (ratchet) and reco-reco for "Savage Poem." Their effect is neither clear nor vivid, however, for they are mixed in with decidedly thick sonorities. The meters change frequently and often are irregular, including one of seven beats.

Were the Choros half as long it would be twice better. It is not a matter of ordered repetition according to precise structure, but a tissue of episodes, all strung together, wherein are popular melodies, dance rhythms, suggestions of Indians and the jungle, and Mr. Villa-Lobos' own manner of expressing himself. Important also—and in contradiction to the composer's renunciation of Europe—are definite touches of Debussy ("La Mer"), Ravel ("Daphnis and Chloe") and Stravinsky ("Petrouchka" and "The Rite of Spring").

"Savage Poem," dedicated to Artur Rubinstein as a piano piece in 1926, and orchestrated in 1932, is shorter than the Choros and more wildly rhapsodic. Yet here, too, the form is amorphous.

A whole afternoon of Villa-Lobos is unquestionably too much of a muchness, but it is also quite exciting. The Friday audience seemed divided; the Brazilian was cordially applauded, yet there were some who left Symphony Hall at intermission, and others departed periodically during the "Savage Poem," although the Boston Symphony in certain other modern music has given out more decibels and fiercer dissonance. I would like to hear the "Savage Poem" conducted by someone else. It is possible that Mr. Villa-Lobos, like many another composer, is not the best conductor of his own music. Even so, he seemed to receive full cooperation from the orchestra.

OTTAWA, CANADA
EVENING JOURNAL

FEB 24 1945

* * *

State Music.

London Free Press.

——On the ground that "music is as much a necessity as food". Serge Koussevitsky, Russian-born American citizen and for the past 21 years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proposes state music for 50 cents a year to be collected through income tax. He argues that there are 3,500,000 taxpayers in New England and that with the income to be derived from such a levy there could be several symphony orchestras, as well as operas, chamber music and conservatories. He admits his plan is based on his observation of a similar scheme in Soviet Russia but declares it would provide work for musicians in general, and give jobs to musicians in the fighting forces after they return to civil life.

* * *

Heitor Villa-Lobos: Genius, South American Department

Feb 25 By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR. Herald

Whatever else Heitor Villa-Lobos may be he is the most intensely creative man in music today and certainly one of the most volatile personalities. Everything he composes is controversial—and he has composed more than fourteen hundred original pieces in all forms from songs to operas—and everything he says is controversial. Life [illegible] where Heitor Villa-Lobos is [illegible].

At 62 he is South America's leading composer and perhaps one of the most distinguished of this era. He is not a tall man but he is [illegible] physically imposing [illegible] head, high forehead [illegible] fierce eyes, [illegible] and strong hands [illegible]. He talks as he composes—like an avalanche, and his [illegible] somehow suggest a Conquistador who has forgotten [illegible] armor.

You have only to ask him a [illegible] the derivation of the term "Choros" (which he has used for no less than 14 of his works) and there follows an [illegible] on everything [illegible] which might have anything to do with a Choros, complete with diagrams on the backs of [illegible], poundings on the table and a stunning repertoire of descriptive sounds, imageries and [illegible]. He could easily convince you that the moon is not only made of green cheese but that he has often dined on it.

But he does not employ this wonderful technique at the expense of the idea he is expounding. On the contrary, he is a musician of the utmost integrity and he will not answer a question that seems to him possible of misinterpretation or of misuse. For instance, I asked him for his opinion of contemporary American composers. He replied that he did not know the music of, say, Piston (who happened to be sitting beside him), Schuman, Barber, Harris, and so on, and felt he required at least ten years' acquaintance with their music to discuss it. At another time he was asked what he thought of American women. He laughed and said he'd been so busy working during his month-long tour of the United States he really hadn't seen any. But if the question suits him, his remarks are anything but quibble or pleasantry.

"Classical education?" he snorted (in French, for he speaks no English). "My father saw me trying to play Bach when I was seven years old. 'Give me that music,' he said, 'who are you to play that music, let alone understand it? No, no! Play the music of your own people or make your own music. Later, maybe, you will know enough to play Bach.' And it was not until I was 27 and had written many, many pieces of my own that I undertook to study the masters."

This general idea of leaving the masters untouched until maturity is now part of Senhor Villa-Lobos' educational credo. He is literally the czar of music in his native Brazil with the post of Director of Music in the schools of that country. In this position he has been able to revolutionize the approach to the teaching of music to young people. "Music is part of the curricula there like mathematics," he says, "and those who don't pass it don't graduate." Yet it is not a question of formal training or rigorous discipline, for he is opposed to discipline except that self-imposed, inner discipline which is the natural product of the realization that co-operative effort is the only road to a higher common will. So his classes in music in Brazil are largely classes in group singing. "Children learn quickly they have to pull together," he says, "to make the music sound right."

It may be, in the long run, that this rejection for himself of formal early training and of lack of discipline will stand between Heitor Villa-Lobos and musical immortality. For his creative method has all the wasteful prodigality, all the burning urgency of the things that grow in the Brazilian jungle after a rain. Music pours out of him and onto paper; music that reeks of the damp soil, of the smells and colors and sounds and terrors of the jungle and of hot-blooded people. Even in repose his music is hot and damp and fecund. And in all of it there is too much of it; it is crowded and matted like the jungle itself where the most exotic and precious flower is often lost in a riotous mass of weeds and useless things.

He writes down what occurs to him as it occurs to him whether it is musically practicable or not—and everything occurs to him. It is usually in his piano music and some of his chamber music that there is an economy of means, a clarity of line, a purity of expression. His piano music, indeed, is with Prokofieff's the finest written in our day. But give him an orchestra and he seems compelled to keep all the musicians working like mad doing things they can't do simply to contribute to a general effect that loses, through its insistence, its effect.

Thus with Villa-Lobos it is pure and burning inspiration and though often wonderful and sometimes breathtaking (and I wish to heaven our American composers—any one of them—had one tenth of his creative impulse) it needs, like all pure inspiration, control of intellectual selections. Beethoven, it is true, could not be held in check by rules, but he knew them as few others, and his process of selection—as indicated by his sketchbook—was an example of self discipline almost unique in music. Villa-Lobos writes music of the most astonishing virility and color and music that intoxicates but does not feed the heart. But there's no rule, come to think of it, that says music must feed the heart, and it is so rare a privilege to come face to face with a man of such towering creative urgency that the larger artistic values seem small indeed.

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

FEB 22 1945

Villa-Lobos Wins Approval as Symphony Conductor

By Mary Prim

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — Guest Conductor Heitor Villa-Lobos led Serge Koussevitzky's Boston ~~Symphony orchestra~~ through three of his own compositions last night as if dancing his native Samba.

But the exuberant grace of his stocky body and tossing hair didn't mean a thing. The Brazilian who pepped up composer Johan Sebastian Bach with South American ratchets, scraped sticks and rattling cocoanuts claimed that he does not dance.

"I have no time for anything but music," he said in his dressing room after a concert that brought Harvard's Sanders theater audience to its feet, applauding and cheering.

Villa-Lobos agreed that his boyhood wanderings as a player in small bands among Brazilian cabarets may have influenced his conducting.

"He's the three-cornered billiard champion of Rio," Manager Henri Leiser remarked. "That may have something to do with it."

The composer's eager vitality and enthusiasm have been a source of delight to the Boston Symthony.

In order to play his "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 7 (Brazilian Bach) and Choros No. 12 (written "in admiration of Serge Koussevitzky) the men had to learn to use many unfamiliar gadgets. Under Villa-Lobos' tuition they are now expert with the "chocalhos" (rattle) "reco-reco" (notched stick and scraper) and "maracca" (dried peas in cocoanut shell.)

"They worked them perfectly," said the conductor, "exactly as I showed them."

Another night club touch was the presence of a girl with the band. A bassoonist, the versatile Ann de Guichard played a saxophone in the South American variation of Bach and the final "Rudepoema." Villa-Lobos wrote the latter while playing in the orchestra of a small movie theater.

The Brazilian is almost as prolific as his favorite Bach, having composed more than 1500 works. He also doubles in brass as director of music for the Brazilian government.

"Music makes better citizens than soldiers," he said.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Feb 27 Post

According to the Symphony Concerts [illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky presented a program made up of some of [illegible] Haydn's Symphony in [illegible] the suite drawn from [illegible] ballet "Petrouchka" and [illegible] symphonies of Sibelius. [illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] No. [illegible] is its Largo [illegible] movement in any [illegible] symphony. For [illegible] the work [illegible] and [illegible] Haydn. [illegible] soloist, Lucas Foss, now [illegible] of the orchestra, was soloist in the "Petrouchka" [illegible] the piano [illegible] instrument in the score.

[illegible] the seven symphonies of Sibelius [illegible] has the strongest hold upon [illegible] largely because of its resplendent finale, though taking melodies [illegible] and throughout. The performance by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony is undoubtedly the finest to be heard today. A program such as this is bound both to please and bestir an audience, and that of last evening [illegible] warmly at every opportunity.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 26 1945

Boston Hears Villa-Lobos Conduct Program of His Own Compositions

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—A week or so ago Dr. Serge Koussevitzky forfeited a brief leave in order to introduce to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Heitor Villa-Lobos whom he described as the greatest composer of the western hemisphere, not a careless distinction coming from a conductor who during the past twenty years has been so sensible of the creative efforts of living American composers one and all.

The musicians responded by playing on Friday afternoon and Saturday night a tremendously difficult program made up entirely of the works of the eminent Rio de Janeiran who happens to be also the commissioner of music education for all Brazil. They even took up new instruments, a violist and a violinist forsaking their fiddles for some of the curious Amazonian percussion devices that go by such names as chocalnos, matraca and reco-reco; a young woman bassoonist transferred to the saxophone.

Audience Restive

The audience was polite but restive. A few seats were vacant after the intermission which had been occupied before it. During the playing of Rudepoêma which, being translated means "Savage Poem," two white-haired ladies were seen to leave the hall. There were repeated recalls for the short, thick-set composer who walked with the greatest deliberation around the corner of the stage where stood the flag of Brazil. He shared all his acclaim with the hard-working orchestra and at length drew attention to Dr. Koussevitzky who was seated in the audience as also was the Brazilian consul, Senhor Americo de Galvao Bueno.

In spite of the amenities the music of Villa-Lobos was not popular with the average listener. Rudepoêma and two excerpts from Bachianas Brasileiras No. 7 had never before been heard in Boston. For Choros No. 12 it was the first performance anywhere. It was freely remarked that this music was long and noisy and monotonous. The Boston critics, with an astonishing unanimity, turned thumbs down, nearly all of them using the word "amorphous" to describe the compositions that they had heard. One of them went so far as to doubt that many of Villo-Lobos' 1,500 compositions existed anywhere except in his own mind. For comparable examples of critical incivility one must turn to the classic cases of Franck and Wagner and Tschaikowsky.

A Long, Complex Work

Choros No. 12 is a long work. An initial feeling of prolixity may grow out of the complete absence of form as we know it. Here is simply an outpouring of inexhaustibly variegated sound. Its melodic fertility is a new thing under the sun. Themes that would have sufficed the classical composer for a whole symphony are spent with a prodigal hand. There are long interludes of voluptuously beautiful tunefulness. Its rhythmic gamut is just as rich and strange. Some sections seem to have choreographic force but not so many as one would except from the combination of Latin and jungle Indian motivation.

What pleases and most arrests the mind is the total disorientation from European patterns and preconceptions. What most inevitably claims respect is that Senhor Villa-Lobos has not needed to invent for himself a new scale system or harmonic philosophy to give living space to the most original, fecund and torrential musical spirit ever to swing across American skies. He has no need of atonality; nor is he afraid of a dissonance. That this twentieth century composer is as prolific as a Bocherini is incomprehensible but we are forced to accept it as a fact just as we accept the short-windedness of most composers of our day.

Master of the Orchestra

Villa-Lobos handles the orchestra with the greatest skill. His is a complex, sonorous orchestra having, for the most part a fine buoyancy although there are times when momentarily it seems to grind into inertia. He employs the brasses freely and seems to be fond of a wind bass.

Downright popular was the fugue in Bachianas Brasileiras. It has the gentlest of themes and is woven into a soft and pleasing fabric modeled on academic lines. The toccata is exotic in temper, although the figuration follows somewhat the Bachian curves.

Rudepoêma was once a piano composition written for Artur Rubinstein. It is now probably a permanent property of the orchestra, just as Moussorgsky's "Pictures" became so, because of the need for bigger sonorities. If Villa-Lobos was ever influenced by the Parisian modernists it was in such a work as this, but to call it derivative would be to ignore its teeming originality and South American flavor.

The composer proved himself an expert and authoritative conductor but decidedly not a spectacular one. C. E. L.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 21 1945

MUSIC

Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony at Metropolitan

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made his first visit of the season to Metropolitan Theater with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. A large audience welcomed him with enthusiasm. A change in the routine —the concert began at 8:05 instead of 8:30—resulted in many customers being late, but not so many as might have been feared.

The program was not forward-looking. It was substantial, however, and it was brilliantly done. Haydn's symphony No. 88, in G major, replaced Mozart's divertimento for strings and horns as the opening work. The firm, flexible tone of the strings earned admiration. The reading was suave and vigorous, in Dr. Koussevitzky's finest manner; it was marked by a particularly zestful delivery of the finale.

The exciting scramble for orchestra put together from "Petrouchka," by Stravinsky, followed Haydn with singular effect. It has a sort of orderly disorder and eccentric brilliance that fascinate and please without requiring concentration; one is likely to overlook the great skill and precision required in producing these seemingly random sounds. The suite introduced to Providence the orchestra's new official pianist, Lukas Foss, young composer. Mr. Foss gave a neccessarily limited but very creditable display of his wares. He is of the flung-forelock school of pianists. Dr. Koussevitzky allowed him a couple of solo bows, well deserved.

The B minor (Pathetic) symphony of Tchaikovsky was the heavy work of the program. Its melodies and sonorous climaxes, its harmonies and powerful rhythms, were sounded with all the resources of a virtuoso orchestra. The waves of brass rolled forth, the strings sang. Every note was in its place and every section of the orchestra was clear in the resounding sum. The audience responded with eager applause.

And yet...... and yet......

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the fourth program of its Monday series in Symphony Hall last night. The program:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 . . . Haydn
Suite from "Petrouchka" . . . Stravinsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 . . . Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

If Dr. Koussevitzky ever gave a concert designed to stagger us with his orchestral virtuosity as well as his enormous sensitivity to the location of the heart of music, it was that he gave last night. The orchestra played like the chorus of angels it is, of course, but it remained Dr. Koussevitzky's show and he made off with it to the very evident approval of everybody in the hall.

Consisting entirely of repertoire pieces—although Dr. Koussevitzky himself hasn't conducted "Petrouchka" for some time—the program carried no listening responsibilities whatever. You simply went to the concert, sat down, and presently found yourself lifted bodily into the empyrean. If you took the trouble to listen—as I gather I'm supposed to—you could note the marvelous classical balance of the Haydn, the elegance and the gallantry yet the warmth of its textures in the conductor's hands. You could single out the magical touch he gives the trio of the minuet, and place it, I am sure, amongst the crowning achievements of his recreative genius. Of course it is foolhardy to overlook Haydn's part—let alone the orchestra's—in the matter, but you can't imagine how very different it is in less gifted hands.

And so it went throughout: "Petrouchka" had all the brilliance and glitter and excitement of the score, but it also had the pathetic irony of the ballet itself. For "Petrouchka" is not funny and when played that way, as it often is in the concert hall, its symbolic essence is a travesty. Then there was Sibelius' Second, and here there was passion without wringing of hands, and climactic emphasis without frenzy. In all these things Dr. Koussevitzky was to be sure given the incomparable support of the men of the orchestra and, in the "Petrouchka," a striking piano principal by Lukas Foss, but it was nonetheless his special night, and he has seldom appeared to such advantage.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

FEB 22 1945

Boston Symphony Cuts Capers Under Leadership Of Brazilian

CAMBRIDGE, Mass.—(AP)—Guest Conductor Heitor Villa-Lobos led Serge Koussevitzky's Boston symphony orchestra through three of his own compositions last night as if dancing his native samba.

But the exuberant grace of his stocky body and tossing hair didn't mean a thing. The Brazilian who pepped up Composer Johan Sebastian Bach with south American ratchets, scraped sticks and rattling cocoanuts claimed that he does not dance.

"I have no time for anything but music," he said in his dressing room after a concert that brought Harvard's Sanders theatre audience to its feet, applauding and cheering.

Villa-Lobos agreed that his boyhood wanderings as a player in small bands among Brazilian cabarets may have influenced his conducting.

"He's the three-cushion billiard champion of Rio," Manager Henri Leiser remarked. "That may have something to do with it."

The composer's eager vitality and enthusiasm have been a source of delight to the Boston Symphony.

In order to play his "Bachianas Brasileiras" No. 7 (Brazilian Bach) and Choros No. 12 (written "in admiration of Serge Koussevitzky) the men had to learn to use many unfamiliar gadgets. Under Villa-Lobos' tuition they are now expert with the "chocalhos" (rattle "reco-reco" (notched stick and scraper) and "maracca" (dried peas in cocoanut shell.)

"They worked them perfectly," said the conductor, "exactly as I showed them."

Another night club touch was the presence of a girl with the band. A bassoonist, the versatile Ann de Guichard played a saxophone in the South American variation of Bach and the final "Rudepoema." Villa-Lobos wrote the latter while playing in the orchestra of a small movie theatre.

The Brazilian is almost as prolific as his favorite Bach, having composed more than 1,500 works. He also doubles in brass as director of music for the Brazilian government.

"Music makes better citizens than soldiers," he said.

BRONX, N. Y.
HOME NEWS
FEB 27 1945

Student Winners of Koussevitzky Contest

Bernard Kastenbaum, 1475 Concourse, and Mary Lynch, 406 E. 160th St., third and fourth from left, were two Bronx winners of the Koussevitzky contest for high school students "Why I Enjoy Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Radio Concerts," conducted recently over WJZ. Others in the group, same order, are Jay B. Stern, of Brooklyn; Norma Kirschenberg, of New York; Yolanda Novak, of Coytesville, N. J., and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, concert conductor.

Richard Tucker

Dr. Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

The Test of a Great Conductor

In war as in peace, the Boston Symphony Orchestra adheres to its tradition of superlative performance. And back of its plans and its ideals looms that giant of music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Institute welcomes his return for the annual Brooklyn series of five Friday night concerts, the first of which will be given on November 17.

It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest, the extent of his vision, and his ability to perfect his orchestra. These qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's have been demonstrated over a lengthening term. He has maintained an absorbing approach to the more familiar classics; he has shown a rewarding catholicity of taste; and he imparts genuine inspiration to the men under his baton. The plans he has announced for the 1944-1945 year reveal another reason for the perennial enjoyment of the Boston Symphony. They will continue to find place for the new composers. It is a striking fact that compositions which Dr. Koussevitzky once had the prophetic vision to see as permanent additions to orchestral repertory have become so. That is because he has sought not the merely new, but the new and good.

To the regular attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts, the gestures of Serge Koussevitzky are a marvel of grace and eloquence. How many of his followers must wish that they could watch him face to face, as his musicians see him! A newspaper reporter, who smuggled himself into a choral group appearing with the orchestra, had just such an experience. He has told how Dr. Koussevitzky takes his place before the "desk," pausing for an instant with head slightly bent. Then he sweeps his glance over the faces of the musicians. Next, he stretches his hand out rather deliberately for the baton. Suddenly both hands are raised and again he eyes the orchestra until there is breathless attention on their part. Then down come the arms, swift but gliding, and the sound of the music rises. The amazing expression of hands, body, and face disclose how Dr. Koussevitzky commands the effects achieved in his music. More, they reveal the subjectiveness of his own statement—"Great music is a necessity of life. Great music makes life complete."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 9 - 1945

Boston Symphony Records Berlioz's 'Harold in Italy'

New York, March 8—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, has just made its first recording in nearly five years. The work, a five-record album of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as violist, will be released by Victor in April.

It's the first complete recording of the Harold anywhere, and the first time the work has appeared on American discs. It is the first new Victor recording to be released since te Petrillo ban was lifted.

Post

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The brightest spot in yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was the performance of Mozart's D Major ("Coronation" Concerto with Robert Casadesus as the pianist. Incidentally, this was the first performance of the work at the regular concerts of our orchestra. Back in 1941 it was given at the Monday-Tuesday series with Frances Nash as the soloist. We could correctly infer that this is not one of the most popular of Mozart's piano concertos. And since it is possible to have gradations even among masterpieces, it is perhaps accurate to say that it is not one of the greatest. But it contains much that may be described as heavenly and, to continue the celestial figure, Mr. Casadesus and the orchestra, led by Dr. Koussevitsky, played it divinely.

The balance of this week's program contains two first performances, and had the conductor stuck to his original intention of playing Dvorak's Second Symphony, it would have had a revival as well. Possibly that would have been too much unfamiliar music for the audience to take, and by that token it was the course of wisdom to substitute the First Symphony of Schumann. This "Spring" Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitsky has a fondness for playing this time of year, is by no means as fine a work as the generally neglected Second, recalled to us by Mr Szell earlier in the season. There is too much sing-song, too many sequences. The First has long been one of Dr. Koussevitsky's happiest ventures and it is not a pleasure to report that here and there yesterday's performance was mannered, coarse and almost slovenly. Obviously, too much rehearsal time had gone into the preparation of the new music.

This last was not of great import. One piece was a Concertino for Orchestra by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, commissioned by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation. It may be set down as diluted Prokofieff, Stravinsky and Shostakovitch, though technically it is a workman-like job. The composer was present, as was our fellow-townsman, Edward Burlingame Hill, who heard the premier of his "Music for English Horn and Orchestra" and a beautiful rendition of the solo part by Louis Speyer. This is agreeable music in the French idiom that has attracted Mr. Hill so much.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

With two new pieces and a brace of soloists, there is variety in abundance at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week. The new pieces, both receiving first performances, are the Concertino for Orchestra, Op. 30, by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, and Edward Burlingame Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, Op. 50. Of the two soloists, Robert Casadesus is heard in the "Coronation" Piano Concerto (K.537) by Mozart, and the orchestra's distinguished virtuoso of the English horn, Louis Speyer, appears in Mr. Hill's work. The final number of Serge Koussevitzky's program is the "Spring" Symphony of Schumann.

Mr. Lopatnikoff's Concertino is another of the works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and is dedicated to the memory of Mme. Koussevitzky. Set in three movements, Toccata, "Little Elegy" and Finale the music is modern and mainly abstract, astringently contrapuntal and of what might be called a bristling texture. Toccata and Finale bustle along cheerfully without seeming to make any conspicuous point, and the slow movement is meditation without sentiment. There are strong influences of three other Russians: Prokofieff, Stravinsky and Shostakovitch. Call the work a high-flavored aperitif and you have characterized it sufficiently.

Although the solo melodies of the English horn wind their graceful phrases rather aimlessly, Mr. Hill's modest, three-part composition is a tissue of delightful sound. The style derives from late Impressionism; the orchestration is very delicate and prismatically colored, always allowing the foreground to the solo instrument. As in all Mr. Hill's work, his technical craftsmanship is a model of clarity and polish. Mr. Speyer contributed a magnificent performance. So did Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, in music where virtuosity is everything.

Mozart's "Coronation" Concerto has been conspicuous by its absence from Boston Symphony programs, although Mr. Casadesus played it at the little Mozart Festival in the Berkshires last August. It is music of notable reticence and extremely fine grain, even for Mozart. Perhaps that is the reason for its neglect. It is also superbly wrought, rich in invention, and demands for correct performance a soloist and orchestra sympathetic to Mozart and completely understanding of his style.

Yesterday's performance was more than good; it was just about perfect, having that proverbial running smoothness of "oil and water." Mr. Casadesus' part was evenly articulated, gracefully phrased, subtly rhythmed. The same may be said of the orchestra, which had been reduced in numbers, with five double-basses as foundation. Mr. Casadesus was most enthusiastically received.

The irresistible surge of the "Spring" Symphony made its heartwarming effect, as it always does. Yet for Mr. Koussevitzky this was less than a first-rank performance because it was mannered and not infrequently coarse in accents and the balance of instruments. Nevertheless, Schumann's work is a masterpiece, and it was decidedly nice to hear again.

Herald

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 18th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Robert Casadesus, pianist, and Louis Speyer, English horn. The program:

Concertino for Orchestra, Op. 30 .... Lopatnikoff
Music for English Horn and Orchestra, Op. 50 .... Hill
Concerto in D major (K. 537) "Coronation" .... Mozart
Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Op. 38 .... Schumann

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Robert Casadesus, whose concerto playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always one of the really distinguished events of the season, returned yesterday afternoon to play Mozart for us, and I swear it was the most exquisite performance of a Mozart Concerto I have ever heard, not only by a pianist but by an accompanying orchestra. It was one of those magic occasions when all the variables of concert performance stabilized for a brief moment into perfection.

The whole first half of the concert, in fact, was of superior value through the first performance of two works of rather more than ordinary interest. This is not to say either the Lopatnikoff or the Hill pieces were shockingly good or anything like that. But they were modest, unpretentious, unaffected, content to be themselves. They were obviously written because their composers got the ideas and liked them and because they hoped other people would like them, too. In neither case was there a sense of effort or strain or pomposity. They were both pieces to be enjoyed by everybody today, not for somebody perhaps tomorrow.

True, the Lopatnikoff piece looked a little ahead, the Hill piece a little back. The Concertino, which for quick (but not necessarily correct) cataloguing may be termed slightly Prokofieff in flavor, had interesting rhythmic effects, drily witty solo passages, and adroit strettos or concentrations. A less gifted man might have inflated the material of the charming Elegietta, for example, into a lachrymose largo, but Mr. Lopatnikoff knew when to stop.

Mr. Hill's Music for English Horn is just that and no more. He wanted to let us hear how really beautiful and evocative the tone color of this instrument is, especially in the hands of so gifted a performer as Louis Speyer. And this quiet, nostalgic and cultivated music was eminently proper to the occasion, and it was wonderfully played by the soloist. Both composers were in the audience, and both were very warmly received.

It remained for the Mozart and for Casadesus and Koussevitzky to combine for the afternoon's coup de maitre, however. It was for the performance of this superb composition that Mozart received "a very handsome snuffbox" from the Elector of Saxony (it gets its "Coronation" title from the fact he played it again at the elevation of Leopold II the following year), and while it may well be the piano part Mozart played at that time was richer and more detailed than the one which has survived on score, it is not likely that Mozart himself could have imagined so graceful, so finely wrought a performance as that given yesterday. The opening orchestral tutti was a marvel of balance and poise, and with the entrance of the piano the music took off for a flight of fancy rather beyond description, and all this despite the fact that the orchestra and the piano were just a fraction of a notch out of tune. The work is to be repeated on Sunday afternoon and of Dr. Casadesus' piano playing, more then. Schumann's Spring Symphony, which for some reason or other keeps reminding me of the fellow who looked like an unmade bed, brought the concert to an end.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR

Victor rushes Berlioz piece on April list

Dramatizing the importance of its first major symphonic release since the recording ban was lifted last November, Victor will present as a national special release for April the first American and only complete recording of Hector Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" in a performance by William Primrose, by common consent the world's greatest master of the viola, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Moreover, this premiere post-ban major release, according to the announcement, presents the first recordings in nearly five years of the famed Boston orchestra and its equally famed conductor Dr. Koussevitzky.

The first symphonic orchestra to record for Victor (in 1917, under Dr. Karl Muck), the Boston Symphony's recording activities came to an end in early 1940 because of previous nonaffiliation with the musician's union. When, in December of 1942, the orchestra affiliated with the union, the ban against recording was already in effect.

Within 48 hours after the ban was lifted, Victor engineers rushed portable sound equipment from New York to Boston's grey-walled Symphony Hall. On Nov. 15 the doors to the hall were locked, a great red curtain was dropped from the ceiling to seats below 20 feet from the stage to absorb overtones in the empty hall (to which even house employes are not admitted during a recording session), and Victor's engineers went to work.

HOME NEWS

FEB 27 1945

Student Winners of Koussevitzky Contest

Bernard Kastenbaum, 1475 Concourse, and Mary Lynch, 406 E. 160th St., third and fourth from left, were two Bronx winners of the Koussevitzky contest for high school students "Why I Enjoy Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Radio Concerts," conducted recently over WJZ. Others in the group, same order, are Jay B. Stern, of Brooklyn; Norma Kirschenberg, of New York; Yolanda Novak, of Coytesville, N. J., and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, concert conductor.

Richard Tucker

Dr. Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

The Test of a Great Conductor

In war as in peace, the Boston Symphony Orchestra adheres to its tradition of superlative performance. And back of its plans and its ideals looms that giant of music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Institute welcomes his return for the annual Brooklyn series of five Friday night concerts, the first of which will be given on November 17.

It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest, the extent of his vision, and his ability to perfect his orchestra. These qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's have been demonstrated over a lengthening term. He has maintained an absorbing approach to the more familiar classics; he has shown a rewarding catholicity of taste; and he imparts genuine inspiration to the men under his baton. The plans he has announced for the 1944-1945 year reveal another reason for the perennial enjoyment of the Boston Symphony. They will continue to find place for the new composers. It is a striking fact that compositions which Dr. Koussevitzky once had the prophetic vision to see as permanent additions to orchestral repertory have become so. That is because he has sought not the merely new, but the new and good.

To the regular attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts, the gestures of Serge Koussevitzky are a marvel of grace and eloquence. How many of his followers must wish that they could watch him face to face, as his musicians see him! A newspaper reporter, who smuggled himself into a choral group appearing with the orchestra, had just such an experience. He has told how Dr. Koussevitzky takes his place before the "desk," pausing for an instant with head slightly bent. Then he sweeps his glance over the faces of the musicians. Next, he stretches his hand out rather deliberately for the baton. Suddenly both hands are raised and again he eyes the orchestra until there is breathless attention on their part. Then down come the arms, swift but gliding, and the sound of the music rises. The amazing expression of hands, body, and face disclose how Dr. Koussevitzky commands the effects achieved in his music. More, they reveal the subjectiveness of his own statement—"Great music is a necessity of life. Great music makes life complete."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 9 - 1945

Boston Symphony Records Berlioz's 'Harold in Italy'

New York, March 8 — (AP) — The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, has just made its first recording in nearly five years. The work, a five-record album of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as violist, will be released by Victor in April.

It's the first complete recording of the Harold anywhere, and the first time the work has appeared on American discs. It is the first new Victor recording to be released since [illegible] was lifted.

Post

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The brightest spot in yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was the performance of Mozart's D Major ("Coronation" Concerto with Robert Casadesus as the pianist. Incidentally, this was the first performance of the work at the regular concerts of our orchestra. Back in 1941 it was given at the Monday-Tuesday series with Frances Nash as the soloist. We could correctly infer that this is not one of the most popular of Mozart's piano concertos. And since it is possible to have gradations even among masterpieces, it is perhaps accurate to say that it is not one of the greatest. But it contains much that may be described as heavenly and, to continue the celestial figure, Mr. Casadesus and the orchestra, led by Dr. Koussevitsky, played it divinely.

The balance of this week's program contains two first performances, and had the conductor stuck to his original intention of playing Dvorak's Second Symphony, it would have had a revival as well. Possibly that would have been too much unfamiliar music for the audience to take, and by that token it was the course of wisdom to substitute the First Symphony of Schumann. This "Spring" Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitsky has a fondness for playing this time of year, is by no means as fine a work as the generally neglected Second, recalled to us by Mr Szell earlier in the season. There is too much sing-song, too many sequences. The First has long been one of Dr. Koussevitsky's happiest ventures and it is not a pleasure to report that here and there yesterday's performance was mannered, coarse and almost slovenly. Obviously, too much rehearsal time had gone into the preparation of the new music.

This last was not of great import. One piece was a Concertino for Orchestra by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, commissioned by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation. It may be set down as diluted Prokofieff, Stravinsky and Shostakovitch, though technically it is a workman-like job. The composer was present, as was our fellow-townsman, Edward Burlingame Hill, who heard the premier of his "Music for English Horn and Orchestra" and a beautiful rendition of the solo part by Louis Speyer. This is agreeable music in the French idiom that has attracted Mr. Hill so much.

Globe

MUSIC

Mar. 3

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

With two new pieces and a brace of soloists, there is variety in abundance at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week. The new pieces, both receiving first performances, are the Concertino for Orchestra, Op. 30, by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, and Edward Burlingame Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, Op. 50. Of the two soloists, Robert Casadesus is heard in the "Coronation" Piano Concerto (K.537) by Mozart, and the orchestra's distinguished virtuoso of the English horn, Louis Speyer, appears in Mr. Hill's work. The final number of Serge Koussevitzky's program is the "Spring" Symphony of Schumann.

Mr. Lopatnikoff's Concertino is another of the works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and is dedicated to the memory of Mme. Koussevitzky. Set in three movements, Toccata, "Little Elegy" and Finale, the music is modern and mainly abstract, astringently contrapuntal and of what might be called a bristling texture. Toccata and Finale bustle along cheerfully without seeming to make any conspicuous point, and the slow movement is meditation without sentiment. There are strong influences of three other Russians: Prokofieff, Stravinsky and Shostakovitch. Call the work a high-flavored aperitif and you have characterized it sufficiently.

Although the solo melodies of the English horn wind their graceful phrases rather aimlessly, Mr. Hill's modest, three-part composition is a tissue of delightful sound. The style derives from late Impressionism; the orchestration is very delicate and prismatically colored, always allowing the foreground to the solo instrument. As in all Mr. Hill's work, his technical craftsmanship is a model of clarity and polish. Mr. Speyer contributed a magnificent performance. So did Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, in music where virtuosity is everything.

Mozart's "Coronation" Concerto has been conspicuous by its absence from Boston Symphony programs, although Mr. Casadesus played it at the little Mozart Festival in the Berkshires last August. It is music of notable reticence and extremely fine grain, even for Mozart. Perhaps that is the reason for its neglect. It is also superbly wrought, rich in invention, and demands for correct performance a soloist and orchestra sympathetic to Mozart and completely understanding of his style.

Yesterday's performance was more than good; it was just about perfect, having that proverbial running smoothness of "oil and water." Mr. Casadesus' part was evenly articulated, gracefully phrased, subtly rhythmed. The same may be said of the orchestra, which had been reduced in numbers, with five double-basses as foundation. Mr. Casadesus was most enthusiastically received.

The irresistible surge of the "Spring" Symphony made its heartwarming effect, as it always does. Yet for Mr. Koussevitzky this was less than a first-rank performance because it was mannered and not infrequently coarse in accents and the balance of instruments. Nevertheless, Schumann's work is a masterpiece, and it was decidedly nice to hear again.

Herald

MUSIC

Mar 3

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 18th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Robert Casadesus, pianist, and Louis Speyer, English horn. The program:

Concertino for Orchestra, Op. 30 ... Lopatnikoff
Music for English Horn and Orchestra, Op. 50 ... Hill
Concerto in D major (K. 537) "Coronation" ... Mozart
Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Op. 38 ... Schumann

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Robert Casadesus, whose concerto playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always one of the really distinguished events of the season, returned yesterday afternoon to play Mozart for us, and I swear it was the most exquisite performance of a Mozart Concerto I have ever heard, not only by a pianist but by an accompanying orchestra. It was one of those magic occasions when all the variables of concert performance stabilized for a brief moment into perfection.

The whole first half of the concert, in fact, was of superior value through the first performance of two works of rather more than ordinary interest. This is not to say either the Lopatnikoff or the Hill pieces were shockingly good or anything like that. But they were modest, unpretentious, unaffected, content to be themselves. They were obviously written because their composers got the ideas and liked them and because they hoped other people would like them, too. In neither case was there a sense of effort or strain or pomposity. They were both pieces to be enjoyed by everybody today, not for somebody perhaps tomorrow.

True, the Lopatnikoff piece looked a little ahead, the Hill piece a little back. The Concertino, which for quick (but not necessarily correct) cataloguing may be termed slightly Prokofieff in flavor, had interesting rhythmic effects, drily witty solo passages, and adroit strettos or concentrations. A less gifted man might have inflated the material of the charming Elegietta, for example, into a lachrymose largo, but Mr. Lopatnikoff knew when to stop.

Mr. Hill's Music for English Horn is just that and no more. He wanted to let us hear how really beautiful and evocative the tone color of this instrument is, especially in the hands of so gifted a performer as Louis Speyer. And this quiet, nostalgic and cultivated music was eminently proper to the occasion, and it was wonderfully played by the soloist. Both composers were in the audience, and both were very warmly received.

It remained for the Mozart and for Casadesus and Koussevitzky to combine for the afternoon's coup de maitre, however. It was for the performance of this superb composition that Mozart received "a very handsome snuffbox" from the Elector of Saxony (it gets its "Coronation" title from the fact he played it again at the elevation of Leopold II the following year), and while it may well be the piano part Mozart played at that time was richer and more detailed than the one which has survived on score, it is not likely that Mozart himself could have imagined so graceful, so finely wrought a performance as that given yesterday. The opening orchestral tutti was a marvel of balance and poise, and with the entrance of the piano the music took off for a flight of fancy rather beyond description, and all this despite the fact that the orchestra and the piano were just a fraction of a notch out of tune. The work is to be repeated on Sunday afternoon and of Dr. Casadesus' piano playing, more then. Schumann's Spring Symphony, which for some reason or other keeps reminding me of the fellow who looked like an unmade bed, brought the concert to an end.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR

MAR 10 1945

Victor rushes Berlioz piece on April list

Dramatizing the importance of its first major symphonic release since the recording ban was lifted last November, Victor will present as a national special release for April the first American and only complete recording of Hector Berlioz'r "Harold in Italy" in a performance by William Primrose, by common consent the world's greatest master of the viola, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Moreover, this premiere post-ban major release, according to the announcement, presents the first recordings in nearly five years of the famed Boston orchestra and its equally famed conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky.

The first symphonic orchestra to record for Victor (in 1917, under Dr. Karl Muck), the Boston Symphony's recording activities came to an end in early 1940 because of previous nonaffiliation with the musician's union. When, in December of 1942, the orchestra affiliated with the union, the ban against recording was already in effect.

Within 48 hours after the ban was lifted, Victor engineers rushed portable sound equipment from New York to Boston's grey-walled Symphony Hall. On Nov. 15 the doors to the hall were locked, a great red curtain was dropped from the ceiling to seats below 20 feet from the stage to absorb overtones in the empty hall (to which even house employes are not admitted during a recording session), and Victor's engineers went to

THE PHILA.FORUM
PHILA., PA
MARCH, 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY

To Give Two Concerts

THE Boston Symphony, "the King of Orchestras," as Olin Downes puts it, will return Thursday evening, March 15, for its annual concert for the members of The Philadelphia Forum. And for the first time in many years it will return for a second concert, on April 12, for the public, also under The Forum's auspices.

Just before the outbreak of the Civil War, Henry Lee Higginson was a music student in Vienna, where he was vividly impressed with the beauty of Beethoven, Schubert and Haydn as performed by a highly expert orchestra. He longed for a similar opportunity for his own city of Boston and twenty years later, when business success had brought him sufficient means, he organized and established a symphony orchestra. He engaged the best musicians he could find, and induced Georg Henschel, a young singer, composer and conductor of undoubted talent, to be their leader. After three years Henschel was succeeded by Wilhelm Gericke, who served as conductor from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906. From 1889 to 1893 the orchestra leader was a young firebrand named Arthur Nikisch, whose conducting in Leipzig had been a sensation throughout Europe, and he was succeeded in Boston by his successor also in Leipzig, Emil Paur, who remained in Boston for five years.

Now the task before Mr. Higginson in 1906 was to secure a conductor who could make the orchestra as illustrious as the finest in the world, and the choice fell on Karl Muck, conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin. After two years Dr. Muck was recalled by the German government and from 1908 to 1912 the orchestra was conducted by his former colleague in Hamburg, Max Fiedler. In 1912 Dr. Muck was permitted to return to Boston and until 1918, when the stress of war caused his resignation, the Boston Symphony, beyond question, excelled every other orchestra.

During the 1918-1919 season Henri Rabaud, distinguished Parisian composer, occupied the post, to be succeeded for five years by Pierre Monteux, brilliant French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, who has for many years past been the great conductor of another great orchestra, San Francisco.

The time, 1924, was again at hand for an illustrious personality, an artist of imagination and daring to revitalize a superb instrument ready to respond to his every wish.

Serge Koussevitzky had organized and conducted an orchestra in Moscow and St. Petersburg. He was accounted a leader of commanding power, a pioneer ready to break a lance for new music by publication and by performance. He conducted in western Europe, and his Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris were found a new and electrifying experience. Anticipation ran high when, in September, 1924, he first set foot on American shores.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in its sixty-fourth season and a third of its years have been Koussevitzky years. They have been years of a single and uninterrupted leadership, of stability in membership, and of the coordination which these conditions have made possible. The present expansion of the orchestra's activities is the result of these years. Extra-seasonal activities, including the foundation of a unique school, now leave only the month of September without concerts. The orchestra's public and its influence in behalf of music have vastly grown.

This has been accomplished without compromise. It is not enough that Dr. Koussevitsky has brought the orchestra to a tonal richness, a brilliance of virtuosity, and a warmth of response quite beyond compare. He looks always to a more complete capturing of beauty. To a great artist in the fullness of his day, his art is always an adventure, a new testing.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Koussevitzky Suggests Taxes for Music Support

A [illegible] year to [illegible] tax for [illegible] music [illegible] Kousse- [illegible] Boston [illegible] has been [illegible] years [illegible] Russia [illegible] work here [illegible] 500,000 tax- [illegible] said the [illegible] to add half [illegible] income tax bill [illegible] symphony or- [illegible] and [illegible] chamber [illegible] conservatories (state-

[illegible] also would [illegible] turning from

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

MAR

AMONG the recent offerings of new symphonic music was "The Feast During the Plague," composed by Arthur Vincent Lourié and introduced here by the Boston Symphony under the knowing guidance of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Lourié's ~~score~~, derived from one of his ballets, is well written and the movements start promisingly, but the net result isn't particularly striking. In addition, the Philharmonic-Symphony and Artur Rodzinski lately delivered the première of Paul Creston's second symphony. It is pleasant music, though not as interesting as Mr. Creston's first symphony, which won the New York Music Critics' Circle award two years ago. Mr. Creston handled his material adroitly, but I'm afraid that the basic thematic substance is not rich enough. Another Philharmonic-Symphony first-timer was Virgil Thomson's "Symphony on a Hymn Tune," for which Mr. Thomson appeared as conductor. This symphony was composed in the twenties and somewhat revised last year. It is musicianly and ingenious but rather jumpy, and not so appealing and effective as many of Mr. Thomson's other works. The soloist at this concert was Wanda Landowska, who, to no one's surprise, contributed superlative performances in a Mozart piano concerto and Haydn concerto for harpsichord. —ROBERT A. SIMON

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 9 1945

First Boston Symphony Recording in 5 Years

NEW YORK, March 8 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, has just made its first recording in nearly five years. The work, a five-record album of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as violist, will be released by Victor in April.

It's the first complete recording of the Harold anywhere, and the first time the work has appeared on American discs. It is the first new Victor recording to be released since the Petrillo ban was lifted.

[58]

THE PHILA. FORUM
PHILA., PA
MARCH, 1945

4

BOSTON SYMPHONY

To Give Two Concerts

THE Boston Symphony, "the King of Orchestras," as Olin Downes puts it, will return Thursday evening, March 15, for its annual concert for the members of The Philadelphia Forum. And for the first time in many years it will return for a second concert, on April 12, for the public, also under The Forum's auspices.

Just before the outbreak of the Civil War, Henry Lee Higginson was a music student in Vienna, where he was vividly impressed with the beauty of Beethoven, Schubert and Haydn as performed by a highly expert orchestra. He longed for a similar opportunity for his own city of Boston and twenty years later, when business success had brought him sufficient means, he organized and established a symphony orchestra. He engaged the best musicians he could find, and induced Georg Henschel, a young singer, composer and conductor of undoubted talent, to be their leader. After three years Henschel was succeeded by Wilhelm Gericke, who served as conductor from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906. From 1889 to 1893 the orchestra leader was a young firebrand named Arthur Nikisch, whose conducting in Leipzig had been a sensation throughout Europe, and he was succeeded in Boston by his successor also in Leipzig, Emil Paur, who remained in Boston for five years.

Now the task before Mr. Higginson in 1906 was to secure a conductor who could make the orchestra as illustrious as the finest in the world, and the choice fell on Karl Muck, conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin. After two years Dr. Muck was recalled by the German government and from 1908 to 1912 the orchestra was conducted by his former colleague in Hamburg, Max Fiedler. In 1912 Dr. Muck was permitted to return to Boston and until 1918, when the stress of war caused his resignation, the Boston Symphony, beyond question, excelled every other orchestra.

During the 1918-1919 season Henri Rabaud, distinguished Parisian composer, occupied the post, to be succeeded for five years by Pierre Monteux, brilliant French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, who has for many years past been the great conductor of another great orchestra, San Francisco.

The time, 1924, was again at hand for an illustrious personality, an artist of imagination and daring to revitalize a superb instrument ready to respond to his every wish.

Serge Koussevitzky had organized and conducted an orchestra in Moscow and St. Petersburg. He was accounted a leader of commanding power, a pioneer ready to break a lance for new music by publication and by performance. He conducted in western Europe, and his Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris were found a new and electrifying experience. Anticipation ran high when, in September, 1924, he first set foot on American shores.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in its sixty-fourth season and a third of its years have been Koussevitzky years. They have been years of a single and uninterrupted leadership, of stability in membership, and of the coordination which these conditions have made possible. The present expansion of the orchestra's activities is the result of these years. Extra-seasonal activities, including the foundation of a unique school, now leave only the month of September without concerts. The orchestra's public and its influence in behalf of music have vastly grown.

